PATRICK J. WHELAN, the man against whom suspicion was thus directed, was born near Dublin, Ireland, about the year 1840. He is therefore now not yet thirty years of age. He served the full term of his apprenticeship to a tailor, commencing at his fourteenth year; but, after having learned his trade, he seems to have led a wandering life, traveling to and fro among several of the principal towns of England, working at his trade so far as it was necessary to meet his wants. After four or five years of this roving life, about the year 1865 he arrived in Canada. For some time he resided in Quebec, working industriously at his trade. He seems to have favored the Fenian organization from the first. His enthusiasm led him at one time to the commission of some rash act, for which he was arrested, but left to go unpunished. It is supposed that he had some connection with the Fenian raid of 1866, as he was in Buffalo, New York, about that time. We next find him at Hamilton, in Canada. He thence returned to Buffalo, and soon afterward went to Montreal, where he resided about a year, during which time he married a lady possessed of a snug little property, and of undoubted respectability. For the lady it proved a most unfortunate marriage. He associated with the Fenians in Montreal, and was a prominent member of the St. Patrick's Society, of whose proceedings Mr. M'GEE made a most uncompromising exposure. In the Fall of 1867 WHELAN came to Ottawa, and while there his conduct was extremely suspicious.

WHELAN is described as being by no means a bad-looking man, but is said to be a person of violent temper and strong impulses. He was known in Montreal and Quebec at times by the name of "Sullivan." Shortly before the murder he was in the habit of attending Fenian meetings in Montreal; and it was given in evidence that he was selected by his fellow-conspirators for some important deed. He appears to have followed M'GEE for some time, as the latter oscillated between Montreal and Ottawa. WHELAN had opposed M'GEE'S return to Parliament, and was in the habit of speaking of him as a traitor who deserved to be shot. Many times he distinctly threatened that he himself would shoot M'GEE. The evidence shows that an attempt had been made upon M'GEE'S life in Montreal, but had failed of success. WHELAN had purchased a pistol, and had practiced with it; this weapon had been found loaded in his drawer at Ottawa. He had been seen going to the House of Commons with this pistol in his pocket. He was a frequent visitor at the House. On the very night of the murder he had been seen there with four or five companions at half past nine o'clock, and his restless manner attracted notice. When Mr. M'GEE, after a lengthy and most eloquent address on the main of the Session, left the Chamber, WHELAN was seen to get up and leave the gallery. But M'GEE had only gone to the library, and WHELAN was next observed near the porch as the House adjourned, evidently watching for some one.

PATRICK J. WHELAN, CONDEMNED FOR THE MURDER OF T. D'ARCY M'GEE.

There was a large amount of circumstantial evidence brought forward on the trial. It was proved that M'GEE had tried to escape the assassin on that fatal night. His footsteps were heard as of one running, also his hurried knocking when he reached his door just the moment before he received the fatal shot. The act was witnessed by a French Canadian named LACROIX, who saw the murderer come in behind M'GEE; he heard the shot, and saw the assassin turn away and come in collision with a post, and exclaim "Jesus!"—a phrase which (as was proved by other witnesses) WHELAN frequently used. This LACROIX identified the prisoner as the man whom he had seen fire the pistol.

The testimony of ANDREW CULLEN, a detective officer of Montreal, is most direct. On the evening of April 16 he heard WHELAN in his cell in the Ottawa jail engaged in conversation with his confederate, DOYLE, who occupied a cell on the same corridor. He heard DOYLE say, "JAMES, I'm sorry you ever done it;" to which WHELAN replied that he didn't care; that he was ready to swing. WHELAN on this occasion distinctly confessed to having committed the murder. This testimony was confirmed by that of ROBERT HESS, who accompanied Detective CULLEN on the morning of the conversation alluded to, also by the evidence of Mr. LITLE, a respectable farmer of Nepean.

The Judge's charge was simply a commentary upon some parts of the evidence. The jury on the morning of September 15 brought in a verdict of "Guilty." The Judge having asked the prisoner at the bar whether he had any reason to urge why the Court should not pronounce judgment against him, WHELAN advanced to the front of the dock and addressed the court and the jury. He protested his innocence of the murder; denied that he had ever been a Fenian. He had, he said, once taken the name of "Sullivan" when arrested and brought before a judge; but that had been to prevent his own name from being paraded in the papers. He denied having taken an active part in the last Parliamentary election. He had heard of a plot to burn Mr. M'GEE'S house, and had given warning. He professed the sincerest loyalty for the Queen. He declared that he had never had any private animus against M'GEE. He admitted that the evidence was against him; and said that if he had been in the place of the jury, getting the same evidence, he should probably have brought in the same verdict; but he claimed that the evidence had been manufactured. He finally began to enter upon a political address concerning the oppression of Irishmen, when he was interrupted by the Chief Justice, who, after telling him that he had had an impartial trial, sentenced him to be hung on the 10th of December next between the hours of 9 A.M. and 4 P.M.

It is not for us to judge as to the justice of WHELAN'S trial. To all appearance it was, as Chief-Justice RICHARDS said, fair and impartial. We can not believe that in any civilized country a man could be arrested for so great a crime without having fairly laid himself open to just suspicion. Nor can we suppose that evidence so strong and so mutually confirmatory, one part of another, could have been manufactured. And really there was no motive for such gross injustice on the part of the prosecution. It is nothing new for a prisoner at the bar to protest his innocence. But WHELAN denied too much to gain credence from any one who carefully examines the evidence. His address, just before his sentence, probably only confirmed the conviction of the jury as to his guilt.

As our own civil strife tended to soften the indignation with which we had almost invariably witnessed the attempts of other governments to suppress rebellion, so have the acts of BOOTH and of his fellow-conspirators led us to sympathize with those governments as against political assassins.

THE DEAD SOLDIER AND HIS DOG.

It has long been a favorite theory with a certain class of philosophers that animals possess and evince faculties precisely the same as those of man, differing only in the degree of intelligence. There are undoubtedly many incidents which prove the existence of the senses of memory, affection, hatred, and revenge; and one of the most frequently quoted instances is that of the Dead Soldier's Dog, which we illustrate on this page. It has been given in various styles for ages back, but still the old familiar story is a welcome one.

A French soldier, who was in the last campaign of NAPOLEON, carried with him a favorite dog, of which he was very fond, and which became much attached to his master. The soldier was wounded at Waterloo, but managed to escape from the field and join in the disastrous retreat to Paris. But he was not able to proceed far; becoming weakened by the loss of blood from his wound and his overexertions to escape the enemy, he fell exhausted by the road-side, and, attended only by his faithful dog, at last died of hunger and exposure. His friend remained faithful even after death, watching by his dead body, and protecting it from the carrion which hovered about, until, finally weakened and exhausted too, he lay down and died by his master's side.

"AND THERE HOLDING THE LANTERN ABOVE HIS EYES, HE SAW ALL THAT WAS LEFT FOR HIM TO SEE OF HIS BRIDE."

LA MERE BAUCHE.

IN TWO PARTS.

PART II.

AND now it was the evening before Adolphe's expected arrival, and La Mère Bauche was discussing the matter with the Capitaine, over the usual cup of coffee. Madame Bauche had of late become rather nervous on the matter, thinking that they had been somewhat rash in acceding so much to Marie. It seemed to her that it was absolutely now left to the two young lovers to say whether they would have each other or not. Now nothing on earth could be further from Madame Bauche's intention than this. Her desire and resolve was to heap down blessings on all persons concerned—provided always that she could have her own way; but, provided she did not have her own way, to heap down—any thing but blessings. She had her code of morality in this matter. She would do good, if possible, to every body around her. But she would not on any score be induced to consent that Adolphe should marry MarieClavert. Should that be in the wind she would rid her house of Marie, the Capitaine, and even of Adolphe himself.

She had become, therefore, somewhat querulous and self-opinionated in her discussions with her friend.

"I don't know," she said, on the evening in question—"I don't know; it may be all right; but if Adolphe turns against us, what are we to do then?"

"Mère Bauche," said the Capitaine, sipping his coffee, and puffing out the smoke of his cigar, "Adolphe will not turn against us."

It had been remarked by many that the Capitaine was more at home in the house, and somewhat freer in his manner of talking with Madame Bauche, since this matrimonial alliance had been on the tapis, than he had ever been before. La Mère herself observed it, and did not quite like it; but how could she prevent it now? When the Capitaine was once married, she would make him know his place, in spite of all her promises to Marie.

"But if he says that he likes the girl?" continued Madame Bauche.

"My friend, you may be sure that he will say nothing of the kind. He has not been away two years without seeing girls as pretty as Marie. And then you have his letter."

"That is nothing, Capitaine. He would eat his letter as quick as you would an omelette aux fines herbes." Now the Capitaine was especially quick over an omelette aux fines herbes.

"And, Mère Bauche, you also have the purse. He will know that he can not eat that, except with your good-will."

"Ah!" exclaimed Madame Bauche, "poor lad! he has not a sous in the world unless I give it to him." But it did not seem that this reflection was in itself displeasing to her.

"Adolphe will now be a man of the world," continued the Capitaine. "He will know that it does not do to throw away every thing for a pair of red lips. That is the folly of a boy, and Adolphe will be no longer a boy. Believe me, Mère Bauche, things will be right enough."

"And then we shall have Marie sick, and ill, and half-dying on our hands," said Madame Bauche.

This was not flattering to the Capitaine, and so he felt it. "Perhaps so; perhaps not," he said; "but, at any rate, she will get over it. It is a malady which rarely kills young women—especially when another alliance awaits them."

"Bah!" said Madame Bauche; and in saying that word she avenged herself for the too great liberty which the Capitaine had lately taken. He shrugged his shoulders, took a pinch of snuff, and, uninvited, helped himself to a tea-spoonful of cognac. Then the conference ended, and on the next morning, before breakfast, Adolphe Bauche arrived.

On that morning poor Marie hardly knew how to bear herself. A month or two back, and even up to the last day or two, she had felt a sort of confidence that Adolphe would be true to her; but the nearer that came, that fatal day, the less strong was the confidence of the poor girl. She knew that those two long-headed, aged councilors were plotting against her happiness, and she felt that she could hardly dare to hope for success with such terrible foes opposed to her. On the evening before the day Madame Bauche had met her in the passages, and kissed her as she wished her good-night. Marie knew little about sacrifices, but she felt that it was a sacrificial kiss.

In those days a sort of diligence, with the mails for Olette, passed through Prades early in the morning, and a conveyance was sent from Vernet to bring Adolphe to the baths. Never was prince or princess expected with more anxiety. Madame Bauche was up and dressed long before the hour, and was heard to say five several times that she was sure he would not come. The Capitaine was out and on the high-road moving about with his wooden leg as perpendicular as a hangpost, and almost as black. Marie also was up; but nobody had seen her. She was up, and had been out about the place before any of them were stirring; but what she had would was on the move she lay hidden, like a hare in its form.

And then the old char-à-banc clattered up to the door, and children came out of it into his mother's arms. He was fatter and finer than she had hitherto seen him, had a larger beard, was more handsomely clothed, and certainly looked more like a man. Marie also saw him out of her little window, and she thought that he looked like a god. Was it possible, she said to herself, that one so godlike would still care for her?

The mother was delighted with her son, who rattled away like a child in his ease. He shook hands very cordially with the Capitaine—of whose intended alliance with his own sweet-heart he had been informed; and then, as he entered the house with his hand under his mother's arm, he asked one question about her. "And where is Marie?" said he. "Marie! Oh, my stars! You shall see her after breakfast," said La Mère Bauche. And in effect breakfast the house, and sent in to breakfast among the guests. Every body who heard something of the story, and they were all on the alert to hear it, thought very much who was want of love was considered to be of so much importance.

"You will see that it will be all right," said the Capitaine, carrying his head very high.

"I think so, I think so," said La Mère Bauche, who, now that her son Adolphe was right, no longer desired to contradict him.

"I know that it will be all right," said the Capitaine. "I will undertake that Adolphe would make a man; and he is a man. Look at him. He does not care this for Marie Clavart," and the Capitaine, with admirable eloquence in the motion, pitched over a neighboring wall a small stone which he held in his hand.

And then they all went to breakfast with many signs of outward joy, and not without some inward joy, for Madame Bauche thought she saw that her son was fond of his love. In the mean time Marie sat up stairs, still afraid to show herself.

"He has come," said a young girl, a servant in the house, running up to the door of Marie's room.

"Yes," said Marie, "I could see that he has come."

"And oh, how beautiful he is!" said the girl, putting her hands together, and looking up to the ceiling. Marie in her heart of hearts wished that he was not half so beautiful, as then her chance of being loved by him might be greater.

"And the company are all talking to him as if he were the prefect."

"Never mind who is talking to him," said Marie. "Go away, and leave me: you are wanted for your work." Why before this was he not talking to her? Why not, if he really true to her? Alas, it began to fall upon her mind that he would be false! And what then? what should she do then? She sat still gloomily, thinking of that other spouse that had been promised to her.

At noon after breakfast as was possible Adolphe was invited to a conference in his mother's private room. She had much debated in her own mind whether the Capitaine should be invited to this conference or no. For many reasons she would have wished to exclude him. She did not like to speak her son that she was able to manage her own affairs, and she would have been well pleased to make the Capitaine understand that his assistance was not absolutely necessary to her. But then she had an inward fear that her green spectacles would not now be as effectual on Adolphe as they had once been, in old days, before he had seen the world and become a man. It might be necessary that he too, being a man, should be opposed by a man. So the Capitaine was invited to the conference.

What took place there need not be described at length. The three were closeted for two hours, at the end of which time they came forth together. The countenance of Madame Bauche was serene and comfortable; her hopes of ultimate success were brighter than ever. The face of the Capitaine was troubled, as are always the faces of great diplomatists; he walked placid and upright, and kept his wooden leg with an ease and skill that was absolutely marvellous. But poor Adolphe's brow was clouded. Yes; poor Adolphe! For he was poor in spirit. He had pledged himself to give up Marie, and to accept the liberal allowance which his mother tendered him; but it was a terrible thing for him now to communicate these tidings to poor Marie herself.

"Could not you tell her?" he had said to his mother, with very little of that manliness in his face on which his mother now so prided herself. But La Mère Bauche explained to him that it was a part of the general agreement that Marie was to hear his decision from his own mouth.

"But you need not regard it," said the Capitaine, with the most indifferent air in the world. "The girl expects it. Only she has some childish idea that she is bound till you yourself release her. I don't think she will be troublesome." Adolphe at that moment did feel that he should have liked to kick the Capitaine out of his mother's house.

And where should the meeting take place? In the hall of the baths, suggested Madame Bauche; because, as she observed, they could walk round and round, and nobody ever went there at that time of day. But to this Adolphe objected. It would be so cold, and dismal, and melancholy.

The Capitaine thought that Mère Bauche's little parlor was the place, but La Mère herself did not like this. They might be overheard, as she well knew, and the gossiping of the evening would not conclude without some sobs that would certainly be bitter, and might perhaps be loud.

"Send her up to the grotto and I will follow her," said Adolphe. On this, therefore, they agreed. Now the grotto was a natural excavation in a high rock, which stood precipitously upright over the establishment of the baths. A steep zigzag path, which almost overhanging steps, had been made along the face of the rock from a little flower-garden attached to the house, which lay immediately under the mountain. And also along the front of the hotel ran a brawling stream, leaving barely-room for a road between it and the door. Over this there was a wooden bridge leading to the garden, and some two or three hundred yards from the bridge began the steps by which the ascent was made to the grotto.

When the season was full and the weather perfectly warm the place was much frequented. There was a good table d'hôte, and one or five dejeuné chairs; a green garden-seat also was there, which, however, had been removed into the intermost hole created by the excavation, as the hinder legs were somewhat at fault. A walk about two feet high ran along the face of it, guarding its occupants from the precipice. In fact, it was no grotto, but a little cavern in the rock, such as we often see up above our heads in rocky valleys, and it was to this somewhat steep steps had been turned into a source of exercise and amusement for the visitors at the hotel.

Standing on the wall over the hotel door into the garden, and down also upon the shining slate roof of Madame Bauche's house, and to the left might be seen the comfortable, new-topped top of the stern old Canigon, king of mountains among those Eastern Pyrenees.

And to this place Adolphe undertook to send Marie up to the grotto, and Adolphe undertook to follow her thither. It was now spring; and though the white hat and the white cow was no longer lying on the lower peaks, still the air was fresh and cold, and there was no danger that any of the visitors would have been induced to visit the place.

"Make her put on her cloak, Mère Bauche," said the Capitaine, who did not wish that his bride should have a cold in her head on their wedding-day. La Mère Bauche prided and pleased herself on her ability to attend to pay any attention to recommendations on such subjects from the Capitaine. But nevertheless, when Marie was seen slowly to creep across the little bridge about fifteen minutes after this time, she had a handkerchief on her head, and was closely wrapped in a dark brown cloak.

Poor Marie herself little headed the cold, frosty air, but she was thinking of other evils, when by means by which she might hide her face. When Madame Bauche sought her out in her own little room, and with a smiling face and kind kiss bade her go to the grotto, she knew, or fancied that she knew, that it was all over.

"He will tell you the truth—how it all is," said La Mère. "We will do all we can, you know, to make you happy, Marie. But you must remember what I told you. Be Carè old up the other day. In this vale of tears we can not have every thing, as we shall have some day, when our prayers looked would have been prayed of all their wickedness. Now go, dear, and take your cloak."

"Yes, maman."

"And Adolphe will come to you. And try and behave well, like a sensible girl."

"Yes, maman," she had answered, bearing on her brow another sacrificial kiss, and bearing in her heart such an unutterable load of woe!

Adolphe had risen out of his bed during her—but standing in the stable-yard, well within the gate so that she should not see him, he watched her slowly crossing the bridge and mounting the first flight of the steps. He had often seen her tripping up those stairs, and had almost as often followed her with his eyes as she did so. Then, when she would hear him, would run; and then he would catch her breathless at the top, and steal kisses from her when all the breath that could have been robbed from her by her efforts at escape. There was no such running now, no such following; no thought of such kisses.

As for him, he would fain have skulked off and shirked the interview had he dared. But he did not dare. He knew that the hour of hard words, for some ten minutes, speaking a word now and then to the bath-man who was standing by, just to show that he was at hand, and the bath-man knew that he was not at his ease. Such would-be lies as those rarely achieve deception—are rarely believed. And then, at the end of the ten minutes, with steps as slow as Marie's had been, he also ascended to the grotto.

Marie had reached the top from the top, but so that she herself should not be seen. He, however, had not once lifted up his head to look for her; but, with eyes turned to the ground, had plodded his way up to the cave. When he entered she was standing in the middle, with her eyes downcast, and her hands clasped before her. She had retired some way from the wall, so that no eyes might possibly see her but those of her false lover. There she stood when he entered, striving to stand motionless, but trembling like a leaf in every limb.

It was only when he reached the top step that he made up his mind how he would behave. Perhaps, after all, the Capitaine was right; perhaps she would not mind it.

"Marie," said he, with a voice that attempted to be cheerful, "this is an odd place to meet in after such a long absence;" and he held out his hand to her. But only his hand! He offered her no salute. He did not even kiss her cheek as a brother would have done! Of the rules of the curtsey she it must be remembered that poor Marie knew but little. He had been a brother to her before he had become her lover.

But Marie took his hand, saying, "Yes; it had been very long."

"And now that I have come back," he went on to say, "it seems that we are all in a conclusion together. I never knew such a piece of work. However, it is all for the best, I suppose."

"Perhaps so," said Marie, still trembling violently, and still looking down upon the ground. And then there was silence between them for a minute or so.

"I tell you what it is, Marie," he said Adolphe at last, dropping her hand and making a great effort to get through the work before him; "I am afraid we two have been very foolish. Don't you think we have?" It seems quite clear that we can never get ourselves married. Don't you see it in that light?"

Marie's head turned round and round with her, but she was not of the fainting order. She took three steps backward, and leaned against the wall of the cave. She also was trying to think how she might best fight her battle. Was there no chance for her? Could no eloquence, no love prove of avail? Her own love she counted but little; but might not prayers do something, and a reference to those old vows which had been so frequent, so eager, so solemnly pledged between them?

"Never get ourselves married!" she said, repeating the words. "Never, Adolphe? Can we never be married?"

"Upon my word, my dear girl, I fear not. You see my mother would not consent."

"But we could wait, could we not?"

"Ah, but that's just it, Marie. We can not wait. My mother has no money—to-day. So that I can do nothing without money from her. And as for you, you see she won't even let you stay in the house unless you accept Capitaine at once. He's a very good sort of fellow though, old as he is; and if you do marry him, why you see you'll be quite right. You'll have your own way in every thing. As for me, I shall come and see you all from time to time, and shall be able to push my way as I never could."

"Then, Adolphe, you wish me to marry the Capitaine?"

"Upon my honor, I think it is the best thing you can do: I do, indeed."

"Oh, Adolphe!"

"What can I do for you, you know? Suppose I was to go down to my mother and tell her that I had decided to keep you myself, what would come of it? I look at it in that light, Marie."

"She could not turn you out—you, her own son!"

"But she would turn you out, and deuced quick too. I can assure you of that; I can, upon my honor."

"I should not care that!" and she made a motion with her hand to show how indifferent she would be to such treatment as regarded herself.

"You don't? I still hold the promise of your love."

"But what would you do?"

"I would work. There are other houses besides that one," and she pointed to the slate roofs of the Bauche establishment.

"And for me, I should have nothing—not a penny in the world," said the young man.

She came up to him and took his right hand between both of hers and pressed it warmly, oh, so warmly. "You would have my love," said she; "my deepest, warmest, best heart's love. I should want nothing more, nothing, nothing on earth, if I could still have yours," and she leaned against his shoulder and looked with all her eyes into his face.

"But, Marie, that's nonsense, you know."

"No, Adolphe; it is not nonsense. Do not let them teach you that. What does love mean if it does not mean that? Oh, Adolphe, you do love me, you do love me, you do love me?"

"Yes—I love you," he said, slowly, as though he would not have said it if he could have helped it. And then he put his arm slowly round her waist, as though in that also he could not help himself.

"And do not I also love you?" said the passionate girl. "Oh, I do, so dearly; with all my heart, with all my soul. Adolphe, I so love you that I could die for you. Have I not sworn to be yours; sworn, sworn a thousand times? How can I marry that man? Oh, Adolphe! how can you think that I should marry him?" and she clung to him, and looked at him, and besought him with her eyes.

"I should not like you to do so"—and then he paused. It was hard to tell her that he was willing to sacrifice her to the old man because he wanted money from his mother.

"Only what? But, Adolphe, do not wish it at all! Have you not sworn that I should be your wife? Look here, look at this!" and she brought out from her bosom a little charm that he had given her in return for that cross. "Did you not kiss it before you swore before the figure of the Virgin that I should be your wife? And do you not remember that I feared to swear so too, because your mother was angry, and then you made me? After that, Adolphe! oh, Adolphe! Tell me that I may have some hope. I will wait; oh, I will wait so patiently!"

He turned himself away from her and walked backward and forward uneasily through the grotto. He did love her—after a sort—as much as love sweet, pretty girls. The warmth of her hand, the softness of her touch, the pure, bright passion of her tear-laden eye had rewaked what power of love there was within him. But what was he to do? Even if he were willing to give up the immediate golden hopes which his mother had held out to him, how was he to begin, and then how carry out this work of self-devotion? Marie would be turned away, and he would be left a victim in the hands of his mother, and of that stiff, wooden-legged militaire—a penniless victim, left to mope about the place without a grain of hope or even a morsel of pleasure.

"But what can we do?" he exclaimed again, as he once more met Marie's searching eyes.

"We can be true and honest, and we can wait," she said, coming close up to him and taking hold of his arm. "I do not fear it, and she will not fear my mother, Adolphe. You need not fear your own mother."

"Fear? No, of course I don't fear. But I don't see how the very devil you can manage it."

"Will you let me tell her that I will not marry the Capitaine, that I will not give up your promises, and that I am ready to leave the house?"

"It would do no good."

"It would do very good, Adolphe, if I had your promise and word and assurance—if I could hear from your voice one more tone of love. Do you not remember this place? It was here that you forced me to say that I loved you. Is it here also that you will tell me that I have been deceived?"

"It is not I that would deceive you," he said.

"I wonder that you should be so hard upon me. God knows that I have trouble enough!"

"Of course, if I am trouble to you, be it so. Be it as you wish;" and she leaned back against the wall of the rock, and, crossing her arms upon her breast, looked up to the sky, whilst tears from her eyes upon the sharp granite peaks of Canigon.

He again betook himself to walk backward and forward before her eyes. He had had enough of love for her to make him wish to marry her; quite enough, now, at this moment, to make the idea of her marrying the Capitaine very distasteful to him; enough, probably, to make him become a decently-good husband to her, should he ever be enabled to marry her. Not enough to enable him to support all the punishment which would be the sure effect of his mother's displeasure. Besides, there was the chance that he would give up Marie—had entirely given in his adhesion to that plan of the marriage with the Capitaine. Even in the course of his future life, as marked out for him by his mother, was the one which is behooved him, as a man, to follow. It was his work to make of her a man which had been specially urged on him with all the Capitaine's eloquence, and he had entirely accepted. It is so easy to get over the needs of one's own —so weak in mind, and so weak in pocket—when the arguments are backed by a promise of two thousand francs a year.

"I'll tell you what I will do," at last he said; "I'll get my mother by herself, and ask her to let the matter rest for a time. It is for the present."

"Not if it be a trouble, M. Adolphe;" and the proud girl still held her hands upon her bosom, and still looked away toward the mountains.

"You know what I mean, Marie. You can understand how she and the Capitaine are worrying me."

"But tell me, Adolphe; do you love me?"

"You know I love you, only—"

"And you will not give me up?"

"I will ask my mother. I will try to make her yield."

Marie could not feel that she received much confidence from her lover's promise; but still, even that, weak and unsteady as it was, even that was better than absolute false-hood. So she thanked him, promised him with tears in her eyes that she would always, always be faithful to him, and then began to creep down to her home. She would follow, she said, as soon as his passing had ceased to be observed.

Adolphe stood at him as though she expected some sign of renewed love. But no such sign was vouchsafed to her; now that she thirsted for the touch of his lips she was left to go as she used to her. He did as she bade him: he went down, slowly loitering, by himself, and in about half an hour she followed him, unobserved crept to her chamber.

Again we will pass over what took place between the mother and the son; but that in that evening, after the guests had gone to bed, Marie received a message desiring her to wait on Madame Bauche in a small room off the principal out from one end of the house. It was intended as a private sitting-room, should any special strangers arrive who might accompany Capitaine, and therefore was but seldom used. Here she found La Mère Bauche, sitting in an arm-chair behind a small table on which were two candles; and on a sofa against the wall sat Adolphe. The Capitaine was not in the room.

"Shut the door, Marie, and come in and sit down," said Madame Bauche. It was easy to understand from the tone of her voice that she was angry and stern, in an unbending mood, and resolved to carry out to the very letter all the threats conveyed by those terrible spectacles.

Marie did as she was bid. She closed the door, and sat down on the chair that was nearest to it.

"Marie," said La Mère Bauche—and the voice sounded fierce in the poor girl's ears, and a glowering look from the glimmered over the green glasses—"what is all this that I hear? Do you dare to say that you hold my son bound to marry you?" And then the august mother paused for an answer.

But Marie had no answer to give. She looked supplicantly toward her lover as though beseeching him to carry on the fight for her. But if she could not do battle for herself, certainly he could not do it for her. Any chance there was of fighting he had had in him had been thoroughly vanquished before her arrival.

"I will have an answer, and that immediately," said Madame Bauche. "I am not going to be betrayed into ignominy and disgrace by the object of my own charity. Who picked you out of the gutter, Miss, and brought you up and fed you when you would otherwise have gone to the foundling? And is this your gratitude for it all? You are not satisfied with being fed and clothed, and cherished by me, but you must rob me of my son! Know this, then: Adolphe shall never marry a child of charity, such as you are."

Marie sat still, stunned by the harshness of these words. Mère Bauche had often scolded her; indeed she was given to much scolding; but she had scolded her as a mother may scold a child. And when the story of Marie's foundling reached her ears she had been very angry, but her anger had never brought her to such a pass as this. Mère Bauche had not hitherto been taught to look at the matter in this light. No one had heretofore twitted her with eating the bread of charity. It had not occurred to her that on this account she was unfit to be Adolphe's wife. There, in that valley, they were all so nearly equal that no idea of her own superiority had ever pressed itself upon her mind. But now—

When the voice ceased the girl looked at him; but it was no longer with a beseeching look. Did he also altogether scorn her? That was now the inquiry which her eyes were turned upon to make. No; she could not say that he did. It seemed to her that his energies were chiefly exerted in pulling to pieces the tassel of the sofa cushion.

"And now, Miss, let me know at once, whether this scene is to be over or not," continued La Mère Bauche. "And I will tell you this at once: I am not going to maintain you here, in my house, to be a constant burden and nuisance. As Marie Clavert you shall not stay here. Capitaine Campan is willing to marry you, and as his wife I, La Mère Bauche, will receive you, though you little deserve it. If you refuse to marry him —you must go. As to my son, he is there, and he will tell you now, in my presence, that he altogether declines the honor you propose for him."

And then she ceased, waiting for an answer, drumming the table while she did so with a rapidity which happened to be ready to her hand. But Marie said nothing. Adolphe had been appealed to, but Adolphe had not yet spoken.

"Well, Miss?" said La Mère Bauche.

Then Marie rose from her seat, and, walking round the table, she touched Adolphe lightly on the shoulder. "Adolphe," she said, "it is for you to speak now. I will do as you bid me."

His eyes, as they sighted first at her hand and then at his mother, shook himself slightly, and then spoke. "Upon my word, Marie, I think mother is right. It would never do for us to marry; it would not, indeed."

"Then it is decided," said Marie, returning to her chair.

"And you will marry the Capitaine?" said La Mère Bauche. Marie merely bowed her head in token of acquiescence.

"Then we are friends again. Come here, Marie, and kiss me. You must know that it is my duty to think of my own son, and you don't want to be angry with you if I can help it; I don't indeed. When once you are Madame Campan you will be my own child, and we shall have any room in the house you like to choose—there." And she once more imprinted a kiss on Marie's cold forehead.

How they all got out of the room, and off to their own chambers, I can hardly tell. But in five minutes the time of this last kiss had been were thus divided. La Mère Bauche had patted Marie and smiled on her, and called her her dear, good Madame Capitaine Campan, had given little mistress of the Hôtel Bauche, and had then got herself into her own room satisfied with her own victory.

Nor must my readers be too severe on Madame Bauche. She had already done much for Marie Clavert, and when there, by her own words, she prayed to be forgiven for the cruelty which she felt that she had shown to the orphan. But in making this apology, with her favorite cant to it in her hand, and the little image of the Virgin before her, she pleaded her duty to her son. Was it not right, was it not the Virgin, that she should save her son from a bad marriage? And then she promised ever so much of recompense both to the Virgin and to Marie—an ever-increasing list each, with candles for the Virgin, with a gold watch and chain for Marie as soon as ever she should be Madame Campan. She had never, as she acknowledged it. But such a crisis was it not excusable? And then the recompense should be full!

But there was one other meeting that night—very short, indeed, but not the less significant. Not long after they had all separated—just so long as to allow of the house being quiet—Adolphe, still sitting in his room, meditating, as I said, what the day had done for him, heard a low tap at his door. "Come in," he said, as one always do say, and Marie, opening the door, crept just within the verge of his chamber. She had on her countenance neither the soft look of entreating love with which she had worn up there in the grotto, nor did she appear crushed and subdued, as she had done before his mother. She carried her head as she had worn it once then when she looked boldly out at him from under her soft eyelashes. There might still be love there, but it was love simply resolving to quell itself. Adolphe, as he looked at her, felt that he was afraid of her.

"It is all over, then, between us, M. Adolphe?" she said.

"Well, yes; don't you think it had better be so; eh, Marie?"

"And this is the meaning of oaths and vows, sworn to each other so sacredly?"

"But, Marie, you heard what my mother said."

"Oh, Sir, I have not come to ask you again to love me: oh no, I am not thinking of that. But this—this would be a lie if I kept it now. It would choke me if I wore it as that man's wife. Take it back;" and she tendered to him the little charm which she had always worn round her neck since she had given it to her. He took it mechanically, without thinking what he did, and placed it on his little dressing-table.

"And," she continued, "can you still keep that cross? Oh no. You, too, must give me back that. It would remind you too often of vows that may never—"

"Marie," said he, "do not be so harsh to me."

"Harsh!" said she. "No; there has been enough of harshness. I would not be harsh to you, Adolphe. But give me the cross. It would prove a curse to you if you kept it."

He then opened a little box which stood upon the table, and taking out the cross, he gave it to her.

"And now, good-by," she said. "We shall have but little more to say to each other. I know this now, that I was wrong ever to have loved you. I should have been true to one of the other poor girls in the house. But oh, how was I to help it?" To this he made no answer, and so he should the day after fifty went back to their chamber. And thus ended the first day of Adolphe Bauche's return to his own home.

But the next morning Capitaine Campan and Marie were formally betrothed. This was done with some little ceremony, in the presence of all the guests who were then staying at the establishment, and with all manner of gracious acknowledgment of Marie's virtues. It seemed as though La Mère Bauche would never have done enough to her. There was no more talk now of her being a child of charity—no more allusion now to the gutter. La Mère Bauche, with her hand, brought her cake, with a glass of wine, her little bottle of cordial was given to refresh the cheek, and called her her dear little Marie Campan; and then the Capitaine was made up to by the whole party, and the Mayor, the Judge, the lawyer, and the servants of the house began to perceive that she was a person entitled to respect. Of course there was much joking, but no such joking that was made on her the preceding evening! Only Adolphe, he alone kept aloof; though he was present at the feast, he avoided being; he, and he only, offered no congratulations.

In the midst of all these gala doings Marie herself said little or nothing. La Mère Bauche perceived this, but she forgave it. Angrily as she had expressed herself at the idea of Marie's being to her son's wife, she was not unwilling within her own heart that such love had been natural. She could feel no pity for Marie as the girl's rival; indeed, she could hardly have known how to pity her. So Marie was still petted and still encouraged, though she went through all the day's work allotted to her.

As to the Capitaine, it was all one to him. He was a man of the world. He did not expect that he should really be preferred, either by Marie or a young fellow like Adolphe. But he did expect that Marie, like other girls, would do as she was bid, and that as soon as she should regain her temper, and be reconciled to her life.

And then the marriage was fixed for a very early day—the 15th of July—only a month or two of waiting? All their minds were made up now, and therefore the sooner the two were married the better. Such was the Capitaine's creed.

The Capitaine said that he did think so.

And then Marie was asked. It was all one to her, she said. When Madame Bauche pleaded, that she would do; only, she would not name a day herself. Indeed, she would neither do nor say that thing henceforth finally, which tended in any way to a furtherance of these matrimonials. But then she acquiesced, quietly enough, if not readily, in what people did and said. And so the marriage was fixed for the day week after Adolphe's return.

The whole affair then went much in the same way. The servants about the place spoke among themselves of Marie's perverseness, obstinacy, and ingratitude; but all that she had to look pleased, or answer Madame Bauche's courtesies with gratitude; but La Mère herself showed no signs of doubt in the Virgin, but she trusted, and she required no more. And she remembered also the harsh words she had used to gain her purpose: and she rolled over in all that she had lost. On these accounts she was forbearing and excited nothing—nothing but that one sacrifice which was to be made on all that had been lost. On these accounts she was forbearing and excited nothing—nothing but that one sacrifice which was to be made on all that had been lost.

And it was made. They were married in the great salon—the dinner-room—immediately after breakfast. Madame Bauche was dressed in a new piece silk dress, and looked very magnificent on the occasion. She simpered, and smiled, and looked gay, even in spite of her spectacles: and, as the ceremony was being performed, she blushed, fast-clutched in her hand, the gold watch and chain which were intended for Marie as soon as ever the marriage should be complete.

The Capitaine was dressed exactly as usual, only that all his clothes were new. Madame Bauche had ordered a new coat, and his trousers were a blue coat, but he answered that such a change would not, he was sure, be to Marie's taste. To tell the truth, Marie would hardly have known the difference had he presented himself in scarlet vestments.

Adolphe, however, was dressed very finely, but he did not make himself prominent on the occasion. Marie watched him closely, though none saw that she did so; and of his garments she could have given an account with much accuracy —of his gauntlets, say, and of every look. "Is he a man?" she said, at last, to herself, "that he can stand by and see all this?"

She, too, was dressed in silk. They had put on her what they pleased, and she bore the burden of her wedding finery without complaint and without pride. There was no blush on her face as she walked up to the table at which the priest stood, no hesitation in her low voice as she made the necessary answers. She put her hand into that of the Capitaine's when required to do so, and when the ring was put on her finger she shuddered, but ever so slightly. No one observed it but La Mère Bauche. "In one week she will be used to it, and then we shall all be happy," said La Mère to herself. "And I, I will be as kind to her!"

And so the marriage was completed and the watch was at once given to Marie. "Thank you, maman," said she, as the trinket was fastened to her girdle. It had been a pin-cushion that had cost three sous it would have affected her as much.

And then there were cake and wine and sweetmeats; and after a few minutes Marie disappeared. For an hour or so the Capitaine was taken up with the congratulations of his friends, and with the efforts necessary to the wearing of his new honors with an air of ease; but after that time he began to be uneasy because his wife did not come to him. Two or three of the afternoon he went to La Mère Bauche to complain. "Upon my word, such nonsense is no good," he said. "At any rate it is too late now. Marie had better come down among us and show herself satisfied with what she has got."

But Madame Bauche took Marie's part. "You must not be too hard on Marie," she said. "She has gone through enough with a good deal this week past, and is very young; whereas, Capitaine, you are not very young."

The Capitaine merely shrugged his shoulders. In the mean time Mère Bauche went up to visit her protégé in her own room, and came down with a report that Marie was suffering from a headache. She could not appear at dinner, Madame Bauche said; but would make one at the little supper party that was to be given in the evening. With this the Capitaine was forced to be content.

The dinner, therefore, went on quietly without her, much as it had done on her ordinary days. And then there was a little time of vacancy during which the gentlemen drank their coffee and smoked their cigars in the café, talking over the event that had taken place that morning, and the ladies brushed their hair and added some ribbon or some flowers to their usual appeal. And during this time did Madame Bauche go up to Marie's room with offers to assist her. "Not now, maman; not quite yet," said Marie, piteously through her tears; and then twice did the green spectacles leave the room covering eyes that were not free from dry. Ah! what had done? What had she dared to take upon herself to do? She could not undo it now.

And then there was quite dark in the passages and out of doors, and the guests assembled in the salon. La Mère Bauche came in and out from her own room, uneasy in her gait and unpleasant in her aspect, and every body began to see that things were wrong. "She is ill, I am afraid," said one. "The excitement has been too much," said a second. "And then he is so old," whispered a third. And the Capitaine walked about, erect on his wooden leg, taking snuff and striving to look indifferent. But he also was uneasy in his mind.

Presently La Mère Bauche came in again, with a quicker step than before, and whispered something—first to Adolphe, and then to the Capitaine, whereon they both followed her out of the room.

"Not in her chamber?" said Adolphe.

"Then she must be in yours," said the Capitaine to Madame Bauche.

"She is in neither chamber," said La Mère Bauche, with her sternest voice. "Nor is she in the house."

And now there was no longer an affectation of indifference on the part of any of them. They were any thing but indifferent. The Capitaine was eager in his demand that the master should call he kept over the guests. She had always been romantic, he said, and had now gone out to walk by the cottage. They three and the old bath-man would go out and look for her.

"But it is pitch dark," said La Mère Bauche.

"We will take a lantern," said the Capitaine. And so they sallied forth, with creeping steps over the gravel, so that they might not be heard by those within, and proceeded to search for the young wife.

"Marie! Marie!" said La Mère Bauche, in tones coaxing and persuasive to me; pay Sir.

"Hush!" said the Capitaine; "they'll hear you if you call." He could not endure that the world should learn that a marriage with him had been so distasteful to Marie Clavert.

"Marie, dear Marie!" called Madame Bauche, louder than before, almost regardless of the Capitaine's feelings. But no Marie answered. In her innermost heart now did La Mère Bauche wish that this cruel marriage had been left undone.

Adolphe was foremost with his lamp, but he had already been to the spot where he felt that it was most likely that she should have taken refuge. How could he meet her again alone in that complicity of guilt in which the four were now? It was clearly for him to accord. "Marie!" he shouted, "are you there?" as he slowly began his long search down the path.

But he had hardly begun to mount when a shivering sound struck his ear, and he felt that the air near him was moved; and then there was a crash upon the lower platform of rock, and a moan, repeated twice but ever so faintly, and a rustle of silk, and a slight struggle, somewhere as he knew within twenty paces of him; and then all was again quiet and still in the night air.

"What was that?" asked the Capitaine, in a harsh voice. He made his way half across the little garden, and he also was within forty or fifty yards of the flat rock. But Adolphe was unable to answer him. He had fainted and the lamp had fallen from his hands, and rolled to the bottom of the steps.

But the Capitaine, though even his heart was all but quenched within him, had still strength enough left to make his way up to the rock; and there, holding the lantern above his eyes, he saw all that was left for him to see or his bride.

As for La Mère Bauche, she never again sat at the head of that table, never again dictated to guests, never again laid down laws for the management of any one. A poor, bedridden old woman, she lay there in her house at Verzon for some seven tedious years, and then was gathered to her fathers.

As for the Capitaine— But what matters? He was made of sterner stuff. What matters either the fate of such a one as Adolphe Bauche?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A STARTLING PIECE OF FURNITURE—A table of dictates.

When a gentleman steps on a lady's train the lady should turn round and say politely, "I beg your pardon, Sir;" and the gentleman should bow and say, "I accept your apology, Madam."

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And runs the rain, never mate,
What balm shall soothe her melancholy?
What art shall set her back up straight?
The only thing for her disaster—
The only way her woe to end—
Is to apply a nineteen plaster
If she won't do it, let her bend.

"I have just met your old acquaintance, Daly," said Mrs. Bishman to Mrs. Wood, "and was sorry to see he has almost shrunk away to nothing. You are thin, but I am thin, but he is thinner than both of us put together."

An eminent artist lately painted a snow-storm so naturally that he thought a bad cold by sitting too near it with his coat off.

"Mary," said the teacher, "why didn't you come to school yesterday?"

"If you please, Marm, my aunt died, and I went to the funeral."

Well, hereafter when your relatives die, tell them to have the funerals Saturday afternoons or on Sundays, so that we can have our education disturbed by such things."

The little girl promised, and recitations commenced.

THE SQUEEZER.

A Yankee of inventive mind,
Observing all things great wrought
Were beset with rather larger wittes
Than seemed conformed to their latter coates,
Framed out and made of polished steel
With many a secret spring and wheel,
A queer machine to see for sure
And altogether perfect cure
In every wise that he could not be
Of small enough perfection.
The wonder of the country
My patent Waist Decreaser,
The tailor living squeezer,
Got up and run by Jabez Kite."
Then, seated in the office of his ease,
He waited calmly for a waist to squeeze.
He had not very long to wait,
For soon a maiden dressed in state,
With youthful bloom and stately mien,
Came in to try the great machine;
And thrusting of her fair and full,
With stoic resignation set
Straight down among the wheels and springs,
And screws and other curious things:
Then said to Kite, "Sir, if you please,
I'd like a little—just a little squeeze."
"Then stand, madam, ma'am," said he, and placed
The pliant springs about her waist;
Then turned the crank; the wheels went right;
Again she smiled with pure delight;
But turned again, she sighed, and then
He turned the polished crank again:
She smiled again, and whirled around,
"My dearest Jabez, turn it slow!
I'd sooner lose my life than this!"
He turned again, she murmured "More!"
Again—and smiled, she strove to speak,
But with ecstatic joy grew weak,
Could only sigh, "Oh, Jabez, John, please,
Another little, just a little squeeze!"
He turned the crank round, she fell swooned, dead,

At Dieppe, in France, the following notice has been placed by the Mayor: "The bathing of persons requested, when a lady is in danger of drowning, to sense her by the dress, and not by the face, which oftentimes remains in their grasp. Newfoundland dogs will govern themselves accordingly."

"When men break their hearts," remarks a cynical female writer, "it is the same as when a lobster breaks one of his claws—another sprouting immediately and growing in its place."

A gentleman once asked a little girl, an only child, if she ever made use of the rod, and "spared" not. "Sir?" Her mother asked Mary, when they were alone, what reason she had to tell such an untruth. "Why, maumaa," cried Mary, "I didn't want him to think we were so poor that you hadn't but one child. Wouldn't he thought we were dreffil poor?"

A young lady in New York has got such a perfect "Grecian Bend" that she has earned the title of bear instead of Miss.

DISSERTATION ON THE MOSQUITO.

The mosquito is not a progressive creature at all. While enlightened medical opinion has declared that the sanguinary allegiance the mosquito keeps right on sleep bleeding his patients, and there complain that complaining is vain, and sound off his horn more terribly. Then, again, the old doctrine they bled you, but would by means still bleed, but now it is not so. The mosquito (slap, slap) prescribes for you as formerly. He writes, and writes, and writes. His skill in (slap) bleeding people would make a fortune with any casual classes of people, he is in a measure quite unsophisticated. You wouldn't make much of a mistake if you picked him up for a cooker every day in the week. (Slap.) If he is sharp at all it is only shown in borrowing people. (Slap.)

He is a creature of very dissipated habits, and frequently borrows money all night. He is ill-bling (slap) to their constitutions, but they don't mind, he never keeps accounts in their books, however, and never keep company except with people of "blood." Thirsty one's company except with people of "blood." Thirsty one's blood (slap) much liquor. He goes to their heads.

THE EARTHQUAKES IN SOUTH AMERICA—SCENE IN THE PLAZA OF AREQUIPA, PERU, AUGUST 15, 1868.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

THE EARTHQUAKE IN SOUTH AMERICA.

THE full details of the great earthquake on the Pacific coast of South America fully corroborate the early statements, of which we gave a synopsis in our last issue. The destruction of life has not proved, as we then hoped it would not, as great as was at first reported. The Providence which inflicts these evils on us also decrees that the terrible visitants shall announce their coming by momentary shocks, not severe or dangerous; and thus warned, most of the residents in the towns destroyed or damaged, managed to escape to the open and less dangerous places.

The earthquake was accompanied by many serious phenomena. It was noticed by many persons that the rocking of the earth was in every instance from north to south, not from east to west or indiscriminately. The tidal waves were in the same general direction. There were two of these seen at sea, the least of them being thirty feet high. At Ylo the sea opened and threw up a column of water to a great height.

Our illustration on page 633 is of the Plaza of Arequipa during the earthquake. A citizen of this place, escaping from its ruins on August 16, the day of its destruction, thus describes the terrible scene we portray:

"About half-past five P.M. I sat down, in company with four other gentlemen. We had got about half through dinner when we felt the first indication of the earthquake. We got up quickly from the table and ran to the nearest door-way, a distance of not more than one hundred feet. By the time we got there the foundation of the house seemed to go one way, and the noise beneath our feet was perfectly terrific. The whole country, together with the lofty mountains that surround this place, seemed to be about violently rocking to and fro. All this occurred in less than a minute, and, as I have said, the house being all over-thrown, I was thrown by the violence of the shock into the middle of the street. Here I remained, unable to walk, for a time, as I hope may never again be witnessed by this or any other people, for I felt as though the very earth had taken a good mother or helpless father on his back or in his arms, trying to take them to a place of safety, although no such place was visible. The loving brother or sister might be with me, or a little group of helpless children around crying for help and protection. Although young in years, all seemed to realize a danger never before surrounded them. The street bunched help the fainting mother of the family, while he is down, she, though apparently unconscious, having her little baby clasped firmly to her bosom. All over the streets and plazas humanity could be seen in all imaginable manners, praying, imploring, weeping, running, kneeling, falling, and lying prostrate on the ground."

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN Ada woke, however, instead of being, as I was, more hopeless, she was almost sanguine. "There is my money, you know," she said. "After all, a bag is a bag, it is only money. I will go and see them, as the man said, and they will come back with me."

So long as we are together, what do I mind whether we have a log house or a little one? And Harry himself speaks of my softness when I cry. I was frightened last night; but now I see what to do. Will you come up to town with me by the twelve o'clock train? And will you go all will come right."

I had not the heart to say a word. I left my home and changed that wretched evening dress which I had worn all through the night. It was a comfort to throw it off and cast it away from me; and I never wore it again: the very sight of it made me sick after. I found that the most in high spirits with the strength of her determination and certainty that she was going to redeem her promise, and make all right, was Ada. I went back. Just before noon, however, when she was putting on her bonnet to start, a carriage swept up to the door. I was at the window of the dining-room when it came in sight, waiting for the brougham to convey us to the station. And the rest of the events were coming up the avenue with "kind inquiries," in the full belief that old Mrs. Gresham was dying, and that the house was "afflicted." No wonder the people stood and stared at the sight. It was old Mrs. Gresham herself, in her pink ribbons, fresh and full and splendid as I had seen her last and all the colors of the rainbow, who came dashing up, with her stately boys, to the door.

I had only time to see that all our little attempts to keep up appearances were destroyed forever when the old people came in; for Harry's father had come up, I found, on the one errand—him in presence of his wife. Mrs. Gresham came in smiling and radiant, in her usual affable and rather overwhelming way, but she would have dismissed me majestically before she went to her daughter-in-law, had it been in reality too obtuse, by reason of fatigue and excitement, to understand what she meant. When she went to Ada the old man remained with me. He was not an attractive old man, and I had scarcely spoken to him before. He walked about the room looking at every thing, while I sat by the window. If he had been an auctioneer valuing the furniture, he could not have been more particular in his investigations. He examined the handsome oak furniture, which was the envy of the Green—the immense mirrors, the great china vases, the pictures on the walls—as if making a mental calculation. Then he came and stood by me, and began to talk. "In my time young people were not so extravagant," he said. "There are thousands of people, I believe, sunk in this house."

Mrs. Gresham had a great deal of taste," I said, faltering.

"Taste! Nonsense. You mean waste," said the old man, sitting down astride on a carved chair, and looking at me across the back of it. "But I admit the things have their value—they'll sell. Of course you know Harry has not a mess?" he went on. "Women think they can hush up these things; but that's impossible. He has behaved like an idiot, and he must take the consequences. Fortunately the family is provided for. Her friends need not be concerned in that respect."

"I am very glad," said I, as it was necessary to say something.

"So am I," said old Mr. Gresham. "I suppose they would have come upon me if that had not been the case. It's a bad business; but it is not on his own head. I'll see to it. I can't make out how a son of mine should have been such an ass. But they all go so fast in these days. I suppose you have a set of jewels, my child?—A ball!" he repeated, with a sort of snort. I don't know if there was any fatherly feeling at all in the man; but if there was he hid it under his mask of harshness and contempt.

"Will not Mr. Gresham return?" I asked, timidly; but my voice was almost too much worn out to have full control of what I said.

The old man gave a shrug, and glanced at me with a look of contempt and sarcasm. "I can't say what may happen in the future," he said, dryly. "I should advise him not. But Ada can live where she likes for me, and I'll see to that."

Old Mrs. Gresham staid a long time up stairs with her daughter-in-law: so long that my patience almost gave out. But Ada herself sent off, after sitting silent opposite to me for some time, to look over the house, which was a large one, and decide if there were any part of it we were far too late for the train. But I was not to suppose we were to give a dinner. Grandpapa never takes lunch; you must wait for him: but I am quite hungry after my long drive.

Then she went out, and I was left all alone, as was trembling so that she refused to stir. I saw that her lips were dry, and she could scarce speak. "Ada," I said, faltering so indistinctly that the man could not hear, "Ada, I do not know about the luncheon. Shall I—"

"Don't trouble me," she said, in a tone of irritability—and let my question go unanswered. I had not stay another day in my house; you are a great deal too easy. So your ball was interrupted last night, Mrs. Gresham? I am so much sorry. Ring!" and the blame laid on me. Oh, those boys! I hope the good people hereabouts will not take offence. I will never forget the generosity in giving Ada such a fright, poor child. She thought I was dying, I suppose; and it was only one of Gerald's practical jokes. Something ought to be done to prevent such things. Ring, I say!" and he would have lost those seconds if they had not rushed off; so they made me feel that I had not touched it. "Ring, ha! I don't look much like dying to-day."

"No, indeed," was all I could say. As for Ada, she turned round upon me fiercely. "I cannot breathe in little gasps like a woman in a fever. The old lady had all the weight of the conversation to bear; and, indeed, she was quite not for our benefit, but for that of the servants, who were bringing the luncheon. She looked so rich and assured that I could not think that they were staggered in their certainty of misfortune and believed her for the moment. The young footman, who had just been bragging me privately to speak a word for him to secure him another place, gave me a stealthy imploring look, begging me, as it were, to "back up" her. The old gentleman was out, going over the house and grounds, but Mrs. Gresham ate a very good luncheon and continued to think me very stupid talk. "They sent me a message this morning," she said, as she ate, "and ordered me to come over and make terms! Insolent and huge sight. Just like boys! Give me some sherry, John Thomas. I shall scold them well, I promise you, when they come back—scold them! Ada's nerves and turning the house upside down like this. I don't know what Ada would have done without you, Mrs. Margaret; and I hope you had their stable-men, trainers, or whatever you call them, to puzzle you too?"

"Yes," I said, faltering with wonder. Was all this an invention, or was she herself deceived? Ada sat by with her eyes cast down, and never spoke except in monosyllables; she could scarcely raise to her lips the wine which her mother-in-law made her swallow. I could not but admire the energy and determination of the woman. But at the same time she bewildered me, as she sat eating and drinking, with her elbow on the table and her rich face nearly sweeping over the white table-cloth, conversing in this confident way. To meet her eyes, which had not a shade of timidity or doubt in them, and see her evident comfort and enjoyment, and believe she was telling a downright lie, was almost more than was possible. "I did not know Mr. Gerald was a racing man," I faltered, not knowing what to say.

"Oh yes, he is on the turf," said Mrs. Gresham, shrugging her shoulders; "he is on every thing that don't pay. Ring, John Thomas, and remove all his life. Not that there is any thing bad about him; but he's fashionable, you know, and we are known to be rich, and every body gives him his own way; and Harry's such a good brother"—said the rash woman all at once, to show how much at her ease she was. But this was taking a step too much. Ada could bear it no longer. There was a sudden sound of choking sobs, and then she sprang from the table. The strain had gone too far.

"I hear baby crying: I must go to baby," she sobbed; and rushed from the room without any regard to appearances. Even Mrs. Gresham, self-possessed as she was, had gone too far for her own strength. Her lip quivered in spite of herself. She looked steadily down, and crumbled the bread-crumbs in her strong agitated fingers. Then she gave a little laugh, which was not much less significant than tears.

"Poor little Ada," she said; "she can't bear to be crossed. She has had such a happy life, when any thing goes contrary it puts her out."

Perhaps it was the quivering of her own lip that brought back her vernacular. And then we began to discuss the ball as if nothing had happened. The husband came in while we were talking, and shrugged his shoulders and muttered disapprobation, but she took no notice. She must have been aware that I knew all; and yet she thought she could bewilder me still.

I went home shortly after, grieved and disgusted and ashamed, remembering all the wicked stories people tell of mercantile dishonesty, of false bankruptcies, and downright robberies, and thinking who escape and live in wealth and comfort abroad. This was how it was to be in the case of Harry Gresham. His wife had her own fortune and would go to him, and they would be rich and well off, though he had as good as stolen his neighbor's property and squandered it too. Of course I did not know all the particulars then; and I had got to be kind of sorry young people. I knew very well that Harry was wicked, and that his little wife was both innocent and good. What was written in the papers one says, and says:

"Wretches!" and thinks no more of it. But these two were not wretches, and I was fond of them, and it made me sick at heart. I went up stairs and shut myself into my own room, not being able to see visitors or to hear all the comments that, no doubt, was going on. But I did not mend matters when I saw from the window Mrs. Gresham driving past, lying back in her carriage, driving along swift as two superb horses could carry her, with her little old husband in the corner by her side, and a smile on her face, ready to bow her hand in gracious recognition of any one she knew. Such was the queen coming among us, rather than the modest one of a man who had fallen in darkness and shame. I never despised poor Mrs. Gresham, or thought less of her for Everard's downfall, but I felt sick and weary of the world at the sight. When these people passed my door; though Mrs. Gresham, too, was her son's champion in her own worldly way.

Some hours later Ada sent me a few anxious pleading words, begging me to go to her. I found her in her room, concealing herself among the trees; though it was a warm summer day she was cold and shivering. I do not know any words that can express her pallor. It was not the whiteness of death, but of agonized and miserable life, palpitating in every nerve and strained every faculty.

"Hush!" she said. "Don't go to the house —I can't bear it—I am watching for him—here!"

"Is he coming?" I cried, in terror.

"I do not know; I can't tell where he is, or where he is going!" cried poor Ada, grasping my arm; "I am afraid some one should come back to be taken. The house is watched. Did you not see that old man sitting under the hedge? There are people placed to watch—watching for my Harry; and they tell me I am to stay here and take no notice. I think I will die—I wish I could die!"

"No, my darling!" I said, crying over her. "Tell me what it is? Did they bring you no comfort? Did you not come back to be taken. There is no fear. Did they not tell you what it means?"

"They told me," cried Ada, with a violent color flushing over her face, "that I was to keep my money to myself, and not to pay back that —that—that Harry took. It is true; he has taken some money that was not his, and has it; but he meant to pay it back again, Mrs. Margaret. Oh, I wish he had died! I wish we had all died," cried Ada, "rather than this—rather than to feel what I do to-day!"

"My dear Ada," I said, "don't say so; repent die when we please. It is a terrible misfortune; but when he did not mean it—"

Great tears were in Ada's eyes. "He did not mean that," she said; "but I think he meant me to keep my money and live on it. Oh, what shall I do? I wish I had been wicked if I give it up. I will work for him with all my heart. But I can not go on living like this, and keep what is not mine. If your husband had done it, Mrs. Mulgrave—don't be angry with me—he would not you have sold the cottage and given up every thing, and what am I to do?"

"You must come in and rest," I said. "Never mind what they said to you. You must do what is right, and God will stand by you. He will know how to do it. Come in now and rest."

"Ah, Gerald!" cried the poor child, and then she leaned on my shoulder and cried. The moment she heard even the name of one man whom she could trust, her strength broke down. "Gerald will know how to do it!" she said, faintly, and laid her in, and tried to smile at me. It was a gleam of wonder, in the darkness. I can not describe the period of terrible suspense that followed. I staid with her, making no pretense of going back to my own house; though when the story came to be in the newspapers all my friends wrote letters to me and disapproved of my conduct. I did not care; one knows one's duty tenfold better than one's friends do. The day after the ball hosts of cards, and civil messages, and "kind inquiries" had poured upon Ada; but after that they totally stopped. Not a carriage nor a visitor came near the house for the last three days. The world fell away from us and left the poor young creature to bear her burden alone. In the midst of all this I was conferring there was one little incident which affected my temper more than all the rest. Old Thomas Lee, an old man from the village, who used to carry little wares about in a basket, and made his living by it, and had taken his place under the hedge close to the gates of Dingleswood, and sat there watching all day long. Of course he was paid to do it, and he was very poor. But I don't think the money he earned so has done him much good. I have never given a penny or a penny's worth to old Lee since that time. Many a sixpence poor Harry had tossed to him as he passed in his Yankee wagon every morning to the station. I had no patience with the wretched old spy. He had the assurance to take off his hat to me when I went into the house he was watching, and I confess that it was with a struggle, no later back than last winter, when the season was at its coldest, that I consented to give him a little help for his children's sake.

It was nearly a week before we got any letters, and all these long days we watched and waited, and shook more and more cold, more than every morning rose; watching at the windows, at the gates, every where that a people could be had of for white, scared watching. Every time the postman went round the Green our hearts grew faint with anxiety; once or twice when the telegraph boy appeared, even I, though not but a spectator, felt the life die out of my heart. But at last this period of dreadful uncertainty came to a close. It was in the morning by the first post, that the letters came. They were under cover to me, and I took them to Ada's room and gave them to her still sleeping the sleep of exhaustion. She sprang up in a moment and caught at her husband's letter as if it had been a revelation from heaven. I believe women in the world could not have been more eagerly received. He was safe. He had put the Channel between himself and his troubles. There was no need for further watching. The relief in itself was a positive happiness. Ten days ago it would have been heart-rending, and the fall of Mary Gresham as an escaped criminal, as an exile, for whom return was impossible; disgraced, penniless, and without hope. Now all the news was joyful news: he was safe, if nothing more.

Then for the first time Ada indulged in the luxury of those tears that came in floods, like those thunder-showers which ease the hearts of the young. She threw herself on my neck and kissed me again and again. "I should have died but for you: I had no mamma of my own to go to," she sobbed, like a baby. Perhaps the thing that made these childish words go to my heart was that I had no child.

Of course I expected, and every body will expect, that Ada's happiness in the world was to fallen ill. But she did not. On the contrary, she came down stairs with me, and ate (almost for the first time), and smiled, and played with her children, while I stood by with the feeling that I ought to have a brain-fever myself, if Ada was not to have that consolation. And as the day ran on she became grave, and ever graver. She said little, and it was evident that her thoughts were busy. She must consider every thing; how she was determined to take no rest, to listen to no argument, till the money was paid. I had no answer to my own wishes in reasoning, and she made no opposition. I said goodnight to her in the nursery where she was sitting close by the little girl's bed, and very crying, poor child, but I did not wonder at that; and nurse was a kind woman, and very attentive to her little charge. I went home with the utmost race and out by the garden, without having any particular reason for it. But before I reached the house some one came hurrying after me, and looking round I saw it was Ada, wrapped in a great water-proof cloak. She was going to walk home with me, she said. I evidently was crying, but it was in vain. It was a warm balmy night, and I could not understand why she should have put on her water-proof cloak unless that she was safe in my little drawing-room, her secret came out. Then she opened her mantle with a smile. At one of her sides hung a basket, and her other rested her sleeping baby. She laughed at my amaze, and then she cried. "I am going to Harry," she said; and held her child closer, and dried her eyes and sat immovable, ready to listen to any thing I chose to say. Heaven knows I said every thing I could think of—that for the folly of it, of her fool-hardiness; that she was totally unable for the task she was putting on herself; that Harry had Gerald's money, and do without her. All which she listened to with a smile, unmoved, and not to be moved. When I had come to an end of my arguments, she stretched out to me the arm on which the bundle hung, and drew me close to her and kissed me again. "You are going to give me some biscuits and a little flask of wine," she said, "to put in my pocket. I have one of the house-keeper's old-fashioned pockets, which is of some use. And then you must say 'God bless you,' and let me go."

"God bless you, my poor child," I said, overcome; "but you must not go; little Ada too—"

Then her eyes filled with tears. "My pretty darling!" she said; "but grandmamma will take her to Bishop's Hope. It is only baby that can not live without his mother. Baby and Harry. What is Gerald? I know he wants me."

"But he can wait," I cried; "and you so young, so delicate, so utterly unused to any trouble!"

"I can carry my child perfectly," said Ada. "I never was delicate. There is a train at eleven, down to Southampton. I found it out in the book: and after that I know my way. I am a very good traveler," she said, with a smile, "and Gerald must come to settle every thing. Give me the biscuits, dear Mrs. Mulgrave, and kiss me and let me go."

And it had to be so, though I pleaded with her until I was hoarse. When the moment came I put on my cloak too and walked with her, late as it was, a mile off to the new station, which both she and I had thought too far for walking in the observed of daylight. I carried the baby while she carried the baby, and we looked like two homely country women trudging home. She drew her hood over her head when she got her ticket, and I waited outside. Then in the dark I kissed her for the last time. I could not speak, nor did she. She took the bundle from me, grasping my hand with her soft fingers almost as a man might have done; and we kissed each other with strength, like people who part forever. And I have never seen her again.

As I came back, frightened and miserable, all by myself along the moonlit road, I had to pass the Stokes' cottage. Lottie was leaning out of the window, though it was now nearly midnight, with her face only half in the moon, because Lord Dinglewood. I could scarcely keep myself from calling to her. She did not know what we had been doing, yet her heart had been with us that night.

CHAPTER V.

I WILL not describe the tumult that arose when it was discovered. The servants rushed over to me in a body, and I suggested that they should send for Mr. Gresham; and that point was soon came in all her splendor and took little Ada away, and gave every body "notice." Then began the auction covered the whole lawn at the gate, and strangers came in heaps to see the place. In a month every thing had melted away like a tub that is full. The Greshams and their wealth and their liberality and their good-nature fell out of the very recollection of the people on the Green, along with the damask and the gilding and the flowers, the fine carriages, and the powdered footman. Every thing connected with them disappeared. The new tenant altered the house a second time; and every thing that could recall the handsome young couple and their lavish ways was cleared away. Of course there was nothing else talked of for a long time after. Every body had his or her account of the whole business: some poor Harry met his pursuers in the field close to the river, and that Gerald and he fought with them, and left them all but dead in the grass; some said that Ada and I defended the house, and would not let them in; and there were countless romances about the escape and Ada's secret following after. The imagination of my neighbors made many a fancy sketch of that last scene; but never hit upon any thing so touching as my last glimpse of her, with her baby under her cloak, going into the train. I held my peace, and let them speak. She had been as my own child for about a week, just a week of our lives; before that she was a common acquaintance, after it a stranger; but I could not let my vague tongues meddle with our relationship or her story in that sacred time.

And after a while the tale fell into oblivion, as every sad story does can but wait long enough. People forgot about the Greshams; sometimes a stranger would observe the name of Mr. Gresham, of Bishop's Hope, in some list of county chairmen, and would ask if he was a Gresham of Greshambury, or if he was any connection of the man who ran away. Of course, at the time, it was in all the newspapers. He had taken money that somebody had trusted him with and invested it in his speculations. Of course he meant to pay it back; but then a great crash came. The men say there was no excuse for him, and I can see that there is no excuse; but he never meant it, poor Harry! And then the papers were full of further incidents, which were more unusual than Harry's sin or his flight. The Times devoted a leading article to it, which every body read, holding Mrs. Gresham up to the applause of the world. Ada gave up her settlement and all her own fortune, and "one of his brothers," the papers said, came forward too, and most of the money was paid back. But Harry, poor fellow, disappeared. He was as if he had gone down at sea. His name and every sign of his life went out of knowledge — waves of forgetfulness, desertion, exile closed over them. And at Dingdicheld they were never either seen or heard of again.

As long as it continued to be in the papers Lottie Stoke kept in a very excited state. She came to me forever finding out every word that was printed about it, dwelling on every thing. That evening when the article appeared about Mrs. Gresham's heroic abandonment of her fortune, and about "one of his brothers," Lottie came with her eyes lighted up like windows in an illumination, and her whole figure trembling with excitement. She read it all to me, and listened to my comments, and clasped my hand in hers when I cried out, "That must be Gerald." She sat on the footstool, holding the paper, and gazed up into my face with her eyes like lamps. "Then I do not mind!" she cried, and buried her face in her hands and sobbed aloud. And I did not ask her what she meant — I had not the heart.

It was quite years after before I heard any thing more of the Greshams, and then it was by way of Lottie Stoke that the news came. She had grown thinner and more worn year by year. She had not had the spirits to go out, and they were so poor that they could have no society at home. And by degrees Lottie came to be considered a little old, which is a dreadful business for an unmarried girl when her people are so poor. Mrs. Stoke did not upbraid her; but still it may be guessed what her feelings were. But, fortunately, as Lottie sunk into the back-ground, Lucy came to the front. She was pretty, and fresh, and gay, and more popular than her sister had ever been. And, by-and-by, she did fulfill the grand destiny of marrying well. When Lucy told me of her engagement she was very angry with her sister.

"She says, how can I do it? She asks me if I have forgotten Gerald Gresham?" cried Lucy, "As if I ever cared for Gerald Gresham; or as if any body ever cared for me. I shall think she cared for him herself if she keeps going on."

"Lucy!" said Lottie, flushing crimson under her hollow eyes. Lucy, for her part, was as bright as happiness, indignation, high health, and unlimited spirits could make her. But, for my part, I liked her sister best.

"Well!" she said; "and I do think it. You would hesitate to marry him when you only having a little fun. As if I ever cared for him! And I don't believe," cried Lucy, courageously, "that he ever cared for me."

Her sister kissed her, though she had been so angry. "Don't let us quarrel now when we are going to part," she said, with unusual quiver in her voice. Perhaps she was right; perhaps he had never cared for her, though Lottie and I both thought he did. At all events he cared for neither of them, probably; and there was no chance that he would ever come back to Dingdicheld to make himself known his family had been so disgraced. But yet Lottie brightened up a little after that day, I can scarcely tell why. Some time after she went on a visit to London in the season: and it was very hard work for Lucy, I know, to get some one to come to go in; for she never would have any of Lucy's presents. She was six weeks away, and she came back looking a different creature. The very first morning after her return she came over to me, glowing with something of the old fun. "Who do you think I met?" she said, with a soft flush trembling over her face. Her sister brought me name irresistibly to my mind. But I would not open that old business; I shook my head, and said I did not know.

"Why, Gerald Gresham!" she cried. "It is true, Mrs. Mulgrave; he is painting pictures now—fine-painting, you understand, not for pleasure, but like a trade. And he told me about Ada and poor Harry. They have gone to America. It has changed him very much, even his looks; and, instead of being rich, he is poor."

"Ah!" I said, "one of his brothers. You always said it was Gerald;" but I was not prepared for what he was to come next.

"Did not I?" cried Lottie, triumphant; "I knew it was him." And then she paused a little, and sat silent, in happy brooding over something that was to come. "And I think it was right," said Lottie, softly. "He had not been thinking of Lucy; it was not Lucy for whom he cared.

I took her hands into my own, perceiving what she meant; and then all at once Lottie fell a crying, for the first time for sorrow.

"That was how I always deceived myself," she said. "It was so base of me at first; I wanted to marry him because he was rich. And then I thought it was Lucy he liked; she was so young and so pretty." Then she made a long pause, and put my hands upon her hot cheeks, and covered herself with them. "Your hands are so cool," she said, "and so soft and kind. I am going to marry him now, Mrs. Mulgrave, and he is poor.

This is a kind of postscript to the story, but still it is so connected with it that it is impossible to tell the one without the other. We were much agitated about this marriage on the Green. If Gerald Gresham had been rich it would have been a different matter. But a stockbroker's son, with disgrace in the family, and poor! I don't know any one who was not sorry for Mrs. Stoke under this circumstance. How. But I was not sorry for Lottie. Gerald, naturally, is not fond of coming to the Green, but I see them sometimes in London, and I think they suit each other. He tells me of poor Ada every time I see him. And I believe old Mr. Gresham is very indignant at Harry's want of spirit in not beginning again, and at Ada for giving up her settlement, and at Lottie for expending his money to help them—"A pack of fools," says the old man. But of course they will all, even the shipwrecked family in America, get something from him when he dies. As for the mother, I met her once at Lottie's door, getting into her fine carriage with the bays, and she was very affable to me. In her opinion it was all Ada's fault. "What can a man do with an extravagant wife who spends all his money before it is made?" she said as she got into her carriage; and I found it a little hard to keep my temper. But the Greshams and their story, and all the brief splendors of Dingdicheld, are almost forgotten by this time by every body on the Green.

GENERAL GRANT'S LETTER.

WE give on this page the fac-simile of the most characteristic passages in a letter of General U. S. GRANT to his father, written during the Vicksburg campaign, but lately published for the first time in the Tribune. The entire letter is a revelation of his true character, and is given below:

MILLIKEN'S BEND, LOUISIANA, April 21, 1863.

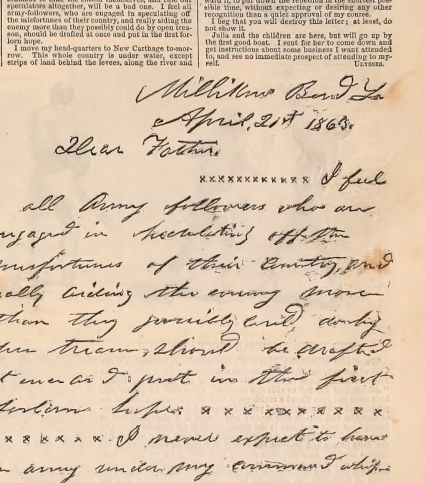
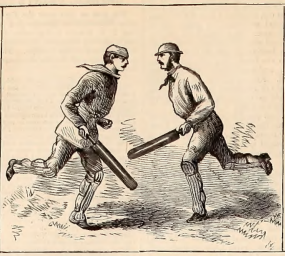
DEAR FATHER,—Your letter of the 7th of April has just this day reached me. I hasten to answer your incorrigible. When I left Memphis, with my past experience, I prohibited trade below Helena. Trade to that point had previously been opened by the Treasury Department. I give no permits to buy cotton, and if I find any one engaged in the business I send them out of the Department and seize their cotton for the Government. I have given a few families permission to leave the country, and to take with them, so far as Memphis, their cotton. In doing this I have been deceived by unprincipled speculators, who have successfully smuggled themselves along with the army in spite of orders prohibiting them, and have been compelled to suspend this favor to prevent success to get out of Dixie.



I understand that Government has adopted some plan to regulate trade with cotton out of the country. I do not know what plan they have adopted, but am satisfied that any that can be adopted, except for Government to take the cotton themselves, and rule out speculators altogether, will be a bad one. I feel all army-followers, who are engaged in speculating off the misfortunes of their country, and really aiding the enemy more than they possibly could do by open treason, should be drafted at once and put in the first fortorn hope.

I move my head-quarters to New Carthage to-morrow. This whole country is under water, except strips of land behind the levees, along the river and bayous, and makes operations almost impossible. I struck upon a plan which I thought would give me a foothold on the east bank of the Mississippi before the enemy could offer any great resistance. But the difficulty of the last one and a half miles next to Carthage makes it so tedious that the enemy can not fail to discover my plans. I am doing my best, and am full of hope for complete success. Time has been consumed, but it was absolutely impossible to avoid it. An attack upon the rear works at any time since I arrived here must inevitably have resulted in the loss of a large portion of my army, if not in entire defeat. There were but two points of land, Haines' Bluff and Vicksburg itself, out of water at any place from which troops could march. These are thoroughly fortified, and it would be folly to attack them as long as there is a prospect of turning their position. I never expect to have an army under my command whipped unless it is very badly whipped and can't help it, but I have no idea of being driven to do a desperate or foolish act by the bowlings of the press. It is painful to me, as a matter of course, to see the course pursued by some of the papers. But there is no one less disturbed by them than myself. I have never sought a large command, and have no ambitious ends to accomplish. Were it not for the very natural desire of proving myself equal to any thing expected of me, and the evidence my friends would afford that I was not thought equal to it, I would gladly accept a less responsible position. I have no desire to be an object of envy or jealousy, nor to have this war continue. I want, and will do my part toward it, to put down the rebellion in the shortest possible time, without expecting or desiring any other recognition than a quiet approval of my course.

I beg that you will destroy this letter; at least, do not show it.



Julia and the children are here, but will go up by the first good boat. I sent for her to come down and get instructions about some business I was attended to, and see no immediate prospect of attending to myself.

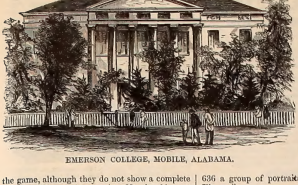
THE INTERNATIONAL CRICKET MATCH.

WE alluded some weeks since to the fact that the St. George's Cricket Club of this city, the first to take serious and earnest steps to introduce the English national game of cricket into America, had invited the famous "All-England Eleven" to visit this country. Since then the Englishmen have come and have played a match-game with the St. George's Club in the presence of a large concourse of persons interested in the subject of physical exercises and out-of-door sports; and already it is observable that an interest has been awakened in the game, which is far superior to that of base-ball. This interest in the sport might have been more extended if the daily papers had reported the match in a manner intelligible to the general reader. As a rule their reports were written for cricketers only, and were totally incomprehensible to the majority of readers. The combinations and rules of the game, the technical terms are so different from those of base-ball, or, where the same, so differently applied, that few readers understood the reports.



Cricket, or, more properly speaking, "double cricket," is the national game of England as much as base-ball is the national game of America. It is usually played by twenty-two persons, eleven on each side, though on the present occasion the "All-England Eleven" were matched against twenty-two of the St. George's, the former being all professionals, and the latter young amateurs. The materials for the game are a ball, five and a half ounces weight; two bats, four and a quarter by thirty-eight inches; two wickets, each of three sticks of wood, twenty-seven inches above ground; and a "bail," or fourth stick, eight inches long, to go across and on top of them. The wickets are placed twenty-two yards apart. One side takes the bats, the other the field; the latter bowl the ball in efforts to knock down the wickets; the "batsmen" guard the wickets by striking the ball; their "score" or count consists of the runs which they make while the ball is on the fly or in the field; and the whole game is a constant exercise of muscle in batting and running, and skill in bowling and catching the ball.

Our illustrations will convey to the reader a good idea of the points of the game, although they do not show a complete "field." We gave in a previous Number (August 1) an engraving showing the whole field in play, to which those interested in the game and anxious to establish it are referred. The first of our small engravings on page 636 shows the positions of the "wicket-keeper" and the "batsman." The former's position is about four or four and a half feet behind the wicket; the latter's in front, and something nearer. The "wicket-keeper" is the captain of the "outs," or "fielders," and it is his duty to see that they are all in their places, directing their movements by signs more than words. The duty of the "batsman" is to guard the wicket from the ball, and to run between the two wickets. There is only one "wicket-keeper," although there are two wickets; the "batsmen" play by turns, changing positions to accommodate the "wicket-keeper" and "bowler," who are stationary.

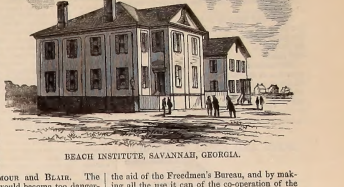
The second cut represents the two "batsmen" while on the run between the two wickets. They are required to run close enough to the wickets to be able to put their bat on the ground within certain limits. The third illustration shows the position of the "bowler" on the side of the wicket opposite the active "batsman" and the "wicket-keeper." His aim is to bowl down the wicket; many bowlers are very expert with the ball, throwing it with a directness truly wonderful, and by giving it a twist or varying its speed can often deceive the "batsman" into a "wide miss." "Caught out" represents a fielder catching a ball in the air; this always puts out the "batsman" who struck it. "Bowled out" shows the wicket knocked down by the ball direct from the bowler's hand. The sixth and last cut represents the "batsman" being put out by the "bowler" striking his leg. By a rule of the game no part of the person can be interposed for the defense of the wicket.

It is to be hoped that the American youth generally will be induced to adopt this game, and that it will become as prevalent as base-ball, to which it is in many respects far superior. Of its popularity there can be little doubt. Those interested in the sport will find a full and easily comprehended manual of the game in WOOD'S "Physical Exercises," published a year since by HARPER & BROTHERS—an admirable practical work on all kinds of calisthenics.

We also give on page 636 a group of portraits of the "All-England Eleven."

The match game played by the twenty-two of the St. George's Club and their eleven guests embraced one inning for the Eleven and two for the St. George's. The Eleven made 175 runs in their one inning; the twenty-two only 155 in both.

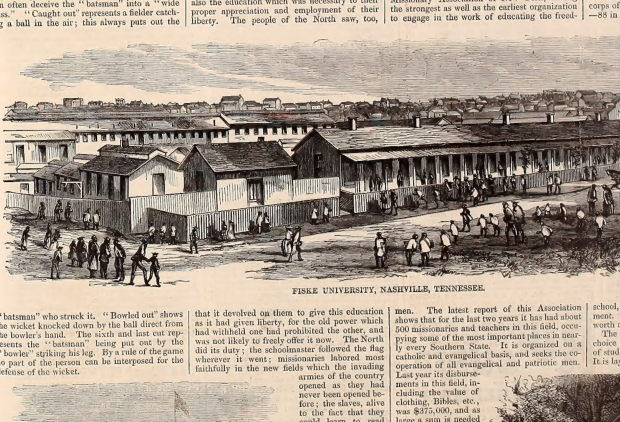


COAN SCHOOL, NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.

THE FREEDMEN'S SCHOOLS.

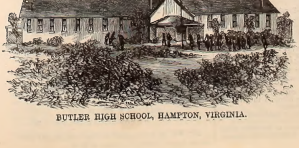
When the North gave freedom to the slaves of the South it saw the necessity of giving them also the education which was necessary to their proper appreciation and employment of their liberty. The people of the North saw, too, that it devolved on them to give this education as it had given liberty, for the old power which had withheld one had prohibited the other, and was not likely to freely offer it now. The North did its duty; the schoolmaster followed the flag wherever it went; missionaries labored most faithfully in the new fields which the invading armies of the country opened as they had never been opened before; the slaves, alive to the fact that they could learn to read openly instead of by stealth, proved most earnest and anxious students; and the good work progressed so favorably and vigorously that, in spite of the violence of old slave-holders and their more rabid dupes, the poor whites, there were in existence at the South on December 31, 1867, 3084 schools, with 6492 teachers and 189,517 pupils. This is the result of a few years' labor against the obstacles of strong opposition from the native whites of the South, and the poverty and almost total ignorance of the class to be instructed. This great work—the true foundation of the real social reconstruction of the South—will have to be stopped, the army of teachers will have to be recalled, the millions of Northern property in schools and school-farms will have to be sacrificed, in the event of the triumph of the Southern rebels by the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR. The South in such a case would become too dangerous to Northern teachers, and a standing army could not maintain and carry on the work which has been inaugurated by the establishment of the schools for freedmen. Their interruption and discontinuance would be one of the sorest of calamities to the race and the country.

We give on this page illustrations of a number of the most prominent of the schools at the South under the control and direction of the American Missionary Association of New York, among the strongest as well as the earliest organization to engage in the work of educating the freedmen.



BEACH INSTITUTE, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

To aid of the Freedmen's Bureau, and by making all the use it can of the co-operation of the colored people, it has already secured a large number of sites and buildings for high schools, normal schools, and incorporated colleges (not omitting the ambitious University); and it is now straining every nerve to avail itself of present opportunities to establish one or more such institutions in every State where there is a large population of freedmen. In Virginia, at Hampton, where the first slave ship touched our shores, it offers a three years' course of study in a normal and agricultural school, on a farm of 120 acres of choice land, in the cultivation of which the young men defray a considerable part of their expenses; the young women, in like manner, lessening their by doing the work of the boarding-house.



High schools are established in Wilmington and Beaufort, North Carolina; Savannah, Georgia; Memphis and Chattanooga, Tennessee; and Louisville, Kentucky. Normal schools at Charleston, South Carolina; Macon, Georgia; Talladega and Mobile, Alabama; and chartered colleges at Berea, Kentucky, Nashville, Tennessee, and Atlanta, Georgia. A peculiar feature of Berea College is, that of the 300 pupils which it numbered last year a little over one-third were white. Its college preparatory class numbered eight; the remainder were in the normal and primary departments.

Fisk University, Nashville, has a charter, a corps of ten instructors, and numbers 413 pupils —88 in the normal department, 85 in grammar-school, and the remainder in the lower department. It stands on a block of land in the city worth at least $10,000.

The Atlanta University, Georgia, occupying a choice location in the city, has a large number of students, in the earlier stages of their course. It is laying the foundations for an important institution, destined to exert a wide influence over the State. At Atlanta as at Wilmington, North Carolina, the Association has an orphan asylum in operation.

The school building at Mobile occupies one of the finest sites in the city, and is really one of the most substantial and commodious buildings in the State. It will furnish school-room for 800 pupils.

The Association reports, also, ten evangelical churches in the South under its care, thus combining in one organization a benevolent, educational, and religious work for the lately enslaved, and yet persecuted and suffering freedmen, which, if vigorously sustained, must tell effectually on the destinies of the South.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

We called attention in our Number for September 19 to the exposé by a Boston civil engineer of the dangerous condition of the Pemberton bridge of the Grand Trunk Railway. The gentleman has since furnished us the following letter and the accompanying diagram which speak for themselves, and reveal a condition of affairs which every traveler has a right to know in order that he may avoid. We are led to believe that too many of the railroads in this country are in the same horrible condition. Our glimpse will have been gained if the attention of the authorities is drawn to this matter. The letter alluded to is as follows:

PARIS, MAINE, Sept., 1868.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR.—I was glad to notice the reference in your issue, dated September 19, to the bad condition of the Grand Trunk Railroad. I made the drawings exhibited in Boston, to which you refer, and they were entirely correct; and I am glad to say that with the effect I intended of making people up to the shocking condition of the road, which was my only object in exposing it. Such sketches are more convincing than a great deal of talk. I believe a correct full-size sketch of a rail joint (one of a vast number just as bad) over which, from my own observation, I know that the regular passenger trains are now every day running at over twenty miles an hour, I call simply a matter of fact; and I leave you to judge of the criminal recklessness of the road, and of the Railroad Commissioners of this State, who will allow such things.

Your obedient servant,
THADDEUS L. YORK,
Civil Engineer.

P.S.—The sketch you may use in any way you please, and show to any one, and give my name to its entire correctness. Indeed I could send such sketches by the hundred if it was worth while.

Way can not New York have clean, fresh, wholesome, and palatable markets as well as Philadelphia? If there is any thing which would be a tonic to merely think about, it would be a certainty that the food we eat has been purchased from a nice, cleanly place. Any one of my body who has been so unfortunate as to be blocked up in the Tenth Avenue cow-pen, in the vicinity of Vesey Street, has noted, through the jam of carts and dregs, the unsightly accumulation of dirty-looking sheds which form a portion of Washington Market—and especially if he suffers his eye to rest long on the immense quantity of beef, pork, and mutton which hangs exposed to dust and dirt, he will be likely to eat his dinner that day with little appetite, not daring to ask where it was procured.

An improved class of markets has recently been made by the Common Council Committee. They were compelled to find the buildings of Washington and Fulton markets in miserable condition—leaky roofs, broken doors and walls. Other things they found, even less agreeable to mention—but which are to be seen there every day. The City Fathers seemed to be impressed with the idea that something should be done immediately; and the public will be devoutly thankful if the impression deepens into an entire Reconstruction.

On Sunday, the 23d of August, while volcanic agencies were still threatening the city of Quito, in Peru, with inundation, a penitential procession organized by the clergy to appease the divine wrath to deprecate the wrath of the sea. The procession gathered around a platform in front of the palace, which was illuminated and covered with flowers, and upon which stood an image of the Saviour to receive intercession they desired to invoke. The name and history of the saint are not generally known. In 1766—so the story goes—after the destruction of the town by earthquake and inundation, an image of some saint was found in one of the sewers, where it was washed by the sea. It was so disfigured that it could not be identified, so the people cleaned, repaired, and adorned it, and placed it on a platform. A procession was formed to bear it to some safer place. At the time the sea was still boisterous, and while the procession stopped to rest near the shore a wonderful miracle was wrought. The sea became calm in a moment, and it was a matter of course, attributed to the saint, so that there and then it was always known as Señor del Mar (our God of the Sea). Since then this saint has been carefully preserved, and whenever the sea is angry Nuestro Señor is brought out to beam it.

John B. Gough commences his lecturing tour early in October; his lecture time has been engaged, he having already declined over eight hundred applications.

There are not far from seventy-five marriages-broken in Paris. Two of them pay an income tax of two hundred thousand francs a year. They charge fifty per cent. on the dower of rich wives, and two per cent. when the fortune of the husband and wife are about equally large. An extra charge is made for securing husbands with aristocratic titles.

The Indian game of "La Crosse" seems to be coming into vogue, and is considered more attractive than base-ball, requiring more players, and greater activity and skill. There are twelve players on each side. Two flags are placed six feet apart on staffs six feet high, and at a distance of one hundred and eighty yards two corresponding flags are fixed. The playing takes place between these two points. A regulation Indian rubber ball is used. The object of the players is to drive the ball between the two flags of the opposing sides, and the men are stationed so that this can be done only by great skill and dexterity. The instrument used in this game is known as "a crosse." It has a slightly curved handle, with a large hook at the end. This is covered with tight net-work, and is used not only to strike the ball, but to catch and carry it. The goal is protected by a "goal-keeper," "point man," and "cover-point man." The game is commenced by the ball being placed in the centre of the field. The players are arranged in "the crosse." The opposing "centre" struggle for the ball, which, as soon as obtained, is hurled to one end by time side. For many minutes, and oftentimes for hours, the ball is hurled about the field, the players all endeavoring to send it between the goal-posts and past the opponents' colors. The exciting moment is when the ball is in proximity to the goals. The players crowd in, and their crosses fly like rapiers, when suddenly one of the fielders of the point catches the ball on his "crosse," and running like a deer, bears it toward the other goal; but he is sorely intercepted by some of the fielders who knock the ball down, and catch the ball in their own. In Canada thousands turn out to witness "La Crosse," and when the Indians, with whom it originated, measure "crosses" with the veteran white players of Montreal there are tens of thousands to witness it.

HALF WAY UP LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN, the place where occurred one of the most beautiful thrilling associations, and where the brave boys of both armies met and fought hand to hand—where the blood of both flowed and for ever mingled, settler or ran down the mountain-side in rivulets—is a smooth-faced rock, upon which a poor wounded soldier carved the following:

"S. T.—1860—X.—Early in the battle I was wounded, and carried to this spot by two clever Yanks. They bade me good-bye, and left me supposed, to die, for I was so weak from loss of blood that I could but faintly thank them for their kindness. They left me a canteen of water, bottle of Plantation Bitters, to which I owe my life, for it strengthened me, and kept life within me until help came. I am now well and hearty. MANHATTAN
CO-OPERATIVE
RELIEF ASSOCIATION.
OFFICE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION,
No. 608 BROADWAY, COR. BOND ST., N. Y.
THE MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is chartered by the State of New York.
OBJECT.
The object of this Association is to secure a cash payment without delay to the heirs of the decedents of as many dollars as there are members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.
MEMBERSHIP FEES.
The membership fees are six dollars at joining (for which a policy will be furnished), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which due notice will be given. The dollar from each member goes to the widow or heirs of the deceased member, and the ten cents defray the expenses of collecting.
INVESTMENTS.
The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the money received as new membership fees shall be made a sinking fund to meet payments falling due by the delinquencies of members. This fund is fully invested.
NATIONAL TRUST CO.,
and will be invested in United States Bonds, or real estate, or bond and mortgage upon New York City property, which property shall be double the value of the money so invested.
THE FUNDS.
The remaining two thirds, after paying the expenses of the Association, shall be invested in real estate in the City of New York, or bond and mortgage on property in the City of New York, the interest of which shall go to pay the current expenses of the Association. If a deceased member leaves no heirs, the money becomes the property of the Association, with the proviso that the expenses of burial shall be paid out of such deceased member's means, and to succeed one hundred dollars.
THE MEMBERS pay his fee of one dollar and ten cents within thirty days from date of notice, forfeit all claims upon the Association, and lose the benefit of money previously paid. In the Pacific States this fee is increased to two dollars. Any change having a permanent residence must notify the Secretary, and the membership will not be given up his fees.
When members choose they can send ten dollars and take out a policy for twenty, by paying their fees, which sum will pay for ten deaths, thus saving the trouble of sending for the money, besides a saving of fifty cents. No man is so poor that he can not pay $6 now, and $1 10 occasionally as assessments fall on his heirs. The average number of dollars each person will receive in this Association will be $30 per year, little over fifty cents per week. This makes this mode of insurance the cheapest ever offered to the public. Have to pay any regular Insurance Company for a similar risk.
This company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women. As soon as ten members are filled ten new classes will be adopted. Men and women then take rank next to the same classes. Every thing is done to make each class equal.
CLASSES.
In class A all persons between the ages of 18 and 20 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 20 and 25 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 25 and 30 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 40 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 45 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 50 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 55 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 60 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 65 yrs.
In class L all persons betw'n the ages of 65 and 70 yrs.
Any one that is found to give his or her age wrong will be expelled, and the money forfeited to the Association. Each class is limited to 5000 members. Each class will be filled as rapidly as the public desire, and as each time a member dies belonging to the same class he or she may be entitled to a policy.
A member of one class can not be assessed this dollar of a deceased member of another class.
EACH CLASS IS INDEPENDENT, having no connection with any other.
ILLUSTRATION.
Class "A" has but twelve members. A man dies. The Association pays over, within forty days, $600 to the heirs of the dead man, and the remaining members forward, within thirty days, $1 10 each to the Association to reimburse it for having to send this sum. Every policy to the Association all moneys paid, and the Association supplies a new member to fill the place of the retiring one.
ADVANTAGES.
The advantages of this Association over ordinary Life Insurance Companies are obvious. No sum can be used, the face are so small, and required to be paid at such long intervals that it is not an object to his family a competency upon his death.
HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.
Any one desiring to become a member must send $6, in check, bank draft, postal order, or by express, the expenses to be paid by the applicant. Under no circumstances will the Association be responsible for moneys sent by mail. Applications are only accepted to receive moneys, but must ask for checks, &c., &c. Applicants must be in better health than by doctor's certificate their own risk. All checks, &c., must be payable to the order of the Secretary, Treasurer, or Trustee, paying the money must be a paper giving the applicant's full name, residence, business, nationality, on who the policy is in favor of, post-office address, town, county, State, age, and the name of the nearest kin, the physical condition, and whether, in the opinion of the doctor examining, the applicant is a proper person to be insured. Blank forms of application for membership will be sent on application.
Agents are not allowed to receive money but in the form of checks, bank draft, postal order, made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.
Each member ought to try to make new members; by so doing he benefits himself. No letter will be noticed that does not contain a two cent postage stamp to prepay return postage.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing a much higher price. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have a watch that will look, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. We are now manufacturing Gents' and Ladies' Watches of extra fine finish and quality, price $30. These are equal in appearance and time to those costing $200. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO. 37 and 39 Nassau St. N. Y. Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless articles for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide: consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

WATCH. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its quality of appearance resembles the Gold we sell, which even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of this month, and has now only called forth the eulogisms of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, thoroughly regulated, and the cases and goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as being perfect timekeepers. Price from $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

A full assortment of Gents' and Ladies Aluminium Bronze Cases for Waltham Watches. Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with privilege.

We are not Cast Iron!

Cast iron undergoes marked changes under the alternate action of heat and cold, and the human body is not cast iron. On the contrary, it is a combination of delicate tissues and fibres, which are exquisitely sensitive to atmospheric changes, and, unless protected against the sudden and violent variations of temperature by wise precautions, are sure to be disastrously affected by them.

At this season the difference between the temperature of night and day is greater than at any other period of the year, and the stomach, the liver, the kidneys, and the nervous system are apt to receive violent shocks from the change, resulting in indigestion, bilious attacks, debility, low nervous fever, fever and ague, remittent fever, &c. Sustain and reinforce these delicate organs by the use of the purest and most potent of all vegetable tonics and alteratives, viz.,

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS,

The effect of this matchless invigorant is to brace up the whole vital organization and regulate its action. Useful at all seasons as a means of promoting perfect digestion, its even and natural flow of bile, and a healthy condition of the bowels and the skin, it is especially necessary in the fall, when the complaints arising from checked perspiration are so common. It is found, by those who are in the habit of using this agreeable and unequaled tonic, that it so strengthens and fortifies the body as to render it proof against the morbid influences which infect the air during the prevalence of epidemics.

THE GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD

—receiving the aid and supervision of the Government, and carried forward by the extraordinary resources and energy of the powerful Corporations to whom it was intrusted—is rapidly approaching completion, and it is safe to say that NEW YORK AND SAN FRANCISCO WILL BE CONNECTED BY RAIL BY THE FOURTH OF JULY NEXT.

More than two-thirds of the Through Line and Branches between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean are constructed, at a cost of nearly ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS, and the remainder is being pushed forward with unparalleled vigor. The to whom belongs the Western and Principal Portion of the Main-Stem Line, receive from the United States Government:

I. The RIGHT OF WAY through the Territories, with the use of timber and materials along the route.

II. An absolute grant of twenty sections per mile (12,800 acres) of the Public LANDS on the line, the minimum value of which is now fixed at $2 50 per acre.

III. A patent issue of UNITED STATES SIX PER CENT. BONDS, at the average rate of $48,000 per mile, delivered as the work progresses; which the Company are allowed to repay within thirty years, principally by transportation services.

IV. Authority to issue their own FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS to the same amount, having the preferred lien mentioned, next to that of the Government.

V. It receives, in addition, DONATIONS AND SUBSIDIES from the State and Cities of California, amounting to more than $5,000,000 in gold.

Or an aggregate of Cash Resources for construction of MORE THAN SIXTY MILLIONS UPON 726 MILES, independent of the Ten Millions of Acres of Public Lands, and further Subsidies pledged to the Capital Stock.

The earning capacities of the enterprise is therefore beyond all reasonable doubt.

This Company have already carried their road successfully across the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and are rapidly extending the track across the Salt Lake Plains, and have already a valuable way-traffic thereon. Before the winter, the newest mines, and being exempt from competition, will always command large revenues, which are collected in specie.

The business for the month of July just was as follows, IN GOLD:

GROSS EARNINGS.	OPERATING EXPENSES.	NET EARNINGS.
$259,590 89.	$80,352 72.	$179,238 17.

This result was upon less than 200 miles opened for business, with insufficient rolling-stock, and was derived from legitimate commercial business only—being altogether independent of the transportation of the immense miles eastward during the same period.

The undersigned offer for sale, and recommend to investors, the bearing six per cent. per annum interest, both principal and interest payable in "UNITED STATES GOLD COIN." These Bonds are the first lien upon one of the most productive and valuable railroad lines in the world—a line which will be finished within twelve months, and which is already earning, after paying operating expenses, more than twice the annual charge of its bonded debt.

More than three fifths of the total amount of Bonds authorized are already negotiated and in the hands of permanent holders, and the Financial Agents are satisfied of their ability to dispose of the remainder at the present or even higher rates. About $5,000,000 of the Bonds have been taken in Europe, and they are assured that, upon the completion of the enterprise, the whole of the Bonds may be advantageously placed at rates far higher than are now obtainable. All the benefits of the large increase in business and consequent advance which may be reasonably expected when the loan is closed, purchasers can not be made too soon.

Thus far the Central Pacific Railroad Company have sold their own First Mortgage Bonds as fast or faster than they received the corresponding United States Bonds on the road built, and in the same ratio the Company could deliver them. It is not improbable, therefore, that the whole of their First Mortgage Loan will be disposed of before the through connection is made, and payments become necessary next.

A limited amount will be disposed of at 100 Per Cent. and Accrued Interest, in Currency.

The Bonds are of $1000 each, with semi-annual gold coupons attached, payable in July and January.

☞ The Company reserve the right to advance the price at any time; but all orders received by mails at the time of such advance will be filled at present prices. At this time they pay more than 8 PER CENT. interest, and the investment is one which will be found a permanent benefit. Subscriptions are solicited from corporate bodies, as well as individuals.

We receive all classes of Government Bonds, at their full market rates in exchange for the Central Pacific Railroad Bonds. Also, advising the holders to realize from 5 to 10 PER CENT. PROFIT and keep the principal of their investments equally secure.

All orders by mail or telegraph receive prompt attention. Information, Descriptive Pamphlets, &c., giving a full account of the Organization, Progress, Business, and Prospects of the enterprises, furnished on application.

Blank Bonds sent by return Express at our cost.

Subscriptions Received by Banks and Bankers, Agents for the Loan throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe.

☞ All descriptions of GOVERNMENT SECURITIES BOUGHT, SOLD, or EXCHANGED, at our Office, and to be had at the BOARD OF BROKERS.

☞ ACCOUNTS of BANKS, BANKERS, and others received, and favorable arrangements made for desirable accounts.

THE WATER DRINKERS.

THE scene here represented is one familiar to all who have traveled in Spain. "Agua fresca, agua fresca, quien quiere agua fresca!" such is the cry we may hear sonorously shouted in the plaza at the corner of the old palace, the porch of which affords a grateful shade, while the hot, burning sun of Spain glows again on the white walls and gray roofs of the old tumble-down square, with its quaint and grateful fountain in the centre splashing a sense of coolness around. No one who has not experienced what summer is in scorched-up Spain can conceive the delight of a deep draught of pure, icy-cold water, such as one gets from CHARLES V.'s well in the Alhambra, for instance. This and a water-melon are the two great luxuries of life in Andalusia. Here we see two Iberian maidens, of almost Moorish hue, in black mantilla and richly-worked shawl, fan in hand, who have probably just returned from mass in the neighboring church. They and the water-carrier are full of character, and thoroughly Spanish. Equally so are the inscriptions we read on the wall—"Una vasa de agua es mejor del vino malo," and "Viva libertad y indipendenza!" Liberty and water are, in truth, the two national aspirations of thirsty and enslaved Spain. As a work of art this is one of PHILLIP'S most delightful pictures, boldly drawn, well grouped, and painted with an impasto and boldness such as no other painter of his school could approach.

THE INDIAN WAR.

GENERAL SHERIDAN writes to a friend in this city that the Indians began their present depredations in order to force the agents to give them further presents and more money, making us, in accordance with our old time Indian policy, purchase a peace. But the policy of Generals SHERMAN and SHERIDAN is not that of the old Indian agents and speculative traders; it is rather that of the actual settlers, and it means extermination or removal. The war now inaugurated will doubtless end in the complete subjugation of the Indian tribes. If General SHERMAN does not render them forever powerless for evil he will disprove much of the character he gained during the late war as a thorough soldier, and if General SHERIDAN does not vigorously pursue and punish those in the field he is not the active soldier we have always supposed him.

We publish on page 653 an illustration of one of the attacks of Indians on a wagon-train. Our artist, writing from near Council Grove, Kansas, says the sketch of the fight at Sheridan was made immediately after its conclusion, he having been a participant in the fight. He adds:

On the morning of the 10th September firing was heard in the direction of the Buttes about a mile and a half from Sheridan. The alarm was immediately given and every one turned out, no man waiting for his neighbor. It was found that part of a Mexican bull-train which had been cut off the preceding night had been attacked a second time. Two men were already dead and one scalped. The party from the town arrived in time to save the scalp of the other one; both, however, were much mutilated. Nearly all the cattle were either killed or wounded. After a short skirmish the Indians retreated without loss. Being mounted they escaped pursuit. During the night they returned and carried off some of the meat of the cattle which had been killed.

THE LOST CAUSE.

WHEN at the last the war was done,
They crowned that lost for which they fought;
But is the blood and treasure naught
By which the victory was won?

If so, then those emancipated years
Brought to the captives of vanished rule no gain,
But only sharpened thrusts of pain,
And grief let loose in scalding tears.

If so, because the sword was drawn
We fought, but not for Right unsailed;
As well the traitor had not quailed,
Nor victory brought at last the Dawn.

See, now, the banners that they fly
Are those that Treason's gory hand
Uplifted across the land
Rings still the same old battle-cry.

And shall the Lost Cause be regained?
Shall Wrong, defeated in the fight,
Be yet triumphant over Right
Though countless fields with blood were stained?

Oh, true and tried of heart and hand!
Man of the loyal people's choice,
In you and in your soldiers' voice
Abides the Future of the land.

THE CAMILLA RIOT.

IT is not easy to ascertain accurately the facts in any case of violence in the late rebel States. Invariably, however, when in a conflict between rebels and Union men of any color, the fair presumption is against the former. The Union men, knowing that the feeling of the old master-class is against them, are not likely to provoke disturbance, while the history of their conduct before and during and since the war relieves them, generally, of the suspicion of instigating trouble. Again, there is not a reflecting man in the country who is familiar with the facts, who supposes that if the colored population in the Southern States were treated with fairness it would be troublesome or vindictive. While there is certainly not a man of common manhood who supposes that any class of men will allow itself to be thrust back into a cruel bondage, from which it has just been delivered, without a struggle. It, therefore, we hear of riots and bloodshed arising from the condition of society in the Southern States, we may be very sure that the final cause is the unjust attempt of one part of the population politically and socially to subjugate another.

A fortnight ago Colonel PIERCE, Republican candidate for Congress in the second district of Georgia, and Captain MCCRARY, one of the Republican candidates for Elector, went with a party or political friends to hold a meeting at Camilla. They were met at the railroad depot by the town by the Sheriff and some of the citizens, who requested them to retire, as the people of Camilla wished to hear no Radical speaking. The party declined, and marching on, entered the town, where they were presently attacked. Both PIERCE and MURPHY were wounded, and many of their friends were killed. The Sheriff says that he asked them only to lay aside their weapons. But it does not oppose that they were unusually armed, while the attack shows the town ought to have been fully armed. This request, therefore, was, that a party of unarmed Republicans, many of whom were colored, should run the risk of holding a meeting in a rebel town and among armed rebels. Now it may be the fate of Union men to be summarily shot in Georgia for the crime of holding political meetings. But it is really extravagant to ask them to submit to slaughter without even a form of remonstrance.

The question upon reading this statement is, whether it was probable that the intention of the party was, as the Associated Press dispatch avers, "to overawe" the citizens of Camilla? Had not Colonel PIERCE and Captain MCCRARY a right to hold a political meeting any where in their district? If some of their friends were armed, has there ever been a political meeting in exciting times in that part of the country where a large part of those present were not armed? Has the conduct of their opponents been such as to show the Republican that it is not necessary to defend themselves? Have not WADE HAMPTON and his associates every where invited the Democrats to organize against colored Union men and starve them if they will not support SEYMOUR? Has not the Georgia Legislature expelled the colored members? Are not colored men thrust from the jury box? Are not the black codes the living witnesses of the feeling of their political opponents?

Governor BULLOCK has done what he can to protect loyal men in Georgia, but the Democratic majority left in the Legislature by the expulsion of Union men has thwarted his efforts. These are the facts of the case. If SEYMOUR and BLAIR should be elected, what a fearful tragedy must not every where follow in the Southern States! If while SEYMOUR is a candidate merely there is such confusion, must not his election produce chaos in that distempered section? General SCHOFIELD has ordered General MEADE to return and to keep the peace in Georgia. He will investigate the facts of the Camilla riot. But we imagine they are already substantially known and understood. Once more, we say, let all sensible men decide what is or the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR is the road to peace.

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

INSURRECTION in Spain is as inevitable as discontent in Ireland. The necessity of modern government is justice; and whatever be the true theory of suffrage, whether it be a right or a trust, experience shows that in states where the suffrage is most general, justice is surest. The most disturbed political communities in our Union are those in which aristocratic government has prevailed; the most peaceful and progressive, those in which there is the highest general welfare, are those which have been most truly popular. Universal suffrage is certainly not a panacea for the ills of human society. But it seems to be the precedent condition of hopeful progress. Intelligence is indispensable necessary to good government; but political power is the necessary means to education. Where every body votes it is the interest of every man that his neighbor should be intelligent. On the other hand, an unintelligent community will not select intelligent governors; but if the governors appoint themselves, all experience again shows that they will abuse their power.

This is the result of aristocratic rule every where. We see its consequences in the present revolution in Spain, and in the Carlist riot, and in Portugal. The latest shindig in modern illustration was that in late war. England is engaged in a peaceful contest with her own aristocracy. The present Gladstone moves so rapidly that the Tory Prime Minister can hold his place only by outdaring the Liberals. He makes his stand in this election, indeed, upon abolishing the ecclesiastical situation in Ireland. But he would be instantly shorn of his strength if his previous conduct were not an assurance of rapid change in the Irish Church. If Ireland should be maintained in the election he would be obliged to present some reform policy for Ireland. The most intelligent of the Tory party of England move so rapidly that the Tory Prime Minister can hold his place only by outdaring the Liberals. He makes his stand in this election, indeed, upon abolishing the ecclesiastical situation in Ireland. But he would be instantly shorn of his strength if his previous conduct were not an assurance of rapid change in the Irish Church. If Ireland should be maintained in the election he would be obliged to present some reform policy for Ireland. The most intelligent of the Tory party of England moves so rapidly that the great changes in that country will be peacefully accomplished. But there is no Englishmen so dull as to believe that those changes can be arrested. The case of the Irish Church acts as he has hitherto acted, he is in no sense a Tory minister. He receives his policy from Parliament, movements which are the expression of events. This changes the form but not the essence of the British Government, for it still leaves Parliament supreme.

The political Tory, during the reign of the present Queen, who came to the throne in 1833, is a conservative who becomes a more or less decide party. Such was the chief of what may be called the Tories or Absolutists, and O'DONNELL of the Whigs or Liberals. The Tory party has generally been dominant, and the true Liberal party, formed by Cobden to a popular government, has been dormant, except when it tried a revolution, which was generally immanently repressed. The Tory and Whig leaders are now dead, and a Liberal revolution has broken out under the most favorable auspices. GONZALEZ BRAVO, the Chief Minister, has resigned, and CONCHA, a moderate Liberal, has succeeded him. But the revolutionists, of whom General PRIM is the most noted leader, have declared for the overthrow of the monarchy and for ESPARTERO, formerly Regent and a Liberal. He is now seventy-six years old, but his name is a popular cry, and connects the revolution with the previous régime.

Before the French Revolution of 1848 the DUKE DE MONTPENSIER, a son of King LOUIS PHILIPPE of France, married QUEEN ISABELLA'S sister. This event was the occasion of the Spanish marriage question, which was considered to be very important. But after LOUIS PHILIPPE left Paris and history under a large umbrella it was not thought to be so important. The Duke is now understood to have arrived in Spain to wait upon Providence. But the revolution is not likely to be satisfied with exchanging one daughter of FERDINAND VII. for another with a French husband. If it succeed it will doubtless appeal to a popular vote, and we shall see a Constituent Assembly in Spain. Nor is any power in Europe likely to interfere, and undertake a crusade against revolutionary Spain as the Great Powers did against revolutionary France at the end of the last century. If ISABELLA abdicates her BURKE will sigh for the vanished age of chivalry, nor fear that the foundations of human society are crumbling because a corrupt tyranny is overthrown. But, whether this movement succeeds or not, the revolution in Spain is permanent. It will continue until the government is harmonized with the welfare of the people.

GENERAL DIX FOR GENERAL GRANT.

THE letter of General DIX strongly advocating the election of General GRANT, and stating his reasons for opposing MR. SEYMOUR, is not only very good in itself, but it is very significant. The SEYMOUR papers sneer at it as the snarl of a disappointed man. But that does not touch the point. Granting it to be so, for the argument, what then? Why is he disappointed? Certainly General DIX is a Democrat of much more conspicuous and brilliant than MR. SEYMOUR'S. He has been Senator in Congress, Secretary of the Treasury, and Minister to France. He is a gentleman of capacity, of scholarly accomplishment, of very great experience in public affairs, of unspotted reputation, and of national distinction. It is said that he is disappointed because he was not nominated by the Democrats for the Presidency. Very well, being a much more eminent and able man than MR. SEYMOUR, and universally known to his party, why was he not nominated?

For precisely the same reason that he was not confirmed as Minister to France twenty years ago, when his party controlled the Senate and the policy of the Government. Because he was not a tool of the aristocratic slave power; because he had been opposed to the annexation of TEXAS and the theft of that power; and because he had said that slavery should be confined to its domain by a cordon of free States, and forever. The scorpion girt with fire, to sting itself to death. General DIX, although a Democrat, had shown some emotion of humanity, some sense of justice, some regard for national honor. But from the moment that this appeared his "Democracy" was not sound. "Sound Democracy" was unswerving subservience to the slave-holding aristocracy. FRANK PIERCE was the true article; so was HORATIO SEYMOUR'S. They sneezed when SENator BUTLER of South Carolina took snuff.

When the Democracy rose in rebellion against the Government, "sound Democracy" was shown in the letter of PIERCE to JEFFERSON DAVIS and the speeches of SEYMOUR, denouncing the war and discrediting the Government. But General DIX surrendered all hope of preferment by the Democratic party when he wrote, "If any man hauls down the American flag, shoot him on the spot!" What will WADE HAMPTON doing but that very thing? What will HORATIO SEYMOUR doing but encouraging him? And when WADE HAMPTON and WADE HAMPTON returned to the command of the Democratic party, of course he rewards SEYMOUR, and General DIX has as much chance of the nomination as CHARLES SUMNER.

If, then, General DIX be a disappointed man, it is because he has not understood his party. What right has he to suppose, from any thing the Democratic party has ever said or done, that hostility to slavery and distinguished service for the Government against the rebellion were claims upon that party? Who were the managers of that party during the war? Who was the President of its National Convention in 1864, and what did that Convention declare? Who controlled the Democratic Convention of Chicago that directed its financial policy, and WADE HAMPTON its policy of reconstruction. It nominated SEYMOUR, who publicly declared that the success of the Government would be as revolutionary as that of the rebellion, and FRANK BLAIR, who called aloud for the President to overthrow by force the government of the Southern States. "Sound Democracy" served slavery alive, and it serves it dead. It passes black codes, organizes the Ku-Klux Klan, and threatens laborers with starvation who do not support it. It is the enemy of equal rights, of peace and of progress. Its chosen representatives are WADE HAMPTON, WADE HAMPTON, and HOWELL COBB. Is General DIX disappointed that these persons did not nominate him, or that his party insists upon being chained to a corpse?

WATER STREET.

THE late performances at the dance-house of JOHN ALLEN in Water Street have not seemed to us so promising as to many ardent souls, whose fancies run an extremely long-headed adversary, and because bears have a habit of feigning death when they have by no means succumbed. It does not seem to us a very hopeful way of improving a man to make him notorious for wickedness, and then an object of sensational attention. If a missionary should go into Water Street—and we wish that the sense of duty called missionaries there rather than to Burmah and Siam oftener than it does—and fin ling a man whose house was the haunt of every horrible vice, should labor with him manfully, show him the infamy of his life, and win him from it, a good work would be done. But missionaries are apt to be very amiable men with very little experience of mankind, and are, consequently, unable always to discover when they are fooled.

The public is greedy for religious sensations. A revival like that of ten years ago excites the community, and it is useless to speculate upon its advantages or harmful results. The difficulty with all such things is the case with which a certain physical condition is mistaken for a spiritual awakening, and in general the healthy both of intentional and unintentional deception. JOHN ALLEN probably made game of his missionary visitors; but finding himself notorious he acted accordingly. An article upon the Wickedest Man in New York may be a good advertisement for a magazine or for a dance-house, but we can not think it a wise way to reform Water Street. The flurry of excitement which has been raised about a particular spot in that missionary region may last for a few days longer. We observe that several fashionable gentlemen have been there to preach and pray. Will they continue to go when the excitement has died away, and no newspaper or magazine deciches the dance-house and its meeting?

If all this is the beginning of a wise moral effort to purify Water Street and the wharves, we shall be very glad of it. But it is a mere spasm of sensation for the cloyed city, Water Street will be worse off than before.

PUSHING THE FINANCIAL QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD ATKINSON, of Boston, is "pushing" the financial question with an ability and vigor that must be rather distressing to Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR, who urges his friends to push it in a very different direction. MR. ATKINSON has been studying documents accessible to every body, but by no means manageable by every body—such as Reports of Secretaries of the Treasury—and has reached some very striking results.

For instance: The total revenue of the United States from April 1, 1861, to June 30, 1868, seven and a quarter years of active war or of so-called peace, was $2,213,349,480. If we deduct from the total expenditure for that time a fair allowance for ordinary peace expenses, we have, $1,915,000,000 as the actual cost of the war. But as we owed on the 30th of June, 1868, only $2,485,000,000, it follows that we have not only raised by taxation, and paid toward the cost of the war, besides paying all our peace expenses, $1,515,000,000. This has been paid in seven and a quarter years, and amounts to three-eighths of the cost of the war. And the money has been raised mainly in the loyal States, which for more than half of the time were the most efficient producing part of the population engaged in war.

Again, as a taxation of nearly $500,000,000 has proved too great for our present condition, the rates have been reduced to but little more than $300,000,000 a year—and such is the reduction of our expenses that this sum is ample to pay expenses and interest, and a moderate annual payment of the principal. The normal increase of the population will so enhance the revenue that the rate per capita, which now yields $300,000,000, will in the next twenty years, increase the aggregate in a sum sufficient to pay all additional expenses and the entire principal of the debt within that time. The present rate per capita yields about $9,000,000. The income tax yields $30,000,000. The whisky and tobacco, stamp and other taxes will yield more than $100,000,000.

This is the way to push the financial question—to tell the truth about it. To show that although the rebellion of the Southern wing of the Democratic party, sustained by the opposition offered to the Government by MR. SEYMOUR and his friends, has thrown a great debt upon the country, yet the energy and industry which overthrew the rebellion will, with equal determination, easily pay the honest cost of the incalculably precious victory.

GOVERNMENT BY THE PEOPLE.

A DEMOCRATIC paper coolly asserts that "self-government is the fundamental law, the policy of the Democracy." Let us see how true this is.

In ten of the States of the Union at least a third of the people, a third of the male adults, are colored. Now the Arkansas Democratic Convention last January declared for "the exclusion of negroes from an equal participation in making the laws." Self-government by the people is, therefore, not the policy of the Arkansas Democracy.

The Richmond Enquirer, the chief Democratic organ in Virginia, says distinctly, "none but white men must vote." The Virginia Democracy rejects the policy of self-government by the people.

The Mobile Register, the leading Democratic authority in Alabama, describes the "negro vote as null and void, and a sum of villainies." This is not very suggestive of government by the people.

Senator HENDRICKS, of Indiana, a prominent candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, says frankly, speaking for his party, "We must, the question squarely; we are against negro suffrage."

The cry of the Democratic party every where is not government by the people; it is "this is a white man's Government."

The alternative therefore is, that colored men are not "people," that is, they are not human beings, an assertion not held exclusively to Democratic orators; or that "people" is an arbitrary term meaning the lawful voters. Thus one Democratic writer gravely says: "It is the right of each State to determine who are the people qualified for political functions therein." Very well: who is the State? There is no State, in common sense, without voters, and who is to determine who the voters shall be? If the Democratic police by government by the people does not assert that all the people conforming to the usual conditions of sex and age ought to vote. But we deny that this is the Democratic policy any where, and least of all in the late rebel States.

All that the paper from which we quote means is that the white voters in the Southern States, a majority of whom in some of the States are unquestionably disloyal, are to the Government, ought to have exclusive political power, and do exactly as they please with the loyal people of every complexion. Hence the fine phrases of the Democratic papers and orators mean class government. The Democratic party, for more than a long generation, has been the political organization of an aristocracy, and it is nothing else now. When its orators a dozen years ago were blarneying the day-laborers of NEW YORK, Mr. HAMMOND, of South Carolina, was expounding his philosophy of society as a structure that rested most securely upon "mud-sills," as he contemptuously called the laborers, and the Richmond Enquirer set forth its pleasant doctrine that capital ought to own labor, not hire it. This was "Democracy" then, as it is now.

DEMOCRATIC SNEERS AT THE FOREIGN FRIENDS OF THE UNION

We do not remember to have seen in any Democratic paper, or to have met in any Democratic speech, any word of praise for the Englishmen and Frenchmen whose faith in the loyalty of our citizens was unshaken during the war. But they have been ridiculed and reviled as if they had been enemies of the country. On the other hand, Mr. REVEREND JOHNSON tells Lord VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, the chief of English association for running the blockade and promoting rebel piracy to destroy American commerce, that he was the only Democrat known to us. So the World, which can usually find its admiration for "the grand old soldier," General LEE, and which declares that the speeches of WADE HAMPTON do "honor to the American character," and exhibit "a true American citizen," and "a practical temper and a just political vision which do honor to the American character," sneers at GOLDWIN SMITH and NEWMAN HALL, who have been here, and at Mr. MCCARTHY, editor of the London Star, who is coming, as men who "look on in contemptuous quotation," stood by us in the dark and trying times."

Even the friendship of an Englishman for the Union and liberty in this country is an unforgivable crime to "Sound Democracy." Judging by experience, if Lord WARNCLIFFE, who hated slavery, and did his utmost to destroy it and save slavery, should come to this country, we do not doubt that the Chairman of the National Democratic Committee would be very glad to receive him; and, as that chairman, in his own house, rebuked a Union soldier for objecting to the Marquis of Hartington's dancing a rebel lady's hand face, so he would take good care that the Democratic organs that bark at the English friends of the Union should be respectfully silent before its enemies.

THE ARTILLERY SCHOOL AT FORTRESS MONROE, VIRGINIA.

We referred in previous articles to the necessity of schools of application and practice for those officers who, upon graduating at West Point, became connected with the artillery and engineer service, such necessity having been demonstrated in the early stages of the late war. Such a school, embracing also instruction for all appointees of the artillery of the army, whether from civil life or from the ranks of the army, has been established at Fortress Monroe. During the brief term of General GRANT as Secretary of War the school was established, in November, 1867, under orders issued by him. Since the school commenced operations a large tract of land, consisting of about three hundred acres, has been purchased and added to our possessions at Fortress Monroe. This establishment is likely to have an important effect upon the future of the Army.

Brevet Major-General BARRY, Colonel Second Regiment Artillery, was assigned to the command of the school and of the military post of Fortress Monroe and its dependencies; and the command was, by general orders, made an independent one, General BARRY receiving such orders directly from, and making his reports directly to, the General-in-Chief.

Brevet Brigadier-General JOSEPH ROBERTS, Lieutenant-Colonel Fourth Regiment Artillery, Brevet Major-General WILLIAM HAYS, Major Fifth Regiment Artillery, were assigned to duty at the school as field-officers; and Brevet Major SANGER, Adjutant First Artillery, as adjutant.

The orders of the War Department prescribed that the instruction at the school should be practical as well as theoretical; that the latter should comprise, besides the study of text-books, a course of lectures, of which notes should be taken by the students, and afterward abstracted and digested.

The practical portion of the course was assigned to the summer months, and was left to the discretion of the commanding officer of the school. The theoretical portion, to which the winter months were to be devoted, was to be arranged by the staff of the school, which was to consist of the commanding officer, the two field-officers, the ordnance officer for the time being in command of the Fortress Monroe Arsenal, and the adjutant of the school as secretary. The staff was also charged with the code of regulations for the governance of the school, which was done with much completeness.

On the battery from each of the five regiments of artillery was ordered to report to Major-General BARRY for duty at the school. All of the five officers belonging to each of these batteries were ordered to command their batteries; and provision was also made for a number of additional officers by directing the assignment to duty at the school of such officers as, by their character and ability, it was deemed desirable to send there. The five instruction batteries were also filled up with recruits to a total of ninety men.

By the 1st of February, 1868, the officers and enlisted men had all been assembled. Major-General BARRY arranged the preliminaries of the organization of the school, and the staff addressed itself to the preparation of the code of regulations, course of theoretical, and other instruction. These having all been finally approved by the General-in-Chief and the Secretary of War, the 1st of April, 1868, was designated for the formal opening of the school and commencement of the course of practical instruction as arranged by Major-General BARRY. An introductory lecture upon the appropriate theme, "The organization and history of the United States Artillery, the true principles of the Government to the present time," was delivered by General BARRY on the evening of March 31, and the course was promptly commenced next day. For the purposes of practical instruction the school is supplied with the following guns:

1. A field-battery (without horses) consisting of four 3-inch rifle muzzle-loading steel guns, and four 12-pounders smooth-bore.

2. A siege-battery of four 4½-inch rifle guns, one 30-pounder Parrott rifle gun, and one 8-inch siege-howitzer.

3. A siege-battery of four 10-inch siege-mortars of new pattern, with iron carriages.

4. A sea-coast battery (in casemate) of six 10-inch Rodman smooth-bore guns, and three 24 pounder shell-boat howitzers.

5. A sea-coast battery (in barbette) of four 100-pounder Parrott rifle guns, and three 15-inch Rodman smooth-bore guns.

6. A sea-coast battery of six 15-inch sea-coast mortars, and one 8-inch siege-howitzer for the land-service (without preponderance) and with iron carriages.

A Laboratory, equipped with every implement and supply requisite for practical instruction in military pyrotechnics, the manufacture of artillery ammunition, was also prepared.

Besides instruction in the ordinary drill and general service of all these guns, practical instruction was given in the laying out and building of siege and mortar batteries, the laying of platforms for siege guns and mortars and for sea-coast batteries; and in every practicable mechanical manœuvre incident to their mounting, dismounting, transfer, and transportation, including, of course, those pieces of ordnance of the heavy calibers, such as Rodman smooth-bores and 13-inch sea-coast mortars and their carriages.

Practice with blank-cartridge and friction-primers was also regularly had monthly. The month of September and the first two weeks of October, which close the practical portion of the course, were to be given to target-practice with every species of gun and projectile now adopted in the United States service. The opportunity offered by target-practice will also be availed of for the purpose of practical instruction in the uses of the Plane-Table for obtaining ranges; SCHULTZE'S Chronoscope, and BENTON'S Electro-ballistic Pendulum for obtaining initial velocities, and RODMAN'S pressure-plug for ascertaining initial strain.

An examination on the practical portion of the course will be had during the last half of the month of October; and on the 1st of November the theoretical portion of the course will commence, and will continue until March, when the final examination will be held.

The course of studies having been fixed by orders of the War Department at one year, the five batteries now under instruction will be replaced on the 1st of April by five others.

From the above summary of what has been done and what is proposed to be done during the first year of the present Artillery School, it will be perceived that its aims are to conserve, digest, and utilize the mass of valuable practical artillery experience acquired during the late war, and to impart to the officers and enlisted men of the United States Artillery instruction in the specialties of their arm of the service, which can be only thoroughly accomplished at the permanent artillery post or school, where apparatus, books, and artillery material can be collected in sufficient quantity and variety, and almost especially arranged for that purpose. Officers of artillery of the Army of the present day are to be divided into three general classes: first, those promoted from the ranks, and whose opportunities for education have been limited; second, those appointed into the artillery from civil life, who have received a good education, but often a collegiate education; and third, the graduates of the Military Academy at West Point. The design of the Artillery School at Fortress Monroe is to afford opportunities to each of the first two classes to acquire as much as is possible of the special information necessary for them as officers of artillery; and to supplement, for those of the third class, what the want of time and the pressure of other studies rendered impracticable for them to acquire at the Military Academy; but all graduates of the latter who are assigned to the artillery are expected to have served at least one year with their batteries before being sent to this school. The thanks of the country are due to General GRANT for this important service.

"JUST SO."

THE following view of the canvass, taken by a leading Democratic paper a month after the nomination of Mr. SEYMOUR, is very ludicrous reading by the light of Maine and Vermont, and the new "uprising of the people" for General GRANT:

"General GRANT has proved to be the most unavailable man the Radicals could have nominated. His military reputation is the strongly pronounced opposite of his pretensions. In short, it is all up with the Radicals. General GRANT is their last card. Their candidate is a sham. Their prospect is utter discomfiture. Their meetings are failures. Captain KIDD, as a memory, arouses more enthusiasm than General GRANT as his double character of chief and candidate. The only active men in the Radical campaign are hired Congressional thieves, their revenue rogues, or their pulpit preachers. Their statesmen keep their head in shame. Their former leaders hide from the public eye. Their prominent men are in the penitentiary together. The fear of detection alone bonds the knaves in union. The rank and file are deserting by tens of thousands. There is no virility in the whole concern. In Connecticut the Democrats come to RAYMOND COOVER. The party is dead and the bubble is burst."

GENERAL GRANT IN EUROPE.

IT is gratifying to find the distinguished European who contributed so materially, by word and pen, to the success of the Union cause, unanimous in regarding the election of General GRANT as absolutely necessary to prevent a recurrence of civil war. Even in the United States from being disgraced in the eyes of the world by financial repudiation. One good friend, Count GASPARIN, writes from Geneva to Mr. BENJAMIN F. WARD LABOULAYE'S words we quoted in a short time since; and the following extract, which we are permitted to make, from private letter of the eminent French historian, HENRY MARTIN, ranks him in the same category:

"You are right, my dear M. MARTIN, "in believing that we are warmly interested in your Presidential contest. The election of a so-called General would be a great calamity; but we have full confidence in the success of General GRANT."

A GENEROUS ACTION.

A FEW weeks since a number of sheriff's officers, in attempting to serve an injunction on an actor at the Broadway Theatre, restraining him from producing the drama of "Foul Play," by CHARLES READE and DION BOUCICAULT, became involved in a fracas in which a man and a boy assaulted in the theatre were wounded. Reports of the occurrence reached Mr. READE, and he immediately sent the sum of ten pounds, worth about $50 in greenbacks, to the sufferers, accompanied by the following characteristic letter:

"ALBERT TERRACE,
GLOUCESTER TERRACE, LONDON.

"Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York:

"DEAR SIRS,—A fracas has taken place about BOUCICAULT'S and READE'S drama of 'Foul Play,' and an old man and a boy have been severely wounded.

"I am grieved at this, but not to the wrong: more content judges will decide that upon a sworn evidence.

"But it makes me very unhappy that blood should be shed about any thing of this kind with which I am connected.

"I inclose a check on HERRIES & COMPANY for ten pounds, and will you be so very kind as to see that this small sum is laid out for cash for each of those two sufferers?

"I also want somebody to take them by the hand and tell them that nobody on either side of the water is more grieved at their misfortune than I am.

"Will you kindly do this, or get it done, for me? I shall be truly obliged to you if you will.

"I am, yours respectfully,

"CHARLES READE."

LITERARY.

THE second volume of DR. DRAPER'S "History of the American Civil War," which will be finished in another volume, is issued by the HARPERS. It is admirably printed and most conveniently arranged, and treats the period from the departure of Mr. LINCOLN from Springfield to the Emancipation Proclamation. DR. DRAPER considers that the military policy of the war contemplated three objects: chronologically to divide the rebellious States by sea and land; to open the Mississippi River; to capture Richmond. The military and naval operations to these results are vividly described, and with a remarkable clearness of detail and freshness of interest. The criticisms upon the commanders, especially upon General MCCLELLAN, are acute and discriminating. Indeed, we do not know where a better picture is drawn of that "military and hesitating" chieftain. DR. DRAPER devotes much space to the foreign relations and domestic policy of the Government. The attitude of England is relentlessly but authentically portrayed, and the French designs in Mexico are discussed with ample knowledge and graphic skill. Indeed, the volume, which is the result of faithful study of official records and personal communications from conspicuous actors, is full of interest and value, and is quite worthy the remarkable accomplishments of its distinguished author.

The HARPERS have just published a work of indescribable interest to the eighty or hundred thousand opium-eaters in the United States—"The Opium Habit, with Suggestions as to the Remedy." It consists of a painfully attractive narrative of the author's attempt to abandon opium; detailed accounts of the most celebrated opium-eaters; and an article and letter by FITZ HUGH LUDLOW, himself a victim of the habit, written with extraordinary detail of knowledge of every shifting aspect of the opium-eating practice. It is a book of great interest for every body, and of especial value for the faculty; and it is loudly demanded by the rapid extension of this insidious habit.

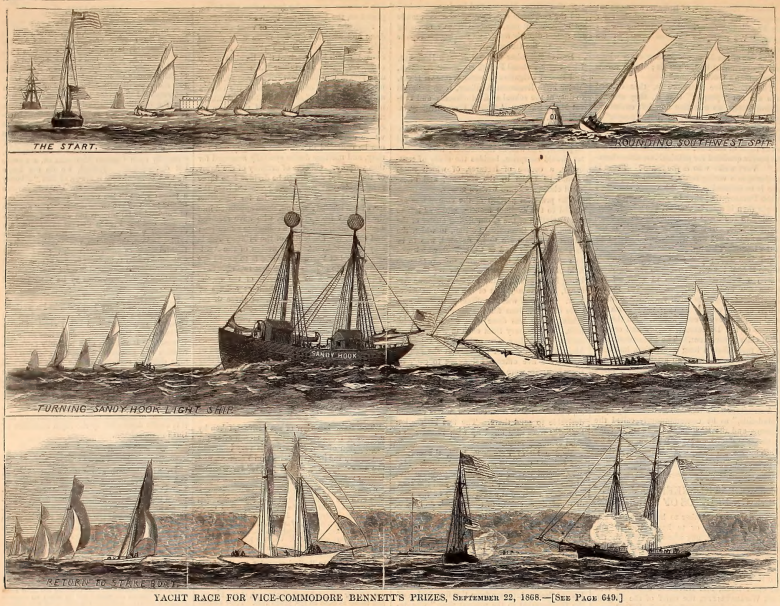
A GENERAL procession was moving the Erie Railway near Elmira on September 22 when an express train dashed into a steer of the drove, killing it instantly on the track and badly injured, and a child of the driver.

Captain MASON, President of the Registration Board of Jefferson Parish, Louisiana, was murdered on the 19th of September by the KU-KLUX Klan, and several negroes have been killed and churches burned recently by the same organization. General Hindman of the same State is also assassinated, and threatened the life of his former rebel soldiers.

On the 20th, BILL SURRATT, the alleged accomplice of BOOTH in the murder of President LINCOLN, was unexpectedly discharged from custody on September 20 under the lay of limitations, which forbids the prosecution of criminals after being more than two years under charges without trial. The Government counsel appealed on the ground that no application was made for the reason that SURRATT was a fugitive from justice.

The bill recently passed by the Louisiana Legislature to disfranchise all persons in favor of a tax in kind in public vehicles and be entertained in public hotels has been vetoed by Governor WARMOTH. He takes the ground that these rights are already secured by the State Constitution, and the effect of the bill can not be made a question for a criminal suit, but a civil one. Besides, he says, it is better to let the prejudice against the newly enfranchised wear away by time rather than have it embittered by such legislation.

FOREIGN NEWS.



THE Spanish rebellion seriously threatens to become a successful revolution in a very short time. All the navy and half the army have joined the insurgent leader Prim, and the rest of the royal army is disorganized and no dependence can be placed upon its loyalty to QUEEN ISABELLA. The principal cities have revolted, and in several instances rebel governors have been murderers. General Prim, Marshal Serrano, and other rebel leaders, are marching with a victorious army on Madrid. The latter chosen for the revolt was at the time Queen ISABELLA was visiting Napoleon in the vain hope of obtaining assistance from him, and she was thus cut off from her capital. Her cause is doubtless the result of her son, but the rebels seem determined to be rid of the Bourbon dynasty, and the movement was not received with loud acclaim. The early expulsion of the Bourbons from Spain is probable, and doubtless the result of the present movements. The Bourbon race will then have run out in Europe.

A deputation of Greek citizens waited upon ADMIRAL FARRAGUT on September 19, and returned thanks for the sympathy which the United States had manifested for the patriots in Candia. Nevertheless, it is really a reproach to have said that the people of America are only sympathetic when it would do them no good so far as possible, the cause of liberty in Crete.

The most interesting latest declaration to the English is to the effect that the differences between England and Spain will be left to arbitration. What we put by this Europeans powers, and keep the country quiet.

The Hawaiian Islands, the group in the centre of Hawaii, the largest of the Sandwich Islands, is continually subject to volcanic eruptions. Mauna Loa is now in its four feet. Shocks of earthquake are felt four or five times a day by those of the islands, and considerable smoke is seen issuing from one of the volcanoes. At Hilo, during the continuance of the great convulsion in South America, the sea rose and fell from three to four feet once every ten minutes.

Later reports from South America place the total number of killed by the earthquakes in Ecuador at 40,000. In Peru the dead are yet hidden under the ruins of houses in many instances, and a stench infests the air which, it is thought, will produce a pestilence. The band of robbers are running through the ruins robbing every one who has any thing left.

LOSS OF THE "WATEREE."

We have heretofore given full accounts of the great earthquake in South America, by which several of the most important cities of Peru and Bolivia were destroyed, and numerous vessels wrecked. Among others were the United States steamers Wateree and Fredonia, and the Peruvian steamer America and bark Chuncarilla. Our illustration on page 644 is of the scene of the destruction of these vessels and the town of Arica, Peru. The ruins of Arica, and a camp of Araucanian Indians, are seen on the left of the engraving; the remnants of the Fredonia are seen in the distance; the Wateree, high and dry a quarter of a mile inland, is seen in the centre and fore-ground; and the Peruvian vessels on the right.

Commodore JAMES H. GILLIS, of the Wateree, in his official report states that "the Wateree lies about three miles to the northwest of the city, and about four hundred and fifty yards inland. Although her hull has suffered much, still she appears to be in perfect condition. Not a plank has been started, and she stands upright as though in a dry dock. Considering her position, and its slight elevation above the sea, we do not think it possible to float her again. It would be impossible to dig under her, as the means are not at hand, and it would cost more than what the vessel is worth."

THE PARAGUAYAN WAR.

THE capture of the fortress of Humaita, after a constant siege of two and a half years, appears to have been rather the result of the voluntary retirement of the Paraguayans than that of a bold assault, as the accounts first led us to suppose. It was occupied by the Allies on July 25, but the Paraguayans had evacuated it a week before, and retired to a new line of defense about fifty miles farther up the river. A small force of 1000 men was left behind to retard the advance of the Allies; these men, after being surrounded, surrendered, and were immediately sworn in to serve on the side of the Allies.

Humaita, on being occupied, was found to be a weak position, depending entirely for its strength on the work just down the river, and known as Curupaita. On the capture of this last-named fort the evacuation of Humaita was begun. The commander of the Allied forces which garrisoned the fortress describes it as "a phantom." Not only was the fortress weak, but the town was wholly uninhabitable, having been destroyed by the constant bombardment of the Allied fleet and army. Our illustration on this page shows the condition in which the church at Humaita was found by the Allies on occupying the position. It had been almost wholly destroyed and leveled with the ground, and the interior was completely riddled.

"FOR GOD'S SAKE, TAKE CARE! THEY'RE GOING TO KILL AND ROB YOU"

CAPTAIN ROLF'S STORY.

By the Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," etc., etc.

DURING the march against the Mormons in 1838 we used to beguile the evenings by different stories of adventures. Captain Rolf of the 15th Regulars was generally a grave and silent man, but one evening, being hard pressed, he told the following story:

It was on the close of a sultry evening in August that I took my way along a woodland road that led to the town of W——, in the State of Virginia. The extreme sultriness of the weather had wearied me more than either the length of the way or the roughness of the road; and when at length I came in sight of a comfortable inn, nestling among trees on the road-side, I felt extreme delight. It was a small house, but a clean one; and the general air of neatness which characterized it was most attractive to the weary traveler.

The western part of Virginia had about this time been much troubled by a gang of desperadoes, whose robberies and acts of violence had both startled and horrified the community. All efforts to catch them had been in vain, and the road which I was traveling enjoyed the unenviable notoriety of having been the scene of by far the greater number of their crimes. It was, therefore, with feelings of deep satisfaction that I entered the door of this peaceful cottage.

The interior corresponded with the exterior. Nothing but cleanliness and neatness met the eye. I was encountered at the door by a woman of very prepossessing appearance, who courteously invited me into the parlor. I informed her that I proposed passing the night at this house, and asked her if she had accommodations for my horse. She answered in the affirmative, and went out to call the hostler. In a few minutes a tall, ill-looking man came forward, and proceeded to lead my horse away; not however before I had removed the saddle-bags and taken them under my own particular care.

The woman soon came in, and busied herself with arrangements about my dinner. I noticed that she had a troubled expression and frequently cast uneasy glances at me. This I did not notice particularly at first, or rather I attributed it to the ordinary anxiety which any careful landlady might feel about the success of her dinner.

Dinner passed over very well, and I adjourned to the chief room of the inn to take my postprandial smoke. I found there several men of sinister aspect sitting around the fire-place. The moment I entered they stopped talking and relapsed into silence.

These men were evidently habitués of the house. How this modest-looking woman ever came into connection with such men I could not imagine. However, there it was. These men, who were nearly a dozen in number, were certainly about the wildest set of desperadoes in appearance that I ever saw. After some minutes of silence they rose one by one and left the room.

I had carried my saddle-bags with me as I entered the room, and I noticed that my care of them attracted the notice of these men. I soon finished my smoke, and then, rising, I took my things and inquired for my bedroom. The woman took the light, and led the way. As I came to the door she turned around and faced me. Handing me the light she suddenly clutched my arm, and with a pale face, and in a thrilling whisper, she said:

"For God's sake, take care! They're going to kill and rob you!"

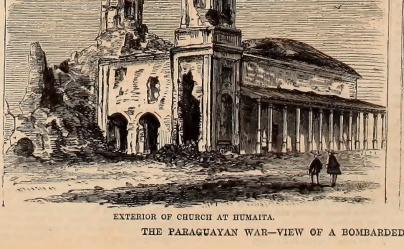
Before I could recover from the start which her words gave me she was gone.

I mechanically entered the room, put down the light, and stood like one stupefied.

What words were these? "Kill me! rob me!" What did the woman mean? As I thought of these words the belief forced itself upon me that this house, notwithstanding its simple neatness, was somehow connected with these very brigands of whom I had heard so much. For a moment I felt paralyzed.

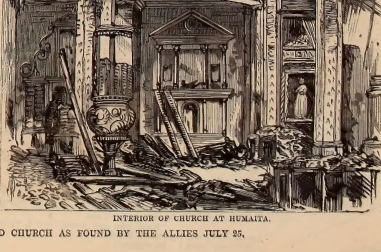
You may well believe that it was a fearful moment. Here was I, alone, in a lonely part of the country, completely in the power of these villains. As to the woman, she had warned me indeed; but why had she not warned me before? I thought of escape, but that was impossible. Supposing I could get away from the house, I could not hope to avoid the pursuit of these ruffians along the road; and to take to the woods was certain death.

At length the very desperation of my situation roused me to action. "Heus," I thought, "I will wait and receive my doom. I will sell my life as dearly as possible; I will not fly. I will remain here, trust in God, and fight till the last." After this decision I felt better. I went to the door and barred it as well as I could, and put all the furniture of the room against it. I also crammed some pillows against the windows. Then, opening my saddle-bags, I took out my pistol-case, to see how my arms were.



My arms consisted of two of the most beautiful revolvers that ever were seen. Both were "seven-shooters," with the very latest improvements—a movable chamber for the insertion of cartridges, which themselves were of a new invention. I had a huge supply of these cartridges, and never did I feel a greater revulsion of feeling than when these revolvers of mine presented themselves before me as my very good friends to protect me at this hour.

So great was the reaction that I felt a positive exultation.



My life will be hard to take, I thought; some of these devils will, perhaps, lose their first. Then my humor grew somewhat pleasant. I reflected with glee upon the fact that I had very little money, and my saddle-bags contained nothing but bills of account which I had come to collect. These ruffians would risk much for nothing whatever. As I coolly had thirty dollars, these ten men, for there seemed to be about that number, would have to risk their lives for three dollars apiece.

I was too excited to sleep, of course. I had to watch and guard my life. Sleep was not hard to fight off. In fact, it never even attempted to come to me.

I concluded that it would be best to put out the light, so as to conceal myself to the best advantage, in case they had any peep-holes through which to spy me. My room was in the front of the house, and looked out upon the road. I put out the light, and then walked softly to the window. It was too dark to see any thing. I found some sticks which I placed on the windows in such a way as to prevent their being opened, thus making them still more secure; and then sitting down on one side of the door, with my revolvers in my hands, I waited for events.

It was not long before I heard footsteps slowly ascending the stairs, and soon the door was tried. The weights which I had placed against it prevented it from being opened.

"He's fastened the door," said a voice.

"Pooh! There's no lock. Push hard."

There was a push. The door yielded.

"What do you want?" said I, quietly.

There was a pause. I heard whispers, but at last some one said:

"If you're awake open the door."

"I will not," said I.

"You must. If you don't we'll push it open."

"Do if you dare," said I, calmly.

They pushed. The door opened. I put my pistol close to the opening and fired.

There was a wild shriek. Some one was hit. There was fearful confusion. I could not resist the opportunity. I thought that I had to die at my rate, and therefore it would be best to put some of these fellows out of the world too. So I fired again. Another yell followed. Once more I fired. There was another yell. Then I heard a rush down stairs, and groans outside of my door.

By this time the intensity of my excitement had made every nerve as rigid and as tense as iron. I pulled away the things and opened the door. Feeling in the dark, I found the groaning men. There were three. I hastily dragged them into the room, and then barricaded the door once more.

"You scoundrels," said I, "I ought to show you no mercy; but you're suffering, and I'll help you."

They only groaned in reply.

I lighted the lamp, and, feeling on the floor, examined the wounded men. One was wounded in the thigh, another had his arm broken, a third had been hit in the right breast.

I soon found some ointments and drugs with me in case of accidents. Here they were quite useful. I brought out my little stock of lint and ointment, and dressed their wounds. The one who had been struck in the breast did not say a word. The others begged my forgiveness. I told them that I would see carefully. I was afraid of being seen through the windows or through the crevices of the door. But the temptation overcame me at the time; and these wretches, miserable as they were, afforded company at least.

After making them easy, I put out the light and waited. I knew that such a desperate gang as these would now be very much enraged, and ever, and determined to watch still more warily.

After a time I heard a noise outside. I conjectured that they were putting a ladder against the window. My revolvers were certainly fools, for what possible chance could they have there since they had failed against the door? "If any of you say one word," I muttered to the wounded men, "I'll blow your brains out." Satisfied with this threat, I waited, watched, and again, as before, there was a rush down stairs. At the same time there was a crash at the window. A gun was fired into the room. Loud curses followed. I rushed to the window. My outstretched hand touched the knee of a man, which was resting on the window-sill. I fired my pistol. The villain staggered back. I caught him before he fell. The window-sash had been smashed away by a blow with the butt-end of a rifle. I dragged him through into the room, where he lay groaning. Then I opened the door, and called out that I would shoot the next man who dared to make an attack. There was no response. So I dragged the other two wounded wretches into the room, reserving this for the last. Finally they retired, barricaded the door as before; and then, with renewed confidence and a feeling of triumph at my easy victory, I lighted the lamp.

The wretches were groaning fearfully. I felt such perfect self-complacency that I had no hard feeling toward them.

"Come," said I, "I've dressed the wounds of these others, and if you be quiet I'll dress yours."

"You're the devil himself!" growled the man whom I had dragged in through the window.

"Will you let the devil dress your wounds, or do you choose to suffer?" said I, quietly.

He said nothing. I proceeded to dress their wounds. The wretches looked grateful. They seemed surprised and bewildered. I gave two of them who were wounded worst my bed, and left the rest on the floor. Then I put the light out, as before, and waited. I would not expose myself, or I knew that the door, as before, with every sense sharpened to an unusual activity. Before putting out the light I had reloaded my pistol, which had been nearly used up in the six shots which I had fired with such effect, and, as I had plenty more charges left, I felt quite at ease.

"I'm all ready," said I, "for fifty of you."

"Have you got fifty pistols there?" said one fellow, whose arm was broken. He spoke with groan.

"You don't seem to know any thing about re- these parts," said I.

" next time you try this game how the man whom you at-

" waited for a long " pectedly, there was the loud report of a gun, close outside the door. Another followed immediately. Instantly I fired two or three shots. They did not seem to take effect. For I heard footsteps hurrying down the stairs. They evidently fancied that I might be standing in front of the door, and tried this experiment. They were mistaken, and they knew it.

After this there was silence for a long time. At last I heard a faint creak on the stairs. I suspected another attempt. I drew myself up close against the wall and waited. Suddenly it came. Three guns were fired in rapid succession. A fourth followed. The door was pushed open with a tremendous effort. A groan came from the bed. Instantly, as I felt the door thrust open, I fired five or six shots in swift succession. Some others were wounded. The shrieks and curses were fearful. Footsteps again sounded from some who were rushing down stairs. There were two men who had fallen in through the doorway and lay groaning on the floor. I dragged them inside. I closed the door again, as before, placing the barricade against it, and, for additional security, putting these wounded men against the barricade. It was a cruel thing to do; but wait till you have been attacked, till your blood is at fever heat, and you are mad with the excitement and the pitiless fervor of battle—wait, and then see what you will do.

Scarcely had I done this than I heard a cry from one of the wounded men. I turned back. There was silence for a time. Then I heard soft footsteps in my room.

Some one had got in!

This was the discovery that flashed upon my mind. What was to be done? I drew myself together in the room. There was a cry. There was a movement in my room. Some one was in it. No doubt in that last attack one of my assailants had flung himself in before his friend. It was during the door I had shut him in. What was he doing now? Where was he?

The groans from one of the wounded men whom I had last pulled in excited my attention and my pity.

"Oh my God!" he groaned; "to stab a wounded man!"

"Silly," I thought, "a wounded man!" What words are these? Who stabbed? Was it this mysterious new-comer? Did he think that he had caught me? Let him find out. But why had he stabbed? Evidently he had no other arm. No; if he had held a pistol in his hands he would have fired. He had a dagger, no doubt, and that only. What was I to do? All was silent in the room. The new-comer was shut in and could not move. He must be there. There was no sound except the groans of the wounded men. No doubt this man had found out that he had attacked one of his own comrades in the dark by mistake.

Not a single thing could be perceived in that intense darkness. But somewhere in the room, whoever he was, stood motionless, afraid to move. The groans of the wounded men arose incessantly. At last I heard a movement. I knew whoever he was, I fired and instantly changed my position to the other side of the door so as to be undiscovered. I had guessed him, whoever he was. There was a long silence.

After a long time, I heard a plunging movement against the door, as if a body were dragged. The man in the room had evidently made a desperate rush at that place from which I had fired my pistol. Instantly I fired again. A groan arose. Again I heard a rustling movement. Had I struck him, or had I not? I thought that perhaps I had struck him, as he had smothered his cry of pain and crawled away.

After this I felt more security, though I still relied upon my watch. No more attacks were made. The result of the last assault had, no doubt, disheartened these desperate wretches. There was silence in the room. My own mind and attention failed to detect any movement, however slight. For my own part, I stood utterly motionless. I was alone, but I felt that some time I feared by any movement to give any indication whatever of the place where I was standing.

The night gradually wore away. For how long that night seemed to me I need scarcely say. At length, to my intense relief, the outlines of the windows became dimly defined. Morning was approaching.

Crouching down in the darkest portion of the room, I waited, watchfully and warily, with my pistols poised and ready for the sight or the sound of the unseen enemy. No longer was the entrance. Those wretches whose wounds I had dressed were asleep. The other two were still groaning near the door. The light increased steadily. At last I could distinguish every one in the room. There were three on the bed, three on the floor, and two near the door. The other one was not visible. It then seemed to me that he had concealed himself under the bed.

"You scoundrel!" I cried; "if you're my pistol pointed under the bed. Come out at once, or I will fire!"

"Don't fire!" cried a voice, in a feeble but imploring tone. "I'll come out."

I waited. A man crawled out from under the bed. One hand was covered with blood. It must have been from my last pistol-shot.

"I have any quantity of shots here," said I, "so you may as well give up. You have no chance."

"Don't kill me," said he.

"If you be quiet," said I, "I'll first dress your wounds as I already have done to the wounds of these other wretches. I would have fixed up these last two, but you wouldn't let me."

He said nothing. There was an expression of intense pain on his face. He was a large, stout, broad-built man, at least six feet high, and far stronger than I was.

"I will dress your wound," said I, "if you promise to be quiet."

He promised.

"If you make the slightest movement," said I, "I'll put a bullet through your head; so you had better be quiet."

I went up to him.

"Come," said I, "I'll not trust you. I won't trust you unless I tie your other hand up."

I had my pistol, and he had nothing but a knife. He flung the knife down.

"Go ahead," said he.

The miserable wretch was evidently suffering awfully. His right wrist had been shot through. In his pain he thought of nothing but relief. At first I intended to tie up his other hand, but, seeing how he suffered, I forbore.

He lay down. I put my pistols in my side-pockets, and began to bind up his hand. It was his left hand that was wounded. Suddenly he plunged his right hand into my pocket. I was on the watch; for there was something in the devil's face which I could distrust him. I seized his hand before it had grasped my pistol, and with my other hand I clutched his throat.

He had only one hand to fight with. I silenced him pretty quickly. His hand dropped. He begged for his life.

"You scoundrel!" I cried, "you don't deserve it. Any how I'll spare your life. But I won't dress your wound, and, what's more, I'll bind your hand."

I did so. He was afraid, and did not attempt to struggle. I wound a handkerchief round his wrist that he could not free it, and then, leaving him, I went to the others. One of these was desperately wounded. He had broken his leg, and there was a stab in his shoulder. The other was wounded in the arm. I dressed their wounds as well as I was able, and then waited for further developments. There I was with nine prisoners, all wounded. Some of the wretches were asleep. Those who were awake were groaning in their pain.

Nine were captured. It was a very good night's work. I wondered how many more there might be. That, however, it was impossible to find out. None of the men would answer. They all were in surly silence.

"Well," said I, "I don't care how many of you there may be. I'm ready for you all. I've got enough to shoot you all for some time yet. The only thing that can reduce me is starvation; but then, you know, if I starve, you'll have to starve too. Now, what do you say to that?"

Some hours passed away. No one came. At last I went to the window and shouted out,

"There are nine prisoners in my here. They all want food and drink. If any body comes up I won't hurt him. Send up the woman."

Nothing came for a long time. At last there was a rap at the door.

"Who's there?"

"Me," said a woman's voice.

I opened cautiously. "If there's any body else," said I, "I'll fire."

"There's no one else," said the woman. She came in carrying a basket full of things. She went up and down several times bringing provisions.

She informed me that there were six men below, and they wished to parley with me. I consented, and they came up some time. They offered to let me go free if I would promise not to molest any of them or inform on them. It was a fair offer. I flown from the woman made me suspect foul play. I refused, and said I would consider. At last I offered to give up the prisoners if they would come up unarmed into the room, and let me go in peace. This they refused. Our parley then came to an end.

As the woman left for the time I prepared to fasten the door. She looked anxiously at me. I lent my head toward her.

"There's a man along-to-day," said she, and departed.

Teams? What did she mean? Evidently posse-men, men on whom I might rely. The thought gave me fresh hope.

From time to time I amused myself with calling to the wounded men at the windows, portrayed the sufferings of their comrades, told them that all was known, and that I was determined to save my life at any hazard, and that I had to wait there a month. I informed them that I had plenty of ammunition, and that any of them could prove it in his own person if he chose. Nothing was said in reply to my harangue.

The day wore away. I began to anticipate another night. I felt tired, but not at all anxious. I could have stood this sort of thing for three or four days. The wounded men suffered most. The man whom I had shot last called on his companions to "knock under," but without effect.

At last, at about four o'clock in the afternoon, I heard the noise of wheels up the road. I looked up. There was a line of farmers' wagons approaching.

I was saved.

They came up to the door. I shouted to them, informed them of my case, and leaped out of the window to the ground. None of the ruffians were there to interfere with me. They had fled.

I told my story. The team-drivers espoused my cause with great vehemence. They followed me up stairs and secured all the ruffians. I looked out for the woman to reward her, but she had gone. My horse was missing also; but I did not mind that. I rode in the teams to Wheeling, where these wretches were handed over to the authorities, and punished according to their deserts. A search was instituted after their confederates, and four out of the six were captured and punished. For myself it is hardly necessary to say that I admired Colonel Colt from that time forth as the greatest benefactor of the human species, and never traveled without revolvers.

So ended Captain Rolf's story.

A HINDOO OPIUM-HOUSE.

Those who have read the strange experience detailed in the new volume lately published by Harper & Brothers, entitled "The Opium Habit," will find the following description of an English gentleman's visit to a Hindoo opium-house of fascinating interest:

"When I was stationed at Dum-Dum, in the Bengal Presidency, in 1859, I paid a visit to one of the opium smoking and chewing houses, of which there are many in Calcutta unknown to the public. The hours are very stringent with regard to them, and the difficulties I met with in carrying out my intention of visiting one of them were very great. My curiosity was first excited by my friend Mohammed Bux Khan, who came daily to give me instruction in Hindustani, and described those dens most accurately to me, as he had an extensive acquaintance with them, his father being a great devotee at the shrine of ——I suppose I ought to say—Nymphea. I proposed to him that he should obtain for me admittance to one of these places, and he promised to try to get me in.

"Mohammed Bux spoke to one of the men who kept an opium-house, and came to tell me that if I would swear not to tell the police how I obtained admittance, nor give any information that might lead to the place being discovered, that then I would be allowed to see what I pleased. This I refused. I gave my word, but would not swear. It was finally accepted on account of the repeated solicitations of the monshee. It was a bright moonlight night when we started in a gharrie, or native carriage, from Dum-Dum to Calcutta, a distance of seven about seven miles distant from Calcutta, and the road runs through a low marshy ground, rice-fields, and cocoa-nut groves. It was about ten o'clock when we approached the China Bazar. Here we had to slacken our pace on account of the thronging of the streets; there were very narrow, having on either side a deep ditch or sewer uncovered, the effluvium from which was very offensive.

"After passing through many ill-lighted, narrow streets, we at length came to a halt in front of a large house, and alighted. Here my monshee spoke a few words in Oordu to a man who was loitering about, and the man disappeared, telling us to wait for him in the verandah. We waited there for about half an hour, when three stately Hindoos made their appearance. The monshee saluted very lowly to them, and seemed to treat them with great respect—it was all policy on his part. They took me aside and cross-examined me very closely as to my object and motives in wishing to see the inside of their establishment. I answered frankly, that I was only actuated by curiosity, and had not intend to injure them in any way. We were then conducted up a flight of stone stairs. The darkness rendered it very painful. We came to the top of the lofty houses in the native part of Calcutta is very narrow and winding, and altogether unsafe. The steps are in a corner, and a half high, rendering it very tiresome to go up. We were quite tired, hot, and out of breath when we reached the open air on the roof of the house. All the houses had flat roofs, and it was possible to go from one end of the street to the other on the roofs of the houses.

"We went on some hundred yards, and there commenced descending into another house by means of a ladder on the one in the front house. We had not got far when we were stopped by two men who were guarding a door to our right. I had to give up my revolver, which search I seldom went far since the mutiny. A few steps more and we were ushered into the first room—the room where the opium was issued from. Here there was a long counter covered with zinc, having scales fastened at intervals all along it, and behind the counter were large opium-mixtures busily engaged in weighing out and giving to attendants doses of the poisonous drug. It was kept in brass jars on shelves behind the counter.

"The men issuing the opium, bang, etc., were dressed in a long, dirty gay manner, and red turbans, light blue cumberbunds (cloth round the waist), and yellow coats, with a great profusion of beads and studs. They were about very nimbly, attending to all calls from the attendants who came from the rooms, and would have put to shame the smartest of London shop-boys. As they were no boots or shoes, they moved noiselessly. There was a whisper when they came in with their orders, and the only reply they received was a nod and the package of opium, or whatever it might be. These attendants were low caste men, naked to the waist, and, with the hair closely cut and beard shaved, with the exception of a small moustache on the old Sepoy presented whenever we came across him after the mutiny ('his occupation being gone'). I ought to say that there was no lamp; it was presided over by a very old man, who sat in an easy-chair on a raised platform, and collected the money from the attendants after they had received the drugs from the gentlemen behind the counter. He was lynx-eyed; and out of the many that were receiving money in and out, no one could escape without handing in the money received for the opium from the customer, although these attendants were only too anxious to cheat if opportunity offered.

"One of the Hindoo gentlemen who had conducted us up to the shop now advanced, and said he was ready to go round the other rooms with us.

"The first room he brought us into was a long, low room, about twenty feet wide, and so filled with smoke that we were unable for a time to distinguish any thing in it. When our eyes became accustomed to it, we could perceive a line of men on each side of the room stretched upon mats, resting their heads upon small wooden pillows, and puffing away vigorously at the pernicious drug. Some of them were not smoking, having fallen off into that lethargic sleep, so like death, which invariably follows the use of large quantities of opium. There were men of all ages here, composed of a rather inferior caste, in all the different stages of opium smoking. Some who had just commenced the use of it, and others who, after a few years' enjoyment (if I may use the word), were fast dreaming into eternity.

"The first man who attracted my attention was an old Hindoo, apparently sixty years of age, with sunken cheeks, hollow eyes, and attenuated features. He was wasted away—almost to a skeleton—seeming to breathe with great difficulty, yet puffing away vigorously at his pipe. Our guide told us the history of the unfortunate old skeleton. He was at one time a native banker in the better part of the native city of Calcutta, and was worth lacs of rupees. During one of the periodical panics a great run was made upon his bank, which, together with the failure of many of his debtors, completely ruined him, and he had to have recourse to the Bankruptcy Court. This so preyed upon his mind that he took to opium, the Asiatic substitute for drink. His friends made many attempts to save him, but all in vain; and here he was now a man not much over forty years of age, looking like an aged man and tottering on the brink of the grave.

"It is but very rarely that a man who has once fairly taken to the use of opium gives it up. The suffering for the want of it is so very intense, and each dose so weakens the mind and body, that the victim is a mere slave to his appetite for it.

"A little further up the room there was quite a lad, of some eighteen years of age, strongly under the influence of bang. Bang is a native drug, somewhat similar to the Egyptian 'hashish;' it never stupefies, but produces a species of madness, varying according to the constitution and temperament of the consumer. The native drunkard generally uses bang in preference to rum, or any other spirituous drink. Indeed, unless a man has lost his caste, he seldom touches European drinks. The lowest caste, or rather men without any caste, use arrack—the native rum—to a large extent, as also do the soldiers (European) when they can get it. This youth was sitting with his back to the wall, and was singing impromptu verse, in the manner of an improvisatore; he used the most beautiful language, and his gestures were quite graceful (the Hindoo is a very graceful creature in all his motions); his face was very thin, and his large black eyes looked liked balls of fire; he had quite a spiritual appearance.

"We stopped and listened to him for some time, he, seemingly, quite unconscious of our presence, until at last Mohammed Bux became quite excited, and, clapping his hands, cried, 'Bahut nena' (very good), 'aur do' (give more).

"Now in this instance the bang took a very mild and pleasant form of exhibiting itself, making the young man, perhaps, more agreeable and entertaining than he would otherwise have been; not like in most cases, where it produces a frenzy, rendering the wretched creature who takes it dangerous to himself and every one within his reach.

"All those fanatics who 'run a muck' are well dosed with bang before they attempt such a thing; at least they have all the appearance of it.

"There was a 'muck' run through the city of Allyghur while I was stationed at the fort, and several people were killed. Three fanatics, having provided themselves with hatchets, ran through the most crowded part of the Hindoo portion of the city, cutting to the right and left, and bringing down a man at every stroke. The thoroughfare was so narrow that the people could not get out of their way. They were at last cut down by some sowars (native cavalry).

"Our conductor pointed out to us a fine muscular Hindoo in a sound sleep, the picture of native health, and told us that he had only commenced taking opium, and that it would, after a while, take a much longer time before he would be in that happy state of oblivion. It seems that at first it simply produces an *un*refreshing sleep, from which one awakes with a headache, or at the best with a very heavy feeling about the head; then a small dose relieves very much, and so on. Like drinking, a man is drawn into it. After using it for a little while it produces a pleasurable, quiet state of excitement, which gradually gives way to slumber. In the final stage it becomes a necessary of life, the opium-smoker or eater being in the most miserable state of trembling weakness and depression until he becomes well dosed. Of the two, I think the abuse of intoxicating drink the lesser evil, although I have seen so very many fearful endings brought on by the bottle.

"Close to the end of the room I observed a man lying, apparently dead, his jaw having fallen, and with his eyes still open. Upon drawing the attention of our conductor to the man's state, he said:

"'Oh, he is not dead, but a few more suns will see him so.'

"I then asked him if men often died there, and he replied:

"'Frequently, daily; we get them carried home at night, and their friends being in expectation of the event, there is no noise made about it.'

"I then regretted having given my promise not to mention to the police any thing about this gentleman's establishment, yet if I had not done so I should not have been permitted to see it. However, the police have many years ago found it out, and closed it forever.

"Our guide now led us up a few steps, and raising a crimson silk curtain, introduced us to the second room—that of the élite, where none of the oi polloi were admitted. This room was not so long as the first one, and was about twice as broad and much more lofty. It was hung all around with crimson silk curtains and golden tassels; the roof was beautifully gilded and decorated with paintings of birds, etc.; four or five large lamps were suspended by silver chains from the ceiling; these lamps were parti-colored green and red, resembling in every particular those used by the Mussulmans in their mosques. The air was filled with the perfume of jasmine mingled with a sweet incense, and of course the smoke of the opium, together with the others, produced a most delightful soothing sensation. This room was better ventilated than the other, and not so crowded. Each smoker and chewer had a magnificent soft velvet Persian rug to lie on, and a multitude of pillows covered with silk handsomely embroidered. The occupants were of a wealthy class, dressed in valuable silks and Cashmere shawls, and covered with jewelry. I here recognized many faces that I was in the habit of seeing every evening on the course (the Fifth Avenue of Calcutta) in carriages. We did not stay long here, as the Hindoo swells might be annoyed at our presence. There were some wealthy merchants among them, and they all had the fat, greasy appearance of well-to-do natives.

"There are many of these opium-houses in all the large cities of India; more in the large cities of the Northwest and Bengal than in Calcutta; for Calcutta, although the largest European city in India, is comparatively a small place, Allahabad, Benares, Agra, and many others of the native cities being much larger. It would be impossible to discover and put a stop to them in these places, as we have but a small number of Europeans stationed some miles away from the native city, and the police in the Mofussil are all natives, and very likely addicted to the pet vices of their fellow-countrymen.

GOURMANDS AND GORMANDIZING.

THE word the French use as a term, if not of honor, certainly of approval, is with us changed into a term of reproach; so much, even in small matters, do the two nations differ. The dictionary of the Academy defines a Gourmand, as Dr. Johnson also does, as synonymous with a glutton. In the Encyclopædia gormandizing is translated as "a demoralized love of good cheer;" but the Abbé Robaud, in his synonyms, is more favorable to gourmands, describing them as "persons who love to eat and make good cheer." They must eat, but not eat without selection. Below the judicious and self-restraining epicure, the sensible and tolerant abbé places four classes of people. First, the Friand—the person who likes all sorts of dainties, especially sweetmeats and dessert. The Goinfre is a monster who has an appetite so brutal that he swallows with ravening mouth every thing he comes near; he eats and eats for the sake of eating. Next appears the Goulu (the shark), the wretch who snatches with avidity, swallows rather than eats, and gobbles rather than chews. Last of all comes that very discreditable creature, the Glutton, who eats with an audible and disagreeable noise, and with such voracity that one morsel scarcely waits for another, and all disappears before him, absorbed as it were in a bottomless abyss. Such are the subtleties of the highly refined language of our neighbors. For all these expressions we have but the feeble epithets of epicure, alderman, greyhound, wolf. We are obliged, indeed, to borrow from the French the two words Gourmand and Gourmet. By the first, meaning those who eat largely, without much regard to quality; by the second, those who study and appreciate the higher branches of cooking.

A friend of Dreikopf's has ascertained, after twenty years' experiments, that it takes thirty-two movements of the upper and lower jaws to cut and grind a morsel of meat sufficiently to allow it to be safely swallowed. The age and strength of the person, and the quality of the molars and incisors, are also, of course, to be taken into account, which drives one to algebra and vulgar fractions; but the rule is a good general one, and may be trusted to. This is philosophy indeed; and yet a man may use his teeth very well without knowing a word of it. It would not have helped that notorious eater, the Abbé de Liongeac, who, as the legend in Paris restaurants goes, would often for a wager eat thirty-six dozens of small pâtés. The abbé was, moreover, a little fragile-looking man, who looked as if a jelly would not melt in his mouth.

One of the most heartless things ever done was a trick once played on Pope, the epicurean actor. A wicked friend asked him to dine off a small turbot and a boiled aitchbone of beef, apologizing for the humble fare with the usual feigned humility of friends.

"Why, it's the very thing I like," said Pope, in his reply, referring to the aitchbone. "I will come, my son, with all the pleasure in life."

He came, he saw, he ate; ate till he grew nearer the table, and could eat no more. He had just laid down his knife and fork, like a soldier tired of war's alarms, when a bell was rung, and in came a smoking haunch of venison. Pope saw the trick at once; he cast a look of bitter reproach upon his friend, trifled with a large slice, then again dropped his now utterly useless weapons, and burst into hysterical and unrestrainable tears.

"A friend of twenty years' standing," he sobbed, "and to be deceived in this manner!"

A dinner was given to Lord Chesterfield, on his quitting the office of Master of the Buckhounds, at the Clarendon. Thirty persons sat down. It was ordered by Count d'Orsay, an epicure of the highest taste, and the price was six guineas a head. A dinner got up at the Albion, under the auspices of Sir William Curtis, cost the party between thirty and forty pounds apiece; but then special messengers had been sent to Westphalia to choose hams. Lord Southampton once gave a dinner at the Albion at ten guineas a head.

Of modern epicures Cambacérès, Second Consul under the Empire, and afterward Napoleon's faithful Chancellor, was the most pre-eminent. This excellent minister was as fond of business as he was of good eating, for, with all his indolence and epicureanism, he worked hard enough to satisfy even Bonaparte. On one occasion (it is said when the fate of the Duke d'Enghien was discussing) Cambacérès was detained very late; as the hour of dinner approached, the minister betrayed unmistakable, and indeed irrepressible, symptoms of impatience, anxiety, and restlessness. At last, unable to control himself, he sat down at an escritoir in the council-room and wrote a note, which he called a gentleman-usher to carry. Napoleon smiled, and nodded to an aid-de-camp to intercept the important dispatch. When it was brought him Cambacérès turned red and begged, like a chidden school-boy, that his notes on small domestic matters might not be read aloud. Napoleon, however, had a will, and he persisted. It was a billet-doux to the cook, containing only these impressive words:

"Preserve the entremets; the roasts are lost."

When Napoleon was pleased with foreign embassadors, he used to send them, for a treat, to "Go and dine with Cambacérès." The Emperor was once very angry with the Cour des Comptes for disallowing an item of three hundred francs for trout, charged to Cambacérès by the municipality of Geneva.

Brillat Savarin published his famous book, "The Physiology of Taste," in 1825. It was written on the principles of the Almanac des Gourmands (commenced in 1803), and was the first recognized attempt to treat gastronomy as an intellectual pursuit and a positive profession. Brillat, born at Belley, in 1755, was a judge of the Court of Cassation, and a member of most of the French scientific societies. He began life successfully as an advocate, and in 1789 was elected a member of the Constituent Assembly. He joined the moderate party, did his best to avert cruelty and oppression, and was appointed President of the Civil Tribunal for the department of L'Ain. Proscribed during the red terror, Brillat fled to Switzerland, where he consoled himself with science and cooking. He then emigrated to this country where a vast untrodden prairie of gastronomy lay before him. He lived here by teaching French and music. It is said that, having been once out with Jefferson, he shot a wild-turkey. Jefferson, on their way home, began relating interesting anecdotes of Washington and the War of Independence. Seeing M. Savarin quite absent and paying no attention, Jefferson stopped, a little nettled, and was about to leave him.

"My dear Sir," said the epicure in exile, "I beg ten thousand pardons, but I was just thinking how I should dress my wild-turkey."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MINISTER met a parishioner who had come into possession of a handsome property by the death of his brother, and inquired how he was getting along. "Oh!" said he, "I am having a dreadful time; what with getting out letters of administration, and attending probate court, and settling claims, I sometimes almost wish he hadn't died."

Where should one always expect to find a bountiful supply of the milk of human kindness?—Within the pale of the church.

HINTS FOR LADIES.

When your husband returns home at night let him find the fire out, his tea and toast cold, and you reading a novel.

If he tells you his expenses are more than his income, and proposes to move in to a smaller house, sit down and cry about it. Tell him you always lived in a large house before you were married.

If at the end of a few months he fails in business don't make the best of his misfortunes, or help him bear his troubles by giving your sympathy, but cry as though your heart would break.

Hint occasionally before him how much higher position you held in society before than since your marriage.

If he has business to call him out in the evening, be sure and fret, when he returns, about his being out nights; and about his disliking to be at home with his family.

Whine every time he comes into the house about being tied at home. Then, if he proposes to take you and the children out to ride, tell him you are tired half to death and don't want to ride.

Follow out these hints faithfully, and in return you will have as impatient and as discontented a husband as can be found, and one who will come home only at eating and sleeping hours; and you may be thankful to see him then.

A QUEER PLACE IN WHICH TO FIND DRY-GOODS—In a lady's waterfall.

Goldsmith is supposed to have referred to the Grecian bend when he wrote "She Stoops to Conquer."

"Doctor," said a patient to one of the great hydropathic lights, whom ill-health had obliged him to consult—"Doctor, do you think a little spirits now and then would hurt me very much?" "Why, no, Sir," answered the doctor, deliberately; "I do not know that a little now and then would hurt you very much, but if you don't take any, you won't be hurt at all."

A negro, after gazing at the Chinese, exclaimed: "If de white folks is dark as dat out dare, I wonder what's de color ob de niggers?"

The other day Mrs. Muggins, finding herself unwell, sent for a doctor, and in the presence of Muggins and the medical man declared her belief that she was "poisoned," and that he (Muggins) had done it. "I didn't do it," shouted Muggins, "it's all gammon, she isn't poisoned. Prove it, doctor—open her upon the spot—I'm willing."

All flowers of speech spring from tu-lips.

"Miss Smith, may I ask the time?" said Sprig, last evening. Lady consults her dummy watch. "Certainly, Mr. Sprig—let me see—about, I should say about—time to go home." Sprig inserts his head into his tile with an emphasis, and bids Miss Smith a good-evening with a jerk.

IMPUDENT QUESTIONS.

To ask a lawyer if he ever told a lie.
To ask a doctor how many persons he had killed.
To ask a lady whether she would like a beau.
To ask a minister to take something to drink.
To ask a subscriber if he has paid the printer.
To ask a merchant if he has ever cheated a customer.
To ask an editor the name of any of his correspondents.
To ask a man to lend you his pocket-book.

SLANDERING AN OLD CUSTOMER—Speaking against Time.

A little girl was a short time ago listening to an argument concerning the great hereafter, when she suddenly went to her aunt and asked her what people did when they went to heaven. Knowing no better answer, her aunt replied that they played on golden harps. "All the time?" asked the child. "All the time," said the aunt. "Then," said the child, "I don't want to go there, for I would get tired; and, besides, I don't like music."

A tombstone in a village cemetery in the interior of Pennsylvania is adorned by a piece of sculpture which brings in relief a colt, a boy, and a tree. The colt is represented as kicking the boy in the stomach; and the epitaph is in this wise:

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF HENRY HARRIS.
Born June 27, 1821, of Henry Harris and Jane his wife. Died on the 4th of May, 1837, by the kick of a colt in his bowels, peacefully and quiet, a friend to his father and mother, and respected by all who knew him, and went to that world where horses can't kick, and where sorrow and weeping is no more.

DEMOCRATIC PROGRAMME FOR NOVEMBER.

PATIENCE ON A MONUMENT.

NATURALIZATION OF FOREIGNERS.

IN view of the coming presidential election the manufacture of voters in the various courts of New York city and county by naturalization progresses with unusual vigor, but a still greater pressure is threatened in a short time by the Democratic leaders. Great efforts are making to prevent frauds: lists of the persons naturalized and their residences are published in the Republican papers, and committees of Republican clubs visit the houses and make inquiry as to the existence of the persons. A common method of obtaining naturalization papers for voting purposes is for the rascal applying to give a false address. In this way it is stated that in 1867, one house, containing not more than four or five voters, was set down on the court records as the residence of no fewer than sixty-eight applicants for naturalization.

The rate of manufacture at this time is about one hundred a day. Our engravings on this page illustrate the method of obtaining the certificates. The would-be citizen first visits the Naturalization Bureau room, City Hall, and obtains a certificate setting forth that he has made an application for citizenship at that office, and that such application has been duly filed and the fees paid. With this stamped certificate he presents himself at the bar of one of the city or county courts and undergoes a cross-questioning on the part of the Judge. His friends or witnesses are also examined as to his character, antecedents, as to the length of his residence in this country, etc. If he "passes" the Judge he presents himself at the desk of the clerk and takes the oath. He is then a citizen of this great and liberal Government, and authorized to vote at the next election as seemeth to him best—whether for GRANT and Peace, or SEYMOUR and Revolution.

THE YACHT RACE.

THE race by the yachts of the New York Club for the services of plate given by Vice-Commodore JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Jun., on September 22, was the most spirited of the season, and was witnessed by a large number of persons on the boats which accompanied the contesting yachts. Our illustrations on page 644 will give the reader who is unfamiliar with yachting races a clear idea of the most interesting points of the contest.

Five sloops and three yachts made "the start" from the stake-boat, anchored in the Narrows opposite the yacht Club House: the sloops moved off in handsome style in a cluster; the schooners Sylvie and Phantom slipped their anchors, but the Palmer for some reason had to raise hers, and thus fell far behind at the start. The race was closely contested to the Southwest Spit. This, the first point in the race, was rounded in admirable order. The White Wing was compelled to make a tack just as she reached the buoy, and thus lost the place which she had previously held. The schooners were far apart at this time, the Sylvie leading, the Phantom next, and the Palmer, struggling manfully, far behind. But just at the Southwest Spit the Sylvie, which had been running too close to the wind, was compelled, like the White Wing, to tack, and the Phantom came up with her.

The race of the sloops to the Sandy Hook light-ship was less exciting. The Addie V. turned the light-ship first, the Sadie being second, the Gracie third, the White Wing last of the sloops, the Nettie having abandoned the race. The race of the schooners was more interesting. The Phantom kept well ahead, and turned the boat first, the Sylvie next, but the Palmer was only three minutes behind her. From this homeward the Sylvie had no chance. The Phantom had outmaneuvered her at the Spit; the Palmer outsailed her to and from the light-ship, passing her easily before reaching the Spit on the return. The Phantom, too, sailed finely, and reached the stake-boat ahead of the sloops, winning the race handsomely. The Addie V., of the sloops, came in first, and both winners were greeted with four guns from the Dauntless, the yacht of the Vice-Commodore, anchored off the Club House. The Palmer came in second of the schooners, having proved to be the worst managed and the best sailing vessel in the contest.

On the conclusion of the race the guests and yachtmen adjourned to the Club House, where the prizes, consisting of two sets of silver, were presented by Vice-Commodore BENNETT to the winners. These handsome prizes were manufactured by MESSRS. TIFFANY & CO. of this city, and cost MR. BENNETT five hundred dollars each. Each set consists of a large punch-bowl and wine-cooler, finished and ornamented in the highest style of the art. The bases of the punch-bowls are formed by an anchor, buoy, and cable, while the top is surmounted by a bead of Neptune. The wine-cooler is of the usual bucket shape, but ornamented with new and appropriate designs emblematical of the enticing sport in which they were won. Vice-Commodore BENNETT is doing much to encourage this noble, though sometimes dangerous and always costly pastime, and his efforts are fully appreciated by the yachting fraternity.

EXAMINING AND SWEARING NATURALIZED CITIZENS.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

BISCACHAS.

SKETCHES IN BUENOS AYRES.

The engravings which we present to our readers in this article are from sketches made in Buenos Ayres.

The carrying of sheath-knives in the city is forbidden by law; but the prohibition, if it extends to the country, is a dead letter there. Every one openly (and sometimes ostentatiously) carries a knife in his belt, and it is too often employed to settle disputes. The proper Gaucho knife is a formidable weapon, having a broad blade about sixteen inches long; but various kinds are in use.

Facons, or short swords, are common, similar in pattern to, but of much greater length than, the knife here engraved. The hilts and sheaths are frequently of real or imitation silver.

The immense plains of Buenos Ayres swarm with an animal called the biscacha. It is classed by naturalists among the family of Chinchillidæ, and the order of Rodentia. It is nocturnal in its habits, and feeds on grass or on the roots of the gigantic thistles which grow in unpenetrable jungles all over the country in summer; for the exact nature of its diet is as yet undecided. It dwells in deep and roomy chambers, underground, to which there are always a number of passages communicating with the surface—tunnels large enough to admit a boy. By destroying large pieces of pasture, the biscacha has created a host of remorseless enemies. He is suffocated by brimstone fumes blown into his subterranean quarters by a machine, and is shot by guns. In winter water is conducted by drains into his burrow (and it requires an astonishing quantity of water to fill it), and when compelled to come forth he is attacked by dogs and spades. Although timid, or at least retiring, in general, he displays the most dauntless courage, and even ferocity, when brought to bay, rushing open-jawbutted at men and dogs, and giving ugly bites with his long incisors. About sunset the biscachas come out to breathe the air, and may be seen sitting gravely at the mouth of his burrow; and he permits the traveler, and all the more readily when on horseback, to approach within a few yards of him without moving, when, all at once, as if some dreadful suspicion had entered his brain, he pops into his hole, uttering his strange, indescribable cry as he retreats underground. In moonlight nights biscachas are to be seen, like black spots, all over the plains, and when a gun is fired the whole air resounds with their peculiar cries, mingled with those of owls and lapwings. Biscachas burrows are also almost invariably inhabited by a curious class of tenants, viz., little owls.

These venture abroad at all hours of the day, although we suspect their vision is rather weak in the glare of noon. They sit blinking at the mouth of the common burrows, turning their heads rapidly from side to side, as if in great perplexity, when you pass, and then flutter off, like large moths, to a short distance, where they alight, and beck, and bow, and stare, and scream, in a very ludicrous manner.

The bullock-cart of Buenos Ayres is the rudest, but most picturesque, vehicle it is possible to imagine. It is very lofty; the sides are constructed of canes, and the roof is covered with hides. This enormous machine is provided with a wooden axle, and is mounted on huge unshod wheels about eight feet in diameter. It is drawn by six bullocks. The savage-looking driver sits, armed with a long cane having a sharp spike in the end, on the yoke, between the heads of the inshaft oxen. The axle is never greased, the groaning and creaking it makes, so horrible to a human ear, being thought to encourage the cattle; and the driver, at any difficult part of the way, as an additional stimulant, gives vent to the most diabolical shouts and yoars of laughter, using his goad to increase the persuasion with great energy.

The bullock-cart, though rough in appearance, is well adapted for the work it has to perform. It carries a cargo of three tons, and, by the great height of the wheels, goods are saved from being damaged by the water with which the whole country is flooded in winter. Almost all the traffic in the Argentine Provinces is carried on by these bullock-carts, which often perform long journeys, though at a slow rate. Many of their drivers have no homes but their carts. They sleep on the ground, with a hide for a bed, in any kind of weather, and have learned from long practice to make a fire, to roast meat, and infuse maté out of any sort of materials and in the most unfavorable places.

The Tuna, a species of aloe (stunted specimens of which may be seen at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere), grows with great luxuriance in Buenos Ayres, springing from the ground with a crowd of leaves, each leaf seeming determined to elbow its way whether there be room for it or not. Some of the leaves attain seven or eight feet in length, about ten inches in breadth, and five or six inches in thickness. They are covered with a leathery skin; but the inside is as soft as a turnip. The internal substance, however, is composed of fibres which make excellent sewing thread and cloth; twine and cordage have been manufactured from them. The edges of the leaves are armed with sharp prickles. This singular plant sends forth a flowering stalk about twenty-five feet in height, which grows to maturity within a few weeks, and has all the appearance of a tree. This spurious tree, although worthless to the carpenter, is of use to the barber, who makes bones of the pith. The stalk of the aloe contains a large quantity of saccharine matter, and in some of the provinces, and in other countries, a spirituous liquor is made from it. It is called Pulque in Mexico, and, according to Sir Woodbine Parish, is the principal drink of the lower orders there. Cattle in Buenos Ayres, as the same excellent authority informs us, eagerly watch the fall of the stalk, and get intoxicated on the juice. The tuna is used as a fence; but is held in small esteem as such, being apt, when it falls, to take the bank in which it is stuck down with it, as a dreadful ruin has family. The eight-sided cactus is also used as a fence, and makes a most grotesque one.

The hornero, or builder, is a bird about the size of a lark, and builds an ingenious nest of compounded mud and horse-dung, fully as large as a man's head—placing it wherever it can find a suitable tree or fence-post. It prefers a post with a forked top; but has no objection to a fork with a single bent prong. It seems to scorn concealment, and often builds upon the top of a post four or five feet high, and in a situation where the nest can be seen half a mile off. We have seen nests built on the fence of a corral, where thirty or forty horses were shut up during the day, and in other places where disturbances were frequent. Conjugal love in many birds seems only to blaze at certain seasons; but the affection of the hornero is more enduring. You may see the faithful pair busy all the year round, building or repairing their happy home. Whenever a shower falls they are hard at work. The nest, when half completed, looks like a bowl set on edge, and every addition of material is carefully pecked and compacted by the industrious birds. The wall on one side is continued around enough to admit a man's hand; which, however, from the strong partition, can not penetrate to the interior. The walls of the nest are about an inch thick, and almost as strong as brick. When a nest is knocked down, the poor birds do not fly off in despair at the destruction of what has cost them months of assiduous labor, but begin at once to build it anew, often in the same situation. They show us a good example in many ways.

NEST OF THE HORNERO.

A STRANGE WHALING CRUISE.

THE good ship Lone Star had been eleven months out, and her whaling cruise had not, as yet, proved very successful, when she ran short of wood and water while beating about the Mozambique Channel under easy sail, and with all hands on the look-out for any sperm-whale unfortunate enough to heave in sight.

It was my first voyage as mate, and I was pacing the quarter-deck in no very enviable frame of mind—for my share in the profits of the voyage were promising to be but small—when the captain sent for me to join him in the cabin.

Leaving one of our boat-steerers in charge of the deck, I went below, and found my superior poring over a chart spread out on the saloon table.

"Well, Mr. Wylie," said he, "whales are kind of scarce, so I am thinking of putting into the Comorin Islands for a supply of wood and water. Take a look at the chart."

I did so, and found that we were only about forty miles from the land referred to. Coinciding with the captain's view, I received his instructions, and returned on deck to alter the ship's course and steer for the islands.

That day we made but little progress. Toward noon the light and fitful breeze died altogether, nor could our most ancient mariners woo back its coy presence with their indefatigable and superstitious whistling.

Slowly and regularly the trim Lone Star rose and fell upon the steady heavings of the glassy ocean. Strange, leaden-colored fish, of dolphin-shape, but otherwise unlike any finny denizen I ever saw before, swam lazily around our motionless black hull; odd-looking jelly-fish, slimy and shiny, with huge and hairy feelers stretching far out to clutch their prey, floated among them; unwieldy, almost shapeless, and altogether useless sun-fish sculled slowly past us with their two great side fins. Now and then, with a sudden plash of the smooth waters, a shoal of silvery flying-fish would dart into the air, and skim swiftly along on outstretched wing, just dip upon the surface of the water again to damp their drying pinions, and then double off in another direction to elude their relentless and untiring enemies—the fierce albicore and the nimble bonita —ever on their track, darting along a few or so beneath the surface. Ravenous, unlistening, and determined, these fish-eating fish would follow the frightened little fugitives till some poor unlucky thing fell tired and despairing into the fangglistening jaws just thrust an inch or two out of the water to catch it. Here the swift and gilttering dolphin, swiftest of all fish, would chase the silvery prey with inconceivable rapidity, now and then revealing its course by immense bounds through the air, often of twenty yards and more; there, an ominous-looking, tall, black object, standing still and upright from the water, told that there lay the lurking and quiescent shark—for that ugly angular thing was his straight dorsal fin; while the gaudily-striped black and golden pilot-fish might be seen shooting about beneath the vessel's quarter, every now and then darting off to its savage lord and master. Birds of gorgeous plumage, unknown name, and curious cry, came ever and anon, to gaze for a moment at our long black ship and her paper-spars; and then off they flew among the brilliant little insects and splendidly-painted butterflies which were winging their frail flights across the bosom of the sleeping Mozambique Channel.

However, during the early hours of the night a light breeze sprung up, so that we made the land soon after midnight, when we stood off and on till daylight, and then sailed slowly into the sheltered anchorage formed by the Comorin Islands and the neighboring main land of Africa.

After coming to an anchor all hands went to breakfast, and when the crumbs of the inner man had become duly satisfied, I armed the crew of my own whale-boat, and set off for the shore on a reconnoitring expedition, in order to ascertain whether any natives—hostile or peaceable —were to be met with, and also to pick out the most likely spots whence to obtain a supply of wood and water.

Hoisting the sail, a light fair wind soon wafted us to the nearest little island. But here nothing rewarded our patient search. Low, impenetrable jungle, together with soft black mud, marked with what astonishing acts, the footprints of some strange and monstrous beast, formed an altogether uninviting wilderness. Proceeding to the next and largest island of the group, however, we found abundance of good water, and a fair proportion of dry wood trees fit for our purposes. Having selected a suitable landing-place, and seen no trace of inhabitants, I gave the order to shove off, and the boat's head was once more turned toward her mother-ship, the gleaming fair and tall, at anchor in the distance. The main land was only a mile or so from where we now lay on our oars; and as I gazed in that direction the temptation to visit it—the curiosity to explore a strange coast—came strong upon me.

"Well, boys," said I to my crew, "what do you say for a stretch as far as the shore away there? There is a leading wind, fair going, and coming, and we might find better wood and water."

This latter expression of opinion was to save my ingenuity from suffering by any suspicion of idle curiosity.

Of course, my men were only too delighted at the opportunity for a run ashore—the islands being small, uninteresting, and uninhabited.

Hauling aft the main-sheet, and keeping the boat away for the desired coast, I left Long Tom, my boat-steerer, in charge, and stretched myself out in the stern-sheets, while the rest of the crew followed my example by throwing themselves into the most comfortable positions they could find along the thwarts.

The breeze was gradually falling lighter, and for some time we sailed gently on, still and silent, save for the musical lap-lap of the ripples against our bows.

The soothing aspects of nature tended to throw me into a dreamy sort of reverie, from which I was suddenly aroused by my boat-steerer's exclamation:

"I saw a black skin shining in the sun just then, Sir."

"Well," said I, drowsily, "it is only a bottle-nose or porpoise."

And I did not even take the trouble to raise my head above the gunnel.

A few moments elapsed, and we had got into shallow water, when Long Tom shouted:

"There it is again!"

"Where away?" "Where away?" I cried, startled by his animation.

"There away, Sir," pointing ahead; "and it's no porpoise, nor bottle-nose, nor—any thing as ever I seed 'afore, as wears thick skin!"

All eyes were now straining to catch a glimpse of Long Tom's strange discovery.

"There she blows! There she blows!" came in chorus from my men, as a large black back rose slowly above the surface, rolled steadily over, with a motion just like that of a spouting or playing whale, and then sank out of sight out a short distance ahead.

"Wait a bit, my lads," said I. "Unship the mast; steer away for sail; then out oars, and we'll soon see what it is."

My orders were promptly obeyed. Then my sturdy carmen, with a long sweep with a will, and the light whale-boat was soon darting swiftly forward to where the object of our curiosity had last appeared.

I was standing on the bow platform, directing Long Tom at the steering oar, when suddenly we "brought up all standing" against something hard, upon which the boat had run "stem on, like a nor'west buffalo," as my mariners expressed it.

"Starn all! Starn all!" I roared.

As the boat was backed off, an enormous bear, heavily raised its huge head out of the water, gave us a look, uttered a loud sort of snorting bellow, and then sank down again in the muddy water, through which we had not been able to discern it.

"Holy sailor, Bill!" I heard the bow carman say to his nearest shipmate. "What is it? I'm blessed if ever I saw such a thing afore, and I've been whaling, man and boy, nigh upon twenty years."

"Pass me up the iron, boys," said I, interrupting the conversation, "and if it comes within reach again we'll soon find out what kind of a creature it is."

A whale-boat is never without the gear of her profession; and so, when my men saw me handle the harpoon, they gave an approving shout, and eagerly gave their attention in obedience to my order for them to pull ahead.

With iron poised and ready, I was intently watching for the monster's reappearance, when my boat-steerer cried:

"There they are, 'way inshore, there; a hull school on 'em."

Sure enough, the glistening black backs tumbling about in the foamy white water showed where a number of the unknown fish or strange amphibious animals were enjoying themselves.

"Look out ahead, Sir! Look out ahead!" roared Tom again. "There's somethin' just broke water."

The next moment I had darted my iron into a back as broad as that of a whale calf, and was shouting:

"Starn all! Starn all! Back water, my boys!"

As the boat shot back and the line ran out, the monster that I had harpooned made desperate plunges at the sea. As it rolled about, I shouted in its agony and surprise, I saw enough of it to know that we had fixed a hippopotamus.

Giving a sudden jerk of savage rage, and vainly trying to grasp the firmly-holding iron with its tremendous teeth, the wounded beast sank down in the muddy water, here only a couple of fathoms deep. Then the air-bubbles rising to the surface as he breathed, together with the long crimson trail of his blood, showed us exactly the course that he was taking, and this was direct for his companions sporting together inshore.

Our prey went at a great speed, considering his ponderous bulk, and we were compelled to follow, or slack the line—the last thing I thought of; so, in a very few moments we found ourselves right in the midst of the herd of hippopotami whose huge, unshapely heads were rising all around, while the wicked glitter of their small, looking little eyes seemed concentrated upon us with looks of wonder, fury, and surprise.

Just then, unable to stay beneath the surface any longer, the wounded monster rose to breathe, and then I gave him a lance in the shoulder.

"Starn all! Starn all for your lives!" shouted.

The tough ash oars urged us clear of the savage brute's charge, but then the boat-steerer cried:

"Hold on, Sir! Hold water! Here's half a dozen on 'em astern coming right for us."

"Hold water, every man!" I roared; then, spraying a harpoon right into the nearest, continued, "Pull the port oars. So! Now give way of all; give way, my lads! Pull for your lives!" And I was pretty sure that all the oars did.

But up from the murky water rose two of the brutes, one on either side, only a few feet distant, and with huge distended jaws they rushed upon us.

Snatching up one of the hat-axes, while Long Tom left his oar and rose to the next rower, and similarly armed himself, I sprang to where one of the hippopotami was almost touching the gunwale, and then, with a tremendous slash, clove the keen axe-blade into its flat black nose. With a roar louder than that of a dozen wild bulls of Madagascar, the monster vanished, spouting blood. Long Tom had also succeeded in driving off its companion, though not before the latter had made a great rent in the side of the boat, and had also very nearly capsized her. A shudder ran through us at our narrow escape—we had not time for more.

The rest of the shoal had now come up, and were making the foam fly in every direction as they dashed through the water to attack us.

It was a terribly critical moment! We could no longer escape by rowing, for the monsters were all around. If once they should succeed in overturning our frail boat, we would assuredly perish horribly among them; their gleaming great tusks and wide gaping jaws would pitilessly rend and tear us limb from limb.

Very fortunately, it suddenly occurred to me that I had somewhere read of hippopotami being frightened at the noise of fire-arms, though I had not known that their amazingly tough skins were quite proof against ordinary spherical leaden bullets.

"Pick up your muskets—be quick, my lads!" I cried, acting upon the inspiration. "Let each man choose an object; then fire all together."

Just as the fierce little pigs-like brutes were glaring close upon us, and the terrible white fangs were glistening in close proximity, the loud roar of our volley rang out over the water, and then the sulphurous smoke-wreaths hid the plunging monsters from our sight. At the same instant, however, one enormous beast seemed to vault half out of the sea, and every man shuddered as he expected it would dash our weak boat to atoms; but, at the flash the huge mass of flesh fell back, though, even in doing so, it nearly capsized us, and half-filled our little craft with water. When the smoke cleared away, our formidable pursuers had disappeared. After a momentary pause in thankfulness at our marvelous escape, we gave chase, the whaling spirit returned, and I said:

"Pass me a lance, Long Tom, and we'll settle the fellow we've had to, at last. Give way, my hearties, and let the two bow hands haul in the line."

Proceeding thus, we soon came up with the wounded beast. Then, for a moment poising the bright lance over my right shoulder, I sent it deep to the heart of our enemy with a cry. With a few tremendous roars, and after a last desperate struggle to reach us, the strange amphibious creature was at last killed. Towing it, floating for a few moments, it once more rose to the surface, and, like a dead whale, floated on its side.

With considerable trouble we managed to tow our prize alongside the Lone Star. Upon measuring the carcass we found it 14 feet from stem to stern—or rather, nose to tail—and no less than twenty-three in girth. It was an immense brute, more enough, I think, to fight our mariners, long tired of salt junk, rejoiced over with huge steaks, and well-flavored hippopotamus steak, for we found the flesh of the monster remarkably good, even delicious.

GHEEL, A COLONY OF THE INSANE.

To the east of Anvers, in Brittany, is a place called Gheel, whose inhabitants, about 10,000 in number, are chiefly employed in farm work, have admitted into their family life the insane, who form a tenth of their number. The cost of board ranges from 50 cents to $400 per annum. The Administration fixes a minimum and a maximum poor. No family receives more than two or three lunatic persons. No patient has any dress or other conventional sign distinguishes the insane from others. This family life is suited to the lunatics, whether the disorder affects the heart or the intellect has lost its light. The influence of women and children is remarkably happy over the insane. A woman who has lost a child, a patient may go and come, help in the work that is on hand, or be idle, at pleasure. Constraint is never used, but kindness reigns. The madman, who elsewhere is locked up like a dangerous wild beast, and whose mere approach excites the terror of women and children, here walks about freely at Gheel, in the houses, or abroad upon the street or high-road, through gardens and fields. It is a general custom to take the insane to any public place; in the cafés he reads the papers, plays cards, or joins in conversation. On market-days he goes to the town, a little more closely if subject to certain freaks. Sympathy and example suffice to attract between half and two-thirds of the insane to church. Music, dancing, and the aged are interested in the duties of the household. Artisans find places in the local shops, others in the fields. Each one is left under the aspects of nature, the open air, movement and travel render such work as salutary to the patient as it is helpful to others. Even in the arts, music especially affords amusements in which all the insane join. There is also a choral society founded by a mad violinist, who is named the Grand Colbert. His portrait adorns the room in which the rehearsals seem to practice, previous to taking part in patriotic or religious fêtes. The church dedicated to Saint Dymphna, which is the tutelary guardian patroness of the cure of the former. The entente cordiale which commonly exists between a family and the inmates commonly reverses the order of things strangely. Take the case of a poor German weaver, who lost his reason in consequence of anxiety on the score of poverty. He was received with an artisan at Gheel, who devoted himself to rehabilitating and restoring the troubled mind of his guest. Before long the two were established, however, the artisan died, leaving his widow and four children unprovided for. The German weaver observed with feelings of the deepest sympathy the sorrow of those by whom he was surrounded. He seemed at once to realize the position of affairs. Calmly and seriously he accepted the responsibility which he considered was imposed on him by gratitude. He employed his returning health of body and mind in working for the family of his kind host. He has constituted himself sole bread-winner for the widow and orphans. He gives a good education to the latter, and a more touching sight can scarcely be imagined than the picturesque old German, now sixty-eight years old, accompanying to church on Sundays the adopted children, who regard him as a father.

A strict and enlightened supervision is maintained not only by physicians established at Gheel, but by a committee of local officers. We preside over the whole system of the colony. This social life is, moreover, too open for any abuse to escape comment. It is extremely rare that any serious disorder or attempt at corruption of the liberty allowed to the insane. Among the cases classed as curable from 60 to 65 per cent. have been cured, and the number of recoveries is observed in the general condition of all the patients under these conditions of personal liberty, gentle treatment, and the play of the social affections.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

OUR BELLE generally spends his summers at Valestrand, a quiet and secluded spot, situated in a charming valley in Norway, about eighteen miles from Bergen. In the autumn he commences his professional tours. He has several brothers residing in Bergen, and many relatives, who died in 1865. He has one son and two daughters now living; the son, Alexander, is at present in Paris. The Norwegians are noted for being somewhat superstitious, and his housekeeper assures me that Ole Bull's violin, among the loose of his violin are distinctly heard in the music-room. Spiritualists say that they have heard the organ in the music-room played by mysterious hands long after the inmates of the villa had retired.

The gentleman who has contracted that walking upon a circular track is against nature—annexed to Belfast runs at the rate of 12 miles an hour, has found that it produced dizziness and nausea, and is compelled to go on needful substantial food; whereas, he says, that when walking on the ordinary he has always eaten heartily, and has never been troubled with any discomfortable sensation in the region of stomach. Action will attempt, on or about the 9th of October, to walk 100 consecutive miles on the track on the roads in Westchester County in less than 20 hours.

An exchange remarks that the pulse of young ladies generally beats about 90 to the pulse of the hand than at the wrist. This curious fact in palpitating physiology should be observed by all young men of an investigating turn.

An English meteorologist has proved to the Astronomical Society that the moon reflected from the surface of the moon affects our atmosphere. Many persons have noticed that the moon usually rains about the time of full moon. The explanation of Mr. Harrison—the famous English meteorologist—is that the reflected heat, being entirely absorbed by our atmospheric vapor, raises the temperature of the air above the clouds, which, in consequence, become freely, and renders the atmosphere clearer.

At a recent agricultural meeting in connection with the cattle show at Dedham, Massachusetts, the orator, after alluding pleasantly to the claims now put forth for the "woman's rights" movement, and expressing his satisfaction with woman as she is, gave the following toast: "The Model Woman—may it be a long time before she arrives!"

It is rumored that a company is being organized in this city for the purpose of introducing velocipedes in opposition to the city railroad cars. In the new velocipedes, passengers will not be required to stand up or to hang on by a strap, which will be an improvement. By the new plan, the cars are to have safe carriages, why do people behave in them as if they were? We do not refer to gentlemen exclusively, we refer to ladies also. Our ear-riders in general. A discreditably large number of persons seat themselves in the cars, and, as soon as they have paid their fares, spread out to their fullest size, in delightful unconsciousness of the wants or feelings of any newcomers. Not unfrequently, when a seat is really not occupied, a bundle and some one enters the car and places it inquiringly around, to see if it remain sparse or if either quite oblivious to sublunary affairs, or obstinately bent on not accommodating, or else so much engaged to another race of beings. The idea of civility to fellow-beings in the cars is one that is unknown for the last comer to sit, seems never to enter their heads. We are not speaking of those who, when a seat of the car are really full—then all can consult their own pleasure, gallantry, or benevolence, in regard to relieving the fatigue of others at the credit of our city, for the sake of common civility, let all who ride in public conveyances remember that they live in a civilized community, and have had some measure of good-breeding at home. If they have not, we are scattered in public places, in time they will bear fruit.

The Hot Springs in Arkansas are fifty-four in number, having a temperature ranging from 93° to 150° Fahrenheit. They range, respectively, from 93° to 150° Fahrenheit, and possess the degree of heat to cook meat or vegetables. On the western slope of Hot Spring Mountain, a margin of the Ozark group—at an elevation of about 1,000 feet above the sea—are the springs, issuing from metal fountains tense. The village and valley, respectively, are called Hot Springs. The springs are famous, in location, as attractive and romantic appearance. Rheumatism, dyspepsia and skin diseases are said to be relieved by these baths.

Scene at the ——— Hotel, Long Branch. Place, dining-room. Waiter discovered, with the bar-tank in a common cup. Gentleman hastiness how to pour it without breaking the cup. "Look, why do you bring hot milk in the cup instead of in a pitcher?" "Pitcher no broken the cup." As nothing can be done in that case gentleman manages as well as he can. "The salt, John," which is brought. "And a hot-spoon." Gentleman, after these matters, said: "Then whittle down a tea-spoon, and bring it." At which sight the waiter disappeared. Meanwhile the gentleman desires some fine sugar for his melon, which, after some delay, is brought in a wine-glass. Gentleman eyes it dubiously. "Sugar-bowls packed, John?" "Yes, Sir," with another broad smile. Examination proves the sugar to be from the very bottom of the packed-up bowl, and—well, not "dyspepsia-dust." "And you've brought it with you would just step down to H——'s Hotel, and borrow a little clean sugar?" John smiles sunlightly, disappears about, and finds another sugar-bowl—a c. wineglass-full. Gentleman is a little too far past—and the gentleman takes the next train home.

According to current report, the proprietor of the Ocean House, Newport, made $50,000 clear in about two months. Very good business!

That curiosity, called the Resurrection Plant, is a native of the southern part of Mexico. These plants during the rainy season flourish luxuriantly; but when the dry weather and hot sun scorch the earth, they, too, dry and curl up, and blow about at the mercy of the wind. To all appearance they are dead; but as soon as the rain comes again, the roots suck up the water, the leaves unfold and assume a beautiful emerald-green appearance. No matter where the plant may be it only asks for water, and at once bursts into new life. Having purchased one of these curiosities, and placed it in a plate filled with water, it will gradually unfold and take on a deep green. The Resurrection Plant may be seen almost any day on Broadway, where it is offered for sale.

A remarkable cave has recently been discovered in Salisbury, Connecticut. The entrance consists of a narrow winding passage about three feet wide, two feet high, and fifteen feet in length, descending into a chamber fifteen feet high, nine wide, and thirteen distant. Beyond this chamber there is an apartment about twenty-five feet in length, terminating in a large room where stalagmites warn one to tread carefully, and stalactites, massive and rather dirt light. In another room a large stalactite reaches from the roof to the floor and forms one vast pillar, resembling a sheet of water frozen. About four feet from the floor this pillar spreads out in all directions like an inverted cone, and at one continuous blinking of a lamp may be flowing like water. There are many other rooms, the largest of which is twenty-five feet in diameter, the centre of the dome a large circular opening extended to a room above, while the sides of this opening are literally covered with stalactites which descend several feet below the aperture, and assume an almost endless variety of appearance tapering to a point like icicles, while others are shaped like leaves, and others are carved in the most exquisite manner.

Boston is a very wonderful city; but can it be that they have in Boston a machine in which, if you put a dollar, there will be found at the other end ladies' gloves, books, brilliant cutlets, stewed kidneys, and new specimens of art?

A late London journal, in connection with many other curious statistics in regard to the traffic in artificial hair, gives us a considerable list of articles in false beards, mustaches, and whiskers. During the American war the vast number of these were sent from Europe to the United States, and a steady demand continued until 1866. It is said to be curious, that the demand lasted as long as the war, and gradually dropped off at its close. The most expensive hair is of fine white. It rarely has to be dyed, and from considerable length, a chemist has been trying various methods of extracting the color from the hair. He has produced a mottled gray, but the true white is yet to be discovered.

It is announced that a Russian mantua-maker of great renown, long attached to the household of her Imperial Majesty the Czarina, is coming to this city to make a fortune. She will introduce the Siberian Curve as a substitute for the Grecian Bend. Her styles of dress will be adapted to this vertebral peculiarity.

A gentleman, living in Exeter, New Hampshire, has a fig-tree, upon which there are now one hundred and twenty-five figs, some of which are ripe.

When the Mahometan conquerors of Egypt were commanded to shave their heads, not to wear hats, shirts, dresses, trowsers, or shoes, not to wash their clothes or their bodies, but to be circumcised, and to leave their shoulders uncovered. A few hours after their orders were given, some of the converts were literally strewn with human hair. A nation of bald heads and naked shoulders is a curious sight. The change in the personal appearance of the people was so great that one could scarcely recognize his most intimate friends, and the heat from the sun

A couple of centuries ago it used to be the fashion for clergymen to write marginal notes on their sermons, to indicate what they might do in the pulpit when preaching, and when they might be done. "Pull back in your seat," "Here, bow," "Here, take handkerchief;" "Start up," "Shout," and "Cough here," are specimens of the notes which have been discovered. Some of these old manuscript sermons may be consulted as authority.

A gentleman living near Naples had a pretty little pet fox, which had become quite domesticated in the family. One day Mr. Master Reynard, being more hungry than usual, jumped into the cradle and devoured the baby in a trice.

A physician of Albany has communicated to the Journal of Psychological Medicine some singular statements respecting a male girl four and a half years old, who uses in talking a vocabulary of her own invention, which is grammatical, syntactic, and idiomatic, and is the child of cultivated parents, who use only the English language. This male girl, though she readily understands what others say, never employs a single word of it herself, although great efforts have been made to induce her to do so. She has a little brother a year and a half younger than herself, who speaks the English language, and has learned from each other rapidly and fluently. The boy, when with other companions, uses the English language and no other word; but the little girl ever does, and a curious vocabulary has been compiled from her language.

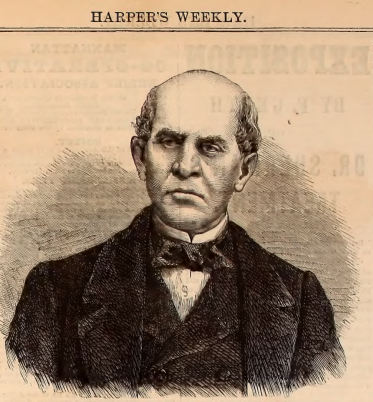
The old adage of "Honesty is the best policy" extends to minute matters—for very little things reveal character. A few days or two ago a boy about sixteen years old went from the country to Boston to enter a prominent mercantile house. The proper party who received the youth in the most kindly manner, and caused his son to take him around town and show him the principal places during the afternoon of his arrival. While among themselves in this way the gentleman noticed his companion's hat, and, passing along in the train that morning, he had given a boy a bright cent to buy a paper. The boy, in his haste, had been mistaken for a five-cent one, the vendor of illies had given him four cents back as change. The gentleman's son questioned the honesty of the transaction, but the young man from the country defended it on the ground that the vendor could afford it, and calculated the incident to his father, who, on conversing with the other gentleman, found that the boy possessed a pride himself on the act, and boldly defended it. The merchant, after mature deliberation, decided that those notions about a small thing would most probably have very loose ideas about matters of greater importance, told the boy that he would employ him, and the youth was sent home to his father with an explanatory letter of regret. When, in like manner, all our eminent business men will regard pure honesty above the consideration of their employés' ability to be retained, and of just dealing speedily rise higher, and cheating, in any form, be regarded as ignoble.

The Boston Journal says: "Persons who are annoyed by dust upon the great organ at the Hall are informed that a cover for it takes six or seven men nearly a week, and involves an expense of upward of $200 to give the instrument a single thorough cleaning."

A full-preserving car has been recently patented, and has brought peaches from Ohio in a perfect state of preservation. The fruit, on arrival, appeared as fresh as when first picked from the trees. The atmosphere within the car is reduced to a low temperature, and kept as dry as possible, by means of various contrivances. Meat may be thus transported in a perfectly fresh condition. The cars are more expensive than the ordinary kind.

THE LUTHER MONUMENT AT WORMS, GERMANY.

THE LUTHER MONUMENT.



We illustrated some weeks since the imposing ceremonies of the dedication of the grand LUTHER MONUMENT at Worms; we give in this issue an engraving of the monument itself. It is erected in the city where, in 1521, LUTHER, for conscience sake, defied the united power of the Romish Church and the powerful Emperor of Catholic Germany. The defiance was uttered in the presence of the Emperor, the Archduke FERDINAND, six sovereign electors, twenty-four sovereign dukes, seven margraves, thirty archbishops and bishops, and a host of princes, counts, barons, and embassadors. The monument was inaugurated in the presence of the King of Prussia, who is Emperor of Protestant Germany in all but the name, the Crown-Prince of Prussia, the King of Wirtemberg, the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, the Grand Duke of Weimar, and Prince WILLIAM of Baden, while England's Queen sent assurances of hearty sympathy with the object.

In size and variety of design the monument has no equal. It is not a statue, but a combination of eleven statues grouped around, and surmounted by the gigantic figure of LUTHER. Ascending a few steps, we stand on a granite base forty feet square, inclosed on the three other sides by a battlemented balustrade. In its centre LUTHER stands pre-eminent. Seated on the four pillars projecting from the corners of LUTHER'S pedestal we see grouped about the master his four precursors who attempted what he accomplished. To this noble array the English, French, Italian, and Bohemian nations have each furnished a member—JOHN WICKLIFFE, PETER WALDO, SAVONAROLA, and JOHN HUSS. Then, turning to the circumference, we notice seven more statues distributed around. Occupying the four corners of the balustrade, and separated from the centre group by the inner space, are the venerable figures of two regal and two clerical allies of the hero of the German Reformation. FREDERICK THE WISE, Elector of Saxony, and PHILIP THE GENEROUS, Landgrave of Hesse, impersonating power and prudence, watch the front; PHILIP MELANCHTHON and JOHN REUCHLIN, with their solid erudition, are in the rear. With these nine great men are associated the symbolical statues of three cities, celebrated in the history of the time—Augsburg, Madgeburg, and Spires, three majestic women, occupy the centre of each side of the balustrade. Seated, and looking up to LUTHER, they are a relief to the four corner statues, which are standing, and have their faces turned in the same direction as the central figure. To do justice to the many places which have likewise deserved well of the cause of religious liberty, the battlements of the inclosure are on the inner side decorated with the escutcheons of twenty-four other German cities: these are Brunswick, Bremen, Constance, Eisenach, Eisleben, Emden, Erfurt, Frankfort, Halle, Hamburg, Heilbronn, Jena, Königsberg, Leipsic, Lindau, Lubeck, Marburg, Memlingen, Nordlingen, Riga, Schmalkald, Strasburg, Wittenberg, and Worms.

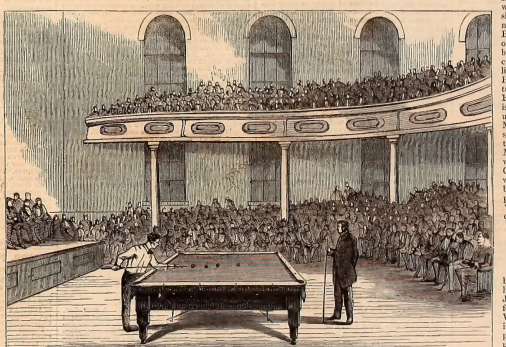
In suggestive detail the pedestal is in keeping with the general design. A square of cast bronze, placed on the stone pillar, supports a similar slab of less dimensions, decorated with inscriptions and reliefs. On its front, a fitting motto of the monument, appear the closing words of LUTHER'S celebrated speech in the Worms Diet: "Here I stand. I can not speak or act otherwise. So help me God. Amen." Under the legend are the medallions of JOHN THE CONSTANT and his son JOHN FREDERICK of SAXONY, who so stedfastly stood by LUTHER in his troubles. On the opposite side is engraved a passage from another speech of the fiery Reformer: "The Gospel which the Lord put into the mouth of the Apostles is His sword. With it he strikes the world as with a thunder-bolt." Underneath are the portraits of ULRICH VON HUTTEN and FRANZ VON SICKINGEN, the two noble knights who brought the chivalrous spirit of their class to the defense of truth and its less warlike champions. To the right of LUTHER we read the following sentence from his correspondence: "Faith is life in God, but it is only through the Spirit of Christ that we can hope to understand Holy Writ." Portraits of JOHN BUGENHAGEN, the Pomeranian reformer, and JUSTUS JONAS, the intimate friend of LUTHER, into whose ear, a moment before his death, he poured the confession of his unshaken faith, are inserted on the same side. Finally, on the left we read: "Those that rightly understand Christ will not be moved by what man may enjoin. They are free, not in the flesh, but in the spirit." JOHN CALVIN and ULRICH ZWINGLI, the founders of the Reformed Church in Switzerland, are aptly placed under this motto, their deviations from LUTHER proceeding from their partiality to the spirit rather than to the letter of the Bible. The lower slab contains scenes from LUTHER'S life in alto-relievo. Here we have him making his speech in the WORMS Parliament, nailing his theses to the door of Wittenberg Cathedral, marrying his CATHARINE, and translating the Bible in the sequestered castle of Wartburg. For character and finish these smaller castings are greatly praised.

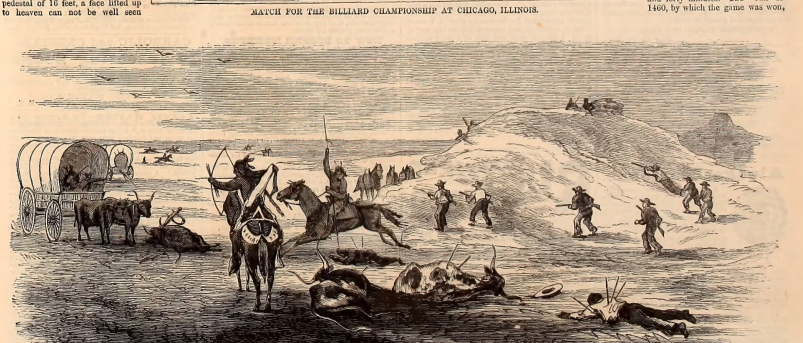
Upon this pedestal stands the colossal statue of MARTIN LUTHER. It is the stout, sturdy shape familiar to us from so many engraved portraits; the dear old well-known form, with its honest features, and calm, imperturbable eye, as painted by CRANACH. With face turned upward, he rests his clenched fist on the closed Bible, as if uttering that verse of his beautiful chorale—"Das Wort sie sollen lassen stehn." From an artistic point of view it might, perhaps, have been better to give his head a more inclined position. In a statue 10½ feet in height, on a pedestal of 16 feet, a face lifted up to heaven can not be well seen from below. A better view is obtained from the side than from the front. The five statues in the centre, indeed, are generally thought to constitute a splendid ensemble; but the seven others, placed much beneath LUTHER, and divided from him by nearly 30 feet, are criticised as having the appearance of separate monuments. The circumstance also that the twelve statues are of four different sizes scarcely allows to the monument that air of composed symmetry indispensable in every composite work of art. LUTHER is 10½ feet high; the figures at his feet, 7 feet: the corner statues of the balustrade, 8½ feet; and those of the towns, 6 feet. But with all these mistakes in reference to the artistic unity of the design the unity of moral interest is perfect. The LUTHER MONUMENT is one of the noblest memorials of one of the greatest events in the history of mankind. It belongs not to Germany alone, but to Europe and the whole world.



DOMINGO F. SARMIENTO, PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION.

PRESIDENT SARMIENTO.

WE give on this page a portrait of DON DOMINGO FAUSTINO SARMIENTO, the newly-elected President of the Argentine Confederation. He was born in San Juan in 1811, and has been in public life since his earliest manhood. He first distinguished himself in his opposition to the Dictator ROSAS, and in consequence of the failure of his party, he was exiled to Chili. Returning to his country in 1836 he founded a school for young ladies, and edited a journal, La Voudà, which, eschewing politics, advocated the interests of agriculture, commerce, and education. But the fact that he did not trouble himself with politics gave him no respite: the Dictator was fearful of the effects of the education of his subjects, and he was a second time exiled to Chili.



He entered the service of Chili, and was sent to Europe on a special mission connected with educational matters. In 1851 he returned to Buenos Ayres, and in the command of a regiment he was engaged in the battle of Monte-Caseros, which decided the fate of ROSAS and established the Argentine Confederation. He assisted in framing the Constitution of 1853, and under the first President, JOSE URQUIZA, was Minister of Instruction. Subsequently, under President DERQUI, he was Minister of the Interior, and later still, Governor of San Juan, his native province. In 1862 he was Minister to the United States. He was recalled in 1865, and appointed Governor of Buenos Ayres. He was elected President in August last by a large popular vote, on a singular platform. It had but one plank: "The ignorance of the people is the crime of bad governments."

MATCH FOR THE BILLIARD CHAMPIONSHIP AT CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

THE BILLIARD CHAMPIONSHIP.

A VERY extraordinary game of billiards was played at Chicago, Illinois, on September 16, between JOHN M'DEVITT and JOSEPH DION, for the "championship of America." We illustrate the scene of the game in Library Hall. The game was played on a four-pocket table, 1,500 points up in nine innings. DION made 409, M'DEVITT made the full number of the game in one hour and forty minutes. The "run" of 1460, by which the game was won, is the largest upon record. The largest hitherto made in a match game had been a little over 800, made with jawed balls. Any thing over 400 was altogether unexpected. Yet there were those who, well acquainted with M'Devitt's practice game, were heard to say he would run the game out. Throughout the run, which occupied an hour and five minutes, the player was thoroughly cool. Once or twice, as he stopped for a moment to take a drink of water, he wiped his face and remarked: "By George, this is hard work!" By the terms under which the champion was defeated, and won by M'Devitt in 1867, he has to hold it for two years against all comers in order to finally become the possessor of it. The sketch of the scene is from the pencil of our artist, Mr. Frank D. Shief.

DR. SHERMAN'S

Here are the editorial remarks in the Staats Zeitung on Mr. P. Gerth and his statement:

"Mr. Gerth, a merchant of respectable gentleman of Newark, N. J., sends us a communication setting forth his sufferings from a terrible case of rupture, and his final relief and restoration by Dr. J. A. Sherman, of the city. Mr. Gerth is an enterprising man, extensively known throughout the country, having for many years carried on a large brewery business in Newark, from which he has retired with a large fortune. A statement of this kind, coming to us clothed with such high respectability, leaves no doubt of its correctness, and prompts us to publish it in another part of this paper. We recommend our readers who may be troubled in this way to lose no time in securing the services of Dr. Sherman."

Newark, Sept. 19.

To the N. Y. Staats Zeitung: After having suffered many years from a bad rupture, and exhausting all my patience and large amounts of money on many doctors of this city, New York, and Brooklyn, and suffering at their hands indescribable agony, I was compelled to abandon all hopes of finding any one competent to relieve me, when providentially, a friend of mine told Dr. Sherman's advertisement out of your paper and inclosed it to me by letter. I showed it to one physician and several doctors, who ridiculed the idea of Dr. Sherman being able to do any thing for me, basing their conclusions on what they knew of the possibility to assist me.

The last doctor I applied to in Brooklyn harnessed me up with a machine like the claws of a lobster, and sent me off with instructions not to remove it. But as my very life was in the balance, agony, and on reaching there was compelled to take my bed, and, as the torment increased, I was obliged to send for a doctor, but it is off. I will not done so, I am sure I would have been killed in less than twenty-four hours, so inflammation was setting in.

Indeed, till I found Dr. Sherman, none of the doctors seemed to have the ability to perfectly reduce my rupture, and in every instance recommended me to bring me nothing could be done for me, and thus one after the other gave me up as a hopeless subject deserving no incessant suffering.

But thank Heaven for the thoughtfulness of my friend and for Dr. Sherman's ability in encouraging me to call on Dr. Sherman, contrary to the advice of many of those physicians who had given me up, and I am now proud for me to express, for I feel like a man emerging from purgatory to Heaven since I placed myself in the hands of this gentleman whom I am compelled to declare the doctor of doctors), who has fulfilled all his promises, while all the others proved to be fruitful sources of evil. Hence you will see why I thus highly appreciate his services, and feel it a duty to make this public statement, that others afflicted with this disease may know where to obtain relief and avoid the delay and sufferings from experiments such as I, for long years, experienced, and from all this suffering I expended a much larger sum of money than I have here stated, for my statement is modest and his treatment not only infinitely superior to others, but also more economical. I have just remarked to a gentleman to-day, that if any one should offer me $5000 in gold to discontinue Dr. Sherman's method, I would think it ridiculous and refuse it like an idle puff of wind. I can now walk and ride with more comfort and pleasure in one hour than I experienced for the past five years previously, and, knowing this relief, with as much facility and comfort as before this affliction came upon me.

My photographs were taken by Dr. Sherman, and may be seen at his office or at my residence, which will give a better idea of my appearance than I can possibly even my description, and it will afford me a pleasure to show them to any gentleman interested, and give all other information, if they feel pleased to call upon me at my residence, No. 86 Market St., Newark, N. J.

MANHATTAN
CO-OPERATIVE
RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Office Manhattan Co-Operative Relief Association,
No. 68 Broadway, Cor. Bond St., N. Y.

The MANHATTAN CO-OPERATIVE RELIEF ASSOCIATION is chartered by the State of New York.

OBJECT.

The object of this association is to secure a cash payment within forty days after the death of a member of as many of the members as there are members in the class to which he or she belongs, to his or her heirs.

MEMBERSHIP FEES.

The membership fees are six dollars at joining (for which a policy of $1000 is issued), and one dollar and ten cents on the death of each member, of which one cent will be paid into the dollar from each month, goes to the widow or heirs of the deceased member, and the ten cents for the expenses of collecting.

INVESTMENTS.

The By-Laws of the Association require that one third of the money received as new memberships fees shall be made a sinking fund to meet payments falling due by the deaths among members. This fund is held by the

NATIONAL TRUST CO.,

and will be invested in United States Bonds, or real estate, or bond and mortgage with New York City property, which property shall be double the value of the money so loaned.

THE FUNDS.

The remaining two thirds, after paying the expenses of the Association, will be invested in real estate in the City of New York, or in bond and mortgage on property in the same city, for the interest of which shall go to pay the current expenses of the Association. The Association however invests no funds, nor money becomes the property of the Association, with the promise that the expenses of burial shall be paid out of such funds—said expenses, however, not to exceed one hundred dollars.

A member failing to pay his fee of one dollar and ten cents monthly, shall be from date of notice, forfeits all claims upon the Association, and also forfeits all money paid in, except the $6 fee, unless the delay time is extended to sixty days. A member having no permanent residence, may name the Secretary, and appoint a representative to pay his fees.

When a member dies, we send ten dollars and fifty cents to the Treasurer to prepay their fees, and when we get the $1.10 cents, thus saving the trouble of sending $1.10 each time, besides a saving of fifty cents. Thus no poor man can be out pay $6 now, and $1 10 occasionally, thus securing $6000 to his heirs. Any number of dollars each person may will have to pay to secure $6000 will be $30 per year, a trifle over eight cents per day. Thus a person in case of insurance cost about one sixth what they would have to pay any Life Insurance Company for a $6000 policy.

This company is divided into ten classes for men, and ten classes for women. As soon as these classes have filled, no more members will be adopted. Men and women are not allowed in the same classes. Every thing is done to make matters easy.

CLASSES.

In class A all persons betw'n the ages of 25 and 35 yrs.
In class B all persons betw'n the ages of 30 and 35 yrs.
In class C all persons betw'n the ages of 35 and 35 yrs.
In class D all persons betw'n the ages of 40 and 35 yrs.
In class E all persons betw'n the ages of 45 and 35 yrs.
In class F all persons betw'n the ages of 50 and 35 yrs.
In class G all persons betw'n the ages of 55 and 35 yrs.
In class H all persons betw'n the ages of 60 and 35 yrs.
In class I all persons betw'n the ages of 65 and 35 yrs.
In class K all persons betw'n the ages of 70 and 65 yrs.

The classes for women are the same as above. Any one may be found in any class for any age they will be expelled, and the moneys paid forfeited to the Association, which will amount to 600 members. Each person pays $6 upon becoming a member, and $1 10 cents when a member dies. Belonging to the same class as he or she may be a member of.

A member of one class can not be assessed this dollar if a member of another class dies. Each class is independent, having its own members, fees, &c.

ILLUSTRATION.

Class "A" has 600 male members. A man dies. The Association pays over, within forty days, $6000 to the widow or heirs, and the remaining members forthwith pay $1 10, which is sent to the Treasurer of the Association to reimburse it. Failing to send this sum, they forfeit to the Association $6 paid, and to the Association supplies a new member to fill the place of the retired.

ADVANTAGES.

The advantages of this association over ordinary Life Insurance Companies are, no panics can break it; the fees are so small that it is within the reach of all; no long intervals, that any man can secure to his family a competency within forty days.

HOW TO BECOME MEMBERS.

Any one desiring to become a member must send $6, in check, bank note, or postal order, or by express, the expressage being paid by the applicant. Under no circumstance will the Association be responsible for moneys sent but in this way. Agents are not allowed to receive money, but only to call for checks, &c., &c. Persons paying an agent otherwise than by check do it at their own risk. Blanks for all papers to be applied for the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer. Accompanying the money and fee must be given the applicant's full name, age, birth-place, present occupation, also the policy in the class desired, and the widow, son, county, state—also, a Medical Certificate, setting forth the physician's name and residence, and the address of the doctor examining, the applicant is a proper person to be inserted. Blank forms of application for membership will be sent upon application.

Agents are wanted to receive money but in the form of a check, draft, or postal order, made payable to the order of W. S. CARMAN, Treasurer.

Each member ought to try to make new members; by doing he benefits himself. No letter will be noticed that does not contain a three-cent postage stamp to prepay return postage.

Note these Facts.

The object of this article is to call the attention of the feeble and ailing to themselves. Ordinarily, business, pleasure—in short, almost every thing in this busy world obtains more consideration than the preservation of that blessing with which nothing earthly should be put in comparison—viz., health. This is a dangerous season, and it does not find the human system in the best condition to defy its perils. To use a homely figure, the torrid summer weather "takes the starch out of people," and leaves them limp and languid. The tree of vitality bears low. The naturally feeble are unusually depressed; the naturally strong are not as vigorous as they might be. The effects of this on the community for more or less the influence of the atmospheric changes which produce the malarious diseases common in October and November. It is a as protective against the effects of these changes that have obtained no small portion of their celebrity. The Great Vegetable Tonic of the Age is not only a specific for Chronic Dyspepsia, Biliousness, and Nervous Complaints, but also a preventive of malarious epidemics. Whoever wishes to be kept against an attack of intermittent or remittent fever (both of which prevail to a melancholy extent all over the country), will do well to resort, without delay, to the soothing invigorating and anti-bilious specific. Quinine has had its day. It leaves a sting behind, which is worse than the disease it relieved. But HOSTETTER'S BITTERS become more popular and command a greater sale with each successive season, because they produce a better medicinal effect than any of the powerful poisons used as tonics, and are at once a safe and palatable preparation.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY

OF

THE GREAT REBELLION

IN

THE UNITED STATES.

By

ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these, 662 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 237 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

This is one of the great enterprises of the day. The historical value of the work is unlimited. The deeds of individuals and incidents are admirably drawn, not only by the pen of the historian, but by the pencil of the artist, and both combined will make, when bound, one of the most authentic histories of the war, and the history of the war. There are official documents on every page, at the bottom, which adds much to the value of the work. It will be found on the centre-tables of thousands of our countrymen.—Boston Post.

Many of its illustrative pictures are the best that we have seen in such a work; and some of the numerous portraits of prominent actors in the war are admirable as likenesses and works of art.—London Athenæum.

This is as valuable a work as ever was compiled on a historical subject.—Iowa Herald.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and in the size and beauty of its pages and paper, in the profuseness, faithfulness, elegance, and completeness of its illustrations, for exceeding any other history yet attempted.—New York Observer.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. We are now manufacturing both Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes, and shall continue to do so. These are equal in appearance and time to gold ones costing $200. Also Oroide Chains, as well made and shape of gold, from $3 to $6. Sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many parties are offering worthless imitations of our watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one does or can supply Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

[From the City Item, Philadelphia.]

THE OROIDE WATCHES.—A new metal, closely resembling gold, has been invented, of which watch-cases and watch-chains are made. C. E. COLLINS & CO., New York, are the manufacturers, and a description will be found in another column. The Oroide Watches are in great demand. From all quarters of the Union, daily, hourly, come orders for one, two, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred watches. They are sold for only $15 each, and better time-keepers are not to be found. One of them has been going for a week in this office, and it is perfect to a second. It looks as handsome, and keeps as good time as a watch costing $150. We advise all who are about to buy a watch to try the Oroide.

[From the La Crosse Republican.]

OROIDE WATCHES.—Out of curiosity, we called on Messrs. Collins & Co., in New York at the Watch Manufactory of Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., on Nassau Street, and confess our astonishment on being shown their assortment of watches. In case made of this new and closely resembling gold that has been recently introduced to select a gold one placed amongst them. We should have no hesitation wearing one with full confidence that time would not change its appearance. Every watch is warranted, and the case is made and finished in all respects equal to a watch costing $150. We have no doubt that when once known in this section, many will be sold here.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

MESSRS. C. E. COLLINS & CO., of 37 and 39 Nassau St., are another improving their beautiful Oroide Watches. These are excellent time-keepers, and for all practical purposes as good as a fine gold hunting-case watch.

[From the New York Independent.]

Our readers have probably observed a notice of the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to have good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which shall look like gold. It keeps counsel with the closest question of gold. We have tried one of the watches, which was sent us, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There is of course a slight variation of velocity in this case as in all others; but it is a first-class silver watch, not $135 to $175 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time, can have it for $15 by sending to Messrs. Collins.

Citizens of Toronto and the Dominion generally, take notice. We have hundreds of Testimonials, for which, see our advertisements. But you need no further evidence than the following, from one who is well known among you. It is from a disinterested party.

HARRY HAZELTON, the well-known author, says:

"I have always been slow to recommend the humbugs and dealers in them as little better than swindlers. At the request of a friend, I have worn for three months the watch he purchased of C. E. Collins, and for which he paid $15. It keeps accurate time, and several of my friends have purchased watches of Collins, and can really see no difference between it and my own, which cost five times the amount of the Collins Watch."

MR. HAZELTON adds:

"I have since purchased FIVE of these watches, at the request of friends, and those for whom they were intended are delighted with them. I keep one of them in my office, and will find some difficulty in supplying the constantly-increasing demand."

We have also seen the watch worn by Mr. Hazelton, and others casting $90. These are superbly finished, and really superior to any article placed upon the market costing five times that sum.

OFFICE STATE CAPITAL REPORTER, 42 and 44 J STREET, SACRAMENTO, CAL., July 18, 1868.

GENTLEMEN: Wells, Fargo & Co. delivered Watch and Chain, as per order; paid bill on presentation. The Watch and Chain are very satisfactory, and are a handy variety of watch and chain for a business man. One is the chief editor of this paper, and the others are the publishers of this paper, and the others are for friends of mine, and by wearing your watches you will help me to sell more of them. Please send me seven watches and seven chains, of same quality as those you sent me, price paid you $15 for watch, and $2 currency for chains. I return you seven dollars, allowing the exact price you charge me. The goods sent me; the number of the watch sent is 66,982. If this order sent turns out as satisfactory as the first, we will give you a good editorial notice and help you sell. I send this order not for my benefit, but for yours and to accommodate my friends. Send to E. K. PIERCE, Office of "State Capital Reporter," Sacramento, California. Yours respectfully, E. K. PIERCE.

WATCH. The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities for resemblance to gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and was only recalled forth the eclipsure of the press in consequence of the prejudice against anything that has not had a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition. The movements are well finished, highly regulated, and the cases and goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to offer them at exceedingly low prices, ranging from $10 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

THE BOYS IN BLUE AT PHILADELPHIA.

A FEW weeks ago it was currently remarked by the opponents of General GRANT that his nomination excited no enthusiasm. No doubt, therefore, our Democratic friends are somewhat surprised by the overwhelming majorities in Vermont and Maine which betoken as certain a victory for GRANT and COLFAX in November as was secured for LINCOLN in 1864. With the soldiers and sailors it is all one way. They know better than the politicians for what they fought, and they more fully appreciate the issues of this Presidential canvass. The Convention of Soldiers and Sailors at Philadelphia on the 1st and 2d instant, was, as regarded the enthusiasm which it called forth, the most remarkable affair of the kind that ever occurred in the Quaker City. On the 1st, delegations of the "Boys in Blue" from all parts of the country crowded every train leading to the city. A portion of the afternoon and evening was occupied by those who had arrived in hearing an address of welcome from Mayor MCMICHAEL, and the speeches of Generals BARNUM, KILPATRICK, BIDDLE, and other prominent officers of the army. The mass meeting was assembled in front of Independence Hall. "Philadelphia's heart," says the Evening Telegraph of that city, "throbbed in one mighty pulsation of welcome to the brave 'Boys in Blue.'"

The quiet disbanding of our volunteer army after four years of war proved that this army was held together by no purpose beyond that of the salvation of the nation. This purpose, and this alone, still holds together the soldiers and the sailors, and their voices will therefore be listened to without hesitation by the masses of the people. It is well that they who fought should speak forth in times like these—that they whom GRANT once led gloriously through so many battles, should have a prominent share in the expression of the people's purpose to still follow him to a victory which is final and decisive.

The 2d of October was the great day of the Convention. It was a holiday in Philadelphia. The parade and procession was the grandest ever witnessed in that city. There were in the line of march delegations from all parts of Pennsylvania, from New York and Brooklyn, from Delaware, Maryland, and Washington, from Ohio, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maine, and Vermont. Prominent in the procession was a battalion of prisoners from Andersonville, Belle Isle, and other prisons of the South, and closing up the line were ambulances and carriages carrying the maimed heroes of the war.

[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE "BOYS IN BLUE" MARCHING DOWN CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 2, 1868.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

The streets were crowded with the citizens and with strangers who had flocked into the city by thousands; the houses also, decorated with the Stars and Stripes, were densely packed with spectators. In passing a given point this vast procession occupied an hour and ten minutes. It was like a second grand review of the armies of the Union.

GENERAL BUTLER AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

THERE is nothing which has given the Republican party a stronger hold upon the intelligent moral support of the country than the action of its great National Convention. It met at a moment of extraordinary excitement, when conspicuous Republican Senators were denounced as pickpockets by certain members of the party because they honestly voted to acquit the President. As to the party consequences of their votes, those gentlemen were certainly as able and honest judges as their accusers, and they were of the sincere opinion that personal duty and the party advantage were coincident.

But the pressure against them was extraordinary. Conspicuous gentlemen were very anxious that the Convention should condemn them. General BUTLER, we believe, was of this opinion. The General had also pronounced for paying the five-twenties in greenbacks, and vigorously defended his views, which were virtually those afterward put into the Democratic platform. Fortunately the Chicago Republican Convention represented the real sentiment of the party every where; and its good sense in refusing utterly to censure an honest difference like that involved in the impeachment, and its high principle in requiring payment of the debt according to the spirit as well as the letter of the contract, assured the country that the party was neither a mob nor a mere representative of those who advocated national dishonor, and who sneered as morality in political action. The Republican party passed through an appalling peril last spring, and so triumphantly that its scope has never been fully appreciated. When frusted Republicans said that they were sick of the slang of honesty, and refused to the vote of certain Senators, they merely emitted a feeble echo of the old Democratic cry, that it was a duty to vote for the Devil if he were regularly nominated.

The late Massachusetts Convention acted in the same spirit with that at Chicago. The National Democratic party republicated at Chicago the views and the policy advocated by General BUTLER, and the Convention of his own State unanimously affirmed that action. Yet General BUTLER, who, after the adoption by acclamation of the National platform demanding the spirit as well as the letter of the contract, deliberately voted in Congress to enable the public creditor, thereby repudiating the authentic declaration of the party, loudly proclaims peculiar zeal for party regularity and orthodoxy. The whole Republican party asks the confidence of the country upon two grounds, both distinctly stated, and both fully understood. One is Constitutional reconstruction upon the principle of equal rights, and the other is payment of the debt according to the spirit of the contract. No man who does not support both measures can fairly claim to represent the party. If any such man receives a regular party nomination it must be assumed that there has been surprise, and any upright party man is released from the support of such a nomination. What Republican in New York would for a moment, as a party man, to vote for FERNANDO WOOD, or any office whatever, even if he had received a regular Republican nomination?

But there is another than the technical party view. A man who openly advocates a breach of the public faith in one particular, as General BUTLER does, reveals a moral unsoundness which is perilous at every point. The General's attempts to hush up his views, to persuade the State Convention to say nothing about paying the debt, and to assure his District Convention that he favored only the middle-of-the-road policy, merely serve to show still more distinctly the danger of placing him in high and responsible position. The character of representatives in Congress does not concern their own districts more than it concerns the country. The Democratic party of the Fifth District of Massachusetts have no right to send a man to Congress to make laws for New York and the other States who rejects one of the chief principles of the party, and more particularly when his declarations imply a positive political immorality. Let the Republicans of that district ask themselves whether they think the cause of the country, as it appears to Republicans, can wisely be intrusted to a Congress composed of men whose views upon a cardinal point have been distinctly rejected by the National and State Conventions.

In a Congress of General BUTLER's white would become of the principles upon which the Republican party is conducting this canvass?

If the Republican party in this country means to throw moral principle overboard, and if the effort is to be openly and distinctly made in Massachusetts, the party and the country are doomed. We might as well be ruined by successful rebellion as by triumphant corruption. And if Republican leaders are to teach that morals do not enter into politics, and that a nation may properly do what a man would be sent to the State Prison for doing, then such Republican leaders will teach and prove that good faith may as well be broken in one way as in another; and they will not hesitate to break faith with the loyal men of the South as well as with the public creditor every where. If the Republicans of the Fifth District of Massachusetts send to Congress a man whom they know is willing to swindle the bondholder, they send a man who upon occasion would betray the negro.

It is of incalculable importance that the party should not merely elect its candidates at this time, but should long retain power. The administration of General GRANT, as his character and career assure us, will be firm, moderate, and wise. We may justly expect him to surround himself with sagacious and truly liberal men, who will help to secure the prolonged ascendency of the party upon its organized principles. But it is essential to that result that our majority in Congress should be composed of men of moral consideration as well as of ability and experience. "Smart men," adroit politicians, unscrupulous self-seekers will not only most seriously embarrass the administration, but throw the party into confusion. Because General BUTLER was a prompt and vigorous military dictator at New Orleans in the midst of a civil war, it by no means follows that he is a wise or safe legislator.

The Republicans of the Fifth District of Massachusetts have a very serious responsibility. They are voluntarily assuming, for the hour, brethren every where. The opportunity is given them by the nomination of B. H. DAVA, Jun., of determining between the party and a questionable ability; one a man of the most spotless fame, who has been always a Republican by the profoundest conviction, and whose views are to-day the most generally expressed opinions of the party in the country and in the State; the other, General BUTLER, who advocates and violates the public faith. If the Fifth District of Massachusetts chooses the latter, we hope it will speak tenderly of the choice of the Fifth District of New York.

THE REVOLUTION IN SPAIN.

THE throne of ISABELLA of Spain has fallen as suddenly and hopelessly as that of LOUIS PHILIPPE in France twenty years ago, and there is probably nobody in the world, except a true Bourbon, who does not believe that the end of the Spanish monarchy is the beginning of hope for the Spanish people. Nothing shows more plainly the changes that have taken place in the world than the comparative indifference with which this event is regarded. The doctrine of divine right in every application has been so entirely discarded that not only does no king think of it as a reason for a throne, no revolution, but nobody imagines that any king would be so foolish. It has become pretty plain that the evil course of the French revolution of the last century was not the fault of the trifling of other powers. If France had been left to manage her affairs in her own way, it is not at all evident that she could not have stifled under the tyranny of the terrorists. But when the crowns made common cause against her the result was inevitable. It is curious and painful to remark that was the fear of the present time—scarcely one of the chief contemporary foreign observers and critics of the Revolution comprehended the exact value of their passionately denounced or enthusiastically hailed. From BURKE to PAINE the real significance of the movement escaped them.

But nobody dreads a coalition and a crusade against Spain. No sane human being can imagine that a reactionary rule of priests and a court like that of ISABELLA can be serviceable to any country; and no power in Europe would probably suffer its government to try to force her back upon her throne. Indeed that is the most striking of the signs of the new Continental politics have ceased to be a mere game of kings. It is the people which has come to the throne even to the monarchies. This is strikingly illustrated in PRUSSIA. There appears to have been no substantial resistance. GONZALES BRAVO resigns, and the Queen calls CONCHA to the head of the Ministry. But the army and the fleet are found to be united for the revolution. The cities declare against the Queen. CONCHA therefore joins the movement, and the Queen leaves her kingdom, and is a powerless refugee at PAU, as CHARLES X. of France was at Holyrood. The Queen is gone, will the monarchy remain? This is the question, and this involves the possibility of trouble.

If there be any really strong and organized party of Spanish Republicans it will now appear. General PRIM is not a Republican, and nothing would seem to be more foreign to the habits and traditions of Spain than any truly Republican movement. But the political activity and progress of the European mind is remarkable. The political aspect of the Continent by no means represents the political conviction; and the peace is much kept by royal doubts of the real temper of the people as by hostile armaments. The debates and resolutions of the late Labor Congress at Brussels reveal the consciousness of the body of the people that they, and not the heads of Governments, are the real "persons of importance." JOHN BRIGHT, in one of his speeches, quoted the lines, written we believe by GEORGE WITHER, which two centuries ago expressed a truth which is now current in America, and is becoming in Europe, the cardinal point for statesmen to remember:

"Know there's on earth a yet angester thing, Vulled vulgar is the name—Parliament or King."

This thing exists in Spain as elsewhere; and the times and the circumstances of the country in its appearance. Whatever form the Government will now finally take must, it seems to us, be first determined by a constituent assembly or an appeal to the people. Such an appeal would be, of course, very much controlled by priests and reactionaries. But the result would inevitably be some constitutional and moderate government, although it were a monarchy. Republicanism is useless in the face of events daily reported. But so remarkable a fact as the peaceful fall of the Spanish Bourbons will probably make a part of the Spanish mind which a truly sagacious leader might turn to the best account for liberty and progress.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN has returned from Europe, and there has been a torch-light procession in his honor. The result was probably not all that its projectors had anticipated. The General did not declare himself. He did not even name SEYMOUR nor hurrah for BLAIR. He merely said "Thank you, gentlemen," bowed, and retired. As usual, he was in a false position. There is something touching in the constant misfortune of eminent interested persons to make the General a great or a representative man. There was, indeed, a time when the need of a great military leader was felt to be so urgent that, it will be said, the country insisted that the General was he. He was the little NAPOLEON. General SCOTT had expressed complimentary opinions, and the fight in West Virginia showed that the great man was coming. The General went to Philadelphia and received a sword, and said, modestly, that the war was to be short, since the decision. And all the while those wretched Quaker guns were making mouths at him from Manassas. It was no fault of the General's that the country was deceived. But it is said to think of the Chickahominy swamps, and it is even ludicrous, now that the facts are becoming known, to recur to this history. It will be a terrible seven days, and the unopposed withdrawal of LEE from Antietam, General M'CLELLAN had quietly disappeared from public view, there would have been an irresistible popular shout, but not a very hostile feeling in regard to him, and the final verdict would have been that we were ourselves most to blame in insisting that any man was great merely because he carried a great name.

The serious error of General M'CLELLAN was accepting the candidacy of the party that demanded the abandonment of the rebellion. He then deliberately became the representative of the Copperhead spirit of the country. It was the result of conviction or of sheer weakness. If it were conviction he is entitled to the same patriotic regard as WADE HAMPTON. If it were weakness, where should we have been had he been elected? His defeat was so signal, so overwhelming, that he materially left the country; and yet there was, and undoubtedly still is, a feeling that he is constantly drifted with out his will into a position where he does not naturally belong. What could be more amusing than his nomination to a Republican Senate by ANDREW JOHNSON as Minister to England? Now that the General is at home again it must seem to him a little hard to be obliged to fraternize with RAPHAEL SEMMES and ROBERT TOOMBS. In 1864, indeed, they hoped for his election, but they took no other part in public affairs than being annihilated by SHERMAN and SHERIDAN. It must be a singular sensation for the Union General who was thus baffled in the field to help LEE at the polls by opposing the Union General to whom LEE surrendered. We can easily imagine that General M'CLELLAN feeling that he has returned a little too soon—except for the absurd fate that always puts him awry.

When the torch-bearers came the other evening and like Tory adherents of that they were the representatives of those who bitterly opposed the war in which he made all the distinction he has, the thoughts must have played truant with the jubilant Boys in Blue who were shouting and singing and filling the neighboring city with patriotic joy! No wonder he said but a few formal words. No wonder he merely thanked the torch-bearers, and remarked that they would not expect a speech. He did not even say that his heart was with them. He did not breathe a wish that the candidate of WADE HAMPTON and SEMMES and HOWELL COBB and VALLANDIGHAM might be elected. When General M'CLELLAN thought of four years ago the spectacle must have seemed to him a little spectral. The report says that the crowd was disappointed. But what must General M'CLELLAN have thought?

THE BOYS IN BLUE.

THE late great assembly of the Boys in Blue at Philadelphia shows how deeply stirred is the heart of the country by the issues of the political campaign. For the first time—and we see it with the utmost pleasure—the officers of the army feel that they have duties as citizens which they are bound to perform with the rest of us. The Lieutenant-General writes, indeed, that he thinks soldiers should not take an active part in politics—by which we hope he means no more than that they should not become brawling partisans. But General SHERIDAN telegraphs from Fort Harker, "Say to the Boys in Blue that it is as essential to have a political victory this fall as it was to have an Appomattox in '65, and that every man who loves his country should vote for GRANT." These are the words of a man who is no less a citizen because he is a soldier. The truth is, that the vast majority of the officers and men of the war hope for the defeat of SEYMOUR precisely as they hoped for the defeat of LEE. Mr. HILL, of Georgia, one of the most reckless of the late rebels and now of the "Southern Democrats," says, in a letter to the Tribune, that he finds very wide-spread conviction in the Southern States that the election of GRANT will promote peace and good will. It is, indeed, a very wide-spread conviction. And there was a persuasion equally profound in 1864 that the election of M'CLELLAN would give success to the rebellion. They were both different forms of the same feeling.

The vast and enthusiastic gathering in Philadelphia was but a sign of the enthusiastic resolution of all loyal men in this country. The question was asked by the shot at Fort Sumter, shall the Union be maintained? The question was asked by the nomination of SEYMOUR, shall the Union be governed by its friends or its enemies? The spirit that saved the Union will now secure the control of the Government to its friends. All other issues have disappeared. The attempt of the Democrats to "push the financial question" has received upon themselves by developing the real truth of the existing situation, which shows that at the present rate of taxation the whole debt can be readily paid within twenty years, and that taxation can be incalculably lightened by a restoration of political confidence. The morals of Democratic financial administration are exhibited in the Democratic repeal of the last Republican Secretary of the Treasury. Its economy is shown in the financial management of the city of New York. The Democratic question has "pushed" the Democratic party in rather an unexpected manner.

There remains the paramount question of the preservation of peace in the country, without which every interest languishes and taxation grows heavier. Peace, however, is not disturbed by the clash of arms only. Constant apprehension, perpetual suspense, or the consciousness that a party of disorganization is paramount, that ignorance and prejudice are in the ascendant, and absolutely agitation which is fatal to the confidence without which there can be no real increase of wealth. And this question it is which such assemblies as that of the Boys in Blue will answer. They show, as the great popular demonstrations during the war showed, that the American people are not deceived. There were mistakes enough made in the management of the war, but the people knew that the war was their cause. There have been some mistakes, doubtless, in the Republican policy of reconstruction, but the people know that that policy is necessary to secure the victory won in the field; and that that policy is therefore the policy of peace.

That great significance of the jubilee of the Boys in Blue. This will be the meaning of the entrance of the Chief of the Boys in Blue into the White House.

DISRAELI AND GLADSTONE.

THE English elections seem to promise a result as overwhelming as that in Ireland—except that Mr. GLADSTONE will have a majority of one hundred and thirty-six or even more. In regard to his opponent, the Prime Minister, Mr. DISRAELI, the chief question has been, whether he would propose a still more radical Irish policy than Mr. GLADSTONE's, and whether he could carry his Tory adherents with him if he did, as in his measures of electoral reform. All summer Mr. DISRAELI has been silent. There have been constant rumors of his cunning intention to repeat his previous policy, but nothing has been known until now, when he has made his declaration of intention.

It will be remembered that at the last session of Parliament Mr. GLADSTONE proposed the disestablishment of the Irish Church, an act of the simplest justice. Mr. DISRAELI opposed it, but the House of Commons strongly supported Mr. GLADSTONE. After contesting the point a little while Parliament was dissolved, and an appeal was made to the electors. It was supposed by those who have more respect for Mr. DISRAELI's ability than for his principle that he would soon ascertain the probable drift of the elections, and act accordingly. But simultaneously with the general concession of a large GLADSTONE majority comes the DISRAELI declaration of which we speak, and which reasserts the policy that is apparently to be decisively rejected by the voters. This is interpreted to mean that Mr. DISRAELI has discovered that he can not carry his party for any measure which will out-Gladstone GLADSTONE, and that he has resolved to go down with all his colors flying.

The difficulty with him is that even dull men can comprehend this question; and the Tory party includes that class of our fellow-beings. "I do not say," said MILL, "that all Conservatives are stupid; but I do say that stupid men are generally Conservatives." Even Squire WESTERN can see that the "Papists" rejoice at the disarrangement of the English Church in Ireland, and that is enough. To please the Papists is to encourage Popery, and to encourage Popery is to endanger the Protestant succession. DISRAELI might refine upon householders and compound householders so as to make it appear that an enlarged vote must be in favor of Church and Queen; but no juggler could make an Irish policy which Popery applauded a true British policy—in the minds of Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY and his friends. Hence the cry of No Popery which Mr. DISRAELI now raises is addressed to the modern DE COVERLEYS and their intelligence.

But we confess that nothing in the Minister's career astonishes us more than he would hesitate at a still more remarkable coup than any he has attempted. If the election shows an immense majority for Mr. GLADSTONE, why should not the Queen open Parliament with a speech favoring it? It then becomes a Ministerial measure, and when the House adopts it it is a triumph of the Ministry, and Mr. GLADSTONE does not come into office. Mr. DISRAELI is probably very indifferent whether he remains Minister by Liberal or by Tory support. Theory of the British Constitution is, that the Ministerial policy shall conform to the declaration of a majority of the House. If a Minister is skilful and intends to yield to the will of the majority in time, the constitutional custom is maintained.

Hitherto it has been a point of honor with an English Prime Minister to represent the policy of one of the two great parties, and if his measures were defeated, to retire for the representative of the other party and policy. But Mr. DISRAELI has changed all that. The Tory policy has been opposition to electoral reform. When Mr. GLADSTONE was in power three years ago Mr. DISRAELI, as the Tory leader, opposed in the Tory interest, prevailed, and he came into office. But the real conviction of Parliament, as he ascertained, was for reform, and he therefore proposed a scheme even more liberal than Mr. GLADSTONE'S. Mr. DISRAELI is not properly a Tory. His principle evidently is that the will of the House should prevail, and whose will that is liberal Mr. DISRAELI is Liberal. When that will demands disestablishment, why should not Mr. DISRAELI disestablish? But there is probably a point beyond which even Mr. DISRAELI's cleverness would not be liberated. If he should attempt his old game, it is by no means improbable that the House would return to the old policy by a vote of want of confidence. This would certainly be done in the event, we suppose, if Mr. GLADSTONE had the nimble intrepidity of Mr. DISRAELI.

THE DROUGHT IN ENGLAND.

We had accepted as correct the statement of the London papers, and of numerous newspaper correspondents in England, that the great drought was broken by the rains which fell on and subsequent to the 11th and 12th of August. But although the rain fell in great part where there was a half inches, and vegetation had assumed somewhat of its ordinary appearance, particularly in the low regions, the benefit had been comparatively confined to the root crops, which are now past recovery, and but very little on the pastures. The expectations formed in England from these rains extend to the autumn crop; but, although but little is said on the subject directly, we suppose that they have been utterly disappointed. The subject is of too great importance to the people of England and to the farmers of this country to justify any careless words in considering the present situation in this respect.

The London Standard of the 18th of September, in discussing the question of the supply of water to the town of Manchester, at the request of "the authorities" makes the following statement: "The drought still continues, and it has long ceased to be possible to anticipate or speculate with any degree of certainty as to the time when we shall have in this district any rain-fall which will materially increase the storage in the corporation reservoirs, upon which so enormous a population is dependent for the supply of water absolutely necessary for health and comfort. The drought has now, with little or no material interruption, continued for the unprecedented period of nearly six months, and it is hardly necessary to say that the Waterworks Committee have for many weeks past been compelled to consider in what way the consumption can be reduced, and been watching with the greatest anxiety the gradual but constant diminution of the water in the reservoirs."

Manchester is second in population among British towns only to London, and is the largest in manufactures, and has a corporation for the supply of water were on a scale corresponding with the importance of the place. In an area of 350 acres there was usually stored three thousand millions of gallons in a region 650 feet higher than Manchester. The water-shed, comprising the extreme east of the county of Cheshire and a small portion of Derbyshire and Yorkshire, consists of about 19,000 acres, part of the hills which constitute the back-bone of England. The River Etherow, which afterward becomes the Mersey, is the main source of supply. The Etherow, after receiving twenty or thirty brooks of various size, is arrested by large embankments thrown across the valley, whereby three reservoirs are formed, in which the water is stored. The ordinary depth of water in one of them is 84 feet, but in the deepest part of the hills it approaches 114 feet, consisting of land which has not been reaped for twenty years, is now exposing its old furrows, that had for ages lodges long submerged may now be traced, and that the high stream which yet flows has retired to its old bed, the banks of which had not been obliterated by the depth of 84 feet of water, and so long covered upon them. The rain, instead of entering these reservoirs, "was all absorbed by the ground."..... "The springs that, united, constitute the water-courses have never now before they were before the rains in August. Upon the moors the bogs are all dry, and great fissures and cracks in the surface show at present how much rain the land will swallow before the springs are in the slightest degree affected." Water, however, was still stored in one or more of the reservoirs. "The authorities have long resided, "continues the Manchester Guardian," the reports appearing constantly in the papers of the very short period (two days, three days or two to three or four hours) during which water is supplied to the inhabitants in neighboring towns, and in other cases of the entire failure of all supply by the authorities." The Guardian also congratulates themselves that the Corporation are, after such a period of drought, and notwithstanding the large demands upon their works, able to supply "the increasing water for during eight hours of each day," etc.

We have been thus particular in presenting the facts with respect to the present drought, because they are of themselves interesting, and bear very strongly on the question about which doubt is expressed in our own papers as to the extent and character of the drought. The utmost candor and accuracy were required as between the authorities and consumers, and there is no motive to mislead. The facts are such as perceived in the published telegrams from England with respect to the crops. The Mark Lane Express of the 21st of September says: "The arrival of the week has been a cheering one day, and began to excite apprehensions, both in this country and abroad. But the copious thunder-showers that then fell gave promise of the needful supply, and should October be fine we may have a very abundant aftermath, which would partly make up for the deficiency in the hay crop, and the Rev. GILBERT SAMUEL would see his exaggerated estimate of 34 bushels of wheat per acre, and an increase this year of 3,000,000 quarters.

In our issue of the 26th ultimo we had occasion to speak of the appearance which the potato vine presented in several fields of this district. They were described as much more large than sparrow's eggs, and to have sprouted after the rains of the 11th and 12th of August. These were the late potatoes. A report from Ireland of the 21st of September mentions that it is feared that some of the late potatoes will not keep through the winter, and the hope is abandoned that turnips sowed at the time of the recent rains generally will come to maturity. The potato crop is second only to that of wheat.

The question, therefore, is improved only to this extent—that the pastures had become green, and afforded a slight and temporary amount of food to sheep and cattle; and unless the rains should be succeeded by another of unusual character—in the Country Gentleman it is stated that a drought of only a fortnight near the sea-board has greatly diminished the quantity of wheat in the county in this State in which it occurred—it can not be otherwise than that every crop which was subjected to the drought in England in April, May, June, and July must have suffered largely. This is admitted of barley, oats, hay, hops, carrots, turnips, and pastures, but it is also true of wheat. The Mark Lane Express! The Maidstone Journal, the organ of the hop-growers, sums up the resumé of this year's production of hops as follows: "Perhaps a greater discrepancy was never known in the growth—a great part very bad, another good. The amount must be less than an average, and a great part very indifferent." As this is the case with the hop-yard and deep rooted plant, these observations apply equally to the crop of wheat, which is more liable to fail as well as on heavy soils, and from spring planting, and that largely, as well as from fall planting. The nearly entire destruction of many spring crops, and the partial destruction of wheat on light soils, justified the inference that wheat must be below an average. No facts have yet been presented in the British press to interfere with this reasonable deduction.

The farming interest of this country may therefore be sure that the drought in England and in parts of France, Russia, and Germany, will produce a large demand for food from our surplus, and if supplies of it from this quarter are not pressed upon the market in injudicious quantities, remunerating prices will be paid. The interests in London and Liverpool are too vast to indace a full exposure of their necessities and wants. Whatever their stock recently harvested may amount to it will be used so as to promote their objects most effectually, which are to obtain supplies in sufficient quantities and at low prices. The season has been too hot to justify large accumulations of food that far, such as would be liable to become heated and damaged, and limits have been rigorously fixed, so far as we are concerned, which at their purchases have seldom been exceeded, as the consumption of the new crop permitted might have been more unquestionably attractive before their harvest of 1869, when it will be necessary to yield to outside views of price, but we have no disposition to aid in any speculation to put their wants, or to do more than to help in obtaining a fair price for our own products.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

At last the New Dominion Government has determined to build the Intercolonial Railway, and that great thoroughfare is actually commenced. Engineers have been assigned to several sections, and gangs of men are at work on the Miramichi, Restigouche, and other parts of approved intervals along the route. These initial steps have been taken so quietly that few are aware that the work is in progress.

The Intercolonial is that known as the North Shore or Major Robinson route, which the Government has decided is the only one that promises, in a thoroughly commercial point of view, for the national objects involved in the undertaking. The Western route, which seemed to present claims for special favor, was objected to as open to attack from the Maine frontier that it would be useless as a military road in case of war; while the Central route traversed a region of almost uninhabited wilderness. The North Shore line touches at the principal Gulf ports, and is the shortest of the three, the distance from Quebec to Halifax being 496 miles. But 77 miles are already built, so that the portion remaining to be constructed is only 465 miles—of which 167 miles are in New Brunswick, 238 in Nova Scotia, and 60 in Nova Scotia. The total cost of the line is estimated at $20,000,000, or $4,000,000 more than for the Western route. The British Government guarantees the interest on $15,000,000 at 4 per cent., and there are $5,000,000 at 6 per cent. not guaranteed.

For twenty years an intercolonial railroad has been the dream of patriotic Canadians. As a measure of public utility, it was declared to be indispensable to the commercial and political consolidation of the British Provinces, and finally came to be universally regarded so. By the efficient strategy of shrewd leaders, and the powerful engines of argument and statistics which were brought to bear on the necessity for such a road was made clearly apparent. Its construction, they showed, would unite and harmonize conflicting interests, improve a panacea for disorders that had long retarded the material prosperity of the country. It would promote trade, attract immigration, create wealth, and make the Provinces dear to each other, and to each other, if not to the mother country. For a long period the Intercolonial question served its purpose in the political arena of Canada, and at last supplied the mighty lever that accomplished Confederation. But for the pledge that the railroad would be built, New Brunswick never would have entered the Canadian Union; and without the assent of New Brunswick there could have been no "New Dominion."

Advocates of Confederation never ceased to press upon that reluctant Province the advantages which it must derive from the railroad. More than one-half the line would necessarily run through her territory, and her resources would be developed in a corresponding ratio. The mere pecuniary outlay for its construction ($12,000,000 or so) would of itself stimulate trade and make money abundant. St. John would be the chief entrepôt of the whole line, so that it would be enabled to compete easily with Portland and Boston for the trade of the through traffic. Flour would be cheaper, and Canada would offer an open market for her manufactures. Other advantages, too numerous to mention, were to accrue to the Province from the construction of this road. All were conditional, however, upon her acceptance of Confederation.

And so New Brunswick yielded her prejudices.

But she has been overreached in the bargain, and now sees how comparatively valueless her new acquisition is destined to be. The road does not run within a hundred miles of St. John. Instead of traversing a rich and populous section of the Province, promising great commercial advantages and a fair pecuniary return, it skirts its northeastern limit, following a long and circuitous route through a sparsely settled region, whose trade is so limited that even with government subsidy it now barely sustains a fortnightly steamer for seven months in the year. But a far more serious difficulty is, that years before the Intercolonial was possibly be finished, the European and North American Railway, from Bangor to St. John, will have been in full and successful operation—thereby establishing an unbroken line of railway communication between Halifax and Montreal, and 25 miles shorter than by the Intercolonial route. Under the circumstances, it is difficult to see how the latter can ever secure any thing like a paying traffic; or, indeed, that it can ever prove other than a miserable failure. Honest and intelligent Provincials admit this already. The Grand Trunk Railway, which traverses the wealthiest part of Canada, was £17,000 sterling in arrears last year, after paying expenses; and the Intercolonial can not certainly be expected to do better. Two-thirds of the traffic of the Province must inevitably flow into the United States. It has long been awaiting an outlet, and the natural one is that by the road now building to Bangor. From which it will not be sent 65o miles to Canada when it can find a ready market within 300 miles. Of course the road will benefit New Brunswick beyond calculation; but the Province might have secured every advantage in full measure without bartering her local privileges for the Intercolonial Railway, which will only prove a big and a burden to her.

The purposes for which the Intercolonial was projected have never been secret. Mr. GALT once said, when pressing its claims:

"We must develop our own trade within its own channels as much as possible. This policy must govern the expenditure of the country in the future. If we are to do our business through the States we might as well part with them. There would then be no use for a separate country."

The railway project was used as a means to secure Confederation; a union of the Provinces was deemed necessary to prevent absorption by the States. In 1865 there was a desperate effort made, on the part of Canada, to head off the advocates of Western Extension who were urging the construction of the road to Bangor. Their schedules, New Brunswick subscribed largely, and the road is now in an advanced stage of progress. The scheme of the Canadians has been wholly frustrated; and the lesson has once more been taught of the hopelessness of attempting to turn aside the course of trade from its natural channels. As the "New Dominion" seems fated to do its business through the United States, taking Mr. GALT's own words, "it might as well unite with them."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

GENERAL SICKLE, our most experienced Indian fighter, is probably the only man in the world (otherwise than may be) with extreme vigor. He has advanced beyond the Canadian, in Texas. In Kansas the attack made upon Forsyth's command on the 17th, of which we gave an illustration on another page, will call forth from General Sheridan the punishment which it deserves. General Sheridan has made things to change, and when the refractory are to be punished in a manner which will be remembered for full twenty has been exacted. Forsyth's command arrived at Fort Wallace on the 24th.

General J. C. Hindman, late of the Confederate army, was assassinated on the 28th ult., in Helena, Arkansas, on the night of September 27.

FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN is now looking out for a ruler, having deposed the "last of the Bourbons." Napoleon, in the name of the Emperor, has sent Marshal Prim to Spain to bent upon carrying on his old idea of a grand alliance of Italy to Napoleon gives some plausibility to the report that Victor Emanuel's daughter is destined for the Spanish throne. Espartero, Duke of Victoria, is said to be the choice of the Spanish people. Espartero is the father-in-law of Prim, who is the father-in-law of Victor Emanuel's daughter. The Spanish throne of either the son or Prince Napoleon, of Amadeus—our new son-in-law—the King of Portugal and Prince Napoleon. The fall of the Bourbons is, in any event, a terrible blow to the papacy.

Salmeron has issued a lengthy proclamation to the citizens and soldiers of Madrid, informing them that he has effected who will return to their allegiance.

Marshal Serrano, regent of Spain, President of the Argentine Republic, has proposed negotiations for peace between Brazil and Paraguay. During the time the war against General Lopez continues with results favorable to the allies.

GENERAL DON JUAN PRIM.

THE SPANISH INSURRECTION.

THE Spanish Revolution is now nearly accomplished. It is the same storm that was muttering twelve months ago, and which has now burst in all its fury about the head of ISABELLA II. City after city, province after province, have swollen the tide of insurrection. Even the army is not to be depended upon. There has been little fighting; the revolutionists appear to have had every thing their own way. On the 3d instant Marshal SERRANO—who, next to General DON JUAN PRIM, is the master spirit of the new movement—entered Madrid with seven generals of the army. The enthusiasm with which he was received by the citizens and the National Guard indicates that the revolution is as popular in the capital as in the provinces and other towns.

General PRIM has had abundant facilities for studying the art of war. He visited the scene of the Crimean War in 1854 as the Spanish Military Commissioner. He was also present in Virginia in 1862, where he witnessed the operations of the Peninsular campaign, and had every opportunity for observing the discipline and tactics of both the National and the Confederate armies. The revolutionists have established a Provisional Junta; they have formally deposed the Queen, who is now a guest of the Emperor NAPOLEON; steps have been taken for an early election of a Constituent Assembly; Marshal ESPARTERO has been called to the head of the state; and a new cabinet has been formed, with SERRANO as President, and General PRIM as Minister of War.

No radical revolution in the Spanish Government will probably follow this outbreak, even if we concede the ultimate success of the insurgents. The great purpose of the Spanish people is the overthrow of QUEEN ISABELLA and of the house of Bourbon. Queen ISABELLA has issued a proclamation protesting against the validity of the Provisional Government. But she is powerless to resist a movement already so successful.

ISABELLA came to the throne in the midst of a civil war. She was born at Madrid, October 30, 1830, and was proclaimed Queen when only three years old. She has had very little to do with the affairs of government, concerning herself chiefly with her own pleasures. She has forfeited the respect of her subjects. Her stanchest supporters belong to the Church party.

STONER'S LIFE-PRESERVING APPARATUS AT HAVRE.

A FEW weeks ago a throng of people gathered on the grand quay of Havre, whence the steamer Courrier was about to sail on an excursion. The municipal authorities, and a considerable number of literary and scientific men of note, were present by invitation. At two o'clock the wheels of the Courrier moved to the sound of music, and in half an hour the steamer was in the middle of the harbor, nine miles from land. In less than three minutes Mr. Stoner and his companion were dressed in their life-preserving costume, and leaped into the waves, furnished with a case of provisions.

They were soon almost out of sight, for the motion of the boat had not been slackened. The excited passengers kept their eyes fixed on the black spot that was dancing up and down on the waves, and waited anxiously for the boat which had put off to approach the swimmers. They were soon discovered taking a comfortable meal on the top of the waves from the covered buoy which served as their cupboard.

About an hour of this exercise served to give a sufficient idea of the efficacy of the apparatus. After their repast the gentlemen took paper and tobacco from the inexhaustible cupboard, and manufactured cigarettes, which they smoked at their ease, while the waiters on the Courrier with an already step offered refreshments to the ladies, and the popping of Champagne corks enlivened the scene. A vexatious rain, preceded by gusts of wind, hastened the return of the party.

A few words concerning Mr. STONER's invention. A large cork belt, properly adjusted in a flexible manner, and covered by a garment of India rubber cloth in one piece, constitutes the whole costume. This garment clings of itself to the wrists, and with the aid of a hood and a few buckles is confined round the figure so as to leave the neck free.

Two leaden weights buckled on the feet serve to fix the centre of gravity low enough to keep the balance easily. Two canvas nageoires are adjusted so as to aid in moving and in guiding the course. By the side of the swimmer floats a buoy full of provisions, from which he can obtain fresh water by the aid of a small rubber tube. An upper compartment holds food enough to last a man several days.

Mr. STONER made another excursion on the 30th of August, accompanied by Messrs. CRADDOCK and EDWARD VANZANDT, and Mrs. CRADDOCK, who had consented herself to try the life-preserving apparatus. The spectacle this time was different: the Courrier left the dock at half past eight in the evening, and when the experiment commenced a strong wind raised the waves in an imposing height; the sun had long since disappeared, and the moon, at times covered by thick clouds, only lighted the scene at intervals. The spectators were filled with anxiety; for they had completely lost sight of these pioneers of progress, and were ignorant of their fates.

Luminous rockets soon revealed the whereabouts of the four swimmers. These are signals of distress, designed to attract the attention of vessels to shipwrecked persons who need their aid. Bengal lights were also displayed with excellent effect.

After so conclusive an experiment it may be affirmed that Mr. STONER has rendered an important service to navigation and to humanity by greatly lessening the risks of life on the water.

After admirably enacting a rescue from shipwreck the experimenters were taken on board amidst the frenzied applause of the spectators, when their clothing was found to have remained perfectly dry.

The inventor, who is a native of New York, was received at the wharf with new huzzas mingled with the strains of the bands of music.

JEROME BAILEY'S RESTITUTION.

We read of people "who have a scale of your whole nervous system, and can play all the gamut of your sensibilities in semitones—touching the naked nerve pulps of a pianist strikes the keys of his instrument." We read that "there are as great masters in this nerve-playing as Vieuxtemps or Thalberg in their lines of performance.

Agnes Macauley, up in her little room—it was a rear room, and in the third story—bathed her eyes, and bathed her forehead, and picking up a piece of sewing, took a few stitches, biting her lips, and winking her forehead, and winking hard to keep the tears back. It was no use. Her fingers were unsteady, her head was aching, and the tears were tears trickling like rain down her cheeks. She tossed the sewing into a basket, and commenced walking the floor in a nervous, highly excited manner. Agnes Macauley had not one of these rare performers that morning, but her nerves were all vibrating yet to his skillful touch.

Agnes Macauley was a music-teacher; not a young girl with a slight knowledge of music, who made attempt to teach the rudiments, but a woman who might have made a noise in the world with her musical abilities, according to the opinion of her friends and the critiques who had listened to her singing and playing.

She had taken her stand at Mrs. John Vincent's grand piano that morning, a patient, modestly contented woman. She had kept time for three of Mrs. John Vincent's daughters with remarkable accuracy, and was busy beating for the fourth, when the door-bell rang with a clear, sharp, and decisive ring that sounded all through the house.

"Woman never ring like that," remarked the sister of Mrs. John Vincent's daughters, almost in a whisper.

"I'm sure I hope not," said Agnes Macauley composedly, and counted: "One, two, three, four; one, two, three, four; one, two, three, four; one, two, three—oh!"

At that sudden exclamation the child who was taking her music lesson paused with her fingers on the piano-keys, and asked:

"What's the matter, Miss Macauley? Did I strike a wrong key?"

Agnes Macauley did not answer. There was a strong key struck elsewhere than on the piano, and she was looking straight at the visitor in Mrs. John Vincent's parlor door. It was a gentleman, who came directly forward with a smile that wreathed his whole face. Agnes Macauley thought involuntarily of Carker in "Dombey and Son." Carker with his broad smile and gleaming teeth.

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Miss Macauley," was the greeting from between the shining rows of teeth.

MONUMENTAL STATUE OF COMMODORE PERRY AT NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.
J. Q. A. WARD, SCULPTOR.—PHOT. BY ROCKWOOD, NEW YORK.—(SEE PAGE 662.)

If he had been Vieuxtemps or Thalberg he could not have felt more exquisite delight at sight of a grand instrument with magnificent compass and delicacy of tone.

Agnes Macauley shivered. It was the premonitory sign of the delicacy of her organization; and then, with a command of herself that showed her power of will, she said, coolly: "How do you do, Mr. Bailey?"

"I never was better," answered the gentleman. "My voyage has quite cured me of that old affection of the heart, or lungs, or liver that used to trouble me, and I flatter myself I am a perfect picture of health. I see music has its old charm for you."

Agnes Macauley made brief denial. "No," she answered; "music ceases to be charming when it is analyzed into one, two, three, four for the better drilling of pupils."

"I see you are devoted to the piano still, in spite of your indifference," the gentleman continued, as if his first touch had failed to strike the real responsive chord.

"Yes," Agnes Macauley answered, in a proud, defiant way. "I am devoted to the piano as washer-women to their tubs, and seamstresses to their needles. They are the tools wherewith we earn our daily bread."

The man had struck the right chord now. Jerome Bailey had made Agnes Macauley confess to him that she was a music-teacher. She glanced nervously toward the door. Why did not the Vincent ladies come?

Jerome Bailey shifted his touch, like a musician testing the compass of an instrument. "I suppose I will find your mother and sisters at the old place?" he remarked.

"The old place has passed into strangers' hands. My mother and sisters have gone West," Agnes Macauley answered, in a voice that suggested a moan down deep in the springs of her life.

"Ah!" Jerome Bailey exclaimed, as if he were hearing the news for the first time. Agnes Macauley knew better. John Vincent's sister Grace had told her only that morning of her meeting Jerome Bailey the night before at Mary Elliott's soirée, and the surprise he had expressed at learning the reduced circumstances of the Macauleys. Why did not the Vincents come? She began to pick at the edge of the crimson sash thrown carelessly around her shoulders to protect her from the chill of Mrs. John Vincent's grand parlors.

Jerome Bailey smiled at the movement. If he had been Vieuxtemps or Thalberg he had not smiled more at the vibration of the keys after his fingers had left them. "I would know that restless motion of your hands in Kamschatka," he said. "It was the only nervous trick you ever had. Are you quite well, Miss Macauley? Late hours used to bring the look in your face that it wears this morning."

"I am quite well. I was up late last night," Agnes replied, glad of an excuse for her jaded looks.

"I suppose you had a pleasant evening?" Jerome Bailey continued, scanning her face attentively.

It turned crimson at his scrutiny, and Agnes answered in a tone that was muffled and unwilling, "Moderately."

"Was the company large?" Jerome Bailey inquired.

"Only myself and another," Agnes Macauley answered, in a defiant way that was like the sharping of the previous note.

"I beg your pardon," Jerome Bailey apologized. "I met the Vincents and Lloyds at Miss Elliott's, and understood that the rest of our clique was at the Millers'. I mentally congratulated the Millers on your probable presence, and pitied the Elliotts for your absence. It was like you to decline both favors, because you must disappoint one or the other."

"You are mistaken," Agnes Macauley answered. "I declined no favors from either party. Neither Miss Elliott nor the Misses Miller include music-teachers in their lists of friends."

"Oh!" Jerome Bailey exclaimed, as if the truth just began to dawn upon him. "Music-teachers—perhaps—ordinarily—but you can never be any thing but Miss Macauley."

Agnes Macauley made no response. The artist, skilful though he was, had struck a key that made no audible vibration.

"Miss Elliott had a brother," Jerome Bailey suggested in a careless, off-hand way, as if he did not know that he had struck the master-key to which Agnes Macauley's life had once been attuned.

"Yes," Agnes replied, in that low, minor key of suffering that indicates suppressed feeling.

"I saw him at Naples. He was with Miss Stuart, affianced then, and to be married soon," Jerome Bailey remarked, in the affected carelessness of manner that artists sometimes assume when they know that they are striking master chords capable of producing great effects.

Agnes Macauley's eyes turned toward the door. Their look was helpless and hopeless. Would the Vincents never come and free her from this man's torture?

There was a sound of heavy silk crushing at every tread, the faintest imaginable tinkle of golden bells in a lady's ears, and Grace Vincent entered. Jerome Bailey arose with a great show of cordiality to greet her, and Agnes Macauley escaped out of the door to the little third story, rear room.

"WHAT'S THE MATTER, MISS MACAULEY? DID I STRIKE A WRONG KEY?"

"Miss Elliott had a brother!" That was the key vibrating still that wrung the notes of torture from Agnes Macauley, walking the floor, biting her lips, and stilling her sobs. Miss Elliott, a star in the fashionable world, had become almost a nonentity to Agnes Macauley. It had been somewhat strange at first to receive cold bows and formal greetings from her old neighbor and reputed intimate when the Macauley bankruptcy began to be hinted about. It had been a little hard to note how the cool bows fell like a mercury drop to zero, and the temperature about herself like an iceberg between herself and Miss Elliott as the Macauley bankruptcy developed itself. It had been something of a shock to Agnes Macauley's pride to find herself cut off from Miss Elliott's list of friends, and realize that she was actually "snubbed" when the Macauley bankruptcy became a fact beyond all question. But Miss Elliott had never been any thing to Agnes Macauley but old Mr. Elliott's daughter, and young Mr. Elliott's sister; a girl with whom it was convenient to laugh and talk, because of proximity of residence; a girl with whom it was pleasant to study fashion-plates, because she entered into the subject with such whole-hearted interest; a girl it was easy to regard interestedly to-day and forget to-morrow, because she had not sufficient depth of character to touch one's heart or become in the least necessary in one's life.

But Miss Elliott's brother was quite another person. He had been more to Agnes Macauley than old Mrs. Elliott's son or young Miss Elliott's brother. He had been a man with whom it was pleasant to talk and laugh, but between and convenient proximity of residence, but because he talked so well and laughed with such an honest and thorough appreciation of humor and good-natured fun. He had been a man with whom it was profitable to discuss important questions of life and character, because his views were clear and his judgments correct. He had been a man it was natural for women to regard interestedly to-day and remember with interest to-morrow, because he had depth of character to touch a woman's heart and become necessary in a woman's life. He was in Europe at the time of the Macauley bankruptcy. He went away "as good as engaged" to Agnes Macauley," her body said. And he made no bones of showing his preference," the people affirmed. And hadn't Agnes Macauley given Jeremy Bailey a cry body the cold shoulder for Tom Elliott?" But old Mr. Macauley's death and insolvency put quite another face on the matter. If the Elliotts weren't people to marry any body, the public said; and Agnes Macauley wasn't any better than any body else since she had lost her fortune and taken to music teaching. She wasn't even as genteel as her sisters who had gone to creatives West; they had got in the way of women like Agnes Macauley to do something outlandish when they had a reverse of fortune. It was no wonder she didn't put on as much aw ensing and make herself a sort of upper servant in somebody's house. It would be just like her. And then the public wondered if she had heard from Tom Elliott lately, or whether she had released him. It was just like a woman of Agnes Macauley's stamp to cast about for one to whom she was engaged, though, to be sure, if Tom wasn't an Elliott, he was one to go through fire and water for the woman he loved; but there never was an Elliott that wasn't fond of money, and hadn't an eye to the main chance.

The public was right in one thing. It was like a woman of Agnes Macauley's stamp to release her lover, and a letter to Tom Elliott after a settlement of her father's affairs, made the man as free as if he had never spoken of love and marriage. Thus Agnes Macauley thought, together some music scholars and went to work, waiving nervously for Tom Elliott's answer. It must have been she shared the public belief that Tom Elliott was a man to go through fire and water for the woman of his love; and she did not see a letter as the public like to see it that Elliott made him avaricious; for she certainly entertained a hope—I think it was a faith—that Tom would not accept the release. It is curious to realize what a wide difference there was between Agnes Macauley, heiress, and Agnes Macauley, music-teacher, when many a month rolled by and not a word came from Tom Elliott. She had known the man who was standing in Agnes Macauley, independent of her family and fortune, that Tom Elliott had loved. Most men assume the position whom they are willing to be the fact, and Agnes Macauley believed Tom Elliott. It was the bitterest drop in the proud woman's cup of disappointment that, when the lover whom she trusted, Agnes Macauley had no intrinsic value. She was like a cipher, dependent on the figures for all her worth. It was very slow in accepting the humiliation, for her faith in Tom Elliott was great; but when Grace Vincent told her that Miss Elliott was showering every body on her sacred word and honor that the affair with her brother and Miss Macauley was all off, and that he was with the Stuarts almost the next door to being engaged to Bessie Stuart, she bowed meekly to her fate, and accepted the nothingness of her position. She finally thought she had begun to be quite indifferent to her old life and dream of love, when her encounter with Jeremy Bailey, a man who comprehended every body's weak points and made the most of them, showed her that her wounds were not healed, they were only hidden. To think that a reference to Miss Elliott's brother should stir her so, and to the one eve of marriage with Bessie Stuart; no wonder he did not write! She ceased her walk, and bathing her eyes, again sat down by the window to her sewing, this time without a quiver of her lip or a wrinkle of her brow.

Woman's pride had stayed one and smoothed out the other.

Agnes Macauley, at Mrs. Vincent's lunch-table, was a very calm woman; "a little pale," Mrs. Vincent remarked; "and absent-minded," Jerome Bailey added, smiling across the table.

"Dangerously pretty," commented Dick Vincent in a whisper to his cousin Grace, with malice aforethought in the speech.

Grace Vincent, with a toss of her head that set the golden bells to tinkling, erased her eyes and exclaimed, "How beautiful!"

Her eyes were on a bouquet of flowers that a servant bore into the room. She sprang forward and buried her beautiful face in the fragrant blossoms. "Who sent them?" she asked.

"Yes, who sent them?" echoed Mrs. John Vincent, with eager curiosity.

"Who sent them?" repeated Dick. "The girl is right curious; why don't you ask?"

The servant made a motion to pass Grace Vincent. "They are for Miss Macauley," she said, complacently.

She was a bright-eyed, intelligent girl; and she gave her information with the satisfaction of a jester who is telling a good story.

Grace Vincent drew away as if she might have inhaled poison in the flowers' perfume.

"Are you sure there is no mistake?" inquired Mrs. John Vincent.

"Whew!" whistled Dick, under his breath.

"With the compliments of Tom Elliott," said the servant, giving the bouquet into Agnes Macauley's hands.

She looked down meekly, as became one of Mrs. John Vincent's servants; but there was the keen satisfaction in her tone of the jester elected by the good story to be quoted with unexpected joke.

Grace Vincent's lip curled. "The manners of that servant are extremely disagreeable," she remarked to Mrs. John Vincent. "She has lived in the family quite long?"

"She is enough, I am sure," answered Mrs. John Vincent. "And the most valuable servant in the house."

"Paul Bryce was under some business obligation to your father, I believe," Jerome Bailey remarked to Agnes Macauley.

"It is possible," Agnes replied, haughtily. The man would extract the very sweetness from her flowers if he could.

Dick Vincent whispered to Grace, "I always said Miss Agnes was a trump, but you wouldn't believe it. You never will, unless tricks now. I tell you she has the power."

"Do be still," rejoined Grace Vincent. "You are so disagreeable, Dick. What is a fuss about a few paltry flowers! Gracious! They'll all be withered to-morrow. I'm sure I don't care if Miss Bryce chooses to send the old debt to Miss Macauley's father by sending her bouquets. In my opinion five-dollar bills would be more tangible and better appreciated. Gracious! how think, Miss Macauley sold me these golden bells I wear in my ears. Didn't you ever notice how their tinkle makes one think? I can make her face grow sad in an instant with a shake of my head. She is smiling over Mr. Bryce's flowers now!"

Grace Vincent gave her head a toss that shook the golden bells, but they failed in producing the desired effect. Agnes Macauley was absorbed with her flowers and did not hear.

Jerome Bailey did, however, and quoted from Poe's "Bells:"

"Hear the mellow wedding bells,
Golden bells!
What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!"

The slow, measured, recitative tone arrested Agnes Macauley's attention and sent the hot blood to her cheeks. Jerome Bailey recognized the bells she had once worn, in Grace Vincent's ears.

Jerome Bailey went on, looking at one woman and talking at another: "They are yours, Miss Vincent, according to the eternal fitness of things. What more appropriate jewels than bells for a jewel of a belle?"

John Vincent, something of a champion of Agnes Macauley's, and fond of the jingle-jangle of the bells, remarked: "According to the eternal fitness of things they are Miss Macauley's. Compliments and bouquets are the rule rhyming and chiming of golden and wedding bells."

"And last night's visitor also," added Jerome Bailey.

There was a crash at Dick Vincent's end of the table, and a water-pitcher was overturned, promptly enough, caused a confusion, and gave Agnes Macauley an opportunity to excuse herself.

"Such an awkward piece of work!" Grace Vincent exclaimed, holding up her wet dress and casting angry glances at her offending cousin Dick. "Upon my word I think such awkwardness is inexcusable."

Dick Vincent looked at the vacant seat where a woman had sat a few minutes before with tears in her eyes, and smiled. "The end justifies the means," he said to himself, and that woman was galled almost beyond endurance. I hope she'll get Bryce, and queen it over these abominable women."

It was a year after that Jerome Bailey entered Mrs. John Vincent's grand parlors and made his way through a crowd of elegantly-attired men and women to the lady who sang at the piano. When the song was concluded, he greeted her cordially. "This is an unexpected pleasure," he said, with the old Vieuxtemps or Thalberg delight at sight of a grand instrument.

"How do you do, Mr. Bailey?" responded the lady. "The way was Agnes Macauley's own.

"Every trip improved my health," Jerome Bailey answered. "I am better than I was a year ago. Your presence in these parlors reminds me that I made a mistake a year ago. I said then you could never be any thing but Miss Macauley. I hear that you are Mrs. Bryce. Accept my congratulations."

The lady bowed her thanks haughtily, as if she would be rid of her companion.

"Where are you living?" Jerome Bailey inquired.

Agnes gave her address with a smile. It was her old home.

"My mother lives with me. My sisters are present," Agnes replied, smiling still, for Jerome Bailey had touched the chord that made some of the sweetest music in her present life.

"You are looking well," he said, surveying her animated face.

"I am well," she answered. "And happy."

Jerome Bailey ran his eye over the woman's face. It was expressive of Thalberg, conscious of their power.

"I see a number of our old friends," he remarked, glancing around the room. "The Millers and Lloyds are here in all their ancient glory. How well Miss Elliott preserves her youthful mien!"

"Yes," Agnes answered, thinking with what intent Jerome Bailey had spoken that name. She could have sworn it had been in his mind since he entered. Only policy dictated that the allusion should come from him.

"AH!" Agnes replied, indifferently. Tom Elliott's memory had ceased to haunt her ere she gave Paul Bryce his answer. She had believed him noble. She found him false. He shall vex my soul no more, she said.

"There was a false rumor about Tom Elliott's engagement to Miss Stuart," Jerome Bailey said, with his eyes fixed on Agnes's face. "He tells me he never thought of marrying her. He tells me, moreover, he shall never marry; he has lost his faith in women."

Skilful Jerome Bailey! There was a crashing sweep of memories and remorse in a woman's soul; a strange, faint sickness at a woman's heart; a sudden pallor in a woman's face; a helpless sense of a woman's power; a rustle of silks, a flutter of fans, and a call for water. Mrs. Bryce had fainted.

Tom Elliott, a bachelor, with threads of silver all through his hair and heavy lines of care upon his brow, took a seat in the office of the editor of the Sentinel, and drawing a guide-book from his pocket followed a course of travel eastward.

An earlier visitor, at a little distance, watched him. He was an American and an invalid, giving way ever and anon to a fit of coughing, as he looked over an American paper in his hand. Folding up the paper at length, he crossed over to Tom Elliott and called him by name.

Tom Elliott looked up for a moment with a puzzled look, and asked, doubtfully: "Is it Jerome Bailey?"

The invalid bowed and seated himself, racked with a hollow cough.

"I am sorry to see you so ill," Tom Elliott said, kindly.

"Yes, I am ill. I haven't long to stay here," Jerome Bailey replied, sadly. "Where are you going?" he asked, suddenly changing the subject.

"I am meditating a trip to the East," Tom Elliott answered. "I have been studying the route."

"You are like myself, a wanderer on the face of the earth," Jerome Bailey remarked. "You have kept your word. You said you would never marry."

A shadow passed over Tom Elliott's face.

"I shall never marry," he said. "Women love too lightly and forget too easily.

"There was Agnes Macauley—" Jerome Bailey began.

Tom Elliott interrupted him.

"We never seem able to talk of her. She is no thing to me," he said.

Jerome Bailey smiled incredulously as he answered:

"Galileo, before his judges, swore that the earth stood still; but in his heart he said, 'I move!' I say, Agnes!"

Tom Elliott shook his head.

"I left Agnes Macauley, strong in my faith in her. I return to find that Paul Bryce's wife."

Jerome Bailey bent forward and spoke eagerly.

"She was poor and persecuted. I saw her poverty and I saw the persecution. In spite of all her poverty, Paul Bryce had never won her if she had not believed you false and affianced to another. I myself picked up the floating gossip and told it for the truth. It is easy for letters to go astray. It is easy for gossip to mar a life." He was again in the violent fit of coughing that left him pale and exhausted.

"What avails this story?" asked Tom Elliott, after a pause, with a motion to another's now."

Jerome Bailey opened the paper and pointed to a paragraph announcing the death of Paul Bryce at sea, and months before. "They were on their way to Naples for his health," he explained. "Agnes was with him, and now—"

He paused and looked up. A change had come over Tom Elliott's face, and there was buoyant eagerness in his tone as he repeated:

"And now—"

Jerome Bailey smiled.

"The earth does move, and Agnes Macauley was never quite dead to you," he said. "Now she is in Paris, homeward bound. I saw her yesterday—saw her turn her head away as if she did not see me. I thought then how she would shrink away from my dead corpse. Here is her address. When you and she are happy, tell her I guided you to her at last, and ask her not to hate me in my grave."

A few days of—a dying man turned his eager gaze toward the opening door, where a man and woman, one in their prime, entered. The woman advanced to the bedside and laid her hand upon the dying man's brow, ministering to his wants with gentlest kindness. A smile flitted over the face whose light was fast fading away. With his little remaining strength he placed the woman's hand within the man's, and clasped them tight. "Tom and Agnes, I wish you all good!" he said, with his dying breath. And thus Jerome Bailey made restitution.

MONUMENTAL STATUE OF COMMODORE PERRY.

ONE of the finest specimens of statuary ever produced by a sculptor is the monumental statue of Commodore MATTHEW CALBRAITH PERRY, recently completed by the artist CROPPER, Rhode Island, by AUGUST BELMONT, of this city. This grand and impressive work of art, of which we give an illustration on this page, was executed and produced by our celebrated sculptor J. H. WARD, of whose former works we have given occasional illustrations in this journal.

This statue was formally unveiled in Touro Park, Newport, on the 1st of October. The local military officers, and the crews of the United States frigate Saratoga and the revenue cutter Crawford, formed a part of the procession. The statue was received on the spot by Governor Padelford, and an address was afterward delivered by the Rev. Dr. FRANCIS VINTON, of New York.

Commodore PERRY was born in South Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1795, and was a brother of UNITED STATES PERRY, of Lake Erie renown. When only five years of age he entered the United States frigate Saratoga and the revenue cutter Crawford, formed a part of the procession. The statue was received on the spot by Governor Padelford, and an address was afterward delivered by the Rev. Dr. FRANCIS VINTON, of New York.

Commodore PERRY was born in South Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1795, and was a brother of UNITED STATES PERRY, of Lake Erie renown. When only five years of age he entered the United States navy as a midshipman, and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in 1813. In this grade he did good service, particularly upon the coast of Africa and in the protection of commerce against pirates, in the West Indies. In 1826 he was commander, and eleven years later a captain. His service was chiefly on foreign stations; but his name extended largely in the organization of our steam navy. In 1838 he was ordered to Europe on special service in connection with dock-yards and steam-engine construction. He succeeded DAVID CONNER in command of the Mexican Gulf squadron, and during the Mexican war secured the reduction of the entire gulf coast of the enemy.

The service for which Commodore PERRY is most widely known, however, is that performed by him as Commander of the Japan Expedition. Appointed to this command in 1852 he succeeded in negotiating a treaty which opened the way to commerce between Japan and other nations. This treaty secured for him a world wide reputation. He returned home in 1856, and died March 4, 1858, while engaged in special duty growing out of his successful expedition. The monument which has been erected to his memory does justice to him while it reflects honor both upon the donor and the artist.

PRECIOUS JEWELS.

THE RUBY.

We generally speak of the diamond as the most valuable of gems, but this is not always the case. The ruby is the most valuable, but it depends for its rarity upon its color. The ruby is the next hardest thing of any to the diamond. It is found principally in the East. Siam, and Ava, and Ceylon afford the most plentiful supplies. In Burmah the finding of one of these jewels is made a state event; the grandees of the empire go out to meet it, with elephants and all the grandeur of Eastern state. There are many shades of red, but the hue most approved of, and commanding the highest price, is that of the "pigeon's blood." The ruby, in common with many other precious stones, had magical properties attributed to it by the ancients; indeed, we do not doubt that many of the most monstrous ideas connected with it are as rife as ever. Our ancestors believed that it was a preservative against evil thoughts, and that it was a dead thing of old—poison. It kept the wearer safe from all evil spirits, and, what was more to a sanitary point of view, it kept the body so that it was said never to suffer in his bodily health. Moreover, it was supposed to be endowed with certain occult qualities. It was also believed that the gem darkened when danger awaited a person, and grew bright again when the peril had passed away. The Indians, who are one of whose tastes is that of Lord of the Rubies, has one the size of a pigeon's egg. The value of these gems goes on increasing at a much higher ratio than that of the diamond. When its weight is as much as four carats, its value is estimated at a hundred to a hundred and fifty pounds, a ram more than double that of a diamond of the same weight.

THE DIAMOND.

The diamond, although only second in real value, is certainly the first in commercial estimation. It is one of the most commercial attractions, as it is the gem most deals in, and the one most constant in value. From the earliest ages of the world diamonds have been sought for by fugitive princes, as the passports which rendered acceptable in all countries. The diamond is mostly found in tropical countries, and especially in India. The composition of the diamond is pure carbon crystallized. Newton long ago came to the conclusion that it was combustible, an opinion entirely opposed to that of the ancients; but Lavoisier proved the English philosopher's notion to have been rightly founded, for he burned it in oxygen, and obtained as a result carbonic acid. Although science has thus managed to destroy it, science has never managed to construct it; if it had, its value would have at once departed.

THE EMERALD AND AMETHYST.

The Oriental emerald is an exceedingly rare jewel, and so is the Oriental amethyst. These, like the ruby and the sapphire, are varieties of the corundum, the Indian name by which they are known. The reader may not be so well acquainted with what is termed the cat's-eye jewel; it has the reputation of being a very lucky stone, and it is sold sometimes for very large prices in consequence of this supposed quality, for there is nothing very beautiful in its appearance to recommend it. The ancients, who had not arrived at the modern perfection in jewel-cutting, were in the habit of engraving their jewels, and Mr. King, in his volume on precious gems, has given us some very beautiful examples of this art.

The emerald is principally found in New Granada, but many are also found in Salzburg and Siberia, particularly in limestone rock. The gem is a great favorite with Mohammedans—chiefly, we suppose, from the color. The Orientals believe it possesses marvelous powers of a very diverse nature; for instance, it is considered capable of endowing the men with courage and the women with chastity: it is supposed to possess many medicinal qualities as well, but it is not necessary to mention them.

THE BERYL.

The beryl is composed of the same material as the emerald, with the exception of its coloring matter. This can scarcely be called a precious stone, as it is found in large quantities. We are told, indeed, that a mass weighing five tons was found in this country. It is used in Birmingham (England) under the name of aqua marina, in making cheap jewelry.

ROCK-CRYSTAL.

Rock-crystal is one of many valuable minerals which belong to the quartz system. It is very generally distributed over the globe in large crystals. Lumps of this mineral, often weighing many hundred weights, are found; and it is used rather in the manufacture of articles of virtu than of gems for the adornment of the person. We read with it in old goldsmith's work, and drinking cups and goblets are made out of it, which are often most delicately cut. Like some of the gems, it was supposed by the ancients to flush with color when poison was poured into cups made from it. Indeed, crystal in all ways has been supposed to possess magical properties. The Japanese and Chinese use it largely, and, among other purposes, as a refrigerator for cold hands. The cairngorm, onyx, carnelian, amethyst, sardonyx, agate, and chalcedony, all belong to the same quartz system as the rock-crystal.

THE OPAL.

The opal, the most delicate of gems, depends for its beauty very much upon the temperature: its rainbow-like tints—or rather, we should say, its iridescent flashes, like those on the breast of a pigeon—are always the most brilliant in warm weather; this fact should teach the wearer that it should be worn as a summer gem only. There are several kinds of opals, the most valuable being known as the noble opal; then there is a more dingy and evenly tinted red opal; and the Mexican opal, which loses much of its beauty upon being exposed to water. Thus it will be seen this jewel is very sensitive to atmospheric effects, and possibly this is the reason it has not been supposed to possess some supernatural gift. The opal is unique in one respect—it can not be imitated with any success. This jewel, when large, is very valuable; there is one in the museum at Vienna valued at thirty thousand pounds.

AN EPISODE IN ONE WOMAN'S LIFE.

THE year following the late civil war I spent in one of the most beautiful cities of the late rebellious States—in a city to which nature had contributed most lavishly. An unusual amount of ill health and lack of loyal society were the causes of my forming a warm and intimate acquaintance with the family of the presiding physician of the Government hospital in that city. As the location of the hospital and the grounds about were airy and pleasant, it was not unfit for me to spend one or two days out of each week in the Doctor's family.

The systematic, admirably arranged, and conducted duties attendant upon the hospital was owing chiefly to the efficient management of the hospital matron, but whose appearance and manners were any thing but attractive to casual or even studious observers. She was tall and gaunt in figure, with faded blue eyes, and her gray hair falling about her face when she stood still, but flying in various directions when she moved (such was the velocity of her pedestrianism), gave her a peculiarly wild and haggard appearance. She usually wore an old-fashioned straw-hat, tipped back on her head, in order to be ready for any emergency that might call her without. Usually a hat worn by a woman on the hearse-road side of fifty gives an impression of one trying to hide the snows of winter under the promise of a spring-time that bloomed years ago. But when the matron came bustling into the Doctor's room, with hair a-flying and voice pitched to the highest, hardest, and most piercing key, giving accounts of the unfaithfulness of sub-officials and employés about the various wards, no one had the disposition to insinuate that she had any desire to spe youthfulness or deceive one in regard to her similarity. She seemed an embodiment of endurance, and every wish and aim of her existence crystallized into the one hard word—business. Early and late she toiled, as if driven by some remorseless task-master, so it was really tiresome to think of her.

Being in the Doctor's room one day when she came in explosive with wrath and indignation, I remarked, after she went out:

"What a stranger, hard, unfeminine creature your matron is! I wonder she doesn't make you fairly nervous with her address and peculiarities.

"Oh, indeed!" he laughed; "that would ill befit me. I couldn't manage the hospital at all without her. She is fire, water, bread, and air to the whole concern. Her bark is worse than her bite; and with all her repellent ways she has the tender heart of a woman. I have seen her cry over many a poor fellow; but mind you, she never lets tears blind her from seeing when something was wanting, will better and him. More over, through her influence she obtains many valuable donations to the hospital." After a moment's pause, he added, "You know she belongs to one of the first families of Baltimore—the famous book publishers?"

"No," I answered. "I knew her name was Commss, but I never thought of associating her with those of Baltimore. But that being so, how came she in her present position? or how do you reconcile her ways and manners with the refining and ennobling influences that must have been her inheritance by birth and surrounded her early days at least?"

"Ah, as to that, she has a history. If you can get her to tell you that you will have the key to the whole. I learned it by the merest chance; but you, being a woman, may by some subtle womanly tact or sympathy to be enabled to get it honestly. But you may be sure that that woman has a heart, and a true, enlightening his words as if I doubted the existence of any save the actual pound of flesh doing organic duty under her bodice.

That my curiosity was fully aroused it would not be wise to doubt. The more I thought about it the more eager I grew to know; and also the more delicate about asking her any direct questions. But I found out at last, and it happened in this wise:

Passing by her room one evening I found the door wide open, and looking in saw Miss Commss sitting in the twilight, with a look of weariness of silence and repose that I ventured to ask if she were ill.

"No," she said, slowly, "only thinking. Will you come in and sit down?"

Her voice was so changed from its wonted harsh and fretful tones, and there was such a gentle sadness that I sat down wonderingly, feeling that it was all an illusion, and she would presently relapse into her old manner. I looked at her face, and that too was softened and relaxed, and the dim faded eyes were aglow with a tenderness that I had never seen on them, and I began to wonder if she had not once indeed been quite beautiful. She sat looking out of the window, as if she were back in fields and gardens farther away than my eyes could see, rather than on the space of landscape that bounded the vision from her window. At that same time I also observed that she held a volume of poems in her hand, and in the opening of the leaves was a miniature copy of what looked like the face of a young man. I at once recognized the poems as being those of Philip Whitney, and knew that the poet must have had some connection with the poet, and said, by way of saying something:

"I see you get time for some reading, Miss Commss. Is Whitney your favorite poet?"

She did not answer me at once, but after a little said, softly: "Yes, he is my favorite poet indeed, to me there is no other. You would not dream that through all these hard, working years, in which I have grown old amidst suffering and care, and become harsh and apparently unfeeling, that in my heart bloom a garden of perpetual beauty and light and love that no circumstances of fate can disturb, and to whose fragrance and freshness I am never weary of turning." I rarely talk of it, but to-night it will do me good to talk it all over and dream about it. It may be equally difficult for you to believe that I was once called beautiful. My friends—you know of them, at least—are wealthy and aristocratic; and even as long ago as when I was young, girls were educated and accomplished, and I had every advantage that could be desired. I had suitors from the best and most influential families. But the only man I ever loved or cared for beyond common friendship was Philip Whitney. To him he was the embodiment of all manliness, tenderness, and gentleness. But he was penniless, and my father forbade my 'throwing myself away upon a poor, shiftless, lazy writer of rhymes.'

"Having been trained in the rigid Puritanic manner, I had no courage to violate my father's will, and to be a doorless wife to my penniless lover would only be like clipping the wings of my song-bird. But how I loved him—loved him not jealously or selfishly, for I would have given him my soul's salvation for inspiration to his song, or my body as a stepping-stone to his advancement. Any thing, every thing, for Philip's sake, was the one anthem and refrain of my whole being.

"But he was poor as he was proud, and sensitive as he was gifted. My father's rejection of his advances, and positive contemptuous treatment, united with my own determination not to burden him with myself, unless by marriage I could materially aid him, seemed to rouse pride, and he left me, bitterly saying the time would come when the name of Whitney would be a prouder one than even that of Commss had been, and the 'poor, shiftless writer of rhymes would win the name of Fool.'

"He went away, and I have never seen him since. The silence that came of his absence became insupportable. Fortune deserted my father's coffers, and he, dying soon after, left me free to work for my living or accept the proffered support of wealthy friends. I chose the former, and placed myself where the demands of duty and necessity would drown with their whir and activity the regret and sorrow that would otherwise have room to grow.

"Philip—that was the name I called him in those beautiful days—is a great poet now. I gathered in his poems as they appeared in papers and magazines, as so many pulsations of his heart that I could feel. I learned them, and count them over in my speech as a sun fingers the beads of her rosary. Every word and line and stanza have a meaning that none other sees as I do. I see the light of his eyes, the glow of his face, hear the sound of his voice, feel the clasp of his hands, as I saw, heard, and felt them in those beautiful days—oh, those beautiful days! He must have gray hairs now—not so gray as mine, I fancy—and he has wife, and children, and home, and fame, and friends, while I am poor, and lone, and old. Yet I would not give the memory of that short, brief splendor and passion of his love for me for all that the world giveth;" and burying her face in the printed poems she gave way to bitter weeping. It was no time for words, and, rising, I passed noiselessly from the room, leaving the faded and worn creature to dream of the love whose glow still animated her heart.

Since then I never hear the name of Whitney or his poems mentioned but there instantly arises the picture of that woman in whose heart is distilled the sweetness and beauty of every song the great poet has sung—the woman whose love is greater, more noble, more inexhaustible than the poems the world applauds—the woman, faithful even unto death.

ADVANTAGE OF BEING POOR.

A poor man never has any taxes to pay. He can sit down and laugh the assessors to scorn, and send off the big appropriations made by councils with a feeling of indescribable exhilaration.

A poor man can enjoy life. He lives in a rented house, and it matters very little to him how he use it abuses, and his equanimity need not be disturbed if it burns down.

A poor man can repose in the bosom of his family and know that there is no avaricious young man prowling around after any rich daughters.

Nobody wants his poor man to die; nobody is lying around in misery and impatience waiting for him to die, so as to absorb his funds.

Another thing—no poor man is ever worried by debts, for nobody will ever trust him, and when he does see a greenback he heartily enjoys it.

Is like the panier which we see
A lady wear with the Grecian bend?"
Says Jim, "The answer must plainly be,
As it is manufactured to bust her, my friend."

"Well, how did your wife manage her shower-bath, deacon?"

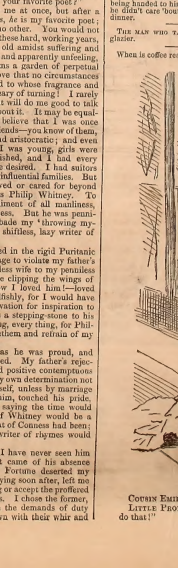
DEACON—"She had real good luck: Madam Mooney told her how she managed. She had a large oiled silk cap with a cape to it, like a fisherman's, that came all over her shoulders and head."

DOCTOR—"She's a fool for her pains. That's not the way."

DEACON—"So my wife thought."

DOCTOR—"Your wife did nothing of the kind, I know."

DEACON—"Oh no: she need an umbrilly."



HOW TO TURN OVER A NEW LEAF—Make cigars.

Said Dora to David, "You may say what you will, I maintain that if a man is disappointed in a marriage, it is his own fault. Doesn't he choose his own mate?" Said David, pensively, "That is very true, Fanny; he wouldn't do so if he knew his choice would be choke mate." Silence ensued.

Among the passengers in a stage-coach was a little gentleman who had possibly been somewhat overcome. The coach being quite full, he sat in the lap of another passenger. While on the way, something was said about pick-pockets, and soon the conversation became general on that interesting subject. The gentleman who was holding our young friend remarked:

"My dear fellow, how many I could pick your pockets?"

"Six, you couldn't," replied he, "I've been looking out for you all the time."

GRAND PROCESSION OF THE "BOYS IN BLUE" AT PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 7, 1868.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF A TRAPPER.—[SKETCHED BY W. M. CARY.]

THE CAPTIVES.

STANDING one day in the market
Of our little sea-port town,
A stranger sauntered past me—
A sailor, worn and brown.

Idly he gazed about him,
Seeming to say: "No face
That I know or love here greets me,
In this crowded marketplace!"

So, as he walked, I followed—
And meeting his upraised eye,
Dim with a look of sorrow,
My own was scarcely dry.

Just at the end of the market
A youthful merchant stood;
For his sweet smile and gentle manner
Captured in field and wood.

The stranger paused in his ramble,
While on the prisoned birds
He gazed with a silence,
Before his thoughts found words.

Then, "How much for your birds?" he questioned.
His gaze the owner told;
The man drew a purse from his bosom
And paid him in foreign gold.

Then turning back to the cages,
He opened the valley door,
And straightway each little captive
Flew out, as free as soar.

He watched their flight while, astonished,
Still nearer pressed the crowd,
And many a wondering comment
Was uttered in hushed mood.

But the stranger answered gently:
"Ah! precious is liberty!
I have lain three years in a prison;
I but made these prisoners free!"

MY GRANDMOTHER'S RING.

I SAW the garden-door, and went slowly down the winding path toward the lane. It was the day after the funeral, and the blinds in the house I had left were down yet, and the windows shut. I had looked so blank for the past week were open again, and people moved about briskly, and spoke no more in those awful whispers. Nay, once—only half an hour since—my ear had caught, from the distant kitchen regions, the ring of a light laugh. Out of doors the sun shone on the green leaves, the birds sang in the elms overhead, and the brooklet in the little hollow gurgled merrily over the stones. Yet, as I turned and sat down on the mossy step of the old sun-dial, and pressed my aching head against the cold stone pillar, I thought I had never looked upon so sad a scene. Even now, when a pang of sorrow strikes me, there flashes back, like the image of the long, low white house, the turf all wet and glittering after the shower, and I hear the dripping of the rain-drops from the trees, and the note of the lark as I heard it on that day, for it was my mother who was dead, and I was very lonely in the world—an only child motherless and sisterless. Presently I stood up, tied on my hat, and going wearily on to the white gate, leaned over it doubtingly. A week ago—only a week—she would have told me where to go, would have planned some errand for me; now, I must follow my own fancy, for my grave uncle within doors was deep in parchment deeds, and had no thought to spare for me. Instinctively my feet turned toward the village. I had trod that path often with a bag or basket on my arm, acting as her almoner, and the impulse came to me some of the faces that used to greet me so gladly, and to hear the blessings breathed upon her name. On I went, lingering for a moment at the turnpike, where the old gate-keeper shook her head sadly at sight of my black garments, and spoke her simple words of sympathy amidst her tears, and passed the children, where the children in the porch hushed their laughter as I went by. Just beyond the school play-ground there stood a low thatched cottage in little garden, and I turned in there, for an old man, sick and suffering, lived in that house, and I knew that suffering touched me closely just then. He was sitting by the fireside quite alone, and as I lifted the latch he turned his head, and a feeble light came into his dim eyes. "Ah, Miss Hester, I was thinking of you only a while ago. Will you be pleased to step in and sit down?"

He made some attempt to rise from his own wooden chair, but I stopped him hastily, and drawing a stool toward the fire, sat down by his side. "How is the rheumatism to-day, Philip?"

"Well, it's baddish, Miss—thank you kindly all the same. I had a hard night with it; but I mustn't grumble, for I've suffered little in my life, and I shall be eighty-two come Whitsuntide."

"Your daughter's out? I heard she had been ill."

"She's middling again now, Miss, and she's gone to do a day's washing up at Squire Lawson's."

"And left you all to yourself," said I, pitying.

"Poor Philip, how long the day must seem!"

"No," answered the old man, slowly; "the hours go pretty quick, Miss, at first, when I was laid by, it did seem long, and I was all agog to be up and doing; but now I sit here by the fire, and think of the days that are by-gone; and oftimes I'm taken aback when the setting sun comes shining in at the window yonder. But," he added, suddenly, "I didn't ought to be talking on of myself now, and never acting so much as a word about you and the dear mistress that's just gone. You'll miss her sorely, I'm thinking."

"Yes, indeed." But, somehow, my wound was too fresh for more than those two words; and reaching a book that I had lent him from the mantle-shelf, I said: "I can't talk much about her" and I began.

Perhaps my reading was monotonous, for my thoughts would not follow the printed words, but wandered far and wide. But as it might, when I raised my head at the end of half an hour the old man was nodding. I softly laid the book aside, and sat for a few minutes watching him, and admiring the fine old head, with its long silvery locks, and the strongly-marked wrinkled features softened by sleep, before I laid my hand upon his sleeve. He started, and opened his eyes, exclaiming: "I'm sure I ask your—" But the rest of the sentence died upon his lips, and he gazed with a sort of terror at my ungloved hand, still resting on his fustian jacket.

"What's—what's that you did it come from?" he faltered out in a thin, quavering voice.

I was startled too. I too stared at my hand.

"What is it, Philip?"

"The ring—that diamond ring with the big emerald in the middle."

There were several on my finger. Two that I had seen from my babyhood on the dear hand now lying in the coffin, and which, on the very morning that she died, she had given to me, bidding me wear them always, for her sake. The third—the emerald—I had rarely worn, but it had been her mother's, and once she had told me that a rule hung by it. Beneath the stones there was a tiny lock of hair, cut from her head when an infant; and for the sake of that fixture peril I had put it on among the others. "The diamond ring," I said, drawing it off. "Philip, do you know it?"

He held out his shaking hand, and I laid it in his palm.

"Do you know it?" I repeated, eagerly. "It was my grandmother's once."

Slowly he turned it over, examining it with a strange intent curiosity; then he gave it back to me. "Do I know it?" he said, now first seeming to hear my question. "Do I know not six years in it for more than sixty years; but on my deathbed I shall see that ring as plainly as I see it now."

"What can you mean?" I exclaimed, impatiently. "I don't understand."

Miss Hester, there was something solemn in his look and tone, "that ring had wellnigh been my ruin—ay, and my soul's ruin too, had yet 'God in his mercy not ordained it should across his face)—'and yet it was not my ruin, but my making; and if it hadn't been for that ring neither you nor your dear lady that's just gone would have seen the light."

I sat looking at him, listening to him, too much amazed to speak.

He noticed my bewildered, half-frightened glances. "Miss Hester, do you care to hear the old man's story? I've never told it even to my daughter; and I don't suppose there's one living in the place even to guess at it now. They kept it dark for my sake, I'm thinking, at the time. But I'm willing to tell it to you, for the sight of that ring has come upon my heart."

"Yes, tell me—pray, tell me," I said, impetuously.

He sat silent for a few minutes, with hands clasped upon his knees, gazing into the fire, then he turned his eyes on me and spoke slowly, as though recalling gradually the distant past.

"I was turned twenty, Miss, and was at home with my father and mother; not here in the village, but in an old house half a mile down the Hilbury Road. My father was a small farmer, but had brought me up to the trade, and he let me manage things pretty much my own way, though I was but a lad. I used to think in those days that so seldom crossed me was lest I should get a family for rounding, and my mother had fretted sorely when my brother Josiah listed in the army; and they had buried two children in Hilbury churchyard. And, moreover, it seemed as though they could never make enough of me. I was a likely young fellow, strong and hearty, a good hand at my work, and for dancing and merry-making with the best in the country-side could beat me. Ah, well, they were blithe days, when I stood last in hand at my wicket on the green, sitting by the fire at night with Margaret Leigh! I would not have changed places with a king then. We were to be married on day, Margaret and I, and many a time I made some way off, we were young and hopeful, and content to wait. But I don't know why I should trouble you with all this, for all my hopes and schemes—only I'm loth to go on to the dark time when the tide turned; for turn it did. First of all my mother fell ill, and many of her careful savings went to pay the doctor. All through one dreary winter she hardly left her bed; and when the spring came, and she was sitting by the door again with Margaret Leigh! I would not have changed places with a king then. We were to be married on day, Margaret and I, and many a time I made some way off, we were young and hopeful, and content to wait. But I don't know why I should trouble you with all this, for all my hopes and schemes—only I'm loth to go on to the dark time when the tide turned; for turn it did. First of all my mother fell ill, and many of her careful savings went to pay the doctor. All through one dreary winter she hardly left her bed; and when the spring came, and she was sitting by the door again, there came a run of ill-luck in our trade. One of our best men left us and took work under a cousin who had set up in a large way, and had drawn off many of our customers. Then we made a venture in a stock of wood that turned out badly; and, worst of all, my father was ill used and couldn't so much as lift a tool; and so we went down—down, till sometimes I used to wonder how long, if matters didn't mend, they could have food to eat or a roof to cover us. And Margaret, too—poor Margaret—her aunt died; and about the time when we used to think we might have married she went out to service many a long mile away.

"I was loitering along the green one evening, sore at heart enough by reason of my troubles, when one of the little lads playing cachepenny on the grass looked up from his game to say: 'Dost know, Phil Morris, that the mistress at the Hall is took very ill—like to die, they say?' 'Who told you that?' I growled out. I had grown very surly of late. 'Tis all a lie, I'll be bound.' That it ain't, then. Mother were up at the house this very afternoon, and they said as how the doctor had most given her up, and the squire were in a great taking. I heard no more, but fell rather all about it.' I sauntered on, thinking bitterly that here was another blow coming, for the lady at the Hall was kind to every one, and my mother was a favorite of hers. You see, I thought only of myself, not of the good-hearted squire, nor of the many who would miss her. Trouble had made me very selfish, and yet I little dreamed what that bit of news meant for me. Only a day and a night—we knew that she was really dead. I heard it in the early morning, as I was taking down the window-shutters; and that same evening I sat at my bench in the work-shop, one of the grooms from the Hall came riding up to the door. My father was standing there, and he came over the message to me. A coffin—did I say that we were undertakers as well as carpenters?—a coffin was to be put in hand at once, for the funeral would be in three days' time. It was very soon, as the man said; but they thought it better, for she had died very suddenly. 'Until to-day,' my father said, looking at his lame wrist. Now, he had mostly taken that sort of work; but of late, since his accident, it had come on more fallen upon me.

"The squire sent word to you, I answered, 'and your hand is pretty near well now.' Hadn't you best go yourself?' 'No, nay, my lad, 'said the old man; 'be sure the squire heeds little enough but now and a third period of sorrow that knocks in the nails, and my wrist is not good for much even now. I doubt it never will be again: you'd best go.' And go I did, and it was I who went up to the house to measure the lady—your grandmother, Miss Hester—for her coffin.

"On the day before the funeral I went for the third and last time with my work. As I went through the Hall the study-door was pushed partly open, and a little period of quiet. I caught a sight of the darkened room, and the squire sitting by the fire with his head resting on his hand, and his elbow upon the table, and the little lad, and the door was shut to again. I can remember, as though it were yesterday, the rosy little face peering up at me, and the soft, muffled sound of my own tread as I went up through the silent house to the room where the body lay. It was a large room, and the bed was in the centre—now in it, the great carved bedstead, the chairs, yes, and the windows too, were hung with white, and folds of white linen had been thrown over the tall mirrors. Every thing was white except where the coffin stood in the middle of the floor, and even there the purple pall and white cross had been scattered. There she lay, as I had placed her the day before—the lady who used to come smiling up to my bench, and who had never once in without a kindly word. Death had not changed her much, and her still face looked as though it had been cut in the purest marble. The housekeeper had come up, and stood watching while I softly swept aside the flower-blossoms that had fallen on the pall, and it was needful that I should move one of the hands which were crossed upon her breast, and, as I lifted it, I saw the ring that I wear now—the ring that my hand a diamond ring. It had been hidden till then, but I saw it now plainly enough—a splendid ring, with a large diamond among, and an emerald in the middle. I looked up in wonder at the housekeeper, and she nodded sadly. 'Yes, it is the ring the mistress's. The squire gave her that ring the day they were married, and she has worn it ever since. She always said that it was to have it buried with her when she died.' 'It was not on her hand yesterday, I observed. 'No; the squire brought it the last night, and put it on her finger his own self.' 'It is a beautiful ring;' and I bent down to look at it more closely. 'Yes; it's worth a mint of money, they've heard my lady say,' Mrs. Winter made answer. 'But I must go now. Shall you be long about it, Morris?' 'Not very long,' I said, 'for I've one of my boys with me. 'I will send Clare up to give you any help you may want,' she said, and went away.

"I was alone with the dead. I stooped down again for a third long stare at that ring. Then I moved a step or two back, and stood playing idly with the tassels of the pall, as I meant to have served my mates. I forgot where I was, and what I had to do. I forgot every thing till I heard a step coming along the passage, and the door behind me began to open, when Clare came in. It was done. The nails were screwed home, the sweet face was hidden under the coffin lid, and we walking fast across the park in the cool evening twilight. I began to whistle as I strode along, to wonder whether my mother would have any supper for me; but I was in the midst of my wonder my thoughts wandered off to something quite different, something I didn't want to think about then; so I looked up at the great oaks, and tried to guess at their years; but the next moment came the recollection that the noblest of those big trees, with its huge girth of trunk and its wide-spreading branches, was nothing compared to—nothing—to a certain bright stone which seemed to be still sparkling before my eyes. I had been rearranging things in the hall, and their would have been nigh as bad a name to me as murderer; but yet, somehow, I couldn't for the life of me resist the temptation. I thought of it buried in the ground, doing no one any good, and of what I might do, were it mine to sell, and of how much I might get for it, and how much longer to make both ends meet; my father shouldn't nigh as he was the loads of wood going past our door to the carpenter's at Hilbury; and Margaret—Margaret and I would be as happy as the day was long, married and settled in the dear old house. But how! That rubbish all this was when the ring would be in the squire's vault to-morrow night, and we were like to be on the parish before many months were over our heads! When I had come to this, I had come also to the stile leading into the fir-wood. I would not give myself time for any more such fancies; so I put my best foot forteenst, and soon was clear of the wood, and tramping along the raised path that led to my father's door.

"The old people were very low that night, for they felt the mistress's loss all the more for their own troubles. They say it was quite sudden, Phil, my father said, as he cut the cheese and passed my mug of beer. 'Mr. Stark, the butler, was down at the village this afternoon, and he said she had only been ill for three days, and no one thought of danger till an hour or two before she died. The squire would have never left her for some grand doctor, but just as the groom was starting she died, all in a minute as it were. 'She isn't much changed, is she, Phil?' my mother asked. I didn't half like talking about her, but I made shift to answer pretty quietly: 'No, not a bit. Except for her being so white and still, you'd scarcely know she was dead;' but I'm just fond of her, I think.' If I'm to bed,' and I left them together, and climbed up the steep staircase to my attic.

"I was tired enough, but I couldn't sleep. Even when I did doze off for a few minutes, it was only into a confused dream, in which I always saw that ring. Now I was digging for it madly in a huge heap of shavings; now I was in church with Margaret, and the parson would not read the marriage-service for me till I put the ring on her finger; and now I was buried, pressed down by the damp stifling earth, but holding it tight. I got up at last in the early morning, and pushing my window open, leaned out for a breath of air. I thought it was the close hot room that had oppressed me, and I threw on my clothes, and went down to the river for a bathe; but when I got there I didn't care to go into the water, and sat down instead upon the bank, steadying at the rushes for a good hour. I didn't fight against my fancies now. The temptation had come, body and soul. Ah, Miss Hester, I know then, as I do now, that it's the first thought which do the harm. If a man once lets himself go on thinking of a thing he ought to drive out of his mind at once he is lost. He can't get rid of this ugly notion afterward. When I walked away from the river I was a changed man, hardened and reckless. That day was not like other days. The busy little village looked dull enough, with the shop-windows closed, and the people, each with some bit of black about them, standing loitering at the street-corners, watching for the funeral procession. My father and mother went to the church-yard, but I had to be up at the Hall. It was a very quiet, simple business. When the old banker at Hilbury had been buried the year before there had been twice as many carriages and as many folk, but the squire had always hated fuss and show, and he was feeling heartsel now to think of any thing but his own grief. All his sister-in-law, and my lady's family, and one or two cousins, and these, with the doctor and the parson, and some of the old servants, made the whole party, except myself and the sailed boy who held his father's hand when they went down into the vault—that same vault, Miss Hester, in which your own mother was laid but yesterday. You know where it is in the churchyard, not a stone's-throw from the chancel window. It was all over by noon, and the funeral-cake had been let fall again, and when the crowd scattered there was scarcely a dry eye among them.

"We went home in pairs, and the mourners were taken down, and father and I sat down to our bench: but somehow, neither of us were in the mood for work. My father took to his pipe, though he liked to potter about among his tools, and watch all that went on. To-day he soon put them by, and we sat leaning over the half-door looking down the street, while I planed and hammered, or sat idly twirling the foot-rule between my fingers. Ah, lad, you're not much use to your heart for carpentering to-day,' my father said at last, as he turned his head and caught sight of my shavings types: but how there he came to need for work than ever there was, for we always knew where to look for help before, and I doubt the people will care much at the death of a Jew. 'Maybe not,' I made answer, and then I got up and walked straight away to the table. I didn't want to talk or be talked to, for my head seemed to feeling bad got hold of me, and I was half afraid of myself. So the day wore on, and the evening came, and my mother looked in at the door, shy, and bade me come to supper. When it was over father reached down his pipe from the mantelshelf. It was pretty much the same thing over again on the green in the twilight, and I saw that he was waiting for me, but I did not mean to go out that night; so I gave him a hint of a good kind of way, and said: 'I promised to get over to Kettlethorpe, to take the order for that linendraper's timber that he's going to have a back before dark.' 'Nay, nay, my lad,' father answered; 'you mustn't be asked, seriously.' I can't tell,' says I, and shut to the door, just hearing father's words: 'Let the lad alone, mother; he'll be all right.' Then I went, and jumped up stairs. I had something to do before I went out, and I wanted to do it quietly.

"So I went up there till I saw my father strolling, pipe in mouth, toward the green, and knew by the clattering plates that my mother was washing up in the back-kitchen, and then I crept softly down, and through the wood-yard to the workshop. Once in there, I turned the key and looked about me. Some tools were lying on the bench, and from these I chose two or three—a sharp screw-driver, a hammer, and a wedge. Then I went to a cupboard, and pushing back some boxes and parcels, came upon an old dark-lantern that had stood there untouched for perhaps a dozen years. I had to look in another closet for a bit of candle and some matches; but I had them all at last, tied up the tools and lantern in a scrap of matting, slipped the candle and matches in my pocket, unlocked the work-shop door, and then crossing it, went out with my bundle in my hand by a side-door at the opposite end, which led, not into the village street, but into a cart-track, hardly ever used, and then into a paddock, shut in by high hedges. There was no one in sight as I ran across the paddock, and so struck into the sandy lane—you know it well, Miss Hester—which runs along by the church-yard wall. In two minutes more I was over the wall, and skirting it inside. At the corner close by I knew there were some loose stones. I knelt down by these, pushed aside two or three, laid my parcel down between them, and piled the stones carefully up again, so that they hid it. Then I looked cautiously all round, to be sure that I was not seen, and vaulting over the low wall, slid down the steep green bank. Now I could breathe again, for I didn't care who met me. I went round by the sexton's house, which stood near the church-yard gate, but I did not go in there; I only looked well at it, and at the little outhouse hard by, as I passed, and then I was away over the moors to Kettlethorpe. I walked fast, not whistling, not thinking, only trying to get over the ground as quickly as I could. My business was soon done, but yet it was quite dark when I turned my face homeward—darker than usual, for the moon was young, and the driving clouds hid the stars. I heard the church clock strike ten as I crossed the last bit of level ground, and began to make my way down the slope toward the village.

"I wasn't in a hurry now, though the night-wind blew chill in my face, and made me shiver; I sat down on a tuft of damp grass, and watched till one by one the lights in the village beneath died out. When the last glimmer of candle-light was gone from the sexton's windows just below me I started up, and half ran, half scrambled down the hill-side. This time I stopped by the wicket-gate that led into the sexton's garden, lifted the latch silently, and stole across the grass, not to the cottage door, but to the little shed beyond, and stepping in, I felt cautiously with my hand along the wall. Yes; there stood the spade and pickaxe as I had seen them two hours ago. It was the pickaxe I wanted; and lifting it on to my shoulder, I crept back over the little grass-plot, and out into the lane. Dark as it was, I felt as if a hundred eyes were watching me then. Panting, and with shaking knees, I climbed up the bank and over the church-yard wall, and groped my way to the corner where I had left my tools. By the dim moonlight I could just see the white heap of stones, but it took me a long while to find my parcel. I had it at last, and with it in one hand and the pickaxe in the other, I struck across the church-yard to—to the vault. You know now what I meant to do: I was going to rob the dead.

"I stumbled twice over the low foot-stones, which I could not see. Once I fell, bruising my knee; but I got there at last. If I hadn't known the place so well I should hardly have been able to find it; but I had taken my bearings that morning, and I could just see the sharp point of the marble monument standing out against the gray sky. The stone I had to lift was not many inches off, and, stooping down, I felt for it upon the ground. I soon found the rough edge, more by my fingers than my eyes, and then I knew whereabouts to stick in my pickaxe. When I had done this the loose soil round so lately disturbed made my work easy enough, and though it cost me a tough strain, I had the stone up before you could count a hundred. I did not wait a moment. I was like one possessed as I went on hands and knees down the narrow slippery stone steps into the vault. I was scared enough, and though the perspiration was running down my face, I was all of a cold shiver. But yet I verily believe that if any body had come upon me then I should have killed them. There was just a glimmer of light thrown into the vault from the opening above, but not enough for me. It helped me, however, to push back the slide of my lantern, and stick in my bit of candle, and then I groped my way on to the furthest side of the vault, and struck a match. It fizzed, blazed up, and went out. With a muttered oath—it wasn't often that I swore, but I did then—I tried another, and this time it kept alight till the wick of the candle caught, and showed the vaulted roof and the dark row of coffins ranged round the stone floor. I did not want to look at them. I closed up the lantern, and putting it on the ground with its light side toward the one coffin I wanted, I went back to the steps to find out if there was any glimmer to be seen above. No. I was safe so far: no spark of light showed there. Now for my screw-driver. If only I could do the work silently enough! The first noise of my effort was startling, and I scarcely dared try another; but I remembered that the vault lay deep, and that there were no houses within a furlong of it. At any rate, I was in for it now, and I got used to the sound as I bent desperately to my task. The oaken lid had been tightly screwed, I knew, but that once open, the business was done—for the time had been too short to make a leaden coffin also. Screw after screw came out, and yet there were more. All at once I fancied I heard a sound above, and my heart stopped beating, and I stood still as the dead around me, grasping the hammer in my hand. It came again, and I knew it this time for the screech of the night-owl in the church-tower. If I could but have wrung its neck for the fright it had given me! To work again: more screws; and now the last was out, and I could move the heavy lid.

"I threw back the lace covering from the body, and the glimmer of the lantern fell on the dead face, as unchanged as on that first day when I had gone up to the Hall. I could not bear to look at it; I knew I should see it forever in my dreams if I did, and yet, somehow, I had noticed every thing: how the dark eyes seemed to give a blue shade to the eyelids closed over them; and how the long lashes lay on the white cheek, before I forced myself back to my work. Even then the still white face was before me, close to mine. I would have hidden it under the lace again, but then I must cover the hands as well. I thought of my own spotted handkerchief; but something—I don't know what—kept me from laying that there. Best get the ring off, and be away from the place. It was on the left hand, the one that lay underneath, and the clammy touch of the fingers made me shudder; but I held them fast, for I saw the diamond glittering in the dim light. I tried to draw it off; but slender as the finger was, the ring would not slide along it. It seemed fixed there as though no power on earth could move it. I wrenched at it with my own big trembling fingers, and got it as far as the first joint—but further it would not come. What should I do? Of a sudden I stooped down and took it firmly between my teeth. It was coming now! I felt it slip. It was off—in my mouth—in my hand. Just for one instant I saw it lying in my palm, and then—I saw something else. A goblin? No; but a stain of blood on the white slender hand, and a pair of brown eyes looking fixedly at me.

"I could not move; I could not breathe; I was like one turned to stone. Slowly the head lying in the coffin turned, and the pale lips moved, and the hand—the stained hand—where the ring had been, grasped feebly the edge of the coffin, and then—then the whole figure stirred, and tried to get up! I turned at that, and with a frightful cry dashed the ring to the floor, and fled, mad with terror, up the stone stairs. On, on! never stopping, never looking round; breathless, gasping, across the church-yard, over the wall, and now I had broken through the rotten park paling, and was tearing through the fern and long grass on toward the Hall. There was a light in the Hall window, and I made for it. I fancied I saw her gaining on me; I seemed to hear the rustling of the grave-clothes at my ear; but I struggled on—up the broad flight of steps, and rang the great bell as though I would have pulled it down. Before they opened the door I had fallen half unconscious on the stones; but I could just see some figures bending over me, and I could just pant out: 'The vault! my lady!' before I fainted dead away."

The old man paused for a moment, took a deep breath, and passed his wrinkled hand through his hair.

"That's my story, Miss Hester. When they got to the vault they found the lady sitting upright in her coffin—alive, though trembling, and sorely scared—and the diamond ring lay on the floor. The lady had been in some strange death-like fit, till my rough usage brought a flow of blood, and so revived her. When I came out of my long swoon it was the squire who stood alone by my bedside, and first heard my story. He forgave me then and there. For once an ill deed had brought about a good end, and he was too happy to be hard. But after that night of horror I would not have stolen a farthing's worth to save my life. No one but the squire and my own father ever heard the whole history from me, and they gave it out that there had been good reasons for opening the vault that night. But there were some shrewd guesses made when the wonderful news got abroad, and the squire contrived to send me away from home on some business of his own for a year or two. When I came back, it was the dear lady herself who set me going in my father's business, and helped me on to my marriage with Margaret. She had a baby girl then—your mother, Miss Hester—and she lived on for fifteen years." He stopped, took the ring again in his hand, and turned it over, sighing wearily. "'Tis sixty years back, and it seems but yesterday," he repeated as he gave it me. "An ill conscience is a fearful thing, Miss Hester."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A lady once remarked, in speaking of a distinguished living actor, "I know —— is a gentleman, for I have seen him eat." If, from an unseen point of view, one could survey our city restaurants between the hours of twelve and two on any day, or even inspect the more retired dining-rooms of our citizens at later hours, and apply the test of eating, what would be the result? Probably the lady referred to had in mind various niceties of manner which mark a person of culture and refinement nowhere more than at the table; but Americans possess one great and very universal fault, which is alike hurtful to indulge in, and unpleasant to behold. A great national evil is fast eating. Bolting down food as if upon a wager disorders the stomach; then comes dyspepsia, from which almost every evil results. That energetic briskness, which is a valuable quality in a business man, should be curbed at meal-time. If business presses, and the time for a luncheon is short, eat ever so little, or even nothing, rather than burden the system with hastily-swallowed, half-masticated food. When over-wearied and exhausted, a hearty and hasty meal is always dangerous, and sometimes fatal.

In addition to a quiet moderation in eating, a thousand little nameless niceties—the want of any one of which, however, is easily detected—indicate the well-bred eater. There are plenty of rules for "table manners;" but moderation, quietness, scrupulous neatness, and the exercise of ordinary good sense and good taste, form, in general, a very respectable basis for the conduct. Yet how often might we truthfully exclaim, with the poet:

> "Dire was the clang of plates, of knife and fork,
> That merciless fell, like tomahawks, to work."

At this season, when the markets are flooded with melons of every kind, it may not be inopportune to bear in mind that Frederick, Emperor of Germany, who died in 1403, and Emperor Maximilian II. of Germany, both came to an untimely death in consequence of indulging in an immoderate passion for melons! Yet melons are very good, and by no means unwholesome, when eaten at proper times and in suitable quantities.

New York has been alarmed, and apparently with some reason, in reference to the impregnation of the Croton water with carbonate of lead from the pipes through which it is conveyed. The matter is one of serious interest, and the attention of many physicians has been directed to it, and investigations of various kinds have been made. It is believed that many diseases, and fatal ones too, are becoming more frequent from the lead poison conveyed in the Croton water. An evening paper recently stated that, allowing each individual a single pint of Croton per day, New York swallows in the aggregate the enormous amount of not less than 12,500 grains of carbonate of lead per year. The tin-lined lead pipes are said to be perfectly innocuous. A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker, however, seems to think there are two sides to the question, and writes as follows: "Chemistry reveals the fact that metals differing in crystalline structure, when placed together in liquid acids, or even in common water, are by galvanic action rapidly oxydized, disintegrated, or destroyed. If lead and tin are placed in juxtaposition with access of water, one or both of the metals will suffer from corrosion. The least defect in soldering, or crack from bending, overstraining, defective manufacture, or corrosive action, whereby the water comes in contact with the lead, would cause electrical currents to commence to flow between the metals, disintegration would be the result with the metals, and lead poisoning to those using the water. The simple lead pipe, though dangerous, is safer than those lined with tin, for the above reasons."

An excited individual walked into an apothecary shop in Portland the other day and nervously asked for creosote. The shop-keeper had none. "Then," said he, "what have you got that will kill a man?" "Oh," said the apothecary, "do you want to kill yourself?" The man said he did, and wanted to make short work of it. "Then I have got just what you want," continued the jocose dealer in drugs; whereupon he filled the hair-oil bottle produced by the suicidal individual with a strong dose of tinture of cayenne pepper, telling him that if the first potion did not produce the desired effect to take another in fifteen minutes! The would-be suicide hastened away with a tragic air.

A most terrific nitro-glycerine explosion recently occurred on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad, near Urbana, Ohio. Ten cars were burned to ashes. They were loaded with flour and pork; but it is supposed that nitro-glycerine had been smuggled into the car next the engine, which exploded. The report was tremendous, having been heard thirty miles distant. An iron rail was thrown three hundred yards from the track and was bent double by the force. A house a quarter of a mile from the wreck was almost demolished, and the vibration came with such force that timbers flew in every direction, and telegraph wires were thrown down for about 600 yards. No one but the engineer was seriously hurt.

An electric light, which has been displayed for many nights from the French steamer, St. Laurent, at the foot of Morton Street, is said to be more powerful than any light of the kind ever before exhibited. The inventor is M. Berlioz, of Paris. It is stated that this light will penetrate the densest fog for the distance of two or more miles, while on dark nights, depending of course on its altitude, its rays can be seen from thirty to forty miles.

Professor Liebig, one of the most eminent chemists in the world, assures us that fourteen hundred and sixty quarts of the best Bavaria beer contained exactly the nourishment of a two-and-a-half pound loaf of bread and no more.

The inventor of Planchette is said to have cleared $50,000 out of his mysterious toy.

A Philadelphia paper speaks of "Mr. A. T. Stewart's new residence on Fifth Street." New Yorkers are better posted about its whereabouts. It is rumored that this elegant building, which is verging toward completion, is to be devoted to literary and public purposes. We give the rumor as it comes to us.

Those who are annoyed almost beyond endurance by peddlers of every kind, perpetually calling at their offices and places of business, will enjoy the following incident:

A pompous, well-dressed individual entered a bank in Boston, and, addressing the teller, inquired:

"Is the cashier in?"

"No, Sir," was the reply.

"Well, I am dealing in pens, supplying the New England banks pretty largely, and I suppose it will be proper for me to deal with the cashier."

"I suppose it will," said the teller.

"Very well; I will wait."

The pen-peddler took a chair and sat composedly for a full hour waiting for the cashier. By that time he began to grow uneasy, but after twisting in his chair for about twenty minutes, and seeing no prospect of a change in his circumstances, asked the teller how soon he would be in.

"Well, I don't know exactly," said the waggish teller, "but I expect him in about eight weeks. He has just gone to Lake Superior, and told me he thought he should come back in that time."

Peddler thought he would not wait.

"Oh, you may stay if you wish," said the teller, very blandly. "We have no objection to your sitting here in the daytime, and you can probably find some place in town where they will be glad to keep you nights."

The pompous peddler disappeared without another word.

According to recent reports, there are in Spain 27,000 primary schools, having in all 1,500,000 pupils; 64 establishments of secondary instruction; 10 universities, and 20 special schools for fine arts, navigation, industry, etc. There are about 150 private schools. The library at Madrid contains 300,000 volumes, and the Central University the same number. The University of Barcelona has 136,000 volumes.

About seven thousand acres of land in Middle Tennessee, situated on what is known as the Cumberland Plateau, have been donated to the Swiss Emigration Society by a public-spirited citizen of that locality. The Consul-General of Switzerland has inspected that section of Tennessee, and considers it peculiarly well adapted for the culture of fruits and vegetables. There are many Swiss who propose to emigrate to the United States.

The "Thames Embankment" must give a new aspect to some sections of London. From Westminster Bridge to Lambeth Palace on the right bank, and from Westminster Hall to Temple Bar on the left, an immense granite quay has been constructed, stated to be of thirty-nine acres superficies, 4 feet above the water, and 30 feet foundation below, and surrounded by a pavement 30 feet wide, beyond which is a macadamized central track 60 feet broad. A wall about the height of a man is the termination of this superb architecture, behind which the gardens adjoining the residences situated along the river are seen. The best arrangements are made for loading and unloading the heaviest cargoes; and floating bridges afford means of embarkation and debarkation. It would be a happy thing if some other cities would follow the example of London in this respect.

It is estimated that the quantity of ripe grapes consumed by the city of Paris this year will exceed ten thousand tons, exclusive of those cultivated within the city limits.

The Russians are becoming greatly excited by the preaching of an old Muscovite peasant who, after a seclusion of several years, now declares himself a prophet. He is going from place to place announcing the approaching destruction of the Crescent and the substitution of the Greek Cross for it, on the dome of St. Sophia at Constantinople. The Russian Government allows every liberty to this popular agitator, who does not attack the administration in any way.

There is an institution at Dusseldorf, Prussia, established by the celebrated Pastor Fliedner, for the training of deaconesses, who resemble in many respects the Catholic "Sisters of Charity." They wear a neat uniform, resembling the dress of Quaker ladies. They have been found specially useful as assistants to foreign missionaries. They perform Christian services of various descriptions, where male missionaries would obtain no access whatever. The chief objects of their care are the children, the women, and the sick.

The trunk of the poplar-tree is now used for making paper. The trees are sawed into blocks, split, the bark and knots removed, and then thoroughly soaked in pure water. A machine similar to a common grindstone is used to reduce the wood into pulp. When the pulp is pressed and all the water removed it is ready for use. Poplar-wood is by nature so pure and white that no chemicals or bleaches are required to make a fit material for manufacturing printing paper. Three parts of the wood pulp is usually mixed with one part rags, to give the paper strength and smoothness.

Many unaccustomed travelers, desiring to stop at some way station on their route, are seriously puzzled to know when they reach their place of destination. The cars stop every few moments, the conductor opens the door and shouts out some unintelligible name, but what it is few can tell, and many are perplexed and uneasy. A good plan has been adopted on the cars of the Ogdensburg and Lake Champlain Railroad. The apparatus consists externally of a box, surmounted by a bell, and having a glass plate in front, under which the name of a station appears in letters of about three inches in length. When the train arrives at the station named on the indicator, the bell on the top of the box rings, and presently the name of the next station on the line appears under the glass plate.

A young man fell in love, not many months ago, with the only daughter of an aristocratic family in Paris. He was uncertain how the head of the household would regard him, but he behaved his best, and kept the young lady supplied with the latest publications. One day the father, happening to return from business when the rest of the family were out, attempted to while away the time with the last new novel, which he found on the table. He was surprised to find a number of words underlined with a lead-pencil, "not beautiful passages," but insignificant words. Suddenly an idea occurred to him, and, connecting the underlined words, his petrified eyes read as follows: "Dearest Mademoiselle,—Will—it—insult—you—if—I—tell—you—that—I—adore:"—in short, a love-letter of the most gushing description, closing with the suggestive words: "Answer—in—the—next—chapter." The exasperated father took a pencil, underlined some words in the next chapter, wrapped the book in a piece of paper, and instructed his footman to take it back to the sentimental young gentleman. The latter opened the volume, his heart throbbing like a sledge-hammer, and read as follows: "If—you—impudent—puppy—dare—again—to—cross—the—threshold—of—my—house—I—shall—kick—you—out—of—the—window."

A young man living in St. Louis, being perplexed about the payment of a note, rose in his sleep, and went from the garret through a trap-door upon the roof of the house. Here he was discovered by his brother seated upon the furthest and narrow edge of the wall, with his hands clasped around one knee, en deshabille, and the whole attitude expressing dejection. The brother was a brave man, but the sight filled him with horror. The least start backward, the swerve even of half a hand's-breadth, and the somnambulist would be dashed to pieces upon the stones below. Knowing it would be instant death if he awoke him by calling to him, the brother procured a rope, made a noose in it, tied one end to the chimney, and then by a dextrous cast threw the rope tightly around his brother's shoulders, literally dragging him from his fearful perch before he became conscious.

WIND.

Wind! There is wind in the furrows,
Wind! There is wind in the sky;
No coign too low for its power,
No throne for its might too high!

It is here, through the sea-shells moaning,
It is there, in the vaulted blue;
Aloft, where the gold stars glimmer,
Below, where the ferns drop dew.

Whence it cometh none may discover,
Whence it goeth none may say;
It ariseth oft in the gloaming,
Dies out ere the roseate day.

Or it swells in the day in its fury,
A Titan, that mocketh sight;
And lo! in a mood capricious,
Is calm as the dove ere night.

Now it rendeth sails on the ocean,
With the wrath of the Power of Death
Now bends to the green corn-meadows,
And stirreth the ears with a breath.

Wind! I would die in the blowing
Of a cloud-flecked, soft moonlight;
Wind! I would die in the flowing
Of those grand cloud-waves at night!

I would leave this weary Being,
For the vast, unknown To Be;
I would see, with an angel's seeing,
The depths of that pathless sea!

O Giant! all-grim in fury,
O Angel! all-soft in love;
I would die, when thy reins are loosened
And mount on thy wings above!

ATTACK ON COLONEL FORSYTH'S COMMAND.

ON the 10th of September Colonel FORSYTH, with fifty picked men, left Fort Wallace, Kansas, in pursuit of some Indians who had been committing depredations in that neighborhood. He was attacked by between 300 and 400 Indians on the morning of the 17th. When the enemy first made his appearance on the bluff, about two miles from Colonel FORSYTH's camp, the latter crossed his men over to Small Island. The Indians advanced, and kept up a steady fire until 11 o'clock A.M. Then there was a lull until the middle of the afternoon, when the savages, reinforced to the number of about 700, renewed the attack with better success. They fought till sunset, and then made a desperate charge upon the camp, which they failed to capture. They continued their attack until nearly midnight, when two scouts managed to escape from the camp by crawling on their hands and knees through the enemy's lines. They brought information of Colonel FORSYTH's situation to Fort Wallace, from which post a hundred men were sent out with provisions to his relief. Colonel FORSYTH was wounded in the engagement; Lieutenant BEECHER and Dr. MOORE received mortal wounds. About twenty others were wounded more or less severely.

THE COUNTRY CHURCH.

THIS characteristic illustration (page 668) gives a picture somewhat familiar to our country friends —at least to those whose memory reaches back to the scenes of twenty years ago. The scene is laid in New Jersey, about fifteen miles distant from Hoboken. The people in the fore-ground are the descendants of old Dutch settlers, many of whom to this day speak the language of their ancestors. The church illustrates the style of architecture formerly adopted by the Dutch Reformed denomination; above the main entrance is an ornamental stone on which is inscribed a text from the Dutch Bible. The time selected by the artist is that just preceding the morning service on Sunday morning. It is a quaint and interesting picture of the good old times, when every Sabbath morning witnessed the "reunion" of Christian families for many miles around.

ENGAGEMENT OF COLONEL FORSYTH'S COMMAND WITH THE INDIANS AT SMALL ISLAND, SEPTEMBER 17, 1868.

DOCTORS M'COSH AND MACLEAN.

BY DR. M'COSH'S acceptance of the Presidency of Princeton College, in New Jersey, Great Britain has lost and America has gained one of the ripest and most profound thinkers of the age. His works on "The Divine Government" and on the "Intuitions of the Human Mind" are familiar to the Christian public in this country that we scarcely need to dwell upon his philosophical attainments. "I hold," said Sir PETER BAYNE, "that since the death of Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON his name has been first among British philosophers, and I cordially congratulate the American people upon obtaining him."

DR. M'COSH has no philosophy that conflicts with faith, or that can not be reduced to practice. He is known in the north of Ireland, where he has resided for the past sixteen years as a kind, enthusiast and public-spirited citizen, as well as a courteous gentleman and thorough Christian. His effort for the social improvement of the working-classes and for the extension of intermediate schools have endeared him to the people of that province. By his residence with us we shall gain not only a useful and an energetic citizen, but also an able and a liberal scholar.

DR. JAMES M'COSH was born in Ayrshire, Scotland, and is now about fifty years of age. His was fifteen years ago called to the chair of Mental and Moral Science in Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, and has remained in that position until the present time. As a champion of a sound and practical philosophy he was not in favor with the literary coteries of London and of Edinburgh, a much more lenient and high philosophy reaches the standard of a positive faith; but for this prejudice he might have held a philosophical chair in one of the Scottish Universities. His philosophy compared with Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON'S was what physiology is compared with anatomy: while he did not lack the skeletons of the dialectician, he clothed his skeletons with flesh and blood, and they readily took their place as living organisms in the world of progress. Hence the popularity of even his profoundest works. His theology is that of DR. CHALMERS. At the time of the Union between the Established Church and became a prominent advocate of the voluntary system.

DR. M'COSH paid a visit to this country two years ago, and is still remembered by the students of the college over which he is to preside. He is described as "a handsome man, of rather more than the average height, with finely cut features, a calm and genial expression of the face, and a head thinly covered with gray hair." His disposition is genial and commands the affections of his pupils, and he is as hospitable at home as he is cordial on the street; in the class-room he is an excellent teacher and disciplinarian.

DR. JOHN MACLEAN, the retiring President, was born in Princeton, in the year 1798. He entered college in the year 1813, and was graduated in 1816 at the age of eighteen. Two years after graduation he began the study of theology in the Princeton Seminary, and in the same year (1818) was appointed tutor in the College. He remained three years in the Seminary, the course at that time being five years. He was elected to the Greek Professorship in 1829. Washington College honored him with the degree of D.D., and, in 1841, the University of the State of New York gave him that of LL.D. In the same year the Board of Trustees elected DR. MACLEAN President of Princeton College. For a period of half a century he has been in the service of his Alma Mater in the several capacities of Tutor, Professor, and President. During that time he has always been earnest in his efforts to advance the interests of the College, which, during his Presidency, especially, has been in its most flourishing condition.

SUICIDES.

PERSONS have committed suicide in positions which would have been thought impossible to produce self-murder. There are several cases of this kind reported in a French medical journal. A man was discovered hanging by his pocket-handkerchief, suspended from a spur stretched across a granary. His legs were found bent at a right angle backward, the knees hanging at the distance of two inches only from a heap of grain on the floor. It would appear that the man, while in the act of hanging, must have held his legs bent at right angles in this extraordinary manner. Another man hung himself from a gratings, which was not so high as himself; when found his legs were reached out before him, and his hips were within a few inches of the ground. A fourth person hung herself so low that she was obliged to stretch out her legs on the floor, not resting on the heel, the other behind her body resting upon the toes. Then there are cases known in which death has been produced by the suicide simply leaning with the neck against a tightened cord.

A still more remarkable case was that of a schoolmaster in the neighborhood of London, who hanged himself in such a manner that the balusters by his crwat, that his body was found resting entirely upon the stairs. Such cases as these are rare, but as medico-legal investigation, as murders may sometimes be very conveniently hidden by contrivances of this character. The suicide of the Duke de Bourbon, in 1830, was supposed by some of the witnesses at the inquest to be only a hidden assassination. However, the fact of his suicide was ultimately established. The duke, indeed, was executed on suspicion of having murdered others, who were afterward pronounced to have been gratuitously executed. Many men who can swim well have been known to tie their hands and legs together before throwing themselves in the water, lest they should be tempted in the dying agony to strike out and save themselves. A lunatic some years ago in Saint Luke's Hospital drowned himself in the bath-room of that institution in a most remarkable manner. She managed to secrete the key of the bath-room, and to make up a dummy to represent herself in bed, in order to deceive the nurse of the ward. In the middle of the night she stole down stairs, and was found next morning lying with her face downward in the shallow water of the bath. She must have deliberately kept herself in the horizontal position in the most determined manner to have effected her purpose.

But determined and deliberate suicides of this kind are characteristic of persons who suffer from confirmed insanity; whereas, in cases of mere impulsive insanity, the patient often regrets the attempt as he is rescued from death, or even, in fact, by the attempt. In the case of Sir Samuel Romilly, the loss of blood, it is suggested, relieved the cerebral congestion which impelled him to make the fatal cut. He bitterly repented of his act immediately it was done, and did all in his power to stop the bleeding. This fact, which is well supported by others, leads to the conclusion that while the person making an attempt upon his life is intensely insane at the moment, yet that he may be perfectly sane the moment after, provided his life has been spared. The impulse to destroy himself does not so promptly people to leap from great heights. There are thousands of persons who dare not trust themselves in such positions. The same is the case with women with respect to razors in certain nervous conditions of the body. It would be absurd to suppose that the act of self-murder can be looked upon as a symptom of insanity.

There are many cases upon the books of this or from committing suicide, or having heard of some example of the kind in their neighborhood. It seems almost incredible that the imitative faculty in idiots of several grades should lead them to such extremities, but it is only another example of the total want of discretion and of the carelessness of life which marks them as a rule in youth. Not only have children hung themselves, but their brothers and sisters of young companions. Here, again, insanity has had nothing to do with the act.

We could not, within the limits of this article, attempt to give any thing like a collection of the remarkable suicides which have taken place, but we may be allowed to refer to a few examples that have been placed on record. We have mentioned a few cases of this kind which apparently have been premeditated with more than usual ingenuity; but an instance was afforded at Fressonville, in Picardy, which has a touch of the grotesque in it worthy of the Arabian Nights. A person who the church bell was heard to ring at an unusual hour, in a very agitated manner. Upon the cause being inquired into, it was found that a man had hung himself to the clapper, and in the agitation caused by his position, the bell rang in the strange manner that had excited attention. This was happily, was not dead: the attempt was certainly a gross effort to ring his own death-knell. In another case a woman had contrived to make a hole in the ice, placed her head in it, and held it there until she was drowned. The most extraordinary example of a deliberate suicide that we have combined with publicity we have heard of, was made by an Italian named Matthew Lovat, a shoemaker. This man had determined upon his own crucifixion, and for this purpose deliberately set about making a cross and providing all the accessories of that terrible scene. He first resolved that it would be difficult to nail himself firmly to the cross, and therefore made a net, which he fastened over his body. He then, by means of an upright beam, a little below the bracket he had placed for his feet, and at the ends of the two arms. He then procured two strong cords or ropes, one from the net, and the other from the place where the beams intersected each other. These ropes he passed over the top of a door or window, and were just sufficiently long to allow the cross to be horizontally upon the floor of the apartment. Having finished these preparations, he next put on his crown of thorns, some of which entered his head; then, having strip himself naked, he girded his loins with a white handkerchief. He then introduced himself into the net, and secured it around him; he then made a nail through the palm of his right hand, by striking its head upon the floor until the point appeared at the back of his hand. He placed his feet on the bracket he had prepared for them, and with a mallet drove a nail completely through them both, and into the wood. A cross-piece was made to receive it, and fastened them to the wood. He next tied himself to the cross by a piece of cord round his waist, and worked himself in the side with a knife which he used in his trade. The wound was inflicted two inches below the left breast, somewhat above the natural angle of the abdominal cavity, but did not injure any of the parts which the cavity contains. Several arterial veins were divided, and many others which appeared to have been done by the knife in probing for a place which should present no obstacle to it. The knife, as usual, was left to represented the spear of the Passion. All this he accomplished in the interior of his apartment, but it was now necessary to get the cross out of doors. To accomplish this, he had placed the foot of the cross overhanging the bed, the whole machine tilted out of the window, and hung by the two ropes which were fastened to the beam. He then, by way of finishing, nailed his right hand to the arm of the cross, but could not succeed in fixing the left, although the nail by which he was to have been fixed was driven through it, and half of it came out on the other side." This took place at eight o'clock in the morning. Some persons by whom he was perceived ran up stairs, disengaged him from the cross, and put him to bed. By medical care his wounds ultimately healed, and the poor man recovered; his mental condition was, however, ever afterward morose and singular.

IMPROVEMENT IN CABINET ORGANS.—A new invention has just been brought out by the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN COMPANY which will attract much attention from the musical profession upon what has been known to some extent as the VOX HUMANA, and produces a very rich and beautiful quality of tone, somewhat resembling that of the human voice. The same thing has been attempted before, but when partial success had been attained, the machinery was so complicated as to be constantly getting out of order. The improvement of MASON & HAMLIN is ingenious, simple, and durable as an instrument itself, and exquisite in its effect.

The reputation of this Company for the best instruments of this class in the world is well established. They were awarded the first prize medal at the Paris Exposition.—New York Musical Gazette.

A SCRIP CURE.

Seymour, Seymour is the man:
Then enter Grant and Colfax,
Grant and Collax, Boys in Blue,
Blair himself after you:
And the Wickedest of Men,
While in the street his men,
Has a host of voters too,
Good and bad—what will you do?
Then, in Bromdway, Greeley Bend
Seeks for honesty, and will send Weakness, discord, and despair
By the same token to the air.
Vote for WOLCOTT and PAIN PAINT,
Try his cure for every complaint;
For your efforts then shall be Crowned with perfect success, I see.

YOU can test PAIN PAINT, free of cost, at Dr. WOLCOTT'S Office, 170 CLINTON SQUARE, N. Y., for it will remove pain or lameness at the very first application, and is a radical and speedy cure for all sores or ulcers. It has no smart, leaves no stain; is sold every where.

Artistic Surgeon, respectfully offers his services in the application of his Rupture Curative Appliances, at his office, 697 Broadway, cor. 4th St.

The great experience of DR. SHERMAN, resulting from the application of his inventions to the Treatment and Cure of this disease, assures him of his ability to give the most perfect relief in the age of the patient, duration of the infirmity, or the difficulties which they may have heretofore encountered in seeking relief. Dr. S., as Principal of the Rupture Curative Institute, has devoted a period of more than fifteen years, and under his care the worst cases in the country, all of which were obstinately relieved, and many, to their great joy, restored to a sound body.

None of the pains and injuries resulting from the use of other Trusses are found in Dr. Sherman's Appliances. They are the very principle of the assertion, he promises greater security and comfort, with a daily improvement in health, than can be obtained from any other person, or the inventions of any other person in the United States.

Prices to suit all classes. It is the only, as well as the best, Truss ever offered the afflicted. Photographic likenesses of cases before and after treatment furnished, and views of instruments.

COUNSEL for the CARELESS.

The body is a machine, and carelessness in its management is as sure to lead to evil results as carelessness in the management of a steam engine. Yet the last thing that most people think of is the protection of this delicate piece of the Creator's handiwork from the many causes of disease by which it is surrounded. It is no easy thing to repair the system when in ruins; but there is no difficulty in fortifying it against many of the dangers to which it is exposed by the exercise of common sense kindly. At the first symptom of this forerunner of more serious ailments, sustain the flagging energies of nature with

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Take it regularly and persistently, until bodily vigor and cheerfulness are restored. It creates no appetites—or, It might as properly be said, compels—the complete digestion of the food, regulates the secretive action of the liver, kidneys, and intestines, and thereby improves the condition of the blood, and gives firmness to the nerves. Upon a system thus thoroughly tested and regulated in all its important functions, the fogs and exhalations of autumn, pregnant with the seminal germs of fever and ague, bilious fever, etc., can make little or no impression. Whoever supposes that he can brave the assaults of this evil in certain districts, at this season of the year, is egregiously mistaken. An electrically as a draught of cold air is shut out by the closing of a door, the complaints and all disorders of a miasmatic type may be prevented by the use of HOSTETTER'S. Even those sickness can be avoided by a means so safe and simple, is it not the merest futility to neglect the proffered antidote? Regarded either as a preventive or a cure for dyspepsia, biliousness, intermittent fever, nervous disorders, general debility, or constipation of the bowels, this pure vegetable preparation stands alone.

OF

IN

THE UNITED STATES.

By

ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these, 583 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, many which in a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 357 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

We speak confidently in praise of the manner in which the work is brought out. The text and type are beflowed by the picturesque illustrations, affords an interesting commentary on the war, and many of the pictures value for preservation.—Boston Advertiser.

The work judiciously combines the merits of philosophical reflection with a vivid and picturesque delineation of facts. His style is at once lively and polished, and every page gives evidence of careful study and preparation.—New York Tribune.

Without any affectation of profound philosophy, or without the less worthy ambition to be considered as one of the best and most valuable records of our great struggle, and we have no doubt it will be received in this reputation. In future years, when the records of the war still are the source of new and valuable discoveries are opened up to the future Prescotts and Motleys, we shall have secrets revealed and light shed on points respecting which we must remain uninformed for the present, but for all ordinary purposes we know of no better record than the one that is steadily going on to completion.—Chicago Tribune.

The Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion is no ordinary work. Its illustrations for its worth though they are excellent specimens of the art, and help the reader to understand the features of the war. The real merits of the work are apart from the engravings. Those merits are a strong and lucid style, a vast amount of well-digested and well-told information, just and well-considered criticisms, and impartial statements of all points about which there are disputes. . . . Every library should have this work for it is one of singular value as a book of reference, because of its comprehensiveness as well as accuracy. . . . As a work of general reading it is of unsurpassed value.—Boston Traveller.

GENERAL BUTLER AND Mr. DANA.

"When a great people borrow money and promise to pay it, that transaction takes its place at the very head of all transactions of good faith and honor in the world."

These words from the speech of R. H. DANA, JUN., upon accepting the Republican nomination for Congress against General BUTLER in the Fifth District of Massachusetts, should be the turning-point of the reflections of the voters of that district. For nothing can be clearer than that those who do not believe it can not be trusted in any great national act. If the promise of the nation, made in its hour of agony to those who gave all to save it, is to be withheld down the wind in the moment of success, the nation becomes justly contemptible in the eyes of history and in the conscience of mankind. To call the keeping of the public faith a minor issue upon which men may fairly differ, is to declare the obligation of common honesty to be an open question. It is to attack the moral foundations of society. It is to destroy all that confidence between men upon which honorable human intercourse proceeds. And when a public man deliberately declares that the public faith may be broken he exposes his own weakness or his own immorality so plainly that nobody can pretend to be deceived. If any but so sophisticated himself as to believe what he says, he is in regard to the national honor precisely what a sincere secessionist was to the national unity. He is to most decent citizens. In the one case he will be supported by the enemies of the Union; in the other only by those who are blind to it, and who refuse to see what simple honesty requires.

If General GRANT, with all his illustrious service to the country, and with all the extraordinary confidence reposed in him, had declared himself in favor of repudiation, he could never have been the successful candidate of the Republican party. The opposition to every honorable heart would instantly have been, "If he does not respect the faith of the Government in one way, how can he be trusted to respect it in another?" How it is not too much to say that General BUTLER'S career before joining the Republican party was not of the kind that inspired universal confidence. Adroitness, management, swift success, he dismissed the great and vital question of our politics by saying substantially that he was bound under the Constitution not to meddle with it, and, consequently, that he had better not think about it. He went heavily into the war, but he did not hesitate to offer Massachusetts soldiers as a slave police—an action which drew from Governor ANDREW a powerful and noble remonstrance. As the anti-slavery feeling of the country ripened, so did that of the General. He gave us the neat extemporization of the "contraband," and when the immediate end of slavery was apparent, there was no more zealous emancipationist than General BUTLER. We say nothing more of his conduct upon this question, or of his career in general, than that it was not of the kind that inspires confidence. General BUTLER has regard for the rights of men was developed at a time and under circumstances which made his services, indeed, very useful, but left an uneasy feeling that his view of the question would still continue to depend upon circumstances.

This feeling, however, might have been regarded as unfair in the General if he had steadily and consistently shown a high moral tone in public affairs, or if he had not shown a total disregard of it. But when he has made his declaration of the propriety of repudiation, it was impossible for the observer of his conduct not to remark that, as his anti-slavery views had been curiously coincident with the change in public opinion upon that subject, so his financial views were evidently tending in the direction which the same public opinion seemed to favor. The suspicion was irresistible that the General possibly liked justice and honor and the rights of man, but the most certainly loved a majority. Now the colored population of the Southern States have precisely the same guarantees with the bondholder—the faith of the Government. They have no other. And if a man is willing to break faith with the one creditor, when he thinks that public opinion demands it, why not with the other?

Or if we suppose that one of these points is irrevocably determined, and that substantially the protection of the rights of the colored population is henceforth secured, then the great question which remains to the country is that of the finances. Having kept faith to the utmost with the colored man, it remains to keep the same faith with the public creditor. Now what is, and will necessarily be, the position of the Republican party upon this point? The observance of the same honesty and good faith. It has not swindled the colored race—it will not swindle the creditors. Why, then, should any Republican constituency shy where select as its representative to deal with this financial question a man who virtually advocates swindling? And why should the earnest supporters of such a candidate permit themselves to describe the question of public honesty as "a minor issue"? There is not, and can never be, an issue so important. Some of these supporters accer at the opposition to General BUTLER as entailed by those who would support ANDREW JOHNSON and yet consider themselves Republicans. But let these gentlemen answer a simple question.! Which is worse for the country or for the party, that the President should have been acquitted, or that the debt should be repudiated?

The contest between General BUTLER and Mr. DANA is watched every where with profound interest, because it is not a local contest merely. It is the submission to a distinctively Republican constituency of the question whether an avowed repudiator—for so a Democrat who holds General BUTLER'S financial views is called by all Republicans—is a proper Republican representative. It is true, as the General says, that the rebels hate him. But that is no reason for sending him to repudiate the debt incurred in conquering them. It is true that the Copperheads would like to see him defeated. But that is no reason for sending him to carry out the Copperhead financial policy in Congress. It is true that he asserted the supremacy of the flag in Baltimore and New Orleans. But that is no reason that he should now be authorized to declare the supremacy of the flag by a policy which the rebels in Baltimore and New Orleans applaud. If the Republican voters of the Fifth Massachusetts District should elect General BUTLER they would proclaim their disagreement with the national party platform, which declares, "We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime."

THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

IF Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON concludes a treaty with England like those which Mr. BANCROFT has negotiated with the German governments, Mr. SEWARD will have established a record for administration of the State Department will always be associated with the settlement of some of the most important foreign questions. In the beginning of Lincoln's term the most part of his dispatches to our ministers was more politic than wise. They failed in the very point where he hoped to make them strong. In trying to acknowledge a moral conflict, he expected the forbearance of all stable governments with a power struggling with rebellion. But in this day of the full recognition of governments, it is the sympathy of the people, which is indispensable—and Mr. SEWARD'S course gained neither. On the other hand, his management of the French and Mexican difficulty was very skilful. Every body may be wise after the fact. The truth is, that the Mexican enterprise of LOUIS NAPOLEON was intended to be a decisive blow to the Union. But it was wholly baffled, and LOUIS NAPOLEON was left in the position of retiring from Mexico by the magnanimous consent of Mr. SEWARD. Throughout the difficulty he secured the honor of the United States, the friendship of Mexico, and the acquiescence of Europe. The only remaining confusions of Mr. SEWARD must not blind us to this great service.

The extension of our territory in Russian America and the proposed treaty for the purchase of the island of St. Thomas are much more questionable acts. The country has certainly not seen the advantage of the former act upon the conditions proposed. But the Chinese Embassy, which, if we can properly interpret the flowery language of the celestial embassadors—however brown—is to open the whole empire into the equal society of nations, will also be an ornament of Mr. SEWARD'S diplomatic career. It is not indeed the work of his, or even inspired by him. But it is one of his happy chances. It occurs under American auspices, and he is the head of American foreign relations. PLANCUS is entitled to the glory of all the events of his consulate.

The German treaties, however, are a substantial credit to Mr. SEWARD and the administration. The European governments do not indeed make the complete surrender of their traditional principles of allegiance which the public opinion of the United States demands, but which our laws have never asserted; yet the concessions are material, and they show a disposition in foreign policy upon the subject to be governed by events which allays the fear of future trouble. The violation of the fundamental principle of the German treaties was alleged by the United States as one of the causes of war with Great Britain in 1812. But when the war ended no mention was made of it in the treaty. England and the United States are not practically exercising the right offensively to us. And now, after fifty years, the difficulty will apparently be partially settled at least without acrimony or humiliation upon either side.

It will be unfortunate, however, if either Mr. JOHNSON or Lord STANLEY think that any such treaty would induce the United States to relax the stringency of the demand for a just settlement of the Alabama claims. We say a just settlement without at all insisting that Mr. SEWARD'S views upon the subject are altogether sound. But the treaty of modified allegiance can not set off any claim of an entirely different character. England did not treat us fairly in the matter of the maritime rights of the rebels. All that we ask is that she be fair now, and not say that she really can not be tortured by the United States. That is not an answer but an insult. If Mr. JOHNSON intimates, he and Lord STANLEY are making an arrangement which will be mutually satisfactory; and if, in addition, he negotiates a treaty concerning aliens which is equally agreeable, he will have earned the right to lay a fresh flower of rhetoric upon the shrine of a common language and of Shakespeare and MILTON.

Meanwhile Mr. SEWARD may properly be congratulated, as he will be kindly remembered, upon the negotiation of treaties by which foreign governments acknowledge the rights of their subjects who become our citizens. But, amidst his just satisfactions, how poignantly must the Secretary sometimes regret that his political insight and his faith in the people had not saved him from the acts and words of the last few years at home!

THE FRIENDS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

IN Mr. BEECHER'S admirable address in the Brooklyn Academy he made great use of the new defenders of the Constitution. And it was well-timed. For the true defender understands the Constitution but those who struggled night and day to destroy it. Nobody is to be accounted a friend of the Union but those who fought to dissolve it or helped the fighters, or who have now combined to overthrow its reconstruction by armed force. Nobody is to be considered conservative but those who, after the cancer has been cut out, are zealously striving to put as much of it back as possible. In the good old days, they cry, was there not one of the original compacts ever seen consuming the bosom of our beloved country; and how, pray, can our beloved country ever be again in a true and genuine state unless that cancer is restored?

But to recall yesterday is as practicable as to make the country what it was, or to restore the old Union. The old Union is impossible without slavery—and slavery is gone, all that belongs to it is gone with it. When emancipation was declared equal rights were assumed. No great multitudes of naive male adults in this country can be held in a kind of purgatory between citizenship and non-citizenship. When they cease to be slaves they become men. When they become men they have all the rights which our principles accord to men. The folly of the Democratic party is that it hopes to prevent this. It thinks that ballot shareholders can propose the admission of a nation of freemen. Who supposes that the old politicians who prostituted the whole Government to the protection of slavery could ever honestly direct that Government, if they could get hold of it, to the extension and security of freedom? When the Americans conquered in the Revolution did they ask the British Tories to take charge of the new Government? If the rebels had succeeded would the Union men have directed affairs? Would the BOCOCKS, the HUNTERS, and FORRESTS, and SEYMOURS, and VALLANDIGHAM have invited General GRANT to the head of their Government? And shall the men who sustained the BOCOCKS, WADE HAMPTONS, TOOMBS, and SEYMOUR to the head of theirs?

The plea of the late rebels now is, that they fought for the true Constitution. What old Constitution? Was not ABRAHAM LINCOLN elected according to its provisions? Had not the slavery party controlled the Government up to the last election? Had he proposed any thing, had Congress proposed any thing unconstitutional? Nobody pretends it. The rebels left the Union because they knew that the Government would no longer be unconstitutionally strained to serve slavery. The plea is wholly false. They cared no more for the Constitution than they do now. They cared only for slavery. As long as they could serve that under the mask of the Constitution they were content. When they could not, they struck at the Constitution. Now again, that they hope they can save some morsels of the corpse of slavery, they profess immense veneration for the Constitution.

It was very constitutional to rob the mails, and suppress free speech, and shoot free settlers in Kansas, and steal Texas, and pay commissioners more for returning an alleged fugitive than for releasing him; but it was frightfully unconstitutional, according to these doctrines, to lift a finger to save the Union or the property of the United States. It was remarkably constitutional that in profound peace Mr. HOAR should be hunted out of Charleston by a mob because he offered to argue a case in the courts, but alarmingly unconstitutional that Mr. VALLANDIGHAM should be arrested for preventing enlistments in the midst of a fearful war. Whatever was useful to slavery was constitutional. Whatever favored loyalty and Union was unconstitutional. It seems that we are all under a mistake. ABRAHAM LINCOLN was the destroyer of the Constitution and Union. JEFFERSON DAVIS was their illustrious defender.

This is the intolerable nonsense of the Southern Democratic pretense in this country. If that party does not learn from the election of General GRANT that the Constitution means freedom and not slavery, it will be, as it has been for the last eight years, despised by all lovers of liberty every where in the world. To serve a live object, even if he be cruel, is at least an intelligible act. But to serve only the meanest of dead tyrants is a condition beyond description.

VOTING IN GEORGIA.

"A SLAVEHOLDER THAT WAS," and that would evidently like still to be, in a few lively lines from Savannah, informs us that the negro was originally sold to "the South" by the "infernal Yankee," and after pronouncing us "mean, low-lifeline," winds up by asking, "Why don't you give the negro the right to vote North?"

Let us speak of this State. If New York, like Georgia, had made war upon the Government of the United States, and after a slow and bloody struggle had been reduced to submission—and it had become perfectly clear that in order to have a sufficient loyal party in the State, the colored population of the non-enfranchised class must be made voters, it would be done. And if the circumstances were such that the country had been left by the Government to the State itself to decide whether the disfranchised class should vote, and the proposition had been contemptuously rejected, the Government would properly do what it thought to be wisest and most necessary to promote the general welfare of New York and of the country.

That is precisely what it has done in Georgia. When that State and others were left without any government whatever, the United States said, "It has been cost to the country and fifty thousand lives and four thousand millions of dollars. Now we can not put a premium upon rebellion and reward it when unsuccessful by giving the increased political power the slaves are now free. You say that you don't wish them to vote. Very well, decide that for yourselves. But if you decide that they shall not, then they must not be counted in the basis of representation. One voter in South Carolina must not be equal at the polls to three men in the State of New York. Decide for yourselves." This was the fourteenth amendment. And the States in question spurned it. Then the Government said, "If you insist upon the actual gain of power by your falsified rebellion, we will settle the matter for the good of the whole." And it passed the reconstruction laws.

Colored suffrage is a matter of State policy in the largest sense. The war waged by "the South" to destroy the Government gave the Government, when successful, the right to regulate the suffrage in certain States. It did in them what circumstances, including the action of those States, showed to be essential to the general welfare both of those States and of the country. The war has not given the Government a right to regulate suffrage in the State of New York. If it had, we assure a Slaveholder that WAS, and, please Heaven, that never again shall be, that we should strenuously urge upon the Government the good policy of perfect equality at the polls. But as it is a subject to be decided by the people of the State, we lose no opportunity of urging it upon them.

Meanwhile our correspondent ought to be able to see that, as a matter of fact, negroes vote in Georgia to-day because the white people of Georgia refused to decide whether they should or not.

TWO NATIONS.

Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON continues to make pleasant speeches in England, and it is now reported that he has arranged the details of a treaty with Lord STANLEY, of which we speak elsewhere. We wish here merely to refer to a friendly criticism in the Nation upon a recent article in which we alleged that Mr. JOHNSON did not truly represent the country.

No Minister, indeed, should be, or indeed can be, properly an agent or representative of his party in a foreign land. His duty is to represent his country. But the country is, in this sense, not a precise term. Every man judges according to his sympathies and convictions. If Mr. FENIMORE COOPER was Minister to England, the United States, of which despite himself he would be a representative, would be a very different country from the United States which Mr. MCCLEAN would represent. Their choice of society, the tone of their conversation, their general political views would leave upon the mind of all who saw them, officially or not, a radically different impression. Each would involuntarily impart his feeling of what he believed his country ought to be, and what he was trying to make it, as really his country. And they would do this not because of their party sympathies at home, but because of the convictions that impelled them at home to act with one or the other party. If, for instance, the United States as Mr. ADAMS conceived them had been represented in England in 1861, instead of the United States as Mr. DALLAS believed them to be, the course of the British policy during the war would possibly have been different.

What we regret in the appointment of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON is, that he does not seem to us to represent the real faith and—so to speak—tendency of his country. The chief and important function of a Minister in these days is his social influence, and by his antecedents, and convictions, and associations, we can not help feeling that the American Minister in England will give false impressions. Of course a Republican—in the party sense—could also give a false impression. If he were anxious to make a public dinner pass off pleasantly, he could also celebrate the community of language, which has nevertheless not prevented two wars and perpetual jealousy and alienation. Whether Republican or Democrat, a Minister could punctually obey instructions, insist upon full satisfaction for Alabama or other claims, send an ultimatum, and demand his passports. But, after all, every nation is, in DISRAELI'S sense, "two nations," and an embassador can only represent one of them. With our own feeling, not in the Republican, but in the American sense, Mr. JOHNSON seems to us to represent the wrong one.

THE ASPECTS OF TRADE.

THE fact to which we have heretofore adverted, that the circulating medium is a fixed quantity, incapable from its quality of being expelled, prevents those alarming vicissitudes in trade which attended our mixed currency whenever, from an excess of paper, the precious metals were driven away. Although since the first of the year the export of the precious metals, chiefly to England, has amounted to over sixty-six millions of dollars, yet, as gold and silver have been demonetized except for payments for duties and for interest, the fact of so large an export of it to pay for interest and for imports has had as yet no serious effect. If our circulating medium had been founded, as it was up to February, 1862, on gold and silver, the removal of so much of its substratum would have thrown our whole monetary system into great confusion. Our present freedom from such disasters is due to the policy, inevitable in a severe war, which made our Treasury notes a legal tender, and, although the situation is not desirable—that of a debtor seldom is, for it prevents competition with those that are solid—it is incomparably better than was possible under any other system. There remains in the country, whatever may be our imprudence in incurring debts abroad, a sufficient quantity of the debt-paying medium. What the country now wants, to place our industry on a footing with all other industries, is a gradual return to the specie prices of the world.

At present our competition with others is limited very much to productions connected with Agriculture. It will be necessary to successful competition in other pursuits that we shall get out of the abnormal condition forced upon us by a great and expensive war as soon as it can be done with advantage, and place ourselves on a footing of equality with the important manufacturing and commercial nations. The large surplus of our agricultural productions now wanted abroad must be carried only in foreign bottoms. The export of Indian corn to London and Liverpool, which was proceeding rapidly during the summer, was suddenly brought to an end, when prices were at 122.3 per bushel for Western mixed, by an advance in freights from 4½*d.* to 9*d.* per bushel. The foreign steamers, which now carry the bulk of our products, take wheat in place of corn, as the former is more valuable; but the price of freight, which vacillates between 8*d.* and 12*d.* per bushel of 56 pounds, going to the higher rate on a brisk demand, amounts to a serious charge upon our agricultural interest, which must divide the expense with the consuming nation. We shall be carriers on the ocean as soon as our range of prices will permit the rebuilding and navigation of vessels at rates not too much disproportioned to those of others.

The same circumstances are required to bring about competition in other important industries. It is probable that Congress has been impelled by the fear of an approaching Presidential canvass, and the disadvantage of having a President at variance with it and with whatever was for the public good, from taking the initiative in those movements which are required for returning prosperity. The great soldier who gave success to our arms—thus saving the millions in expenditure that would otherwise have been incurred—has developed qualities in administration, and in his intercourse with the public since the war, of a character to assure us that when the reins of Presidential power are given to his hands he will guide the nation aright, and communicate to all departments of the Government the example and the spirit of his wisdom, virtue, and courage. We may then hope to recover in time the position which will place us on a footing with the most skillful nations. Until this is accomplished we shall remain isolated so far as all industries are concerned in which we have no special advantage derived from what nature has bestowed.

Even in agriculture many nations in ordinary years can still undersell us in those markets which buy largely for the consumption of their people. The immense growth of population in the large manufacturing countries of Europe, and the tendency toward the exhaustion of wheat lands which is constantly going on abroad, operate to overcome the disadvantage resulting from the increased cost of production here. But this year we have special reasons for great activity in all the productions of agriculture. The drought has not only diminished the extent of crops in the British Isles, in which it was most severe, but also in the most important of those grain-growing countries which compete with us in the London and Liverpool markets. All the states on the west coast of Europe have more or less suffered. Turkey, Egypt, and Hungary will enjoy with us the benefits, if such they can be called, which the drought in Europe has temporarily occasioned. We do not rank California in the list of competitors, for we share in the advantages which her large surplus of grain will afford.

It has doubtless been considered remarkable that gold should have advanced to 150 a few weeks ago, and that it suddenly fell to 137¼ without any change in our foreign indebtedness to call for this difference. The circumstances were somewhat favorable for the advance, inasmuch as there had been, as we have seen, a large export of gold, and the balance in the Treasury and in banks had become so sensibly reduced as to give to speculators the audacity which they feel when no large amount can suddenly be thrown upon the market. They carried it up with ease, but the loss here from the export of our sixty-six millions has been reduced to about thirty-eight by receipts from California and elsewhere, and the Treasury had become so strong that speculation in view of that fact and of the certainty of large demands for our cotton and breadstuffs, turned about in its policy. The manner in which the payments for Alaska was managed had some effect in this direction. It may be that the intention of the Government to sell gold may have leaked out from some quarter, and been influential to produce this change, for there was great boldness in sales short; and when, late in September, the Government actually sold, the movements on the Exchange had become nearly frantic to drive it down. The sales of gold made by the Treasury in September were of only about two millions three hundred thousand dollars—an amount easily absorbed; but no definite ideas were entertained by the majority of operators as to the true objects of the Government and the extent to which it would go in these sales. The ability of the Government in depressing gold was considered greater than was the power of any combination then formed to resist, and hence the operations for a fall. It is understood, in the best financial circles, that it is supposed at Washington that the price for gold should range between 140 and 145; but sales were made by the Department last week at lower figures, explained, however, on the ground that currency was wanted and that gold could be spared. The truth is very evident that speculation is the main element which suddenly carries it above, and as suddenly below the value which it possesses as compared with the general run of prices of articles of general use the subjects of general commercial activity. The experiment of selling gold to the highest offer is now to be tried by the Treasury.

The inactivity of trade, in England particularly, is favorable now to a tolerably low price for gold in this country, inasmuch as the low rate of interest there and the much higher here occasion large temporary loans in Wall Street. The amount of this floating mass of capital held for English account is estimated at from fifty to a hundred millions of dollars. It is loaned in gold for sixty days, the borrower stipulating to furnish at or before maturity an unexceptionable sterling bill at sixty days' sight, drawn on London. These options, as they are called, have the tendency to furnish a much larger amount of exchange than is produced by our regular exports, and really to postpone the adjustment of the balance lately much against us on the total of imports and exports. Whenever the time arrives for the transfer of this floating capital to London it will occasion a great scarcity of exchange, unless it shall happen in consequence of a lower rate of interest here than is now paid, due to the possible abundance of money which may arise from the inevitable large demand for our cotton and breadstuffs. But so long as we have an extensive paper circulation the advantage of a large demand from abroad for our productions will be wasted, and those nations will be benefited who have the inestimable benefit of a sound currency.

Notwithstanding these fluctuations in gold, business has gone forward with great steadiness, and on as large a scale as was expected during the season of a Presidential canvass. Numerous and large assemblages, especially in country towns and at mid-day, are very costly, as they withdraw considerable bodies of men from their usual industry. It is this in the main which prevents any large accumulation of goods at country stores. People are engaged more in politics than in business. But there are just grounds for expecting that trade will not only be distributed over the whole year, but that it will improve when the canvass reaches the favorable end which now seems inevitable. An amount of agricultural productions in the North seldom or never surpassed; the certainty of a fair crop of cotton, and of a market for both; and nothing but political disturbance—soon, however, to be removed—to hinder the general prosperity, constitute a basis for activity which is sure to bestow activity until the results are known of the harvest of 1869.

JUDGE PIERREPONT ON THE CAMPAIGN.

WE give below the interesting correspondence which has lately taken place between Judge EDWARDS PIERREPONT and ALEXANDER T. STEWART, the Chairman of the Grant Committee. It is of course unnecessary to remind our readers that Judge PIERREPONT has hitherto always acted with the Democratic party. Like General DIX, he was a "War Democrat," and, like him also, he understands that the issues of this Presidential campaign are well defined as being "between the friends and the enemies of our Government." It is needless for us to add that the exalted character of Mr. STEWART affords a perfect guarantee that the funds will be used as he states, only for proper purposes.

103 FIFTH AVENUE,
NEW YORK, Oct. 10, 1868.

To Alex. T. Stewart, Esq., Chairman of the Grant Committee, etc.:

MY DEAR SIR,—When FRANK P. BLAIR, who had no claims whatever upon the Democratic party, was nominated in Tammany Hall with such shouts of applause just after proclaiming that "We must have a President who will trample into dust" the laws of Congress, and when four rebel generals made the chief ratification speeches in New York, my attention as a War Democrat was arrested by this remarkable exhibition.

Since then I have carefully noted the expressions of Southern journals and the speeches of Southern politicians, from WADE HAMPTON on his return to Charleston to the recent manifesto of B. H. HILL, and I find that every leading rebel in the confederacy regards the expected election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR as a complete vindication of the rebellion, and as certain to restore the South to every right which she had before the war, including the "trampling into dust" by military feet the proclamation of freedom and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

The contest presents a well-defined issue between the friends and the enemies of our Government.

I can not conceive how any intelligent man, who does not wish the rebels returned to power, the nation's faith violated, its debt repudiated, its name dishonored, its prosperity destroyed, its patriots insulted, and the "lost cause" restored, can vote against GRANT.

In my judgment the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR would forthwith confuse and paralyze our business, and reduce the value of our property one-half.

To aid in averting this calamity I send you herewith twenty thousand dollars ($20,000), which I give to be used in the election of General GRANT in such manner as you and the committees with whom you act may think best. And I am, yours ever truly,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT.

BROADWAY AND CHAMBERS STREET,
NEW YORK, Oct. 12, 1868.

Edwards Pierrepont, New York City:

MY DEAR JUDGE,—It gives me great pleasure to know that you fully appreciate the consequences to all business men—indeed every one having any interest in the prosperity of our country—that must result from the election of General GRANT.

The question is presented to the people whether they will aid in electing an administration bent upon trampling loyalty into the dust and elevating upon its ruins a power controlled by rebel chiefs, whose motto will be, "The rebellion vindicated," with prostration to every branch of industry and business at the North, or whether we should place in the Executive Mansion one emphatically of the people, who has never acted except from a just sense of duty to his country, and from whose administration we will have all the blessings that can flow from peace in every department of our Government, inspiring a confidence that can only lead us to prosperity and happiness as a nation, and promising for us a future unequaled in the history of the past.

To secure this end I accept your generous contribution, and will apply it to such proper uses as may tend to bring about a result so full of promise of blessings to us all.

Sincerely your friend,
ALEXANDER T. STEWART.

FORGERIES.

SOME weeks ago the New York World declared that certain expressions of opinion by noted Democratic leaders in the Southern States, which were generally published in the Republican papers, were forgeries. We printed several such extracts under the caption, "Are they forgeries?" and among them a paragraph from the Mobile Register, edited by Mr. JOHN FORSYTH. Mr. FORSYTH, under his signature in his paper, charges us with forgery in perverting his meaning.

The simple truth is, that Mr. FORSYTH, after calling the present State Governments in the Southern States the rule of carpet-baggers, negroes, and scalawags, added: "And here we may as well say that the people of the South do not intend to submit to that permanent rule, result as the Presidential election may." We quoted these words as indicative of the spirit in which the Southern Democratic leaders regard reconstruction; and we assert that it is because of FRANK BLAIR'S deliberate declaration that reconstruction should be overthrown by force that his nomination was so jubilantly hailed by those of whom Mr. FORSYTH is a fair representative.

In his long letter of reply Mr. FORSYTH says that we misuse—not misquote—his words, and that he did not mean any thing offensive. Mr. FORSYTH will pardon us if we infer the meaning of words from the conduct of those who use them. His friend Mr. YANCEY came to New York in 1860 and asked in the Cooper Institute whether it was to be expected that "the South" would submit to Mr. LINCOLN'S election. His words were not as strong as Mr. FORSYTH'S, but he meant rebellion, and it is foolish for the latter gentleman to plead a Pickwickian sense for his words. We quoted them fairly, and they were the point of his article. They were in no sense a forgery; and we repeat what we said in quoting them, that the nomination of General BLAIR upon his BRODHEAD letter, the declarations of WADE HAMPTON in regard to the platform, the whole course of the canvass, and the proved feeling of the friends of Mr. FORSYTH, "show distinctly that the policy of the Democratic party, should it succeed at the polls, will be the forcible overthrow of the governments of the Southern States."

Mr. FORSYTH'S general views of the rebellion are stated in another article, from which we quote as follows:

> "Already the word 'Copperhead' has lost half of its odium in the northern public mind, and 'rebel' is getting to be understood as an armed protest against a faction that was inimical to human freedom and was at open war with the Constitution of the United States. ......The Confederate States bore the old Constitution with them, and set it upon their own altars for a purer, holier, and safer worship. And history will yet write that it was that act that through fire and blood saved the Constitution, and enabled the nation in the fullness of time to vindicate and re-enthrone it in their hearts and again plant it upon the altars of a common country."

He holds that the rebels are the loyal men, and that those who tried to smother the Union in blood are its truest friends. And his paper, the Mobile Register, in which he utters these sentiments, is editorially commended by the New York World as follows:

> "The Mobile Register, in its various editions, is one of the most trusted and trust-worthy organs of Southern political opinion. It has been for fifty years a champion of Democratic principles."

LITERARY.

"M'Pherson's Hand-Book of Politics for 1868," published by PHILP & SOLOMONS, Washington, is indispensable to every one who would be accurately informed of current political affairs. The present volume contains the hand-book for three years past, and is a body of documents, votes, laws, speeches, proclamations, platforms, letters, opinions, messages, orders, and miscellany upon the whole subject of reconstruction. Mr. M'PHERSON who, as Clerk of the House of Representatives, has peculiar facilities for such a work, has skillfully condensed and selected, so that the manual is as convenient as it is copious. It is, of course, a work of permanent value.

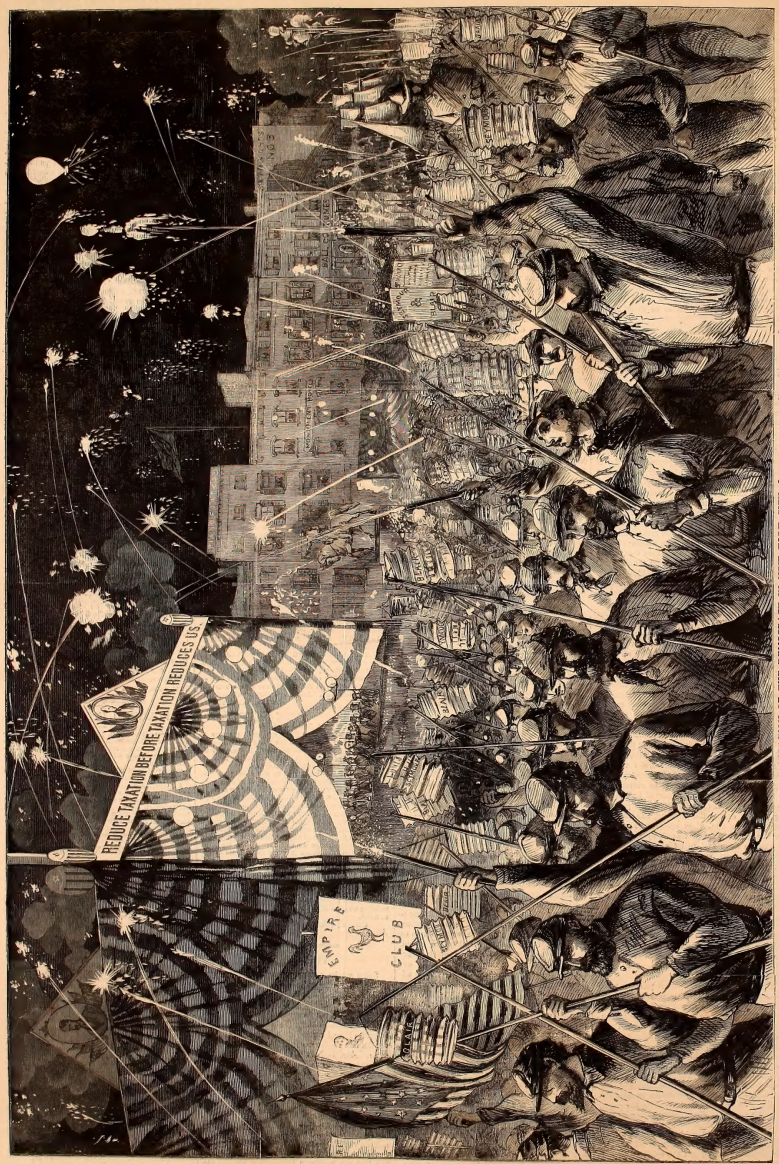
DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE revenue case, in which Commissioner Rollins and Deputy Commissioner Harland were the defendants, was dismissed on the 7th by Commissioner Guttman, no evidence whatever being produced by the prosecution.

General Howell Cobb died suddenly at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in this city on the 9th instant.

President Johnson has through General Grant issued an order to the army and navy, instructing officers not to interfere with the holding of elections in the Southern States. These instructions were called forth by General Reynolds's late order forbidding an election for Presidential electors to be held in Texas.

FOREIGN NEWS.



THE Provisional Government, with Prim and Serrano at its head, seems to have firmly established itself in Spain. General Prim arrived in Madrid on the 5th instant. Espartero, who was at first thought of as the head of the Government, seems to have been discarded either on account of his advanced age or of his conservative sentiments. Our minister at Madrid, Mr. Hale, has recognized the new Government, and his action has been approved by Secretary Seward. Lersundi, Captain-General of Cuba, has formally acceded to the authority of the Provisional Government; but he is to be relieved by General Dulce. The first steps taken by the revolutionists promise good results. Its liberal action in regard to slavery in the colonies, its admission of delegates from Cuban citizens in Madrid, and its anxiety for the early assembling of the Cortes, show a disposition toward moderation rarely exhibited immediately after a popular uprising. In some cases—as in the matter of duties—the Government has overstepped its proper limits, and has usurped the proper functions of the Cortes. As to the form of government which will succeed this temporary arrangement, or whether indeed this arrangement will not be maintained, it is useless at the present time to speculate.

The King of Denmark has announced to the Danish Parliament that the negotiations with Prussia in regard to Schleswig-Holstein have reached no result. The Parliament has postponed for one year the ratification of the sale of St. Thomas.

The land question is the most radical one connected with Irish reform. It is reported that the British Parliament will take up this difficult question at an early day.

Hon. Reverdy Johnson, our Minister to England, has sent a cable dispatch to this Government, stating that he has signed a protocol with the British Government regulating the rights of naturalized citizens. The compact is similar in features to the treaty recently concluded by Mr. Bancroft with the German powers.

LILY'S STORY.

THE scene of our story is a dépôt on the Georgia Railroad, not far from Augusta, and the time is the spring of 1866. Some things linked to it run back of that date for two generations.

I first saw the place on a dismal morning in February, for my father had bought the saw-mill, which was the principal feature of the place; and as the war-poverty had compelled a sale of our city home, he sought a livelihood and exemption from debt at the mill.

The first view was not charming. A building, long, low, rambling, and destitute of paint as of taste, was the railroad hotel and boarding-house. With our own, and half a score of negro shanties with dirt chimneys, it and they made the village.

There was a footpath which began ankle-deep in sand, and arose into the variety of gully, rock, and bramble which diversified the hill upon which stood our new home.

It was a box with a front-porch and four rooms, crowning the summit of said hill, and open to sun and wind; for not a shrub three feet high was left of the original black-jack and sweet-gum growth. The fence of rough boards inclosed half an acre of sand, two scraggy wild rose-bushes, and the kitchen. The pig-pen and other improvements came at a later date.

At the foot of this hill an immense bank of saw-dust marked the site of another mill,

> "Whose mules were dead
> Whose sawyer fled,
> And its lumber all departed."

Its yellow dust now partially bridged the swamp and made a passable wagon-road.

Beyond this spread a few hundred acres of fields, which were of sufficient fertility to average a dozen corn-stalks and as many ghosts of last year's poke-berries to the acre; and beyond this was pine timber, while the limit of vision still suggested—pine.

I saw all this before I entered the house. There, the pine ceiling of wrinkled, yellow grain, the furniture revealing some mahogany and maple; the books, and pictures, and fresh tints of the carpets; and, best of all, the flames that licked out red tongues from the turpentine of the logs, and roared and crackled up the huge chimneys, literally like "a house afire," all made me feel comfortable and at home.

Perhaps the reader will appreciate all this more when I introduce myself as being a girl named Mary, and fifteen years old.

The next day, bright, bracing, and sunny, the cool spring weather of our clime, tempted me forth, and I found that in coming to the house I had turned my back upon the best; for there, beyond the railroad, lay a broad plain, arched for acres in eternal green, like some cathedral on a festal day; and in the cool shadow, where sunlight made mosaic as it gleamed through the arches and myriad pillars on the brown carpet of pine straw, there was a perpetual incense from the amber tears of the great stems; and the wind through a thousand pillared aisles breathed the mellowed thunder of nature's organ, and the whispering of the leaves seemed expectant of the anthem from the distant choir. The ages that had reared those great brown trunks to heaven, or strewn their long-leaved summer spoils upon the floor, seemed to be still present in the solitude, and every note of that solemn monotone that throbbed through the silence uttered only—God.

But nature is ever marred by man's intermeddling, and even the bold spring that leaped with a gurgle of joy from the rough heart of the hillside, and sent a perfect fountain of yellow sand boiling from its bottom, was stopped before it had gleamed among the reeds for a dozen yards, and forced to become a frog-pond. From this diurnal vile it had two escapes. One, a spout where the most faithful old nurse in the world, Aunt Mary, used to wash her clothes; the other, a viaduct of hollowed logs leading under rock and bramble, swamp, saw-dust, and railroad, to at last assert its hydraulic principles and fill the great wooden tank of five hundred barrels, at which the iron horse loved to drink till the cold water would hiss and bubble in his hot throat.

Some half a mile down his iron track was the new saw-mill—

> "Its mules hauling logs, the great shed beneath,
> Where the puff of steam was whirling the teeth
> Of the circular saw through the lumber," and where a score of sweating negroes, in ventilated pantaloons, were shoveling saw-dust, piling plank, adjusting bands and stop-cocks, and a congregation of wives and children, evidently possessed of hereditary hydrophobia, admired from the doors of their shanties the all things which constitute the poetry of saw-mills. I may as well confess that at night, when the "pillar of cloud" floats in lessened density from the great, black chimney up through the stars; when such fires roar up those chimneys of sticks and mud as might fuse brick ones; when the inevitable fiddle comes from the box under the bed, and men and women join their full, powerful voices in the hymns that are all rhyme and no reason; then there is a weird enchantment about the whole scene, with a little of the Macbeth witch effect, and a good deal of honest peace and Christian content. But when some mischievous hand touches the lever of the engine-whistle, and the voice of the steam fiend howls through the gloom, the witch effect is (to use a Georgaism) "right smart ahead."

One pleasant afternoon, in the mild April days that did come at last, my household friends, or at least the whites of the family, seemed to have all deserted our windy hill. Father was directing score of colored American citizens, who piled ton after ton of plank and scantling on the dozen cars which constituted the body and tail of the railroad regtle, of which the great black head was hissing away like a helpless old tea-kettle. Mother was on a visit to Augusta. Brother absent telegraphing some "distinguished" other, and I

"HOW DID YOU EVER HAPPEN TO MARRY A MAN OLDER THAN YOURSELF?"

FLOATING FOR DEER IN THE ADIRONDACKS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 670.]

"At liesse,
With the moon
Or a dreaming dog in my ear."

And nothing on earth to do all the long afternoon but to look at our young cook, Lily, as she sat on the porch steps in the sun, and sewed on a shirt for her husband.

She had been called "the lily child" by her parents in compliment to the three-fourths of white blood in her veins, and had been married two years to Hansell Ruff, the colored foreman of the mill hands. She began in a pleasant but monotonous tone to tum the words of a poem she had seen in the Atlanta Era, and had herself adapted to a negro melody. As I was lonely, and the hot sun had brutalized to accompany the orphan pig that wandered about the yard, and as the frogs of the pond would not open before dusk, I asked her to sing it. She did so, little comprehending how true a picture it presented of her own career, herself into freedom, as once Israel from the land mourning its first-born dead, and yet so poor and homeless as to sigh for slavery, as that people for the "fleshpots" of their Egypt.

The words were Watson's, and I give them as worth preserving:

"A freedman sat on a pile of bricks,
As the rain was pattering down;
His shoes were worn and his coat was torn,
And his hat was without a crown.
He viewed his home and he viewed himself,
And shook the wet from his head,
With a tear in his eye, as he sore go by
A boy with a loaf of bread.
Then raising his head from in a obsesome tone,
That sounded like a song,
While he kept his eyes on his happy crown,
He sang to himself this song:

"De wind mought blow, but it done with toil,
And I'n let de cotton patch:
I guess de sun is mighty hot,
His sickness fore dey betch.
I totes no more de heavy load,
No driver old Missa round;
I wonder who dey's gwine to get
To work de patch in de ground.

Den ding away de plow and hoe,
De sun may burn,
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But trees de Lord Is free!

"But I think last night, as I tried to sleep
Upon the cabin ground,
While de rain was drippin' on my head,
And de wind was whistlin' round,
I'd like to hab my lighf'ood fire
And my cabin home again,
For de weddin's gettin' berry cold
Out here in de rain.
But den I 'se done wid rake and hoe,
De sun may burn,
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But trees de Lord I'n free!

"De odder day when Pinkey died
I think it berry good
Dat de dear Lord would take her off
Before dis cold wind blowed:
But den I 'se hard to see her die—
I wish she'd not been born—
Fe I'nld she 'spised, for she asked
About de rice and corn.
But den I 'se done wid rake and hoe,
Dis am de jubilee:
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But trees de Lord 'Is free!"

"And Dinah sits dere on de ground,
And looks wid hard, sad poor;
She can not stop the song she sang
About de cabin home.
Her poor ole limbs are almost bare;
Her cheek-bone's comin' frou;
I almost wish de Lord would come
And take her up to you.
But den she's done wid rake an' hoe,
Dis am de jubilee:
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But trees de Lord shall be free!

"I dreamt las' night ole Massa come
And took us home wid he
To de happies' place we 'se ebber see
When first dey set us free!
And when I woke de lightwood fire,
And Dinah cooked de yam:
Dey say dat dreams sometimes true;
I wonder if dis one am.
But den I 'se done wid rake and hoe,
To hab a jubilee:
De rain may come, de wind may blow,
But trees de Lord 'Is free!"

As I looked at Lily, with her dusky cheeks of as rich a color as ever Moorish blood gave to the girls of Spain; her jetty hair crinkling its short manes in the effort to curl; her quick and saucy black eyes; the unmistakable Saxon dimple at the corners of her mouth; and neck and arms whose faultless lines in their contour wondered how it was that she, a girl of twenty, and the pride and belle of every negro dancing frolic in the neighborhood, should ever have mated with the sedate husband of forty-five.

So I asked: "Does Hansell ever dance when he goes with you to weddings and holidays?"

"Bless you, no, Mistress! He's done with all such foolishness long ago, and he generally stays at home now and minds the baby."

"How did you ever happen to marry a man older than yourself?"

"It's a long story to tell."

"Well, if you will tell it to me I will sew up that sleeve for you, as I have nothing that I want to do else."

She was willing enough, as she loved to talk and also to be petted; and this following is what I remember of it, and nearly her language:

"You see, Missus, that while I was young and foolish, and liked young men best, I had sense enough to know that a good steady provider was best; and so I chose meat, and bread, and good clothes, over dancing and fun abroad, and dry bread at home.

"Hansell Ruff always was free, and was ageing to buy me and have our children free if we could; and then he worked for himself and had money, and there's a principle in money, you know. So he promised to follow me wherever the white folks took me, and I always laid off to have him; but he had a hard time to get me, sure!"

"How so, Lily?"

"Well, I'll tell it all through. The old folks —and that's Dud and Mam—they said he was a lower too old for me, and that they never liked free niggers no way. Then Hans—that's Ruff, you know—he once on a time had another wife that still lives in this settlement. But when she took to a white man Hans quit her for good; but that made him be talked about. So he kept courtin' me, and brought me a heap of candy and cakes and all sorts of nice things.

"One night, when he was a settin' up to me—Dad—that's father, you know—he speaks up and says: 'Lily's so ramblin' and wild I don't know what to do with her sometimes.' Then Hans, he ups and says, 'Give her to me. I'll feed her, and never strike her a lick either.'

"And Dud and Mam both says: 'Take her and welcome;' but they didn't mean it for earnest, as Hans hoped they did.

"So when he got to coming oftener they flew all to flinders, and forbid him the house. He kept bringing me fruit and candy, or sending it, but never came himself. One night he brought me a basket of big red apples, and just set it down by me, saying, 'I thought you might want some apples.' Good-night all,' and went off again as common.

"Before he was out of the yard they asked me for some, and I handed the basket to Dud, he said, 'Mammy, if I couldn't ask Ruff into the house I wouldn't eat his apples.'

"So the next day Hansell came. Mam asked him to come in and take a chair, but he said, 'No, thank you, and went away.

"I took Dud and Mam all talk to him at the fence; but old folks don't sleep sound, and they listened to us, and then they locked me up of nights in a room with a trap-door to itself.

"Well, Mr. Ruff—that's Hans, you know—he found me out, and could open the padlock with a nail, and used to come in the night of nights, and set up and be company for me. I reckon he come to see me more'n a dozen times, and he used to tell me a story about the parrots away over in Africa, and it was so powerful interestin' I made him tell it so often that I know it by heart."

"Do tell me that," I asked, and she replied:

"Law, Miss Mary, it makes the story a heap longer, but just as you say."

So there came a story within a story.

"I don't know only what Hans says, but it appears like there's a powerful river, or an ocean, he calls it, that runs between where white people stay and where the niggers live, and it's mighty hot there, and named Africa. Once upon a time there was a great nation, all black, and more nations all around, and them black too. I reckon like South Carolina and Georgia and Alabama, but I don't know. Well, in this nation the granddad—that's grandfather, you know—of Hans, he was a king over the nation, and that's more than a governor, or a justice of the peace, or a Freedmen's Bureau. This king was Hansell Ruff's grandfather, and that's his father's name, and he was a mighty old man. It was a great country too. There was cocoa-nuts just like we grate up to make pies of, only growing wild on trees taller than your house, and monkeys and little niggers had to climb to get them. There was roots—I reckon they was like yams, for they cooked them and ate them—and the most perfect timber and biggest leaves you ever heard of. Then there was elephants like come in the show to Augusta, only the color different, and their teeth to sell, and there was another sort of elephants in the big rivers; and in the big woods and dark corners was lions and panthers and things, the biggest kind, that could whip a dog. Then there was birds, and one sort with bonnet feathers in their tails, that says 'good-by' when you turkey-gobblers; but I don't believe all that. don't believe much about the rattlesnakes that don't rattle, you know, but you can't make a child, nor the ant-hills as big as a cabin, nor that it ain't never cold there; but Hans says his grandfather see it all. It's all there, I reckon.

"But this king he was too fast. He and his son, named Prince, as Hans says, they outrun a boy bigger than a dog, and whipped all the others, and his son, that was Hansell's father, he kept with the king, and they fought all about, and run day and night, and the women, and run some into the river where alligators were waiting for them, and killed some in the woods, and took lots and lots of them.

"But this king he was too fast. He and his son, named Prince, as Hans says, they outrun a boy bigger than a dog, and whipped all the others, and his son, that was Hansell's father, he kept with the king, and they fought all about, and run day and night, and the women, and run some into the river where alligators were waiting for them, and killed some in the woods, and took lots and lots of them.

"But this king he was too fast. He and his son, named Prince, as Hans says, they outrun a boy bigger than a dog, and whipped all the others of a crowd of the others that was running away. But these didn't like to be all killed by two people, even if they was king and his son, so they killed the king and took his son and just carried him right along.

"The Prince, that's Hans's father, now his grandfather being dead, he expected to be cooked and eat up, but they took a notion right to where the biggest river of all, named the ocean, was, then stopped and tied him all night. The next day he sent him off on a steamboat, a canoe with white cloth for the wind to blow, just like that you showed me in my Reader, and said was a ship.

"That day for the first time he saw white men. He thought they bought him to eat, from the way they looked at him and felt of him, but when the axes and looking-glasses and beads were paid for him and a whole lot more, they took him in little boats on with you say is a ship. He liked it at first, but when they put trace-chains on his legs, and chained him and nearly five hundred more (that Hans says) altogether, and put them all down in a dark hole, then it was bad, and so hot they would all fight to get to the hole where they came down and get air. But the ship started, and then they all got dreadful sick, and no more fighting for air. They couldn't.

"It seemed like there was no other side to the river or ocean, but they must have been going up or down it, for they went day after day and never stopped. At first the water for drinkin' was good, and they could hear the wind blow and the salt-water wash the boat, and while the river wasn't steady just lolled them about terrible, still it wasn't as bad as about sea.

"But pretty soon the drinkin' water got worse and worse, and less to eat, and no fresh meat, and only hard bread, and the water would smell bad, and when they would throw it out and make signs for good water the white men would talk loud and whip them.

"Then the wind stopped blowing, and they thought they were there, for the ship didn't seem to go at all. So what they were not sure of was when some got sick and died they all had to climb up and run around on the roof that was flat, and the ones too sick to do it was got with hooks and hall if they went slow. The air was good up there, but the wind didn't blow, and they didn't go at all.

"Then Hans said his father said it was dreadful, for they were glad to get water at all, and only got enough to wet their mouths, and at first twice a day, and then only once; and that was worse than swamp water, for it was dirty and had wiggle-tails in it. Bread was scarce too, and hard and bad. Then Hans says the white men must have been bit by a snake and had no conjure-bones from the way they cut up, for they should and beat the colored people all day long. They seemed to get mad to see them die, for they did die, and they would carry them up and the sharks take them off, and then they would be thrown in the water like dogs; and great fish got so used to it they would wait to eat them and jump like a minnow after bait.

"Down in the hole it was most awful hot, and such a smell as never was heard of before or since. But it was too bad to talk about among Christian people; and the listening to the dead moaning and the sick children crying was bad into the water, and thinking a fish might get him before he was good dead, was the worst part of all, for he was afraid to die.

"At last so many died that all there was left could get to the air-hole at once; and after days and days the steamer and they started again, and not so many died.

"They expected to get there soon, but neither back of the coast or land could they see; and it was wide all the way since they started.

"At last there was land, and while they were most dead for water, they all danced and sung like mad.

"Well, the land wasn't Africa, but this side; and they could see the ship all the time, and they saw a canoe, and got on the bank and had the chains taken off, and then walked into the woods and got good water, and some fruit besides.

"Then they walked to a nice plantation and a good man got them, for they were fed and had clothes, and nursed the sick children and got rice and catch fish. Hans says oysters come from there.

"One day Hans's father saw his master in washing, and saw one of the same fish that used to eat the dead trying to catch his master. So the old man got his grandfather's fishing-pole, and then, he was close on the spot in the boat, and he jumped right into the water and cut the fish with his knife till he was near enough to get into the boat. But just as he was helping Hansell's father in, and was safe himself, the fish, named a shark, bit off the foot of the brave colored man and bit it right off.

"But the white man, his master, was a good white man, and took pay to his own house and had him carried like a baby; and when he come to himself (for he was most dead from bleeding) he saw a dollar piece for the first time, and seemed till his leg all cured up, only he had to have a crutch.

"Then the white man took him to the State of Kentucky and set him free, and gave him a hundred dollars and left him.

"Then the man with one leg went to Georgia with his free papers, and liked these parts and staid here: and here he got married to Hansell's dad, and here Hansell Ruff, my husband, was born.

"So that is the end of the King of Africa, and that is how the Ruffs came always free. He was born so, like St. Paul was."

I laughed at her queer idea of the Roman citizenship of Hansell Ruff, but let it go, and all of it very much, but you left off your own story when shut up of nights in the cabin. How long was that for?"

"A good while. But one time I hid to keep from being locked up; for, when Hansell did not come back, I was afraid of them."

"Did your father find you?"

"He did that; for he got me out, and then give me a hide with his belt and his big stick that he kept to whip us with. I had to run fust to keep off the whipping; but Mam she begged for me, and so I got off, and that was near about the last of locking me up."

"Did your father ever find out that Hansell visited you in your jail?"

"I think so; for he come home one night from Ruff's and caught him with me, and only he didn't. He tore about and slapped all the little children and swore 'if Hansell Ruff ever troubled another him his wife would break his head.'

"I was scared; but Hans come about as usual. One Sunday I went to a meeting-house about five miles off to meet Hansell there. And there was Keezy, or Aizzie, as she called herself, who used to be Hansell's wife, and some of my friends told me not to eat any thing that day, for she had swore to poison me before I left the hill. I was dressed fine, and knew about as much as I could just to aggravate her, and she looked dangerous enough to bite. I got lots of cake, but was afraid to eat, and liked to have starved until Hansell got me some chicken and biscuit from his white folks, and I wasn't afraid of that.

"She was a mean thing, as old as Hansell, and black as tar."

"But how did you get married?"

"Why, you see, when Dad questioned my intentions I told him it was my intentions to have Mr. Ruff, and he got so mad that I was actually afraid. So me and Hana we pretended to have a falling out, and I didn't speak to him nor him to me for nigh onto a month. That fooled them all, you see, and they said I was sensible at last, and quit watching us.

"So one moonshiny night Hansell he hired a preacher, and he come to Tilla's cabin, which is the yard, and I slipped on a dress, and was soon there. When the preacher talked enough so they all said we were safe, they called Dad and Mam to come and see the rest of it. But they was so mad they wouldn't come, and he prayed a good prayer for us to live happy and be good, and said them that I was Mrs. Ruff, and for good.

"So Hansell made me a good husband, and I haven't seen one sorry day yet."

"Have you always kept together during the war?"

"Nearly always, for he followed me. Once he had to fly till Christmas at a place, because his word was to stay; but he come forty-seven miles on the cars Christmas-eve, and, as we had moved again, he walked about ten miles before day to find me.

"He kept close to me till freedom come, and since then we have had full and plenty, and old master is going to give us land to tend on shares, and maybe Hansell can buy it some day, and we have a home for our children when we are old and they grown."

This seemed the end of her story, for she said, "Your Pa will get a late supper if I fool away time here;" and soon she was returning from the spring bearing the cedar bucket filled brimmed with water; and her attitude was much that ascribed to "Edna Earl," if her chant was not so grand and Homeric as sublime. Her song was a triumphal contrast to Watson's, and something like this:

"Say, darkey, have you seen ole masa,
With the mustach on his face,
Go'ing ob road some time dis morning
Like he's gwine to leab de place?
He seed me way up de plantin,
Whar de Linkum gun-boats lay;
He picked up his hat and left very sudden,
I spec dat he's run away.
Masa run away!
Darkeys stay, oho!
Mus be leave dat de kingdom's comin',
Or de year of jubilo!"

Since that day I have often thought of Lily's story, and while it lacks many of the true essentials of first-class literature, still it is much as told it. I regret that I have forgotten many of her peculiar Africanized English expressions; for it is customary to put in all possible scraps of foreign language, and if I could but imitated the foregoing pages with a few genuine quotations from the negro dialect they would be less wonderstood, and hence more popular, than French or Greek.

This defect I confess; for even when I heard the story the language of Lily was good English for a country servant.

There is more than one hearty child now in the cabin which they may one day own, and as I see them from time to time beneath the sheltering arms of the broad oak above their humble home, and behold the steady, honest labor which cheers their poverty and lessens it day by day, I ask myself, for their children, if not for themselves, there is not a brighter beyond than this they now possess; a Canaan beyond some Jordan for their travel.

Hansell Ruff is the most obedient and faithful of all his humble and faithful race, and yet his father was a freedman and his grandsire was a KING.

FLOATING FOR DEER IN THE ADIRONDACKS.

One artist thus describes the subject of his sketch on page 676:

Some time after nightfall we lit the two candles in the jack and let the shanty, taking the trail for the lake a few rods distant. Finding the light skiff we quickly blew out the candles, and set the jack-staff in its position in the bow. MAX took the paddle in the stern. Shoving off I located in the forward seat with face toward the bow. Now all was quiet. Presently a slight wash against the side of the boat, as she was urged with noiseless paddle among and through the water lily leaves that grow there. Some moments elapsed, during which time I had made some astronomical observations, and MAX had made a considerable distance with our little craft: now we were only floating, for the paddle, though still in the water, was motionless. It was indescribable: the lake was only broken by the occasional splash of a trout jumping for a miller, or the hoot of an owl far up on the mountainside. Splash! went the oar down by the marsh at the lower end of the lake. I stop my musing. MAX's paddle is moving slowly: an occasional push is strongest. Splash! splash! again. The paddle-stroke is stronger, but no noise. I feel for my matches and the rough pebbles that are to be used for lighting them. The paddle-stroke now is longer and slower. The boat is being headed directly toward the spot from which the occasional sound of the splashes seems to come. Again the paddle is still; match and pebble are ready. I am awaiting MAX's signal—a slight jerk of the boat. Then the match is lit, and hidden in the hands until it burns freely; now up to the candles, which are lit in an instant, and the jack is turned fair to the front. The paddle is already sending the boat forward. MAX is no longer guided by the splash; two bright sparks of light glow through the darkness in front of us; these are the eyes of the deer. In a moment more there is a light spot discernible. Gradually this takes shape. The boat is just moving; my rifle is slung forward and cocked; now we are within twenty yards of a handsome buck. The motion of the boat has ceased. The slight jerk that comes from MAX is answered by a stream of fire which flames from the buck rifle-barrel; this for a single instant lights up the scene. The crack of the rifle echoes and re-echoes across the lake and among the forest-clad hillsides. "Jump twice," quoth MAX. "Bustin' shoot over the Plains after buffaler no' the like ain't took none of the shoot off run, that's sure. The deer that was, venison that be, will now take a ride on the lake," remarked MAX, as we proceeded to land the dead deer into the boat, and shove off for the shanty, on the way to which we laughed over the scene that we had both witnessed while paddling green eyes up to deer. "Many's the buck-shot-gun I've seen emptied by fellers close up to the wild cattle that climb over downwoods ains without doing worse than getting up a scare for them," said MAX, as his now nosy paddle splashed and splashed again.

OCTOBER.

Oh crickets, hush your bodieg song!
I know the truth it makes so plain—
Ye say that autumn dies ere long,
And soon the winter will be here.
Will chill the pallid world again.

Oh, mournful wind of midnight, cease
Thy breathe your low prophetic sigh,
Too clearly for my spirit's peace
I see the mellow days decrease,
And feel Decembers coming pitch.

Fall silently, October rain,
Nor take that wailing under-tone—
For best so lonely it is plain—
The sad, monotonous refrain
Which tells me summer-time has flown.

Be charter of your pinions grim
Oh goldenest month of all the throng!
Oh poor less lovelyist your rays!
Heard carolling from every bough,
So haply it may last more long!

Speadthrift October! art thou wise
Who wastest in the forest prime
More beauty on the earth and skies,
More hue and glow, than would suffice
To brighten all the summer time?

Yes—better autumn all delight,
And then a winter all nubbed,
Than months of mingled joy and blight,
Of faded tints and pallid light,
Imperfect dreams and broken rest.

And better far it is to know
One wholly happy, perfect year,
One time of cloudless joy and glow—
An hour when all the heart is free—
Than this commingled hope and fear.

This doubt and dread which naught consoles—
Which stays from earth the promised's prime:
This dark uncertainty which rolls
Like chariot-wheels across our souls,
And leaves all dim the future time.

So pour your light, October skies,
Oh fairest skies which ever are!
Let on, O Hotels, your splendor drop,
And smile, although the cricket cries,
And winter threatens from afar!

THE HONEYMOON HOTEL.

If you are getting on in years, and want to be reminded seriously of the flight of Time, I recommend you (and especially if you do not go to the Capels) to resort to the Honeymoon Hotel. Its situation is "salubrious"—a word, by-the-by, that seems exclusively appropriated by advertisers—and its prospects it commands sublime. The charges, it is true, are enormous; but then it is not every hotel that is visited by a royal personage. Such a visitor, at least of the deepest wonder as to how they ever got there, but also with incamonable delight, was the object of the admiration of two persons; for there the guests of the Honeymoon Hotel are to be found seated in front of it, the one being discovered on the other in the garden below) looking at one another, and apparently with but one arm apiece. These couples are all young, and, I should hopefully, and I dare say accomplished. They are egotistic, sorry for themselves, and, I dare say that I am displeased upon my own account. The contemplation of that unalloyed bliss was something too aggressive. Besides, I had myself so separate to this careless bridegroom; I should treat his Emma so differently if she were my Emma; it seems to me that I should never get tired of her winning ways.

When I said that these happy couples made no acquaintance with their fellow-pairs, I did not mean it to be inferred that they took no notice of one another; quite the reverse. The rival platforms would regard one another, when each thought the other was not looking, with the eye of a professional sufferer or broker; one, so to speak, took stock of his other from head to foot, and certainly did not overestimate her value—the other Edwin's bargain. Yes, I am quite confident, from the expression of their faces while making these calculations, that they were not extravagant ones. The bridegroom was perhaps indiscious enough to praise, but the bride only appraised. She took no notice of the other husbands whatever. You see there was only one man in the world as far as she was concerned; but she was not quite so certain that for her Edwin (although he was almost an angel) there was only one woman. At least upon no other ground can I account for her evident hostility toward those who seemed to me as lovely and innocent as herself. As for the rival Edwins, they were not aware of the existence of Angelina.

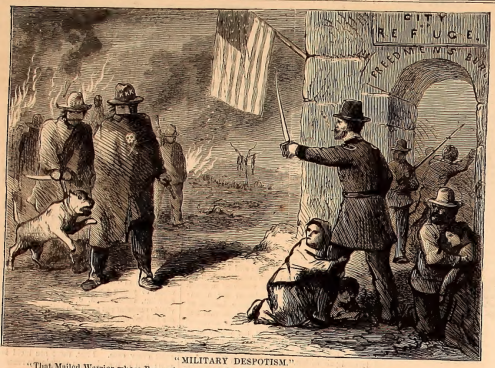
The position of my wife and myself among these ring-doves was incongruous and embarrassing enough; but if a gentleman and his family were to arrive at the Honeymoon Hotel, I do not know what would be done. The diplomatic waiter would have to exert himself, I suppose, that he had mistaken the character of that establishment altogether. There is no accommodation for children — no facilities for the entertainment of "[illegible]" exceeding two in number. The vehicles kept on hire are generally of that description which Mr. Punch has associated with sending articles to the wash; there are no donkey and basket-carriages, such as lotus-eater while Emma drives the pony. Since the institution of the Ark, in fact, I should doubt whether any dwelling-place has been constructed so exclusively for the reception of Pairs as the Honeymoon Hotel. It is not adapted for the larger type of matrimony, but is all arranged, devoted to young persons laboring under mental delusion, intoxication, delirium. There is no private retreat put upon the prices; the rooms are padded only in the sense of being exceedingly comfortable; yet the treatment pursued seems to be of a padded description. In a word, Bedlam at most, there is a sensible improvement in attendance over that of First, there are "keepers;" and in time Reason completely reassumes her sway.

The intelligent proprietor favored me with many curious anecdotes concerning the afflicted persons who resorted to his establishment; but I do not consider myself justified in repeating them. The patients referred to are all thoroughly cured, and might recognize with pain the description of their individual lunacy. Upon the whole, I may say that no reformatory or other institution for the amelioration of my fellow-creatures with which I am acquainted is afforded me so much interest as did my observations at the Honeymoon Hotel. To the friends of "Those who are about to marry," I do most conscientiously recommend this well-conducted retreat; while even other elderly couples—for no bachelor would of course visit such a place will be found to exercise a wholesome effect. It will convince them of the absurdity of that period of their lives in which they are accustomed to sentimentally regret as its palmy time. The bill being framed, there is every thing else to benefit the young couples only; may be thought by others a little extortionate; but then, as I before observed, a generous moral lesson is going (along with the fees to servants). It will be most unmistakably impressed upon you that you are not so young as you used to be; and that you are out of the category of Honeymoon couples altogether; and that the description of bliss of which you are perhaps an unconscious relic, may be obtained for your boys and girls in due time, but never more for you.

I confess, for my own part, that on one or two occasions I did feel just a little envious. Was it wrong? Ah, but if you had only seen the Emmas! Upon the whole, however, in our stolid, long-wedded matter-of-fact fashion, we enjoyed ourselves at the Honeymoon Hotel, notwithstanding that I saw my own folly. The beautiful little sitting-room was taken over our heads, as it were, by a couple of young people, evidently just one worst stage of the honeymoon, and whose united ages could not have exceeded forty. I heard the female voice make some remarks concerning me, as I passed them in the hall, which I felt sure was of a complimentary character, but being a little deaf, I could not catch the exact words.

"What was it that charming pretty girl said about me?" inquired I of my consort as we drove away.

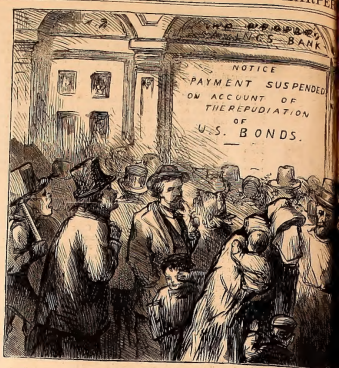
"I don't agree with you that she is pretty," replied she, pouting; "but she said something was: 'How like that gentleman is to dear papa!'"



"Well, my love," replied I, "the coachman was right; and we have no business at the Honeymoon Hotel, for we are a pair of old uns."

"Yet he added," said my wife, with a touching tenderness in her voice that was by no pleasant, nevertheless, and I think we did so."

"My dear," said I, "you are an angel;" and although I dare say the remark has been heard often enough in the neighborhood of the Honeymoon Hotel, I doubt if it was ever so near the truth.



AN UNKNOWN SOLDIER.

THE Quarter-Master-General has requested us to publish the portrait of a soldier who died on the 23d of May, 1864, in the Armory Square Military Hospital in the city of Washington. When he was brought to the hospital this soldier was so weak that he could not give any information as to his name, regiment, or corps; and on searching his effects, which were taken charge of by the proper officer of the Government, a sum of money and the ambrotype or ferrotype of a child were found. Surgeon D. W. Bliss, in charge of the hospital, caused a photograph to be taken after death, which we publish on page 684 at the request of the War Department, in the hope that it may lead to the restoration of his effects to his wife or child. Any inquiries in regard to him, with duplicates of the portrait of child supposed to be his, and found among his effects, should, with other proof of relationship, be addressed to General M. C. MEIGS, Quarter-Master-General, Washington, D. C.

DEMOCRATIC DEMONSTRATION IN NEW YORK CITY.

NEW YORK CITY is the great political rendezvous of the Democratic party in this State. Blot out the city and the State is overwhelmingly Republican. The great question in the rural districts at any momentous crisis is, Can we overcome the Democratic majority of the metropolis? It is not to be wondered at, then, that the Democratic party should have "demonstrated" on the largest possible scale in New York City. Of course, the whole thing was under the control of the Tammany organization, which in July showed the measure of its strength by the nomination of SEYMOUR and BLAIR, and in the announcement of a political platform which on the one hand undermines the basis of national credit, and on the other distinctly proposes revolution as the remedy of Democratic discontent. These results, to be sure, are not all to be accredited to the Tammany Society alone; WADE HAMPTON and other representatives of the late Confederacy had their say, and YALLANDIGHAM was not without a voice.

Tammany Hall was the centre of this recent demonstration. And how appropriate it was that General "BALDY" SMITH, who has ventilated his not altogether unprejudiced notions of GRANT'S generalship in the New York World, should become the chairman of this grand Democratic mass meeting! General MCCLELLAN had been invited to preside on this occasion, but, politely as possible, he had said to the Committee, "No, gentlemen, I thank you." But the General could not refrain from doing honor to GRANT justice in the very face of those who had heaped upon the latter such a shower of calumnies—he is the highest respect for the services he has rendered our country."

We have not publish in detail the speeches which were made by SANFORD E. CHURCH, HENRY C. MURPHY, MAYOR HOFFMAN, and ALLEN C. BEACH; the trite arguments of these politicians are too familiar to our readers to need either mention or refutation. Suffice it to say there was an immense crowd in attendance, and an immense procession, and that the Democrats were satisfied. The affair reminds us of two former occasions in the same sort, under the auspices of the same party—and both were followed by a crushing Democratic defeat.

THE SETTING STAR.

SET, pallid star, the yellow light
Is waking on the slopes of corn,
The autumned woods upon the height
Are golden-penciled by the morn.

Set, fading star, the happy sky
Is blushing at the kiss of day,
Set, ere thy saddened lustre die
In the rich rays that track his way.

Set, darkened star, the silver stream
That took the image through the night
Will lose it soon in fuller gleam:
Set, ere it learn a new delight.

Tremble no longer on the brink,
Droop downward, sinking skies of rest,
Droop downward, setting star, and sink
Before the twilight leaves the west.

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER CHARACTERS

AS WELL AS CASES.

THERE is not a pleasanter sea-side resort in the country than Rye Beach, and it is most especially pleasant because, possessing all the picturesqueness of Newport and Long Branch, it also has a quiet which they never enjoy—at least never in the season. It is an old town with a quaint history—one that dates back of dozens of others along our northeastern coast, but still interesting alike to annual antiquarian visitors like myself, and the casual fashionables, like the crew of others, who are here now. The beach is very fine, the sea view very grand, and the surrounding scenery, as you may back from the beach, very picturesque, and of a character to make one wonder why the ancient inhabitants of these gable-roofed houses, with such immense dormer windows, gave the town such a misnomer as Sand Haven.

Its attractions are greatest for old people like myself, but you are not to imagine that there are no young people to be found here. It is chiefly the resort of old people, but you are not to infer that no "rapid" men or "lively" ladies ever come here in the summer. Its economy makes it the resort of people with shattered fortunes as well as shattered constitutions, but you are not to suppose that these visitors are all invalids, are shabby-genteel people and consumptives. Quite the contrary. Some of the handsomest turnouts we have, among both the visitors and the residents, you shall say, healthy and wealthy people; and there can not be found in any part of the world more charming young women, or more perfect young gentlemen, than the pair of couples of Sand Haven whose romance has just concluded with the present season, and of which this is the faithful history.

You must know that we have no grand hotels and summer cottages here as at Newport and Long Branch. The visitors to Sand Haven board find comfortable shelter and good board in these same gable-roofed and dormer-windowed houses of the residents. And each resident thinks it a obligatory on him or her to take a summer boarder or two, as a good Methodist does to care for at least one Minister during Conference. And one of the most prompt and pleasing in the exercise of this remunerative duty is the Widow Pernell, whose little Gothic-like cottage is one of the most popular in the village—at least it has been heretofore, though I should not be surprised to find that next season will reveal a decline in its popularity, since Jennie and Kate, who were the secrets of the old house's attractiveness, have flown, or fled, or been abstracted, as you may choose to call it when you get through.

The Widow Pernell's girls are by all odds, and for that matter have been for three or four seasons back, a little the prettiest of the pretty girls in the town, visitors or residents. They are of the Saxon type—fair-haired, blue-eyed, coral-lipped, rosy-cheeked, with skins as white and transparent as alabaster, and that skin so smooth and soft that one's very finger tips seem to touch it. Then they are so pleasant in their manner, so winning in their ways, so cheerful, obliging, complaisant, incessant talkers, that they have won the favor of all who visited the house.

The ages of Jennie and Kate are respectively twenty-one and twenty-three. Of course, they have had for years back plenty of admirers. All kinds of flattering compliments were paid to them. But they took no heed of all those nice sayings and tender looks; they thought that every one was singularly kind to them, and they endeavored to respond to it by making themselves as agreeable and as chatty as they possibly could. Indeed, some conceited fops imagined because they received a cheerful answer and a smiling glance that they had made an impression. Nothing of the sort. They were forgotten as soon as they were away.

The fact is, the girls were too constantly and closely occupied to pay any attention to such one-minded remarks, direct compliments, and the somewhat impudent leers to which they were subjected. They were too busy to serve, as many demands to honor, so many wants to supply, that they had as much as they could do without adding to it the responsibility of listening to the rubbish which would have been poured into their ears if they had had time to listen to it or had given the encouragement for it to have been done. In fact, the girls had so grown into womanhood, surrounded by flirts, and were so thoroughly schooled by experience in the arts of others in flirtation, that it is no wonder that education and natural inclination combining they were perfect little coquettes. This was developed without design, with just the same innocence that the bee coquets with the flower; and in all the love scenes in which they figured they were so lively, so lovely, so kindly, and sensible withal, that the susceptible youths, who were continually proposing and proposed, never for a minute call a premeditated encouragement on their part, or any thing harsh in the laughing refusals which were sure to follow their proposals. They laughed at love, and laughed through life as merry as crickets and busy as bees about their work. To which their old mother with their aid kept its such perfect trim.

The earliest applicant for a room at Mrs. Pernell's this summer past was Mr. Gerald Payne, a young professional man—a physician, I believe, but one by courtesy rather than practice. He had more than one reason, and could afford to neglect the few he had while he spent the summer at the sea-side; and being of a most somewhat sentimental turn of mind he chose Sand Haven and the Widow Pernell's as the place for a summer's rest to 68.

He came to Sand Haven and lounged on the beach for a day or two alone, and then, like all the rest of it, he succumbed to the indoor attractions, and lounged about the Widow Pernell's, preferring to listen to the singing of her pretty birds rather than to the sea nature. I have since been told that he had remarked to Mrs. Pernell on the first evening of his stay that her "daughters were full of music," and that, a few days after, encountering Kate with a broom in her hand sweeping the little parlor and singing as she swept, he had remarked, "You must be a very happy young lady, Miss Kate, you are always singing at your work."

"Oh yes," she had sung just as you gentlemen whistle at your work—'for want of thought.'"

"Ah! but some men whistle when planning deepest; are we to suppose you are plotting mischief when you sing? I shall have to give you credit then for deep much."

"I won't admit that I mean mischief; Jennie is the mischief plotter—at least she mischief has come by her; she is woefully ringed lately. She used to be as merry as a cricket and as happy as a lark. Now 'see where the poor thing comes moping.'"

"I fancied your sister was of a more sentimental turn of mind than yourself."

"So she is lately, but I am not. I am not for her, I assure you."

Jennie had entered the room and blushed as she comprehended these last sentences. Had they indeed noticed a change in her manner? Was she displeased at her sister's words? She was forced to admit she had; but what or who had effected the metamorphosis? Perhaps the explanation may be found in the following words:

"I congratulate you, Mr. Payne," she said, "you are to have a delightful companion in the house."

"You should have previously congratulated me on already possessing two," he replied, trying to be gallant.

Jennie blushed, but Kate burlesqued his manner, and laughed at his sentiment; then Jennie blushed, with some little confusion, to explain.

"Mother has a letter," she said, "from Mr. Gregory—the one who was here last summer. Kate—and he is coming down to stay the summer through with us. You do not seem overglad."

Katie had evinced a sudden serious or sentimental disposition on this announcement, and when her sister noticed and remarked on it, she blushed as palpably as her sister had. But she recovered herself with more readiness, and explained:

"Oh, I see no reason to be glad. The two gentlemen will be either bathing or smoking all the time, and in either case we shall see nothing of them, for there is no object in Nature so repulsive to me as a man in a bathing-suit or smoking a pipe."

"Why, Katie!" exclaimed Jennie.

"Now, don't be prudish, Jennie," retorted the lively little beauty; "you know you feel the same way, and I don't see why we need conceal it. But I am glad Mr. Gregory is coming, for he is a clever, good fellow, and you used to be real fond of him."

Mr. Gregory duly made his appearance, and was duly installed in his old quarters. The duty of receiving him devolved on Jennie. She and Katie and Mr. Payne were in the parlor—Jennie knitting; Katie chatting like a little chatter-box, and saying all sorts of saucy things to Mr. Payne, reminding him of reminiscences and frowns of her sister; while Payne lounged on the sofa, and indolently admired the handsome Jennie at the window. But on the appearance of Mr. Gregory in the distance—Jennie from her place at the window had discovered him—Katie in some confusion fled from the room, declaring she was in no condition to see any one, "except you," she said to Mr. Payne, on making her error, "and you are quite domesticated now; I look on you quite as one of the family."

Jennie at this bent lower than ever over her knitting, and Payne stammered out half aloud, half to himself, some stupid answer or comment on the young lady's words.

Jennie soon put aside blushes, and knitting, too, to receive the new guest, and was most profuse in her welcome to Mr. Gregory. Payne was, with some discontent, that the young man was, by virtue of a former session in the house, in most cordial relations with the young lady; he noticed the cordiality and ease of Miss Jennie's welcome, and not being a very profound student of close observation of human character, concluded at once that the ease, as well as the cordiality, was due, not only to the familiarity, but also to the affectionate regard of their former intercourse.

"Wise judges are we of each other," as the poet says; but most we err when judging of the motives, feelings, thoughts, and passions of the opposite sex.

When the two young men were introduced, Mary glared at Payne for a minute or two.

"This Mr. Gregory," said Payne to himself, "is here to make love: he looks it in his dress and face. He is good-looking, too, and has the inside track of me."

"I wonder how long this chap has been here," said Mr. Gregory to himself. "He has been making love, that's evident; but I rather fancy it's not to Jennie, or she wouldn't be so delighted to see me. I'm not in his line."

Another wise Daniel come to judgment, this!

It was not until nightfall that Katie again made her appearance. It was at the tea-table, and she looked all blushes and beauty, and gave the tips of her fingers to Mr. Gregory with as much hauteur as if he had offended her. He was evidently overjoyed to see her again, and said so, in a stammering way—not only to said so in confusion. She offered her a seat at the table beside him, but she took care to avoid accepting it, and, seating herself beside Mr. Payne, remarked "that this was her place."—And Jennie, speaking with unusual liveliness, added, "You shall be to-morrow, Mr. Gregory. I've no doubt we shall get along charmingly."

Gregory did not smile and bow as he should have done, and Mr. Payne only scowled across the room at him.

A week of the most comical adventures followed. Mr. Gregory was, in Mr. Payne's opinion, almost engaged to Miss Jennie, and she was desperately fond of him. She was as lively as a cricket in his presence, and coquetted with him as a mouse in his own. While she was sad and sentimental with him, she was most pleasantly sharp and mischievous with Mr. Payne. Gregory. If they went to the beach, Jennie was sure to avoid, and Kate appeared only too eager to accept his escort. In the natural consequence of all this was, that while Mr. Payne believed Mr. Gregory to be in love with Jennie and she rather fond of him, Mr. Gregory, who had only been in love with Kate for a whole season, was certain that Payne had secured their fair friend, and that she was only too fond of him.

The quartette went to church together: Mr. Payne offered his arm to Jennie, and somehow by a series of accidents and natural understanding between the girls, Kate accepted it, while, much to the chagrin and a little to the astonishment of Mr. Gregory, Jennie seized his arm with what appeared to Mr. Payne an undue haste; and thus the girls marched off with each lover's favor. Mr. Payne, seemingly preoccupied, escorted arrangement Jennie was seated as far as possible from Mr. Payne and next to Mr. Gregory in the pew, while Kate slily slipped her mother between herself and Mr. Payne. This little trick was the only consolation which the day and the service offered Mr. Gregory.

During the remainder of the day Payne manifested to Jennie a little serious talk with Jennie, though mainly in the presence of Mr. Gregory, who, deprived of the company of Katie (that young lady, as we have before said, pouting, had somewhat secluded herself of late), made himself conspicuous in intruding upon Jennie and Payne. She, we have half delighted, half vexed at the sister when the other is absent. Decidedly politic young man he is," thought Gregory. As for Jennie, she was half delighted, half vexed at this play of cross-purposes, while Mr. Payne was thoroughly provoked at the want of consideration on Mr. Gregory's part. The same evening the two young men asked the girls to take a walk, and they accepted, but, either through design on the part of the girls or confusion on that of the men, Jennie walked with Gregory and Kate with Mr. Payne; and much to the distress of the two lovers the girls seemed in excess their companions very much indeed. The hilarity of Jennie on this occasion, so timid and retiring when alone with him, was most harassing to Mr. Payne; while the lively chatting of Katie, so quiet and reserved with him, by no means had the soothing effect of music on Mr. Gregory.

"Katie has grown to be very beautiful girl since you were here, Mr. Gregory," remarked Jennie, as they caught the laugh of that young lady above the roar of the breakers.

"She is pretty lovely!" he exclaimed, with ardor.

"Isn't she? That's what all the young men who come to Sand Haven say."

Gregory grossed.

"I suppose she has had plenty of offers."

"Any number," replied Jennie, "such as they were."

"And she has accepted one:" questioned Gregory, hastily.

"None as yet."

"Not even this?"

"His? whose?"

"Payne's—Dr. Payne's?"

Jennie stopped short, and stared at him in some surprise.

"Do you not think that Katie and Payne are engaged?" he queried again.

"I never heard of it," she answered, with a perplexed and astonished look on her face.

"If you do not think the indications are very strong that there is or will be such an engagement?"

"I can't believe it possible," she answered, in a tone which was meant less for him than herself.

This conversation had a singularly enlivening effect on Gregory, but Miss Jennie became depressed in spirits for the rest of the day, and more or less during the walk. But until Jennie refused any explanation save the assertion that it was "better to be openly ill-natured than secretly deceitful." And Gregory laughed and remarked that Jennie had apparently determined to be both. And further on in the discussion, which resulted in no explanation or understanding, Katie remarked with equal justice that Jennie's character had suddenly changed for the worse. And thereupon Jennie retorted that Katie had lately thrown aside her old nature, and was as changed in character as in beauty. In such examinations and recriminations they rapidly progressed to angry and disappointed words—and Eve and Eve's fall of fame.

Something of the same circumstances led Mr. Gregory to the room of Mr. Payne, but it was much in demonstrative contrast to Jennie's explain to him his situation. He was satisfied that a mutual understanding would be to the interest of both. Jennie's denial of any engagement between Katie and Mr. Payne had greatly encouraged him, and when Payne answered "Come in" to the knock of Mr. Gregory, that gentleman entered with a clearly defined smile illuminating his countenance, and beautifying it, as a smile always does any face, male or female, though unfortunately few people seem to know this simple fact of physiognomy.

That encountering the same pleasant countenance of Mr. Payne, Mr. Gregory became somewhat confused, and he discovered the task of explanation would be more easy of performance.

"I called to—to ask the pleasure of a cigar with you," he began, hesitatingly.

"Certainly, certainly, said Payne, politely, but very stiffly. "Take a chair."

"Thank you. You smoke a pipe, I see."

"Yes."

"I never did—I prefer the cigar." Then, hesitating for a moment, as if in want of another topic, or debating how to begin, he at length took refuge in the pipe again, and asked, simply enough:

"Meerschaums?"

Payne looked at him in some surprise, and with something of a scowl. At length, handing him the pipe, he said:

"Do you know the article when you see it?"

For half an hour Mr. Gregory talked of every thing without interest, much to the astonishment of Payne, who at length really began to imagine that his companion was a little simple-minded. He might have been talking about the bush to this day if Payne had not, to aid him out of a long speech, in which he had plunged without conversation, and in which he had become inextricably confused, remarked very quietly:

"You seem to like Miss Jennie, Mr. Gregory."

"And I think I have great reason to be. The fact is, I came to tell you about the cause of my sudden departure, and to—well, really to come to a mutual understanding with you about—about—in fact, about the girls."

"Sir!"

"You see, Doctor, I had the happiness this evening to be walking with Miss Jennie."

"I am aware of this, Sir. It seems to me that you have had that pleasure very frequently of late. But it is a subject we have no right and I have no disposition to talk about; so, if you please, we'll have no more of it."

"I was only going to say that I had what was to me a very important and pleasant conversation with Miss Jennie."

"Sir, I can't want to hear of your conversations with any body."

"It was on a subject in which you are concerned."

"Sir! By what right do you suppose me to be concerned in the mutual affairs of you and Miss Pernell? Now, once for all, no more of it—I shall be obliged to you if you will retire."

"I only sought an explanation. Miss Jennie was good and kind enough—"

"Leave the room, Sir!" exclaimed Payne, starting up—"leave the room, or I shall put you out."

"I must say you are very unreasonable. It was only in regard to an engagement of marriage—"

Payne could stand no more, but instantly seizing Gregory he attempted to thrust him from the room. But Gregory had no intention of allowing such an indignity, and in a second more the two men were struggling with an energy that produced ample enough to rouse the Seven Sleepers, if they had been occupants of the gable-roofed cottage of Mrs. Pernell instead of caves with unpronounceable and unreckonable names. At any rate, it did rouse the widow and her daughters, and they rushed into the room to bring the combat to a close. On their presence, it needed only an exclamation each from the two young ladies, and a scream from the old lady, to bring about a cessation of hostilities, if it did not produce actual peace. And a minute or two after both young men, heartily ashamed of themselves, began apologizing in answer to these demands of the widow and her daughters, viz.:

"I am very sorry, ladies," said Gregory, "but I was attacked and had to defend myself."

"I had ordered this gentleman to leave my room," said Dr. Doctor; "He intruded here ostensibly to take a smoke, but ended by insulting me."

"I deny that; I came to explain—"

"There was—there is nothing to explain; leave the room, if you please."

"I shall not."

"Oh, gentlemen, don't quarrel!" exclaimed the widow.

"I hope you will be calm, Doctor," pleaded Jennie, taking his arm and endeavoring to draw him away. "Mr. Gregory, if you do not keep quiet and conduct yourself I'll never like—I'll never speak to you again."

"I insist, Mrs. Pernell, on explaining," said Mr. Gregory.

"Please to retire, Sir, and explain elsewhere."

"No, Sir; I'll explain here, and before all parties."

"Miss Pernell, I trust you will understand, and will make this very dull gentleman understand, that another remark on the subject must be odious to me."

"I understand!" exclaimed Jennie. "I do not understand, and I don't know what subject you mean."

"Are you determined to insult me, also?"

"I insult you, Mr. Payne, I—I am incapable of such a thing."

"You do not know what he came here to tell me?"

"I certainly do not," she answered. "I am totally in the dark."

"Then he is merely a hoaster? Did you have no conversation with him to-day upon—upon—love affairs?"

"I certainly did not."

"There, Sir, you hear that!" exclaimed Dr. Payne. "Why, Mrs. Pernell—Miss Jennie, he came here and began telling me that there had been this very evening engaged in marriage to you."

"Sir!" exclaimed Gregory, indignantly.

"Mr. Gregory," exclaimed Jennie, "how could you say such a thing?"

"It is false, I said nothing of the sort."

"Oh, gentlemen, gentlemen!" pleaded the widow, "I hope you don't mean to quarrel and fight about my girls."

"I assure you, Madam, those were his words. He spoke of his engagement to Miss Jennie—"

"No! no! no!" protested Gregory.

"Of how happy she had made him."

"No, no!"

"And could I be expected to hear patiently words that were the death-warrant of my love? for you must know, you must have felt, Jennie, how I loved you."

"Loved her!" exclaimed Gregory, "I had supposed you were engaged to Katie, and is—"

"Engaged to me!" exclaimed Katie. "Nothing of the sort. I never gave him the slightest encouragement."

"Then you do not love him?"

"Love him! no, why should I?"

"And you are free to love me?"

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Dr. Payne.

"Then it was about a supposed engagement between Katie and me that you were talking about, and I suppose you engaged to Jennie."

"Precisely; and you are not engaged?"

"Not to Katie, but—" And he turned to Jennie, but she had quietly slipped from the room.

"What a couple of fools we have been!" exclaimed Gregory. "I beg your pardons a thousand times. And Katie—" he turned to see her disappearing through the door. The two young men stared at each other for an instant; then, as it suddenly inspired with the idea that the hour of fate for them had arrived, they rushed off in different directions in search of the fair Oracles who were to pronounce their sentences. A few minutes afterward Dr. Payne was at the feet of Jennie in the parlor, and Mr. Gregory had seized on Katie in the dining-room engaged in the housewifely duty of dusting in a vain effort to hide her confusion, and in equal confusion and much more ardor insisted on clasping the blushing beauty, dirty duster and all, to his palpitating bosom.

And in the mean time Mrs. Pernell was left standing in the centre of the room "the monarch of all she surveyed," and alone she still remains, for at the close of the season her summer lodgers carried her girls off to winter residences in the city; and thus these circumstances which I have narrated altered the characters and conditions of all the personages concerned in more senses than one.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A NEW style of postage-stamps will soon supersede those now in use. The contract for the supply has been awarded by the Postmaster-general to the National Bank Note Company of New York. The new stamps will be somewhat smaller than those in use at present, and are delicate and elegant engravings. Three of the set illustrate the postal service; the two-cent stamp represents a primitive mail-carrier on horseback, such as is still necessary among the sparse population of the West; the three-cent stamp shows a mail train, as illustrating the land-service, while the twelve-cent denomination exhibits a steamer at sea, as an exemplification of the ocean mail. The fifteen cent stamps bear a portrait of Washington, being an accurate copy of the engraving on the United States. The ten and thirty cent stamps are oval gems; the former being a portrait of Franklin, "Bearer of Despatches," the latter, "Commerce between the States." Some new and ingenious modes of cancellation have been submitted to the Post-office Department, but they were considered too complex, and the old method will continue in use.

Apropos of vending postage-stamps, we recently heard from a reliable source a very good story. Some time ago a respectable-looking individual, wearing a weak and pompous but benevolent expression, called upon the authorities of the London Post-office. He announced that he had invented a machine for removing the cancellation mark from stamps so perfectly that it could not be detected. The statement was doubted, and he desired an opportunity to prove it. At his request he was left alone with a letter on which was a cancelled stamp. In a few moments he exhibited the letter with an uncelled stamp upon it, which was identical with the other. The officials were eager to know the secret, but the discoverer demanded five hundred pounds ere he revealed it. At length, being promised, he proceeded to exhibit a machine operandi. He took from his pocket a little bottle, a small sponge, and a tooth-brush. "This bottle is soft water in this bottle," he explained, "and I pour a little on the sponge—so, and then I rub the sponge on the sponge, so—and then I rub the stamp very gently, so"—suiting the action to the word with great tenderness—"very gently, or you will injure it; and then I take a little more water, and a little more soap, and rub a little more, and by-and-by the stamp is perfectly clean, as you will see!" A London gentleman having likewise received from Washington an official document with a long row of stamps upon it, removed by this process the cancellation marks with not a little pains, and returned the stamps to the sender, offering to sell the secret very cheap! Whether the Government responded to the jocose proposal is uncertain.

Extensive fires have been raging in the woods and prairie lands of Oregon. In the Wallamet Valley the sun for many days was only visible at mid-day, and then obscurely, like the moon elsewhere. Traveling has been dangerous both by land and water on account of the thick smoke.

A "Medicinal Mud Mound" is reported from Braintree, Texas. It covers an area of about half a mile in diameter. It is a round, conical elevation about two hundred feet above the level of the surrounding prairie. At the apex of this mound is found an extra earth, a little of which acidifies water so strongly that it operates as ordinary telegraph battery.

But what gives special interest to the mound is the fact that water in which the earth has been steeped has recently been found to possess medicinal virtues. Every man can have medicinal water at his door by obtaining a barrel of this earth, which can be procured at this time more per bushel than corn. For the information of the system from this locality, however, a long attacks of intermittent fever, the water in which this sour earth has been steeped is considered a sovereign remedy.

There is a telegraph operator in St. Louis who lost his hearing some months ago and believed there was an end of telegraphy, in which he has become a remarkable adept. His method of receiving a query is extremely interesting. Not hearing a single sound he places his hand upon the working instrument, or his knee against the operating table, and by his peculiar and sensitive nerves feels every vibration so distinctly that he is able to answer promptly and with the accuracy of his reports. He hears nothing about him, is never disturbed, and consequently works in a silent world of his own.

We may be wiser in our generation than those of olden time regarding the manufacture of clothing of fences and midsummers; but our ancestors had some very excellent notions and believed those who willfully trifled with the public health should be dealt with severely. In 1314 a London baker was convicted for selling putrid bread; and a man and woman suffered the punishment of the pillory for selling bread made of bad materials and deficient weight. Some years later a certain dealer was sentenced to be put upon the pillory, and two putrid beef carcasses to be burned under him for exposing the said carcasses for sale. Similar instances are very frequent in the old records of London. In the time of Henry V. the substitution of wines and the sale of false wines were punished by the pillory.

The Sixth Fair of the Mechanics' Institute which has been recently held in San Francisco is pronounced a great success. The edifice erected for the occasion, embracing nearly the whole area of a public square, contained articles exhibited by nearly 1000 persons. By far the larger portion of these articles represented the inventive and mechanical genius, the manufacturing enterprise and products of California. Many inventions adapted to local wants have been exhibited, one of the most remarkable of which is a steam plow, which seems likely to be of great importance to the harvesting exhibit was made of the new silk industry, which, it is now conceded, will be an ultimate success in California.

Some post made out a list of no less than forty signs of rain as an excuse for not going on an excursion with a friend, once upon a time. It is very certain that the sensibility of many animals and plants to the condition of the atmosphere will often indicate with certainty approaching changes in the weather. When a storm is pending, the spider shortens the thread of his web, and lengthens it again when the storm is about to pass off. The swallow is also an infallible barometer, flying low, almost touching the earth, and uttering a low, plaintive cry before rain, but soaring back and forth high in the air during settled weather. The goose manifests great uneasiness before rain, plunging into the water, and rapidly returning to the land. The crowing of the cricket is a sign of fair weather, but the cry of the tree-toad indicates rain. The leaf of the sensitive plant, moistened with the odor of flowers is strong and penetrating, and in dry weather it is soft and agreeable.

When grapes are nearly mature they will, it is said, endure pretty severe cold without injury. It is not necessary to gather them because a few cold nights come early in the season. The Indian Summer days are favorable to thoroughly ripen them, and many persons think they are sweeter after one or two frosts. Indeed, it has been noticed that most matured fruits, which remain upon the tree, will endure a great deal of cold without injury.

There are at present more than three hundred and fifty woolen mills in seven of the Western States, having together a capital of about $8,500,000. Hence some estimate may be formed of the amount of wool necessary to keep these mills in operation, with corresponding demand to be consumed at home, as Eastern manufactures are realizing.

According to the latest reports, there were 1720 persons married in New York city during the month of August, and 1466 during September.

The Paris Academy of Science has conferred the degree of Bachelier-des-Sciences on a young Russian lady. It is stated of note that Russian ladies have evinced a decided taste for solid studies. Public classes have also been opened for them in St. Petersburg, and there has been a rumor of the establishment of a university for women in that city. Ladies' medical schools and medicine are permitted to practice in St. Petersburg.

It is estimated that sugar-candy is consumed in the United States at the rate of 250,000 pounds a day.

From the report of the Working Women's House In the city we learn that at present there are not far from two hundred and fifty boarders, who occupy the house, fifty-seven being about all of a work for each person. The object has been to furnish every thing at the lowest possible prices. About four hundred boarders can be accommodated in the building. Similar Homes have been established in Philadelphia, Boston, and Brooklyn.

The following incident is related by M. Alexandre Dumas, Jun., in the preface of the second volume of his play: "A few days since Jerome Paturot went to the village near the French capital where George Sand lived. He inquired of many persons, 'Which is George Sand's house?' But nobody could tell him. At length a young woman, who was evidently quite wealthy, she replied, 'George Sand? Why, let's see the lady who is in the papers?' 'Madame Dudevant?' 'Ah! the 'Power Horse,'" recently published by the Messrs. Harper, is considered as among the very finest of their juvenile novels. She writes in a quiet but forcible style, her power of description being one great secret of her success.

WIFE. "Well, my dear, it is so nice to have you here at meal-time." (A big smile.)

HUSBAND. "Yes, I suppose so."

WIFE. "How has your business prospered to-day?" (Another smile.)

HUSBAND. "About as usual."

WIFE. "Come, my dear, supper is ready; let me draw your chair." (In other smile.)

HUSBAND (grufflly). "I am too tired to stir—will till I warm to the fire."

WIFE. "Do as you choose, my dear." (Another sweet smile.)

HUSBAND. "Look o' here, old woman, bothering any more fuss is made about it, I should like to know what in thunder we are gruinin' for."

A WIFE'S BLAST AGAINST TOBACCO.

He sits in a corner from morning to night—
'Tis smoke, chew, smoke!
He rises at dawn his pipe to light,
Goes puffing and chewing with all his might,
Till the hour of sleep. 'Tis his delight
To smoke, chew, smoke.

The quid goes in when the pipe goes out—
'Tis chew, chew, chew!
Now a cloud of smoke goes up from his throat,
Then he mouth sends a constant stream afloat;
'Tis chew, chew, chew!

He sits all day in smoke or fog—
'Tis puff, puff, puff,
He growls at the wife, the cat, and dog,
He covers with filth the hearth and hob,
And his only answer when I give him a jog
Is puff, puff, puff.

The house all o'er, from end to end,
Is filled with smoke, chew, smoke,
In whatever room my way I wend,
If I take his clothes to patch and mend,
Ungrateful perfumes will ever ascend,
Of smoke, chew, smoke.

At home or abroad, afar or near,
He smoke, chew, smoke;
His mouth is stuffed from ear to ear.
Or puffing the stump of a pipe so dear;
And his very will and, I verily fear,
Is smoke, smoke, smoke.

CURIOSITIES IN CELLS.—The ordinary mode of chemical murder in China is to put the victim in a nice, cosy, a dog's skin—tie it on a donkey, mount a boy on him, with rowels in his spurs, and start the length of the animal's care, and then run him four-mile heats.

LAW REFORM.—The next morning the judge of the police court met the lady who had been down and received me cordially; said he had heard of the wonderful things I had accomplished by wandering down five persons and assaulting six others, and was proud to say that I was a prominent citizen, and all that. Then he offered a toast: "Ability or not guilty!" I responded, in a neat but eloquent speech, setting forth the importance of the occasion that had brought us together. After the usual ceremonies, I was requested to load the city ten dollars.

MARY ELLEN (nervous a little). "Don't you think Susan Brown looks dreadful homely?"

BETSY JANE. "Well, she threw over Jack Hart's Charlie! Isn't he a perfect Adonis! How I do wish he would look over here!"

MARY ELLEN (audibly sweetly). "Ah! I see him. He's looking toward us."

BETSY JANE (smartly). "He isn't looking at you, so you needn't act like a fool. The minister's going up, pray."

MARY ELLEN. "Those long prayers of his are positively awful, and I shan't try to keep awake."

BETSY JANE (pooper through her fingers at Charlie). "Go to sleep, dear, I shan't disturb you."

"MR. BROWN, you said the defendant was honest and intelligent. Do you always make up your minds as you quainted with him?" "No, Sir, I never send him. I say, then, do you come to a conclusion?" "Course he takes ten newspapers, and pays for them in advance." Verdict for defendant.

NEW IDEA FOR FAMILY PORTRAITS.—A gentleman from Paris paid a visit to a country dance, in whose parlor he saw the portrait of a lovely woman of, say, three-and-twenty. Upon the entrance of the lady the visitor naturally asked her if the picture was a family portrait, and was told that it represented her deceased daughter. "Has it been long since you lost her?" asked the gentleman. "Alas, Sir," replied the lady, "she died just after her birth, and I have had the portrait painted to represent her as she would appear if she had lived until now."

MONUMENTAL STATUE ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN SEDGWICK BY THE SIXTH CORPS. (LAUNT THOMPSON, SCULPTOR.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD.)

THE SEDGWICK MONUMENT.

A MONUMENT has been erected by the old Sixth Corps to the honor of its illustrious commander, JOHN SEDGWICK. The ceremonies incident to the unveiling of the statue will take place at West Point on the 21st instant, on which occasion the commemorative oration is to be delivered by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS. The Executive Committee consists of the four major-generals of SEDGWICK'S command. The Monument is located in the plain in front of the Commandant's residence at West Point.

We give an illustration of the bronze statue of General SEDGWICK, which is the prominent feature of the Monument, and which was produced by LAUNT THOMPSON, one of the most prominent of American artists.

Underneath the statue is the following inscription:

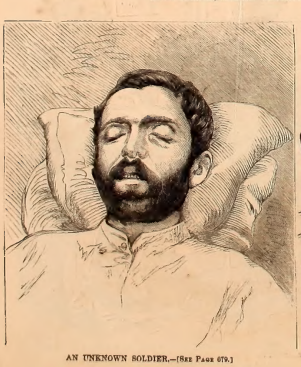
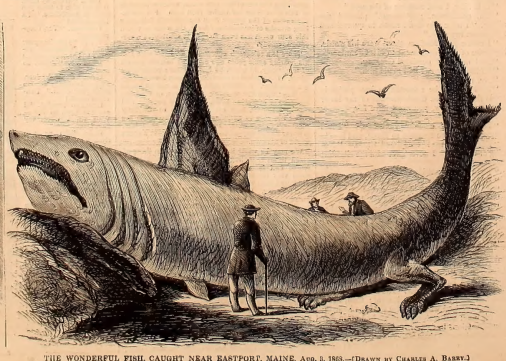
A WONDERFUL FISH.



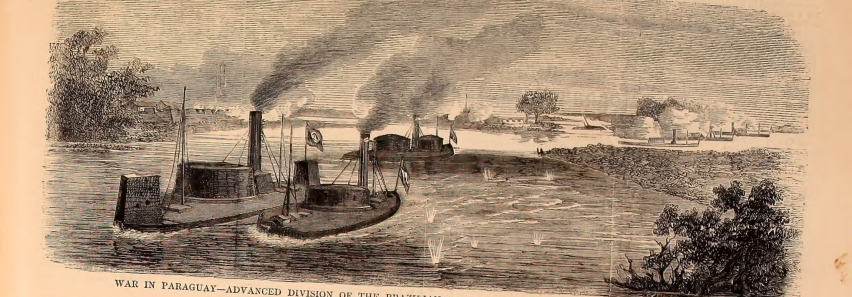
THIS curiosity of natural history, caught "down East," near Eastport, Maine, a few weeks ago, has attracted so much attention and excited so much wonder, even among naturalists, that we give a representation of it in the accompanying illustration. The Bangor Daily Whig gives the following detailed description of this fish:

"The strange animal recently captured near Eastport, meagre reports of which had reached us, arrived in this city a few days ago, and has been on exhibition, during which it has been visited by our citizens, all of whom have expressed their wonder as well at the remarkable size of the monster as at its anomalous character. This animal, part beast and part fish, is over thirty feet in length, and girts twenty-one feet. It has one enormous dorsal fin, two side belly fins, and a broad, shark-like tail. About one-third of its length from its tail, in connection with small fins, it has two huge legs, terminating in web feet. Its mouth makes a line five or six feet in length, the whole extent of which is set with innumerable small teeth, very much resembling in size and shape the kernel of a species of sharp-pointed popcorn. It has a series of gills which overlap each other like the flounces once the style in ladies' dresses. Its immense body, which was estimated to have weighed when captured about eleven tons, had no frame-work of bones, its most solid portions consisting of cartilage incapable of preservation. Its skin is dark and tough, like that of the elephant and rhinoceros.



"There is no record of his species, and to none is it a greater wonder than to naturalists, whose attention is being drawn to it. Among others who have had the opportunity of seeing it is Professor Baird, of the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, who is as yet unable to place it in the known lists of the animal kingdom. It is indeed a veritable wonder calculated to excite popular curiosity, and to invite the researches of the scientific.

"At various times during the past fifteen years a strange monster, believed to be a huge serpent, has been reported seen in Lake Utopia, in New Brunswick, just across the State line; but as these reports in each instance rested upon the testimony of but one or two individuals, they were generally discredited. Latterly, however, the reports and the number of witnesses had so increased as to take the story out of the realm of fiction. On Sunday, August 3, the monster was discovered near the shore on the west side of Eastport Island, where Passamaquoddy Bay is connected with Lake Utopia by a marsh a quarter of a mile long. Being attacked by musketry, it struck for the marsh, and probably for the lake, which was undoubtedly its home, and before being rendered incapable of locomotion, it had worked its way with its fins and legs a number of rods. The report of its presence at once spread to the town, attracting a large number to the spot to aid in its destruction. It received some seventy musket balls, and although attacked in the forenoon, it exhibited signs of life the following day.



"Thus the northeastern point of our State, with the assistance of New Brunswick, has the honor of producing the nearest approach to a veritable sea-serpent, which is destined to make a popular sensation wherever exhibited. It is to be at Portland during the forthcoming State Fair, and is thence bound for Boston, New York, and other principal cities."

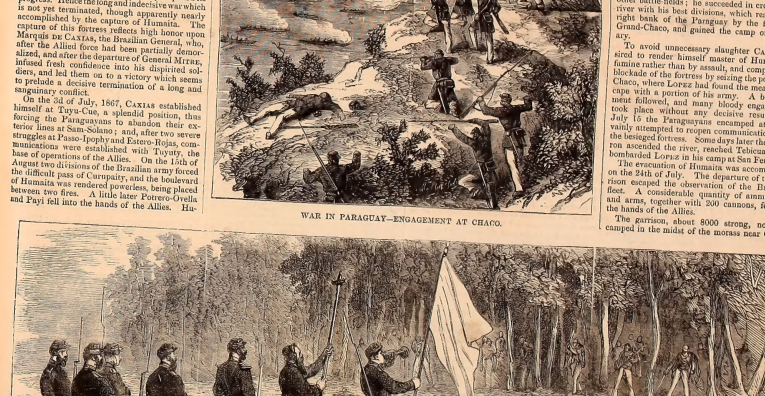
THE WONDERFUL FISH, CAUGHT NEAR EASTPORT, MAINE, AUG. 3, 1868.—[DRAWN BY CHARLES A. BARRY.]

WAR IN PARAGUAY—ADVANCED DIVISION OF THE BRAZILIAN SQUADRON REDUCING THE BATTERIES OF TEBICUARY.

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY.

THE events which have recently taken place in La Plata are of great moment in South America. The Allies, as our readers already know, have made themselves masters of Humaita—a fortress which was deemed impregnable. For nearly four years the little republic of Paraguay, with a population of less than one and a half millions, has maintained the war against Brazil, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic; and we scarcely know which most to admire—the pluck of LOPEZ and his army, or the perseverance of the Allies. LOPEZ was the aggressor. Without a declaration of war, near the close of 1864, he seized the Brazilian mail-steamer Marquez de Olinda, and invaded the province of Matto Grosso. The Brazilian army, which in time of peace scarcely numbers a thousand men, were from the first at a disadvantage against LOPEZ with over 40,000; it was recruited by volunteers, but its ignorance of the theatre of operations, its inferior military discipline, and the strength of the positions which it was brought to assail have greatly impeded its progress. Hence the long and indecisive war which is not yet terminated, though apparently nearly accomplished by the capture of Humaita. The capture of this fortress reflects high honor upon Marquis DE CAXIAS, the Brazilian General, who, after the Allied force had been partially demoralized, and after the departure of General MITRE, infused fresh confidence into his dispirited soldiers, and led them on to a victory which seems to prelude a decisive termination of a long and sanguinary conflict.

On the 3d of July, 1867, CAXIAS established himself at Tuyu-Cue, a splendid position, thus forcing the Paraguayans to abandon their exterior lines at Sam-Solano; and, after two severe struggles at Passo-Ipophy and Estero-Rojas, communications were established with Tuyuty, the base of operations of the Allies. On the 15th of August two divisions of the Brazilian army forced the difficult pass of Curupaity, and the boulevard of Humaita was rendered powerless, being placed between two fires. A little later Potrero-Ovella and Payi fell into the hands of the Allies. Humaita was completely surrounded by land, and only secure on its river front. The occupation of Payi gave the Imperial squadron a port and a point d'appui, in the event of its accomplishing the formidable passage of Humaita, which had been thought impossible. But on the 19th of last February six armored ships of the Brazilian navy, taking advantage of a rise in the river Paraguay, ventured upon a bold engagement with the forts; 200 cannon vomited forth fire over their heads while they rapidly glided down above the chains, the palisades, and the murderous torpedoes which guzzed their holds. The same day CAXIAS seized the fort d'Establecimiento. Humaita was now hemmed in on all sides; the Paraguayans in vain conceived the crazy idea of boarding the hostile vessels; 3000 of them, having mounted the gun-boats, found death in an attempt which could only have been suggested by despair.



WAR IN PARAGUAY—ENGAGEMENT AT CHACO.

In view of the inevitable fall of Humaita LOPEZ strove to secure a continuation of the struggle on other battle-fields; he succeeded in crossing the river with his best divisions, which reached the right bank of the Paraguay by the forests of Grand-Chaco, and gained the camp of Tebicuary.

To avoid unnecessary slaughter CAXIAS desired to render himself master of Humaita by famine rather than by assault, and completed his blockade of the fortress by seizing the position at Chaco, where LOPEZ had found the means of escape with a portion of his army. A bombardment followed, and many bloody engagements took place without any decisive result. On July 16 the Paraguayans encamped at Chaco vainly attempted to reopen communications with the besieged fortress. Some days later the squadron ascended the river, reached Tebicuary, and bombarded LOPEZ in his camp at San Fernando.

The evacuation of Humaita was accomplished on the 24th of July. The departure of the garrison escaped the observation of the Brazilian fleet. A considerable quantity of ammunition and arms, together with 200 cannons, fell into the hands of the Allies.

The garrison, about 8000 strong, now encamped in the midst of the morass near Chaco, was surrounded by the Allied forces. There was but a single approach to Timbo or Tebicuary, and this lay along the right bank of the river, and was barred by a force of the enemy nearly 12,000 strong. The only resource left was to cross a large and deep lagune, and to make a way out past a division of the Allies which guarded the outlets in that direction. From the 25th to the 30th of July the Farraguayans made a brave defense against the assaults made upon Chuyo by the Allies, on the night following they planned the lagune with all the small boats in their possession. By holding above them branches of trees 2000 men managed to escape with eight cannon. This scene recalls to us the marching of Birnam wood to Dunsinane, in SHAKESPEARE'S Macbeth.

On the night of July 31 or morning of August 1 a dozen embarking parties, commanded by Colonel LOPEZ, were surprised by a Brazilian fleet of small boats, and after a terrible conflict, in which eight of the embarking parties escaped, the other four, laden in part with women and children, fell into the hands of the Allies; of the 120 soldiers who defended these only 25 consented to surrender, though their wounds made a continuation of the fight on their part impossible. Those still left behind had no hope of escape. Yet they disregarded the summons to surrender. Finally the Rev. Father ESMERATE, Chaplain of the Brazilian squadron, at the peril of his life, went to these unfortunates and persuaded them to yield to an honorable capitulation. These men had not eaten for four days.

At the end of the conflict to which we have referred 3000 Paraguayan corpses floated upon the waters by the side of 1000 corpses of the Allies. Such was the result of the nocturnal engagement which followed the evacuation of Humaita.

The illustrations which we give of these events relate to occurrences of a later date than the abandonment of Humaita, and bring our series of sketches of the Paraguayan war down to the latest period of which we have any definite information. Will the war soon terminate, in accordance with the suggestion of the Argentine President, or will LOPEZ continue it until his soldiers are exterminated?

DEAR SIR,—It is with much pleasure that I say to you that I consider the PLANTATION BITTERS the best medicine. In the fall of 1867 I was taken with Chills and Fever, with the most severe pains in my chest and head. It was with great difficulty that I could breathe. My lungs were greatly distressed, and there was severe pain in my right side, by spells. I could hardly get up from my bed. I called a doctor, who attended me all winter without the least benefit. About the first of August I commenced using your PLANTATION BITTERS—was thirteen full three times a day—and have used it most of the time since, and I am now well and strong, able to do all my own work and the care of a large family.

LET PERSONS HAVING SEVERE PAIN IN THE SIDE TAKE NOTICE!
ALLCOCK'S
POROUS PLASTERS.

A gentleman, after a severe sickness, had lesion of the liver. Every quick movement or sudden jar gave him severe pain which kept him up for days. Hence he was unable to attend any occupation with regularity.

In the condition he applied over the part affected an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER. At first it seemed to irritate, so it was taken off. But the marked improvement he experienced afterward gave him courage to try again, and he therefore applied another plaster. In a few days something gave way—"slipped," to use the gentleman's own words. There was some soreness for a few days after, then his health was perfectly restored. Upon being sounded by his physician, the adhesion or lesion was found to be gone.

Another gentleman who had lived some time in a tropical climate returned to his home in New York a confirmed invalid. He had almost constant pain in his left side, on which he applied an

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER.

After a few days the plaster was fairly washed off by a sort of weeping of the pores of the part. He applied a towel, which soon became so wet he had to change it several times a day. When the weeping from the part stopped, the pain returned; so another Porous Plaster was applied. This produced the same effect as the former application, when he again used a towel, which had to be changed several times a day.

These applications of Allcock's Porous Plaster, alternating with hard work, were continued for a period of several months, during which time the gentleman's health was improving. At length he also felt something give way inside. Upon going to bed that night he found that in the case was adhesion of the spleen, but upon being sounded it was found removed.

The anxiety had left his countenance; he was once more a sound man.

Is it any wonder that we receive such statement of sales as the following?

MESSRS. SISSON & BUTLER, of Hartford, Conn., write, July 8, 1868:

"We sell more of Allcock's Porous Plasters than all others, and they give universal satisfaction."

MESSRS. BALCH & SONS, of Providence, R. I., write, November, 1867: "We have sold over twenty-one thousand of Allcock's Porous Plasters in the last twenty years—the half in the last two years."

JONES & BROTHER, of Sing Sing, say: "We have sold over three thousand dollars' worth of Allcock's Porous Plasters, and shall continue to do so."

ALLENTOWN, Pa., April 4, 1865.

Messrs. T. Allcock & Co.:

DEAR SIRS,—My daughter used one of your Porous Plasters, had a very bad pain in her side, and it cured her in one week.

YOURS TRULY, JOHN V. N. HUNTER.

Certificate from A. F. Stirling, Esq.

For two years I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and during that time, temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of "ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS," I got little more than relief. Having one under each shoulder-blade and the other over the small of my back, and for the past three months I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain. I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Plaster. A. F. STERLING,

HARTFORD, CONN., November 11, 1864.

Messrs. T. Allcock & Co.:

Please send with dispatch one gross Allcock's Porous Plasters. Our daily experience confirms their very superior excellence. At this moment of writing a man applies for one who, by entanglement in the shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. The man found relief very soon after the application of a Plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay $5 for a single Plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. I am surprised that surgeons do not make use of these Perforated Plasters in the extraction of all stones, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other Plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations positively render their use more desirable to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the Plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known. J. W. JOHNSON, M.D.

IMPORTANT TESTIMONIAL.

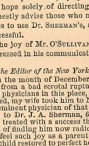
THE FOLLOWING COMMUNICATION, sent to us from New London, Conn., in relation to the successful treatment of rupture by Dr. J. A. SHERMAN, of this city, we publish in the papers that it may lead to the relief of other persons who may be afflicted with this most tenacious infirmity. The discussion recently carried on between Dr. SHERMAN and Dr. MASON, about the utility of their relative inventions, has enabled Dr. SHERMAN to establish the fact of the great superiority of his hernial appliances over the truss of Dr. MASON, which seems (in view of the arguments used) to inflict great suffering and oftentimes irreparable injury upon those who use it. With the hope solely of directing our readers aright, we earnestly advise those who may require rupture remedies to use Dr. SHERMAN'S, as the most reliable and successful.

The Joy of Mr. O'SULLIVAN is, no doubt, truthfully expressed in his communication:

SEPT. 23, 1868.

To the Editor of the New York Herald:



In the month of December last my son was suffering from a bad rupture, and after trying several physicians in this place, without having been relieved, we (my wife, myself, and YOUR SON, ED. FOLEY, an eminent physician of that city, directed her to take him to Dr. J. A. Sherman, 597 Broadway, where he was treated with a success that gives me the satisfaction of finding my home radically cured.

I feel such joy as a parent can only feel in finding the child restored to perfect health after suffering from an infirmity of the kind, which is generally believed to be incurable, and which is at all times, under the most favorable circumstances, distressing and dangerous.

Feeling as though every parent should know to whom they could apply for relief, I beg of you to give this publicity through your journal.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

[From the City Item, Philadelphia.]

The Oroide Watches.—A new metal, closely resembling gold, has been invented, of which watch-cases and watch-movements are made. C. E. Collins & Co., New York, are the manufacturers, and their advertisement will be found in another column. The Oroide Watches are in great demand. From the reports of the Trade, we learn that the cases are made in Hunting, Open-face, and Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, ranging in price from $15 each, and better time-keepers are not to be found. One of them has been going for a week in this office, and it is perfect in its performance. It looks as handsome, and keeps as good time as a watch costing $100. We advise all who are about to buy a watch to try the Oroide.

[From the La Crosse Republican.]

Oroide Watches.—Out of curiosity, we called when in New York at the Watch Manufactory of Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., on Nassau Street, and confess our astonishment on being shown their assortment of watches. No one could tell that the metal so closely resembles eighteen carat gold that we were pozzled to select a gold one placed amongst them. We should have no hesitation wearing one with the confidence that time would not change it, and the workmanship is guaranteed, and the watches are perfectly reliable and in all respects equal to a watch costing $150. We have no doubt that when once known in this section, many will be sold.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., of 37 and 39 Nassau St., are still further improving their beautiful Oroide Watches. These are excellent time-keepers, and for all practical purposes as good as a fine gold hunting-case watch.

[From the New York Independent.]

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches. These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to be of unsurpassing qualities, and in case which shall be, in appearance, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. If these watches have all the elements of society, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, at the price of $15, we hope our readers to suit their cases exactly.

Citizens of Toronto and the Dominion generally, take notice. We have hundreds of Testimonials, for which, among you, there is his proof positive.

Harry Hazlitone, the well-known author, says:

"I have always looked upon watches as humbugs and dealers in them as little better than swindlers. At the request of a friend, I have worn for three months the watch he purchased of C. E. Collins, and for fairness between it and my own, which cost five times the amount of the Collins Watch. I will say that Mr. E. Hazlitone."

I have since purchased FIVE of these watches, at the request of friends, and those for whom they were intended are delighted with them. I can recommend them to all, believing that Mr. C. will find some difficulty in supplying the constantly-increasing demand."

☞ The Oroide Watches are sold by jewelers and others costing $20. These are superbly finished, and really superior to any article placed upon the market costing five times that sum.

The Condition of Thousands.

No appetite; no refreshing sleep; no cheerful thoughts; no disposition to labor; no inclination to society; no interest in anything; no desire to live, even; and yet no special ailment to define or locate the nerves, and a clouded brain. What does common sense suggest as a remedy for this deficiency in vital power? Clearly, a RE-VITALIZER invigorating and restorative, that will stimulate, tone, and sustain the broken-down energies of nature.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

meet the case exactly. In this beneficent Tonic are combined all the ingredients necessary to change the condition of the system, and bring the dormant organs into healthful action. In the fall of the year, when the night-dews are chill and heavy, and the morning fogs are dense and unhealthy, and, debilitated by the heats of summer, is peculiarly susceptible to unwholesome influences. At this season, of all others, this powerful preventive is required, both as a safeguard against fever and ague and other malarious disorders, and as a preparation for the searching cold of winter. Dyspepsia, bilious complaints, nervous disorders, and distressing affections of the bowels are always more or less prevalent in October and November, and the surest and safest means of averting them is a course of this purest, mildest, and most efficacious of all tonics and alteratives.

ARICA AFTER THE EARTHQUAKE.

THE latest intelligence in regard to the effects of the terrible earthquakes of the 10th and 16th of August, in many of the towns along the coast of Peru and Ecuador, indicates that the first rumors received here were not extravagant. We illustrate on page 693 the condition in which Arica was left by the shocks of the 16th. The town was laid in ruins by the earthquake at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Half an hour afterward the lower part of the town was submerged by an earthquake wave, which the first wave rolled from the shipping in the bay was lying in eight fathoms of water. The ships all grounded, leaving about 6 feet of water alongside. The second return wave was a breaking one, at an elevation of about 60 feet, which destroyed the American store-ship Fredonia, with all on board, the Peruvian bark Rosa Riviera, the brig Edoardo, with all hands, and the Peruvian frigate Americana, which was thrown 800 yards above high-water-mark. Her principal officers, with about 130 of her crew, were drowned. The bark Chanavcilla was thrown 600 yards above high-water-mark. Captain Fox was on shore when the earthquake occurred, and dispatched his boat to bring the crew of his vessel to the land to assist the panic-stricken inhabitants, many of whom were partially buried in the ruins, along with their dead just above ground. The scene is described as most heart-rending, the people shrieking and gesticulating in a dreadful manner. When the wave burst over the city it drowned those who were partially buried by the earthquake. The commander of the ship Wateree, in number, who were left on board in charge of the Chanavcilla, perished with her. It is considered that after the second shock of the earthquake and the earthquake waves, and consequently that town suffered the most.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1868.

A FOOLISH FARCE.

A SHORT time before the meeting of the Democratic National Convention the New York World urged that its party should learn something, and not chain itself to a corpse. It suggested that the issues of the past should be abandoned, that reconstruction should be accepted as a fact, that a platform of safe principles should be adopted, and—although it did not mention his name—that Mr. CHASE should be nominated. This advice, which could only have proceeded from an extremely youthful counselor, was instantly and indignantly spurned. The difficulty, as the Virginia Democrat at the time—the difficulty with the Democratic leaders in the city of New York who inspire the World is that they have no corpse to bury. Now the Southern Democrats have convictions, and, as the positive element of a party usually governs, the World was instantly silenced. The Southern leaders came triumphantly to New York, decided that a repudiation of the expense of conquering them, and for a candidate who would restore them to power by the sword. The party accustomed to receive its policy from beyond the Potomac, yielded without a word. Having nominated the candidates and dictated the platform, the old leaders marched into Union Square, and their followers that they were to stand by with bayonets if the leaders did not have their way about "the white vote," and having given the key-note to the assembled hosts,

From that moment the New York World began the most shameless and indecent party warfare ever known in this country. With the patriot paint General GRANT as a knave, it derided him as a fool. The platform, which was directly opposed to its scheme of a true platform for the party, it ridiculed as a body of political wisdom. When WADE HAMPTON spoke, the World declared that "the true American citizen speaks." It "took pains to assure" its deliberate judgment "nothing could save the Radicals from a Waterloo defeat in November.....The Democracy will, nevertheless, triumph by acclamation." Northern, Western, border States enough to constitute a clear majority of the electoral ticket.....The Democracy will carry all the Southern States except, perhaps, one." According to the World the whole thing was after all merely a form, and it was only reasonable to suppose that SEYMOUR and BLAIR would be unanimously elected. Vermont spoke, but Vermont was nothing. Maine spoke, but, truly understood, twenty thousand Republican majority in that State meant the election of SEYMOUR. Contentment showed in her local elections a significant, if not decisive, Republican gain; but that was "good news." Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Nebraska thundered, but it merely indicated that there might be some show of opposition to SEYMOUR'S election.—The next day the World demanded a total change of policy and the withdrawal of the candidates.

This was the crowning folly of an extremely foolish newspaper. It repeated the demand. It asserted that "what is needed is some event," and indicated that it meant the withdrawal of General BLAIR. The next day it said that nothing could surpass the spirit of the party, and that it waited for "the new order of battle." This all means that, as the country has now shown that it rejects the policy of the Democratic party, certain gentlemen had better say that the Democratic party renounce it. If one mask is not agreeable, by all means put on another. But the difficulty is not in the mask: it is in what is behind it. WADE HAMPTON and FORREST behind HORATIO SEYMOUR, or JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, or General HANCOCK, or Judge CHASE, are still WADE HAMPTON and FORREST. It is the spirit, the principle, the character of the Democratic party that is the national peril, not SEYMOUR or BLAIR. "Let's call this sword a rose-leaf," says the World, "and every body will think June is just at hand." "We beg to say," reply the serene TILDEN, the patriotic BELMONT, and the practical SCHELL, "that a sword is a sword, and we mean to use it." They are wise, at least. The people of this country know a sword when they see it, whatever it is called. They have seen this sword all summer, and they propose to sheathe it on the 3d of November.

MORE DROLLERY.

MR. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS is a comedian. He goes to South Carolina, and, after a solemn restatement of President JOHNSON'S theory of his reconstruction policy, tells WADE HAMPTON and his friends that he thinks at the end of the war they had renounced all they fought for—and this in full face of the fact that only at the earnest urgency of the Union men and some of the States repudiate their rebel debt, that they consented to abolish slavery only with reluctant conditions and delays, and that they are still in the freedmen's-bureau cruel and unjust and therefore stupidly impolitic. He says that "we," meaning the loyal country, after the rebels were defeated, dashed forward "to embrace you" in our turn." He asserts that the temper of the "Southern mind" was grossly misrepresented, and then adds that "the Southern vagrant laws, however humane and liberal they may have been, were exceedingly unfortunate and inopportune."

MR. ADAMS proceeds to say that the North has made up its mind to an utter renunciation by the South of the doctrine of secession; the entire extirpation of slavery and all its family; a fair and impartial suffrage for the colored race in and the equal right of every citizen of the United States to travel, speak, and live in any State so long as he does not infringe the right of others. Mr. ADAMS says that these things "are fundamental" and their influence and spirit do not renounce the cause of secession; are trying to retain as much of slavery as possible; are trying to "debauch men in every way; inspire the KU-KLUX KLAN, which pursues loyal men with fire and sword—and nominated SEYMOUR and BLAIR. And WADE HAMPTON and FORREST are actively working for SEYMOUR and BLAIR. Mr. ADAMS advises submission to the de facto governments, and then shouts for those whose declared policy is to overthrow them by the sword. He says that he has nothing but kindness expressed for the colored citizens, and then pathetically entreats the States not to permit the freedmen to be "the God's sake," that they be not made hopeless by needless anger or ill blood. It is not true that this is a white man's government, exclaims Mr. ADAMS, and immediately nominates SEYMOUR and BLAIR, who declares that it is. We do not mean that he literally shouted for SEYMOUR and BLAIR; but he appeared in South Carolina as the supporter of that ticket, and he himself expecting the vote of their friends for Governor of Massachusetts.

There must be no class hopelessly excluded from political privilege," says Mr. ADAMS; and he has left the Republican party, of which this is a cardinal principle, to bring into power the party which avowedly repudiates this idea. "A great majority of all the North only wait to be sure it is safe to take you cordially by the hand to welcome you back again to the Republican feeling; and would Mr. ADAMS tell the history and human nature at hand, wish it to be different, or believe that otherwise there could be peace? The action of Mr. ADAMS'S Southern friends in reorganizing their States, and in the Democratic Convention, shows that it was not safe up to that time. Have the speeches of Mr. HAMPTON and FORREST during their absence to the colored people of Democratic voting or intrusion, and the performances of the KU-KLUX KLAN since, shown that it was safe?

We have no reason to doubt that Mr. ADAMS means well. When he says that he finds upon conversation with Mr. WADE HAMPTON that he is no more actuated by ill-will himself, there is doubt that Mr. HAMPTON left that impression upon Mr. ADAMS'S mind. Mr. HAMPTON probably does not intend immediately to take the field. But if SEYMOUR and BLAIR were elected, and the spirit and principles of Mr. HAMPTON obtained control of the Government, does Mr. ADAMS think it would be a beneficial result to the country? Of course he does, for he is working to that end. But to other men it seems very safe and fair and sensible that the Government should be intrusted to those whose devotion to liberty and justice and equal rights has been as long and cherished a tradition as that of Mr. HAMPTON and Mr. WADE HAMPTON to the most cruel injustice. We should like to hear from Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS a statement of his reasons for believing that a party which includes all the most disaffected persons to the Government in the country, whose political theories are essentially hostile to equal liberty and logically produced the war, and which demanded national dishonor and forcible evictions as the platform of a campaign, is a party which honorable and loyal men should support by their speeches or votes.

THE POPE'S TROUBLES.

IS the Pope upon the point of abandoning his field—of surrendering—that he has lately called an Œcumenical Council of all his bishops and archbishops, and in an apostolic letter addressed to all non-Romish religious organizations urges them to return to the bosom of the Church? Does the military maxim which has been so often proved in conflicts of arms hold good in religious revolutions also? Is there confusion and not wisdom in a multitude of religious as well as military counselors? Does this calling of a council, and the sudden change of the former curses and excommunications to entreaties and arguments indicate that the Pope is about to abandon the field and give up the fight?

Certainly the Pope has lately met with many and reverses, and is no longer in condition to make a vigorous defense of his Church against the assaults continually urged against both his spiritual and temporal authority. The restrictions placed on the latter by the success of the Germans and Italians have not been more exasperating and significant than the curtailment of the former by the advancement made in general intelligence by the various nationalities of Europe.

The present year has witnessed a most striking indication of the changed power of the Church of Rome. The revocation of the Concordat with Austria and the revolution in Spain are the two blows which have been most severe during the century. If there were any two countries in which the Pope and his adherents and supporters would have expected that the Roman Church retained its power they were Austria and Spain. But it appears that even in these countries the Church has little power over the conscience of the people, and inspires no terror in the minds of the ruling monarchs. A few months ago the newly-elected Parliament of Austria passed laws giving the Protestants the right of worship in places sacred in the Church, extant faith, granting to Protestants the privilege of marrying according to their own forms and ceremonies without having their children pronounced illegitimate and debarred from all legal benefits, and finally permitting non-Catholic Christians to be inclosed in unblessed coffins and interred in unsanctified grounds without being exposed to the refusal in consequence.

The Pope solemnly protested against this dangerous innovation, and called upon the Emperor and Empress to hold fast to the Concordat which had, from time immemorial, given the education and salvation and perdition of all souls to the Church. But the newly-elected Emperor and Empress approved what the new Parliament fresh from the people had enacted, and the bold and sturdy Prime Minister, VON BEUST, said to the Emperor, "Sign!" and Francis JOSEPH signed, and the Pope's letter to the Pope's protest shrugged his shoulders and said, "I had to sign or abdicate, and I did not choose to abdicate." Then the Spanish Revolution rallied to the Pope's letter, and briefly but plainly told PIUS IX. that he was meddling in affairs that did not concern him. Meantime, Italy scrutinized the Austrian border, in the city of Worms, another reply to the protest of the Pope had been prepared; and on the very day of the publication of his complaint the PRINCE REGENT of all Germany, headed by their king, dedicated a magnificent monument to MARTIN LUTHER on the spot where just three hundred and fifty-seven years before he had defied Pope and priesthood, and had set in motion the vast and increasing Protestant reformation.

The present revolution in Spain seems to indicate that the influence of the Pope, and Church, and priesthood is not the blind spirit of reverence which BUCKLE thought "the capital and essential vice of the Spanish people." It would have been, as the Historian of Civilization declared, "their sole national vice," but it has not, as he feared, quite yet "sufficed to ruin them." Like the people of many other nations the Spaniards have suffered intellectually from priestly influence; but they have not, as the late revolution has shown, been so broken in spirit as to accept without murmur an unworthy and ignominious submission. No more significant sign of the Spanish virtue, or more threatening to the Roman supremacy, has yet appeared than the banners carried in the procession at Madrid on October 3 at the reception of the revolutionists leaders inscribed "Religious Liberty" and "Free Education." Queen ISABELLA and her whole race in Spain and France have ever been faithful children of Rome. But they have not protested by spiritual allegiance to the Pope, and often offered to send troops to the defense of Rome when she could hardly have mustered a loyal squad to defend her own person. Her vehement protestations and offers of aid were made to propitiate France and the rest of Catholic Europe. She could send no troops to the Pope for the reason that the peninsula refuse to serve in the Papal army. That little squad of ten thousand men is almost wholly composed of Swiss, Austrians, and Frenchmen. There is one Italian battalion, but no German or Spanish organization of any character.

The Pope's firmest foothold seems to be in South America; and indeed the very word "United Italy" be once more inspired by the Republican movement in Spain, the Holy Father may return longingly to the scene of his early labors as a Dominican friar in Brazil. But, alas! one of the most vigorous of the allies of Brazil has just chosen a former schoolmaster and editor to be its President. And what has the Pope to hope from a continent of republics, schoolmasters, and editors?

THE MASSACHUSETTS FIFTH DISTRICT.

A SPECIAL correspondent of the New York Tribune writes from Boston that the reception which GENERAL BUTLER received in New Hall "refutes the statements that the Union party in Massachusetts do not sympathize with nor support him." Then the Massachusetts Republicans have changed their opinions or General BUTLER has changed his. The Union party in Massachusetts lately held a large and enthusiastic Convention. Every thing was ready to it as a delegate. He worked very hard for the nomination of a candidate whose name was not even presented to the Convention; and when the General found that he could not defeat the original and consistent Republican upon whose nomination the Convention had set its heart, he made a virtue of necessity and very cordially moved a nomination by acclamation. The General also labored to persuade the delegates not to speak distinctly about paying the bonds, and the Convention, in response to his efforts, thundered that common honesty required payment in gold and silver coin. Which has changed, the Massachusetts Republican party or General BUTLER? The party still holds to an honest payment of the debt, according to its letter and spirit, then it does not sympathize with nor support General BUTLER, who does not pretend to have changed his views.

The Convention at Worcester, like the meeting at Faneuil Hall, was in high good-humor, and loudly cheered the General as he rushing, smashing speaker is always welcome to a party meeting; and when to his rhetoric is added admiration of certain vigorous actions in his career, such as the evacuation of Baltimore and the regulation of New Orleans during the war, the crowd lustily applauds, and the applause is accepted as a personal approval. But if the favor of the Fifth Massachusetts District is to depend upon what is called the record of the two candidates, we do not think that Mr. DANA need fear the contest. When, at the second peril, he was trying to rescue fugitive slaves in the dark and bitter days which tried the quality of men's faith, the General was refusing to think of the war as a political question. Mr. DANA demands that the national honor shall be sacredly maintained, the General laughs at the national honor as an excellent jest. "I will show you," says the General in effect, "a trick worth knowing. Look at that law! Study its words and letters. Don't you see that we can outwit it?" It is this the man who has a shame to say that Massachusetts Republicans do not sympathize with and support? What would it be if Massachusetts Republicans did sympathize with him and support him? When JOHNNY BURKE heard the gibbles of GEORGE GREENVILLE and his friends about taxing the colonies, he exclaimed to the effect that the American citizen ought ever to forget, "It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do, but what humanity, reason, and justice tell me I ought to do."

Would the Independent also answer of EDMUND BURKE, as it does at Mr. DANA, as a gentleman in white kid gloves, because he said so? Would the Independent also answer of BURKE that fifty pairs of gloves would not make a steel gauntlet? Is simple honesty in public affairs mere kid-glovery? Is open and elaborate treachery manliness? The effort is both so folly so fatal as that of those who defend or palliate dishonesty in public affairs. When the moral sentiment is gone, all is gone; and when Republicans select a candidate who is a repudiator upon the ground that he is a trusty Radical, they forget that no Radical and no other man can be trusted when he plays fast and loose with the public honor.

Moreover, some of the opponents of Mr. DANA are as unfair in their assertions as they are illogical in their method. They allege that the opposition to General BUTLER is really because of his Radicalism, not because of his repudiation. They must know that this is not true. When Radical Republicans in other States wrote to their friends in the Essex district in the early summer to know if there could be a candidate put forward in that district who accepted both of the great principles of the party in this canvas, the reply was that nobody wanted the nomination so much as the General, and he would secure the Primaries and have the Convention. He did this, and so received the nomination. But meanwhile the conviction became deeper that the matter ought not to go by default; that some resolute effort should be made to show the Republican party in the country that the Republicans of no district in Massachusetts felt that a repudiator was their proper representative; and when the name of MR. DANA was proposed he was urged to accept the nomination in the name and for the good faith of the party every where.

Granting that General BUTLER was a serviceable officer in the war, so was the former Republican General SCOTT here in New York. But when he adopted Democratic principles the Republicans voted against him. General BUTLER has not indeed renounced the Republican policy of Reconstruction, but he has renounced the Republican financial principle, and upon that point, cardinal, vital, he is no more a Republican than MR. PENDLETON. General BUTLER is undoubtedly a Radical upon one of the two planks of the platform—upon the other he is not a Republican at all. It is not because of his radicalism, it is because of his falling under that ban of the national Republican platform which declares "all forms of repudiation a national crime" that General BUTLER is properly opposed by a party man.

There are doubtless other and influential reasons. They are found in a very general conviction as to his character, based upon familiar knowledge and experience in his building of several GRANT, and in the kind of prominence which he would be likely to attain in Congress. His method of conducting the canvass is also suggestive. General BUTLER offers for every five dollars reward for any competent evidence implicating any one in "the attempt to defraud the people of Essex of the election franchise." Are the Essex voters his property? Is it a fraud upon them to urge them not to send to Congress a gentleman who favors one form of repudiation? Is this a remarkable attractiveness lest the voters of Essex be defrauded upon the pact of a gentleman who proposes to defraud the creditors of the Government every where? It was remarked in the French Convention that the sight of blood from a cut finger made ROBESPIERRE quite faint.

We have, therefore, the election of General BUTLER because, as radical Republicans, we do not believe the party, the cause, or the country are safe in the hands of reckless and unprincipled men. If by any chance General BUTLER could have been nominated for President, do the Republicans of the Fifth District in Massachusetts believe that he would have received, or ought to have received, the hearty support of the party in the country? And would it have been withheld because he was so true an exponent of Republican principles? Is it because it was felt that he was not a true representative of the party principle and character?

GENERAL BLAIR AS A PROPHET.

GENERAL FRANK BLAIR does not say that General GRANT will be assassinated, but he says that he will never leave the White House alive because he will establish a military despotism. This remark shows the profound wisdom of General FRANK BLAIR. It also shows how truly he understands General GRANT'S character and that of the American people. Every thing in General GRANT'S career shows, of course, that unquenchable thirst for despotic rule of which pomp and statesmanship and soldier General FRANK BLAIR speaks. This relentless greediness for absolute power is only surpassed by General GRANT'S fiendish loftiness for the pomp and circumstance which surround it. He has a painful taste for show. He is constantly making displays to captivate the people of which he has already obtained a full yoke. He is the candidate of a party that has always maintained slavery of every kind. It is notorious that the Republican party was ready to submit four millions of the Southern population to the uncontrolled tyranny of a certain disloyal class of that population, and General FRANK BLAIR says he can not stand. General GRANT, says General FRANK BLAIR, is "a mailed warrior whose bayonets are now at the throat of eight millions of people at the South." It is GRANT, he says, who is invoking and encourages the KU-KLUX KLAN. The sage BLAIR, who proposes to overthrow the Southern governments by the sword, is full of consternation at the prospect of the military despotism which General GRANT is about to establish.

The sly despot, the bloody demagogue, the ambitious warrior, GRANT, says he will have peace; but he means "let us compel the army to disperse the carpet-bag State Governments"—doesn't he, General BLAIR? He says that the only way to peace is to obey the law; but he means that he "will trample into dust the usurpations of Congress known as the reconstruction acts"—doesn't he, General BLAIR? Indeed, GRANT evidently has an admiring eye upon that former military despot, WASHINGTON. Like him he has shown a constant contempt for authority, and an insane passion and ambition—hasn't he, General BLAIR? And the American people, who know what a respect for law the late rebels have, and who know that a certain person was nominated for Vice-President because he was very anxious to draw the sword, will put him and his sword out of sight—won't they, General BLAIR?

Free speech is an invaluable blessing. The enemies of equal liberty assembled in Convention at Tammany Hall and freely expressed their opinions, and nominated their candidates. They then went out "and, like frogs" to the people, and have disastrously defeated those candidates. While there was any doubt of the winning of the platform and the candidates there was a chance of their success. But when the orators began to explain what they meant that chance disappeared. Every speech which General FRANK BLAIR has made has made the cost him and his party many hundreds of votes; while the free speech of the true chiefs of the party, the Southern leaders, has gone very far to secure the loyal State for GRANT and LOGAN. We can not enough extol the virtue of free speech. But to think of the infatuation of a country which deliberately prefers to take the chances of peace with GRANT and honesty, COLFAX and liberty, rather than with SEYMOUR and repudiation, BLAIR and the forcible dismemberment of State governments. How on earth it will not see that nothing but General BLAIR'S sword can save it from General GRANT'S despotism!

THE CONDITION OF TRADE.

The last decisive result in the States which voted on the 13th of October has been carried up the public debt about two and a half per cent., and as all anxiety is removed as to the issue of the Presidential election we may count with certainty on an active trade for the residue of the year. There is a solid basis for this opinion in the bountiful crops of the cereals and the fair but not huge crop of cotton with which the country has been favored. It is altogether probable that our bonds will be in demand across the Atlantic, and that, urged by the low which is likely to obtain in our money market, we may be disposed to import in excess of our actual means. But if we are guilty of that imprudence the day of reckoning will be postponed, and ultimately come at a time when it must be greatly to our disadvantage.

The actual basis of a large trade, however, consists in the abundance of the cereals at home, and in the want of food in the British Isles and elsewhere.

There are those in England and in this country who strenuously deny that there will be any extensive demand for food from abroad. We have lately witnessed at Chicago the operation of a corner in wheat. The price of winter corn was carried up to 112 cents or more per bushel, while as the termination of the cornering process is suddenly fell to 91 cents or thereabouts, which was full value. The two parties to this combination—one for a rise, the other for a fall—had their agents in this market, who were at direct variance as to the situation in England, one claiming that there would be an unusual foreign demand, the other that it would exceed all precedent. It may very well be that these opposite combinations may be based upon the value of food irrespectively of demand and supply have their representatives in London and Liverpool. A controversy has been for a long time prevailing in the Manchester press as to statements, made with respect to cotton, alleged to be false, to influence an upward or a downward movement. It is to be assumed that such statements are made for some special and improper object both there and here. The press in England has been very reticent lately with respect to the state of the harvest prospect. Pamphlets have been written there to show that the drought is a visitation of Heaven to punish those who legislated for the Liberal cause in the last Parliament, and that the rain is a boon, while the political importance of a good crop is conceded, it is claimed that England, on the score of gold, will be over the danger hard, and ordinary years. To arrive at the exact truth one must be able, from the best lights of agricultural experience, to form a judgment independently of what may be expressed from interested motives.

We published quite recently, from the Maidstone Journal, the organ of part of the English hop-growing district, a statement of the yield in samples of hops was scarcely ever known to be so great as in this year. Some very bad, some good, and we draw the inference from it that the wheat crops on adjoining soils must in part have shared the same fate.

The flax purchasers of Belfast make like statements as to flax. We omit extracts from their statements; but it is generally conceded that the crop is light in Ireland, owing to the drought, and that it is also light, and for the same reason, in Russia, Germany, and France.

The order of the French Government opening its ports to the entry of cereals free of tonnage duty after the 1st of October has been the subject of extensive comment in our newspapers, and various suggestions have been made with respect to it. Should the present drought, however, be very much to another it is altogether due to drought. The Report made by the Agricultural Bureau of France of her imports and exports for the first six months of this year throws some light on this question, and upon the one suggested by the British press that England will be able to receive a portion of the flour she wants from France. The French statement presents a very unusual import of the cereals. While her exports of these amount in value to only about $250,000, her imports, for the same period, amount in value to 176,420,825 francs, or between five millions and fifty millions of dollars. This import is very unusual. The Lyons papers, in describing the crop of grapes, stated that on light soils they were "roasted." The region of severe drought is situated between Lyons and the Mediterranean; but it existed also on the borders of Spain. In parts of Spain it was so severe that an order for the opening of her ports to the cereals free of tonnage duty followed the French order, before the Revolution in Spain, and supplies are now going forward to Spanish ports from London and Liverpool.

It must be remembered by those who feel impatience that no considerable advance in breadstuffs takes place in the London and Liverpool markets that the crops of all descriptions harvested in July are yet unconsumed, and that the extra wages will not be paid for grain so long as this is the case. There exists an interest the deepest that can sway a community in favor of giving to the world the most favorable impression of what their fields have produced. Many will be deceived by the bold statement of MR. SAUNDERSON that this year's yield of wheat is only two preceding years by three million quarters. The "Encyclopædia Britannica" states that it is impossible to arrive at accurate views of what is produced in any given year, even in the matter concerning of what is grown and what is imported. A drought of unprecedented severity, extending, according to the Manchester Guardian, over a period of six months, deprives many of the data on which England relies, and so severe that wheat was plowed in on light soils as being utterly worthless, although no very good basis for a large increase of wheat. This crop can be pronounced larger than usual only out of regard to the political and financial considerations which are involved in the questions. We regard it as certain that there will be a heavy demand abroad up to the harvest of '69 for all descriptions of our food productions, and consequently that trade will be active here.

THE WORK IN NEW YORK.

OUR friends must remember that the sole remaining hope of the Democracy is to carry the State of New York and elect MR. HOFFMAN Governor. In the Convention that nominated him the consequences of such an election were portrayed by one of the delegates from Brooklyn whom indignation kindled into eloquence. He described the ballot-ring. The election of MR. HOFFMAN, said this Democratic authority, will be the transfer of the State to the control of the relentless ring of Tammany Hall. The whole State then, instead of the city merely, will be ground to swell the enormous booty of the Tammany leaders. We beg our friends throughout the State to be as firm and prompt at every point as if the battle were going against us. We beg them to remember that it is most desirable that the Executive of New York should be in sympathy with the Executive of the United States, and that in JOHN A. GRISWOLD we have a man whose character and career are the guarantee of an efficient and honest administration of which he will be in full harmony with that of the United States.

A RELIGIOUS REBEL VIEW.

BEFORE the rebellion some of the most fiery of the secession leaders were the clergymen in the Southern States. This was admirably set forth in the novel of "Inside," published in most papers or three years ago. The fiery character and method of the rebel clerical influence were most graphically sketched in the character of the Reverend Ezekiel Barker. The Reverend Barker again lifts up his voice, and under the signature of Ecclesiæ writes as follows to the Presbyterian Index, published in Mobile and New Orleans:

"If SEYMOUR and BLAIR be not elected," says the Reverend Ezekiel Barker, in his loudest roar,

"we are on the verge of a war by far more diffusive, bitter, and sanguinary than that through which we have passed. The whirlwind of it is very nearly down on the moderate element, if it can be maintained, and the last throw of the dice that settles the question of peace is set for the loss of November. We have said the failure of a hope that the revolutionists can be arrested, having so far been sustained by their constituency, and having the power of position and organization. Besides, they are headed by the most reckless and reprobate of living humanity—as desperate gamblers on political fortunes as any British Parliament, French Assembly, or Council of Ten ever embodied. The North and West, it is true, are vastly infatuated by an un-American foreign element of population; but still they contain enough of pure, patriotic, liberty-loving Americans to consider the revolutionary acts of the New York Convention has sounded the tocsin of war."

THE GOOD TIME COMING.

THE October elections are the bright rays of the coming sun. With the real Peace that is founded upon justice, prosperity and the general welfare will return. When the leaders of the late troubles perceive that the victory over them is not won only, but understood, they will learn to acquiesce in the inevitable result. General GRANT, says MR. ADAMS, whom they invited to come, and tell them the truth, is not your enemy, but your friend. General GRANT says "Let us have peace," and he means it. The news of his election, on the morning of the 4th of November, will be the dawn of that era of Peace in which every industry will revive; and the blessings which will seem to bear, as in MR. HOGAN'S picture upon page 691, the gold and announcing once more the glad tidings of goodwill to all men.

THE BLOATED BONDHOLDERS.

In his speech at the Cooper Institute MR. MARVIN I. TOWNSEND, of Troy, one of the very toughest of Republicans, whose ample information and oratorical fire and felicity will recommend him to the heart as well as to the head of his audience, told the simple truth about "the bloated bondholder" in a way to be remembered. He said that "the debt incurred during the war was now about $2,500,000,000, of which it is more than likely there has been in existence before the war or incurred since, $1,000,000,000 in the aggregate—that is, coin, coin was loaned; $400,000,000 more is held by the banks, which the owners of every State bank note dollar is deposited in the Savings-Banks of the country, and of this at least $300,000,000 is invested in bonds, while the Life Insurance and Fire Insurance Companies of the country probably hold $600,000,000 more. Some are corporations which any State can tax; thus $1,400,000,000 of the debt is now or can be taxed; $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 more of the bonds are held in Europe, and these and even the Democrats pretend ought to be taxed: so that only $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 remain, and these are held by coin, old maids, estates in trust, etc. Rich men don't invest their money in bonds; they can make a dollar by speculation in stocks while they are making one dollar in government bonds. And these people are the bloated bondholders. Every man and woman who holds a bill, every one who holds a deposit in a Savings-Bank—indeed every man, woman, and child in the country who is interested in the financial stability of the Government.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ELECTIONS took place on October 13 in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Nebraska. All four of these States elected Governors. There was no election for Governor in either Pennsylvania or Ohio. In the former a Republican Governor and a majority of Congress were elected, the Republican majority being 15,000. In Ohio the Legislature, which elects U.S. Senators, and a Supreme Judge were elected, the Republican majority was over 40,000. Indiana elected a Governor, but while it is almost certain that the Republicans have a majority, it is impossible to state with any decidedly until all the official returns are in. The returns from Nebraska indicate a Republican gain in the price of gold, and occasioned the most hearty rejoicing throughout the country. A wealthy citizen of Omaha in the loyal and disturbed the enemies of the Government most.

Congress met at Washington on the 16th; but only for the purpose of readjournment to November 30.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Spanish Junta has seized the property of the Jesuits and declared the order abolished. Recent letters from Madrid state that no attempt has been made to assassinate General Prim. Senor Rosas de Olana has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Central Duke, who was appointed Captain-General of Cuba by the Spanish authorities, has declined an account of ill health.

General Prim has received the title of Marshal of Spain. General Dulce has been made Duke of Madrid. A deputation of Cubans have been in consultation with the Central Junta. They have agreed to measures looking to the gradual abolition of slavery. The Republicans have commenced an agitation in Barcelona and Valencia against the Junta's policy. Prim and Serrano. General Serrano has made a speech at Seville, declaring that the Junta's policy in relation to Madrid would reign on the meeting of the Cortes.

NAVAL ENGAGEMENT OFF PETIT GOAVE, HAYTI.

PRESIDENT SALNAVE seems to have quite firmly secured his Government in Hayti. We give on page 692 an account of a brilliant little engagement off Petit Goave on the 20th of September, which took place between the Haytien corvette Toussaint Louverture and the ships and batteries at that point.

The corvette arrived at Port-au-Prince from New York on October 10, and immediately came to go to Petit Goave, 29 miles westward, and captures or sink the Sylphide and the Liberté—the one with a crew of 60 men and 10 guns, and the second a side-wheel steamer of 4 guns—and to engage the hostile batteries. Accordingly, at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 20th, the Toussaint left Cayes with his Staff went on board the corvette, together with MR. REESTER, formerly Charge d'Affaires at Hayti. The Toussaint has 4 4-in. guns, and steamed down the bay to Grand Goave, where she left some muskets and ammunition for the troops there, then stationed, and then proceeded to Petit Goave. This point was reached at 8 o'clock, and the engagement began at once. The Toussaint was under fire from the Sylphide and the Liberté was on fire. It was found that the Sylphide was rapidly sinking; therefore her chain was slipped, and the Petion took her in tow to get her on the bank off the point to the right. Before she reached the shallow water, however, she went down in deep water. The Liberté, with her some of the prize crew and a Haytien General who had boarded her. About seventy of these were saved and brought on board the Petion. This latter vessel in the mean time kept up an engagement with the batteries. Two of the prisoners from the Sylvia were killed on her quarter-deck, and this was the only loss sustained from the enemy's fire, though his shells flew thick and fast about the Petion.

At 3 o'clock P.M the Petion hauled off, only one gun remaining in position on shore, and returned to Port-au-Prince, having accomplished her mission. The troops on shore stormed the place as soon as the bombardment ceased. This victory over the vessels was important to President SALNAVE, as the latter had to a great extent damaged the commerce, and even the forts in possession of the Government.

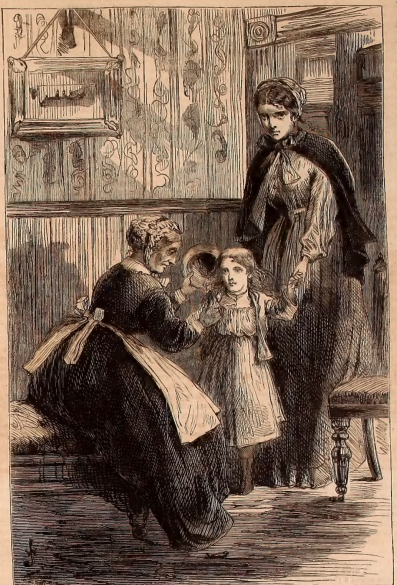
HOW A SONG FOUND HER.

THE day had been a weary one. One of those gentle days in spring that come with the soft kiss of summer to our lips, and we love the wooing touch though it steals from us our sturdiness; and we languidly long for the season of packed trunks, deserted city homes, and the tempting summer life away from the babble and the din; quite up in the mountain slopes, by the river's quiet bank, or the long stretch of sea-sand—any where where it is green and bright, and we can feel ourselves alone with each other, and with our mother Nature, who, with all a loving mother's fondness, lays her caressing hand on the worn frame and the enervated brain of all who invoke the touch; and we wonder, as in childhood, how it is that the "motherly touch can kiss the pain away, and we are strong again for work or play"—as we choose in our childhood's day, but as we can not choose now that its sunny day has set, and we know that each that rises brings us something to do for ourselves and each other.

My fashionable friend, Mrs. Fletcher, had been displaying to me her preparatory purchases for the season; wonderful fabrics so gossamer-like, that when at the sea-side among the crowd where she would reign indisputably "the belle," they would question how she threw a mortal spell over Undine, and won from her the robe of frosty, shimmering green; and then in contrast, rich moirés and heavy piques for elegant appearance at those gay resorts where human hearts are common traffic; or if not the hearts the inferior clay that would be animated by them, had such a fossil structure been found therein.

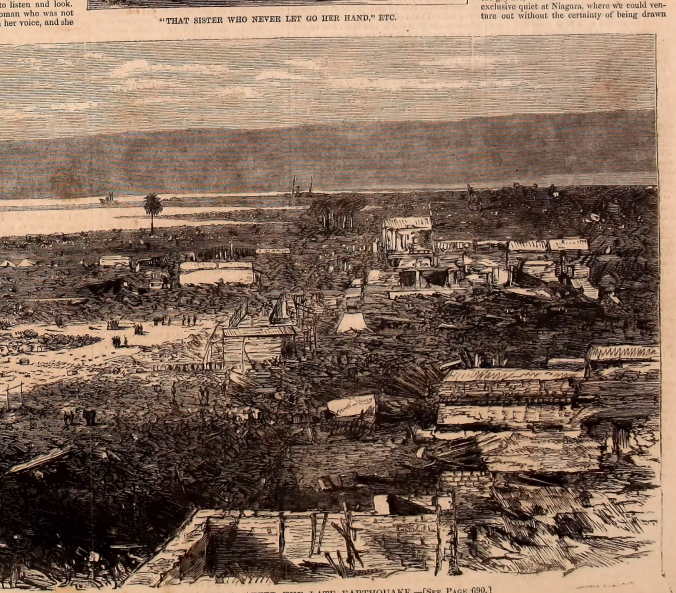
Mrs. Fletcher was showing me all these decorations for self—but Mrs. Fletcher was not a heartless woman; like a butterfly that loved its element of roses and sunshine, and its pretty painted wings, because God made it a butterfly, and put into its insect nature a taste for these; but after all a very human butterfly, that could suffer and feel for those whom the same God had made moths and millers and ugly brown-winged insects. A very human heart had Mrs. Fletcher; it was that which shone from the winning eyes that seemed to look quite down into your heart sometimes, and smiled from the sympathetic lips that gave her the ascendency she won, and rightly named her queen wherever she carried her fine face and noble form.

"It was just such a night as this, Clare, when you were away from us last week—just such a balmy stillness held the air. Jo had been out for his cigar and stroll, which you know he never makes a long one from me: we sat chatting of the old days when we two flitted with each other, as we had with many before us, till we discovered there was something more for us both to do than flirt—something that would make us happier—when all at once out on the still night air came a voice so sweet and clear, so thrilling, that with one consent we hushed our chat to listen and look. It was a woman, Clare—a woman who was not old, for there was freshness in her voice, and she was singing at that late hour about the streets for money. I should have gone down to see her, but that at the moment the maid came to me saying little Paul was wakening restless and calling for mamma; so I had to send her down in my stead with such odd change as I had convenient. Somehow I can't recover from that voice—it comes back to me on such nights as this. The maid said all the neighbors sent her money, which she took silently and went her way.



Interested as I had been by such an unusual way of earning one's bread, as my friend Mrs. Fletcher had described to me, it was not strange that I leaned out of my moonlit window to brood over the chances of life and build up my own theory of its moods and changes which had cast this singing woman on the city streets. When it seemed as if in direct response to my sympathy which (unknown to me as she was) had already wakened for her, crept along silently a woman and a child—a little child clasping tight the other's hand; they stopped just beneath my window; and stooping, sent out on the tranquil up-town streets, which claimed no passers-by save themselves, such a low, plaintive sound, one would hardly guess it were the beginning of song. It seemed more like heart-music which in uttered involuntarily—not songs for paid money—then it rose higher, clearer, and sank deeper; while the midnight air stood still to let the waves of sound catch yet more of that almost divine, that "liquid sweetness." Such a voice as that must have had one teacher—Sorrow—which only could have toned it down to this infinite expression—this inflection that seemed to be hope, love, regret, all and each in turn.

When it ceased I caught up purse and scarlet dressing-sack for bodily protection, and rushed down to this woman who had so moved my soul; how could I offer her such reward for that speaking to mine from the depths of her own?



I hesitated, almost ashamed to enter into her presence. But I must not; for that which I had and she needed had she ventured out clothed in poor raiment, but Godiva-like in her woman's chastity with no protector but her God and the child.

I reached the door just in time to see another step up to her and take her in, away from me and my charity, away from this love for her which was born of her song: and the door closed upon her. If I had only known our neighbors—but who in New York knew their neighbors? I went to the door-step thinking I too might follow and hear her story, but shrunk back again, afraid my little charity would seem like ostentation. I went to my room, but not to sleep; she haunted me. All night, and day after day, the sad voice and the quiet gliding figure rang in my ears and crept before my vision.

The time came for us to take up the line of summer march. We went through the usual routine of springs, sea-side, etc., when, sated with the gay life, we decided to leave these for a more exclusive quiet at Niagara, where we could venture out without the certainty of being drawn into the whirl of that restless, devouring nondescript dubbed society, which holds its carnival wherever its followers are found. So to Niagara we went, and stood, as we had stood times before, awe-struck and cowed by the magnitude of those grandly heavy waters, falling, falling, as they had fallen years that had gone, and would fall an eternity to come, with no voice that dared to ask them how or why, but their own response, their never-ceasing hallelujah of "Glory to God!" A new delight was open to us now in the "Three Sisters," as they are called—three new islands opening from "Goat Island," like the joints of a telescope, each smaller and smaller. How glad we were that while yet in the rudeness of their first exploring we had gone to them—such tangled underbrush and wild rocks that multitudes of sight-seers had not yet desecrated with knife and pen, carving names which would in no other way make any mark in their life travels. Standing with our very feet almost washed by the miniature falls that compose the rapids, one could seem to comprehend and approach these not only bodily, but in thought, where it would seem rash presumption to venture into the overpowering presence of the stupendous great waters themselves.

With a cry of gladness that almost alarmed my friends lest I had come to harm I sprang forward to greet John Grey, who sat there so immovable that even my joyous welcome failed to rouse him, the very picture of discontent.

"What, John!" cried I, "can't the sight of friends rising upon you as out of the very mist and spray of these waters arouse you from their contemplation? Substantial nymphs are we, but very accessible, as we shall show you. You're just what we want to complete our party."

He rose to meet us, and I saw my cousin John was not the cousin whom I had met a year ago. He was cordial, but with a constrained cordiality; affable, but a studied affability. The discontent I had marked upon his face when alone with the waters and his reverie was discontent still, only marked by a forced effort to appear as of old.

So he joined us in our wanderings; and one night we two strayed by ourselves out into Luna Island, where, somehow, like the wind, whose coming and going we can not divine, the picture of that singing woman came before me. I told her tale to John.

"Don't go weaving any romance out of that, Clare. There is enough of sorrow and heartache in the world without sentiment for warp and woof to aid us in fabricating more. We mortals get our share of woes as they come along without borrowing some one else's to grieve over. Don't let your womanly sympathy run away with your ideas of womanly propriety. Doubtless your persecuted daughter, abused wife, penitent Magdalen, or whatever your fancy may have painted her, was some itinerant singer who could have earned an honest livelihood in a simple way without patrolling the streets for a pittance, keeping good-hearted little women who will permit themselves to be worked upon from the sound sleep that would soon put all such troubles into dreamland."

What had soured my good cousin's notions? He used to be, a year or two past, the very cream of the "milk of human kindness," and such a soured element as that was not palatable to me.

"Why, John, don't you suppose that woman would work if she could? We don't know how hard she tried. We don't know how daintily she may have been brought up, and reared to do nothing but sing and flutter away the golden days of her life. And when the storms came how could she meet them?"

Surely some great grief must have come to John, that, filling his own heart, left him no thought for others—some trust been broken—some sympathy turned back upon himself again, that he should be so faithless.

"Hurrah for a raid upon her Majesty's domain to-day, ye feminines!" shouted Jo Fletcher next morning. "We'll take you along to outwit the Custom-house officers. We want new broadcloth and pure 'old Otard.' We want more things than would fill one of your Saratoga arks, and we'll invite you to go along as ladies, but to return as pack-horses, whose amiability will permit any amount of lading to be done by us, your 'lords of creation,' expecting your wit to invent some yet untried resource of your patent framework to pull the wool of our very excellent broadcloth over those worthies' investigations."

Such was the invitation our guide and jolly companion gave us to go over to the Canada side, and we decided to row over in the little boat which plies from the foot of the inclined plane on the American shore. In going down this plane the fears of an elderly lady were loudly expressed, and we recognized our neighbors at home. Our party being large could not all be accommodated in one boat, and I mentally determined I would be the one to go in the other which should carry Mrs. Weed, and perhaps by an adroit introduction of myself learn from her the story I had longed to hear.

John was left for escort, and the rest of our friends were to await us on the Canada side. The offer of a shawl, which I could well spare, soon opened the conversation between Mrs. Weed and myself, and I forthwith asked her about the singing woman.

"Oh dear, yes!" she exclaimed. "That woman with the little child. You don't know how she made me love her. I was so glad to take her in and listen to her voice, which speaks as sweetly as it sings. Poor thing, it's a hard hand must have sent her out to get her bread for herself and the little sister she had with her. When I offered her some attention you should have seen the look she cast up, as if she was praying a little prayer, to thank God first before she did me; after that she said such low, pretty thanks to me, as if she had not been used to thanking any one for such deeds. I asked her all about herself; but, dearie me, she was so silent-like I couldn't get her to tell me a word about why she was left so friendless to wander around the streets, with no one to look at her or to speak to that she knew, but that little wee sister of hers, whom she called Lily. Lily enough she looked like, with great violet eyes, and long, shaggy hair, just like the fashionable children wear it, only Nature did hers all in golden "crimps," I suppose her maid would call it if she had put it up in pins; but it must have been some time since she'd any maid but that sister who never let go her hand, always clasping it as if she feared she'd be an angel and fly away if she took her human touch off of her.

"As I said, I couldn't get her to speak of what sent her out into the world like a pet fawn that had always been fed and fondled by one hand in a park, and who'd strayed away among the wolves and savage creatures of the wood. I thought, as I was an old body, fit to be her mother, she'd see I didn't care for all the false ways and society charities that have to know all about you, where you came from, who's helped you last, and if you were very grateful; but would open her poor, torn heart to me, just as she'd opened her own mouth to let out the rich voice.

"But she didn't tell me why she wasn't living like a lady any more, for lady she always would be, no matter how she lived. Only when she thanked me she took the little Lily up on her knee and said, 'I thank you, and Lily thanks you, because now she won't have to go away from me yet, for this will buy food and wine for her. My darling will stay with me, who wants her so much, who can't spare her to God because He has a whole heaven full of Lilys like her, and I have only this one. I'm all alone if she should go. If you knew how I'd crept away from her and left her sleeping in her morning sleep, and run so fast that when I got back she should never know I'd left her at all—to sell all our little treasures to the great Jewman who kept the pawn-shop near us. I had to feel his crafty eyes on me as well as on them, and I dreaded so to go that I was almost glad when the last went, and I thought I could work for Lily.

"'When we two first went to live alone I didn't know where to go for our new home; but I chose a high front-room, where I saw flowers at the window-ledge below it, and I thought she could look down on them and fancy they were our garden, and up to the sky and see the same stars she used to watch from our window at home. Pretty soon we got too poor to live in that nice place—nice when I think of the home she lives in now—and I took my Lily up in my arms and carried her where it seemed as if I was burying her in the little dark room I took her to.

"'Then the money was all gone, and the treasures, too, except this;' for I had glanced down quite unconsciously at her hands, which looked as if it was little work that they could do. By this she meant a plain gold ring—a wide band it seemed, so thick it had a deep groove in it, where was a braided band of hair ended with a slide in which set one great pearl. She didn't blush when she saw me notice it, and perhaps wonder how she could keep any thing so incongruous with her present life. She only said,

"'I couldn't have sold that, Madam, to a Jew to save any thing but Lily's breath when nothing else would. I'd cut off and sell her golden locks first,' and she wound them caressingly around her own slender fingers. 'I'd leave the little dear in the bed alone at night while I sang round the streets without her. But I couldn't let that go; it's all that's left me of my past, and worth more to me than all I've sacrificed.

"'You may not think it, but I have tried to get work to do. First I tried to make wax-flowers and sell them; but it took more out of my purse for materials than it put in. I suppose some would have succeeded; but it was all so strange to me I didn't know where to go, or how to dispose of them. Then I tried to embroider; but I couldn't work fast enough to pay our rent and keep us both in food and Lily in medicine. I couldn't teach, because I couldn't leave my baby, as I call her, all the day; so I tried to get coarser work to do; but I'd never done it before, and though I tried hard I sewed in more tears than stitches, and they preferred to give it to those who were used to their trades.

"'One night Lily had said, "Sister, sing to me as you used to sing when we went into the woods, and the flowers and the birds were there. How I wish you could take me up into your arms and carry me out, because it's spring now, and maybe it would seem as if the flowers and the birds would come back to me—and to you too, sister." So I took her up and wandered out into the moonlight with her, for I was not afraid; and I walked on, on; it seemed so good to have her close up to my heart, because it was my all—all I had to feel was mine, and we two were alone. She was then getting so little day by day, so little, that it seemed as if she might slip away from me and be gone. She whispered, "Sing, sister." So I sang. A gentleman stopped and gave me some money for my song. It put a new thought into my head: I could sing—sing and save Lily. The old voice seemed to come back to me, and I went home with money—money to buy my Lily back again; and I've sung ever since, while Lily grows strong enough to walk now, and we are happy together.'

"I asked her where she lived, and she told me. Begging permission to go soon to see her, I meant to do so; but you know how it is in the city, we 'boast ourselves of the morrow,' and put off to-day. I had some friends who came upon me unexpectedly, and was then hurried off to the bedside of a sick brother, where I staid till his recovery. Mr. Weed joined me there, so that we should not miss this trip; and here we are, sure enough, at the Canada side, and I've been staring away at the great falls without really seeing them, and hearing the roar and thinking and ta[illegible]g all the while about the poor young thing, who seemed no more fit to be roaming around the world that way than somebody's pet canary let out of its cage by mistake. I shall look for her when we get back, and perhaps, as we are neighbors, and so accidentally met, you wouldn't object to going with me to visit her. I suppose we must part now, as I notice your friends on the bank above awaiting you." And, with a kindly shake of the hand, the good old soul, with her quiet husband, parted from us.

"Why, John!" I exclaimed, as he extended his hand to place mine within his arm. "John, I believe you are fairly enlisted on my side. Now change your colors like a deserter, and do honor to my feminine discrimination. Don't you remember bantering me about my wasted sympathies?"

"Clare, don't. It is cruel of you. Don't you see I suffer; the torture, the uncertainty. We must get away from that party. We must get on to the city. I must go, and you with me."

"But, John, now it's my turn. What is womanly sympathy compared with masculine interest? Then you are not proof against romance after all?"

"Hush, Clare! Excuse yourself from these people, and I'll tell you all my story. You'll not wonder then that I said real life had enough of heartache in it to leave it with its own;" and as he neared the party he urged again: "Go with me, cousin. One day may make all mine a long night, if we lose her."

Thus urged, without knowing why, except that I trusted John to explain to me, I plead a headache and utter inability to go to the Whirlpool and the usual points of interest that we had planned to visit that day. John engaged a carriage, that he might in its seclusion tell me why he was so moved, and thus we returned to our hotel via the Bridge.

"Now, cousin, my reward for yielding my share of the plunder Mr. Fletcher was to intrust me with; my thanks for abandoning a gay and congenial party for such a personification of wretchedness as you have suddenly become. Really, the 'last state of the man is worse than the first' in your case. I found you hanging over those surging waters, the very spirit of discontent, as if it needed but little coaxing from the sprites for you to join them in their mad leap; and though you have smiled on us and been one with us, this simple story of city life—as poverty and wealth clasp hands—transforms you again into the misanthropic John I almost failed to recognize as the John of old. Woman's moods, indeed! No April day could be more changeful than yours."

"Clare," answered he, "you heard Mrs. Weed's story, now hear mine: Do you remember the wards my father took into our home? You know how I had grown up the selfish, careless idol of his life; selfish, because I'd no one to call me out of my self-existence, and solitary living is apt to make one take for themselves what they are not called upon to yield to another. Careless of others' needs, because every wish had been gratified almost before known to myself. I had no mother in my childhood, no sister or brother for my playmate, and my father had one thought, or two, which were identical—money and me. Well, you know all this, and how, when my father's friend died, leaving his orphan children to his care, we took them home to live with us. He left them with little means for such as had been proudly born and tenderly cultured, but under my father's guardianship he hoped it would become more; so he died, and they two gentle girls came home to us two men, left to our own companionship. It was like letting in daylight to a rayless cell; it was a sunbeam in the house all day; and warped, stunted as had been my moral growth, with never a mother's knee to kneel down and pray at, when I had been a boy, nor a mother's hand to lay its fondling fingers on my throbbing temples, was it strange that my heart should grow to this girl-mother that had come into our home?

"I used to watch her toy with her baby sister—for Lily was but a two-year-old baby when they came to us—and wish that I'd been Lily. Day by day we three, so left to ourselves, grew to know each other, till by assimulation with the unselfishness and devotion of Mary Monteith I learned myself better; and loving her I loved what was nobler and truer, and established without perceiving it a higher moral tone for myself than my lone life had ever known. Following on after her blessed example, I worshiped her as men worship what makes them better and holier—as all women could be worshiped if they would ever hold what is pure and holy in their nature; thus leading man nearer to the Virgin-Mother that through the God-Son comes down to them again.

"Yes; I grew to worship Mary Monteith, and I worship her yet. Only that I grope now blindly in the dark for my idol; it is gone, and the cross only is before me. Where were warm kisses now I hold the crucifix to my lips, on which the dead love hangs yet warm. For me there is no 'Easter Morn.' Where there was life is only death; and if I ever get to heaven with this spirit of unforgiveness tugging at my heart 'twill be because not only God but she is there.

"Well, last winter my father, whom men thought infallible, came home with clouded brow, neither Mary's tact nor Lily's childish prattle could move that seated gloom that thickened there; it deepened and deepened till we could hardly recognize the man. One day, on coming home earlier than usual, I found him earnestly conversing with Mary. Supposing he was advising with her as to the best possible use for some of her funds I did not of course intrude, and, to while away the hours, took the next train back into the city to attend alone the Opera which I was so anxious to see. Arriving home late that night I was the next morning surprised by the non-appearance of Mary and Lily in the breakfast-room; expressing this to my father I for the first observed his unusually haggard face. 'What does it mean? Speak, father!' I cried. 'Why don't Mary and Lily come? Why are you so troubled? Does this augur ill for us in our home? Surely no harm can have come to them we may not share—or they share ours—we are as one.'

"'No, John'—he spoke now unflinchingly—'we are not as one. You had better know it all. Sure as I had been that no sagacity of mine would fail, it was a hollow trust. Sanguine of my usual success, I had not only involved my own but the little capital of those two orphan children. We are not beggared quite—they are penniless. Never since the day I broke their father's trust and took their little all, hoping to make it more, have I known peace; that act, kind in its intent, but a fatal venture in its trial, has been the spectre which has haunted me till I could suffer it no longer; but, confessing my guilt yesterday when you saw Mary with me, and praying her pardon, I begged of her to still be with us, and one of us, till the storm was over, and from the wreck which might yet be saved I could recompense her for my unjust stewardship. I spoke of you, and how this would shape your life so differently; that now many long years of struggle would have to come before you could hope to have one honest penny of your own. You, my son, for whose independence I had toiled and held my name so high that it should be an honor to you to bear it. When I spoke of you, and how, if she would let you, you too would join with me in repaying this broken trust, Mary would not listen; she only turned away her head, and said it must not be. No reproach escaped her, only forgiveness and sympathy for us and for Lily. "My Lily a beggared child," she said. "I must shield Lily, but John must not work for me and her; he shall not be bound to cancel his father's obligations—we have no right to that." She seemed quite broken with the thought of it; but I hoped so much for to-day and your persuasions. But to-day, John—to-day—the worst is yet to come. There is no to-day for us with Mary; she has gone. Where, how, I can't tell you. I only know that she has taken her child and gone, leaving this for us'—and my father held out to me a little note I know by heart—every character graved itself into my being as I read:

"'Good-by, dear guardian, for I shall be gone away when you see this. I could not stay to be a daily reproach to you for my wronged rights, which so overcome you, nor to add the burden of two lives more to John's untried powers. Don't grieve for us. God will take care of us and help me to care for Lily. I shall pray to Him to bless you.'

"I was stunned. Life had been a holiday to me. I had a vague notion of what misery might be as it came to other fellow-creatures; but for myself I wanted nothing. Living on in the sweet content which had pervaded the very air of my existence, since she, my light, had dawned upon it, I never dreamed but that I was exempt. Now misfortune with sudden hand draped all the bright colors of my future with one black pall. I seemed to have lived one life, and, awakening from its grave, to merge into a new state—the very genius of whose birth was death and desolation.

"Work! why should I work? It was easier to lie down and die, if one only could. Life would be now a mere rising in the morning to watch the day-hours go by, and count them as they led on to sleepless nights. I had some pity for my father, who stood before me a stricken man, lost to his own self-respect, doubtful now of his own ability to retrieve his good name and his heretofore reliable sagacity. But I pitied myself more. He had shut out my sun and left me blinded in the darkness; in the shrouding gloom I should be lost to my better, newer self, and grope in the old life from which I had arisen. And she—what, was she to be cast out on the uncertain tide of the world? A frail shell at the mercy of waves—tossed whither, now, while I vainly deplored? There was but one thing to do: to find her and save her and myself. To this we bent all our energies. We sought, and vainly sought again, daily coming back to each other and to the home two disappointed men, eager, yet dreading to ask the other of success, which we knew without the asking was failure.

"Meantime my father's affairs were settled, and we had a little remnant left. The home was still ours, through right of my own, from my dead mother; but a home no longer. Within its four walls we had only the stinging memory of what it had been, and might be, if its breathing life had not gone out and left it a cold dead sepulchre where we nightly buried the hope that day had brought. So we went on with little cheer to ourselves and each other, till my father was urged to go abroad on special business for a Company who had known him long; and I begged him to go, with the vain endeavor to dispel the gloom into which our lives had settled. I left the spot of my happiness and grief, seeking by change to shut out the vision that is ever before me. But this woman's story. She had a sister—Lily; and that ring was one I know as I know herself. She always wore it; it was her mother's hair. I must seek her. I must see this singing woman with my Mary's voice; and seeing, know it is not her, only my dead cold love come back to me in thought and memory.

"You must go with me, Clare. I must have some one to lean upon who is stronger than I, who has not bent and yielded to this storm of fate as I have done. Come with me, Clare. Don't delay; we must start to-night."

What a transformer is hope! The settled discontent had yielded to it; the eyes that were raised to mine had a new light in them. How sadly would they fill and darken if they never rested again on the idol which they sought! Of course I would go with John. These two stories, that seemed to be but parts of one, had taken a strong hold upon me, and I made hasty preparations for our exit from the party whose return we awaited.

I was prepared for remonstrance from my delightful and very good-natured friends, whose common-sense I thought the best in the world, when they acknowledged John's strange claims upon me; and we started back to the city at the utmost speed of express locomotion, which could hardly equal the haste with which we mentally traveled. Our destination, No. —Seventeenth Street. We reached it to find a row of dismal tenement houses, said to be latched by any creature whose life had been light and love; and ascending the stairs asked for Miss Monteith.

"An' is it the dillicut crather she is?" came was, small, white hands, that never looked fit to handle ony thin' but gould and silber, and bedeck herself out in all that's purty, they're watchin' fur. Musha! an' if yes cud been ony binifit to her it 'ud bin well for her to led yes on ye befor. It 'ud make even the cold black heart av the ony divvil himself wake like to think he'd brought as much sin into the warld, that iinycint lambs like her shud suffer; and she so low, with never a frind to turn to, ony those her own swate ways could mak' out of the likes of sech as meself. Got one of us in the house that we can go down on our knee to sarved her, and pray'd the Blessid Vargin and all the howly saints that the Blessid av Hivvin kape her safe, so's to save that little goulden-haired beauty of hers. But it's little good that prayin' and wapin' and talkin' will do her, plase the good Lard, now that's better fur us nor we knows ourselves, maks up His mind what He's best do for us."

"Is he dead?" interrupted John. "Lily dead and Mary so bereaved without one care from me? Where is she now? Tell me, good woman, which is her room," turning to the voluble and sympathetic Celt.

"Where is she now? Faith, that's what we'd all like to know if she is not gone to the place we could do her. But wait a bit and I'll till yees all I can ne'her, and p'raps it'sill help yees to find her. You see, Sur, that poor young lady-lin' liv hers was jist pining like for thim angels that she'd strayed away from, and who were lonesome up in the purple-land without her to play was ony the compashun she fit in her little heart, that scarcely bate at all, it wint so slow, that hipt her wid a kind av a sinking. She cud not have to go at the last, Sur. When the days got hotter and hotter, and the air was so thick like that even the flies were too lazy to stir, and the baby lie in the sister's arrums and luk up into her face, as if she'd ask her when she'd be willing to let her go. Thin the two big tares wint down in the early spring-time the two av thim used to go out av nights, for the child was thin more like other childer, and not so wan and sainted, by the same. But whin this breath got so close in these city streets all the grand folks that they used to sing fur wer gone out of the city cool howses, and though, for that matter, I've an idee that many av thim cud stand the hate and the silo a good sile since then the two who got paid for singin' thim. Though they niver complained and let on to the likes av us that the cash was shortening, we'd all our minds made up to that, for there was no more a sup of wine for the little one, and a dainty loaf of white bread fit for such quality childer. And the sister must lave her wid not any longer for an airin', if airin' it could be called, whin there was none to spare for sich folks as wan't big and grand enough to be cut off to the country where they kape it in the summer-time. At last we culdent stond outside ony longer becaw we knew she was now in ur us; so we ventured in to beashe uv her to let us do somethin' for her, if it was only to rin for the dochthur; and the dochthur he came and spake sich kindly wordsto her that it samed as if they'd do her sowl good if the pills and powthers were uv no use to the little one, who samed to mind nothin' at all about her any more, only to have the sister sing to her. She'd sit and sing all through the long night sich beautiful songs as would hush ony kind of pain if it studdent be spasms or somethin' vedlint; and so it was that she a-singing and the child a-dyin', for the songs cuddint kape her. One night, whin the great moon came and looked down into their little room above, Sur, I'd got my own little ones all fast, and I begged uv her to let me stop a bit wid her, for I'd seen the Lily was wasting like, and I thought it might be a comfort to have somebuddy about if it wasn't kith or kin. I not mesilf down in the far corner uv the room, that they mightn't feel I was there. It was nigh on toward morning whin she lay on the sister's heart and said 'Sing, sister, sing, for the angels are coming; I can see them. They are coming wid flowers and white wings, and every thing purty as it used to be in the other home; and they stop to me with their harps. "Come, come!" they sing. But I can't go unless ye sing with them, for I can't go home without ye." So the sister sang; and while she sang the child wint home, and I'd niver known whin it was she wint, it was so still and solemn-like, only that the sister moaned and rocked to and fro, and wint on wid the song; but now all of the song was, 'Alone! alone!' The night was spint intirely, and I culdent git her yit to lay the child out of her arrums though it was quite dead, and could no more feel her kisses than if it was an angel up in Hivvin she was tryin' to rache with those purty lips uv hers; she wouldn't bade me, only sit with the child, and the moan, and the kisses. But befines the dochthur he came, not knowin' thot death had cum in the night, and he pacified her like, a-tellin' uv her how much the child was saved; for it was likely nivver to be strong or hearty; and whin she knew how it must suffer if it 'id lived, she seemed to be willin' it 'od gon' up to the angels and the flowers where it cuddint suffer agin. The dochthur he took the matther of uv her hondis quite nately, and sint the beautiful little coffin to shut her up in; and his wife, a nice, noble-lookin' leddy, cum and laid the Lily in it, wid white flowers all about her to mak' her look comfortable, and the Lily herself was the waxenist and swatist uv thim all; and if they'd had a harp to put into the little whit hands you'd nivver known but it was one uv the saints that was sint down to bring her, she looked so hivvinly. They had a little funeral for her wid only the priest, and the dochthur and his leddy, and the sister, and mesilf, who was invited to cum in; and whin they'd shut her up tight in it to take her away I heard the dochthur read it to his leddy off uv the silver plate on the little coffin: 'Lily Monteith.' And that was the first time I iver knew the child's name.

"Oh God!" cried John, "to bear all this alone —so near, and yet never found! Tell me, tell me, where has she gone? where is Miss Monteith?"

"And that's what I can't be tellin' yez for the dochthur and his leddy wouldn't tell me here, where it wasn't fit for such a gontleswoman; he got new lodgings for her, and promised to do somethin' for her as soon as she was able to stir. The dochthur's name has slipped me intirely; and when my little Nora was sick with the scarf-fever I don't mind the day I was going up and all, so I've no direct wav uv puttin' yees on the thrack uv 'em, which 'ud do my heart good, if I'm thine it would for them. I'm sure they're from the lonesomeins and the heartache. But if ye'll be jist layin' me yea address, and I ever discover the sarch, I'll be afther writin' yez, whativer, whare goin' to the night-school and larnin' eddication, to write to ye in a berry."

And this was all. Well might the breath grow short, the hope-light fade from the eye, and the discontent settle heavier on the brow of John Grey. That his idol should be thus wandered vainly seeking the shrine, was no comfort to him. He had tested before the fruitlessness of search. He had sent out boys, and men, and paid, and had come back to him at night a raven of disappointment; he knew what was left him now; only to turn back to the Past and wait for Mary's wail, perhaps, forever, unless chance, or that higher power that holds the chances and the lives of all, would send back to him the little one he cannot for his prayers. And so to many who wait and pray the fruition and the peace are found only when the struggle is over, the heart is ever content, and they come into the eternal light of the "Forever."

It was now September, and though the city air was still humid with the exhalations of winter a monday sun, we had no heart to leave it. John determined to remain, and hearing Mrs. Fletcher would soon return, I decided to be her guest. The close of the month brought many back ready to enjoy all that October offers, in varied sight and sound, during that most enjoyable month to all who throng eagerly homeward.

Mrs. Fletcher and all the attractions that art can add to a woman formed whom Fletcher had been so lavish, she did not for her foster-mother given up the fond worship of her first. She was a dear lover of flowers. It was, of course, too early for a party of the season, but some of her choicest buds were out; the Night-blooming Cereus was unfolding its pearl, and she had promised to give some of her thousand-and-one great friends to benefit, whenever that should occur. As the silent expansion went on, and while how at the set of sun it would culminate its beauty and its fragrance, she hastily sent out a summons to an appreciative few to congregate that evening in her lovely home. The evening came—perfect one. And its guests came—men of professions, who brought their brains filled with busy systems which had worked there all day, and worked them and the subtle odor could not dissipate; men of merchandise, who came to please their wives and daughters; men who were idlers, and had nothing better to do with themselves than enjoy, as their insipidity could, what nature offered them in flowers, or bright, fascinating women, who adorned or flattered, and thereby pleased them more than the wonder they had come to see; model mammas, with the last vainly-changeable of their unreliable fares throughout the season, but still undaunted, kept up their spirits by such little informal gatherings as might intervene until the full winter season should burst in its holiday glory; lovely daughters, who were ecstatic over dear Mrs. Fletcher, her perfect dinners, her accomplishments, and her exquisite taste.

John Grey turned from them all, for I had coaxed him to come, hoping that he gain a little respite for him from the shadow that sat always at his side—and was still only a shadow.

The gay crowd had entered the conservatory; admired loudly, complimented profusely, and returned at last to a more congenial atmosphere of social badinage and compliment, interspersed with dancing and music.

My cousin John and I had lingered near the perfumed bank of night's queen, hovered over the blossom, looking down into its cup-like, creamy, pale green heart, and touched with reverence each the sweet petals of this nocturnal mystery, while over our senses stole the peculiar power of its fragrance.

John was the first to break the mutual silence. "A little life this is, isn't it, Clare? Coming up in the night with such wonderful delicacy and frailty, burdening the air with its rich aroma, just like some human flower-lives that open to us thoughts as pure, words as tender, as the white blossom before us. In the morning cups, and they have closed upon us their profuse lo-liness; we grasp only the dead, lifeless stock, but the air is freighted yet with the insidious out-

A QUESTION OF WORDS.—When a man is hurt in a railway accident he very foolishly sues for "damages." SUNDAY AT SEA.—[See Page 698.]

THE GOOD TIME COMING.

SUNDAY AT SEA.

If it were not for the hour's service in the morning, the absence of cards, and the indescribable air of quiet and peace which prevails on shipboard on the Sabbath, that day in the cabin would be hard to distinguish from others. The brief service, read by the captain or his chaplain, is always impressive, even to the old sailors and frequent travelers, who have heard it on innumerable occasions. Like the solemn service of the dead, prayers at sea never lose their significance and force; it is alike solemn to stand in the presence of death or amidst the calm solitude of mid-ocean.

And equally difficult is it to tell the day by the conduct of those on deck as in the cabins. The great machines and their keepers are ever at work, night and day, and the monotonous sounds of the hissing steam, and the rumbling implements it drives, never cease. The sailors are only a little less busy, and too often, when not engaged on the watch, they are all too idle. It is not often that one, descending to their deck, and penetrating to their berths, will find them engaged, as the sailor and the boy in our illustration, in reading the Bible. But this infrequent scene does sometimes occur, and our illustration is of a notable instance, told in a quaint old ballad, in which "Bob, the cabin-boy," was instrumental in converting the "Captain of the Nancy,"

"A godless man was he."

But when sick unto death, Bob, the only one of the crew who did not fear the Captain, and to whom only the Captain was kind, penetrated to his room and insisted on reading him the Bible. It was only after repeated efforts and many entreaties that Bob could find a hearing. At length he did, the words struck terror to the Captain's soul, and he was driven to prayer for peace. The ballad then goes on to say, in rhyme more affecting than elegant:

Next morning, at break of day, Bob rose,
And came to his master's door:
The Captain had risen, and all alone
He knelt on the cabin-floor.

His hands were clasped, and his head was bowed,
And he seemed as if in prayer.
Bob paused, lest the sound of his step should fall
On the solemn silence there.

But a strange fear crept around his heart,
"Oh, master!" at length he cried,
"Oh! Captain, oh, master dear, speak, speak!"
But no voice to his replied.

He laid his hand on the Captain's arm,
And laid it upon his head;
And tenderly called him by name again,
But the Captain, he was dead.

CIRCUMSTANCES.

Beatrice and Robert Lamley were betrothed, after three years of as stormy courtship as ever vexed mortal man. And it may seem that I commence my story where, according to custom from time immemorial, it should end; but the stormiest act in their drama was yet to come; and all for an idle whim of a woman.

Beatrice was a coquette. She had led Robert a weary life till folks cried shame, and he turned at bay; swore stanchly that he would have a final "yes," or would that month sail for England. When he would no longer follow her she came to him; but she shackled her consent with one condition. She said,

"And it be known that we have plighted troth, folk will buzz and tattle at every tea-table in the county. Miss Betty will cry, What might he see in her! Miss Eliza will say, Why, her nose is snub, and her temper is deplorable. I shall have never a virtue or a feature left."

"Consider then," urged Robert, "that you are the sum of all virtues to me."

"Nay, but you should consider, Robert, that I have no mother to whom I can go with my secret, and whisper, 'I love Robert.' I am a poor little motherless girl, and my father thinks of his acres and his chests; and for Mistress Lucy, she hath been but a shrewish cousin and housekeeper to me."

"Robert Lamley's wife may choose her own housekeeper."

"Robert Lamley hath no wife," she answered, saucily, but blushing in spite of herself. "There is no such person; and I would have you know, Sir, that our bargain is not yet concluded. Mistress Lucy, who looks scorn at a woman in love, as though it were an immodesty, she shall not fling and sneer at me; and so, if our troth is to hold, you shall tell it to none, and I shall tell it to Barbara, who is more my sister than my maid. You shall be kind to Lucy, and barely civil to me, and I shall be as rude to you as I like, Sir; and it shall go hard, before all is done, if our dear cousin do not think herself on the high-road to the state and condition of Dame Lucy Lamley?"

Robert shook his head. "I am a plain man, Beatrice. I like neither masks nor false colors. And if I am to be Mistress Lucy's servant, and get only biting words from you, in what shall I have bettered myself?"

"In what? You do well to say that you are a plain man." And here she pouted. "I promise you myself, and you ask if you are bettered; though a while back it was only that I should give you some sign that one day I might listen to you. That which is given is no longer desired, I know; but you need not be in quite such haste to show me that I am no longer dear." Here a sigh interrupted her eloquence, and a sob followed the sigh, and tears the sobs. She put up her little hands to hide the tears, and then her handkerchief, and though Robert's utmost persuasion could not remove it, he could see quite enough to alarm him behind it. Resolute with men, he knew nothing of dealing with women, only that he would have ridden his horse over the Lover's Ledge to please this one. And there are women who are Undines. They treat a man with that playful malice with which a child tosses about its puppet, and only through love and sorrow come to a woman's soul. Such a one was Beatrice. To dry her tears Robert gave her his promise. For the love of her own will she accepted it.

There never was a more disastrous concession. It was in itself the very apple of discord. Beatrice had one black fault: she was jealous of every woman not actually hideous. Thus, though she herself had ordained Robert's civilities to Mistress Lucy, she could not endure them; and in turn she tormented him so adroitly that he almost questioned whether it were of accident or intention. If he came in at one door she slipped out of the other. If he approached her in the drawing-room she dodged him around Mistress Lucy. If he sent her messages through her maid she laughed, and returned none. Too downright to comprehend that he was punished for obeying her, Robert bore with her a while with grim patience. Then he took revenge after a man's fashion. He mounted his horse and rode away, and there came no word of him for a month save that he was stopping with Master Venner, who had a fair daughter.

So falling out was the first consequence of this hopeful agreement, and worse was to follow. Mistress Lucy was Beatrice's cousin, and a gentlewoman; but also her father's housekeeper, and a dependent. She was a handsome woman of twenty-eight or thirty, set aside and neglected for a spoiled child like Beatrice. She professed to saintliness, but had a wide mouth and a muddy, brown eye. Her tone was always even, and yet every man and maid servant hated her; and she was a shrewd woman, and had fallen into a trap set for a fool: so much does inclination befog the clearest head. To play with such a woman was to play with fire and gunpowder.

Meantime the month of Robert's visit wore away; and as Mistress Lucy stitched in the parlor of a fair October morning, and Beatrice flitted in and out of the long garden window like some bright bird, her quick eye spied Robert's horse at the gate. Only the moment before she was vowing to tease him no more; but no sooner did she see his tall figure coming quickly up the walk than she rushed in to Mistress Lucy with,

"Put aside your stitching, cousin. Master Lamley's horse is at the gate."

"And if it is," answered Mrs. Lucy, bridling, "why should I lay down my needle, or you come panting here like a farmer's lad that hath seen a show?"

"Mighty well," retorted Beatrice, tossing her head. "There be folk like the ostrich, who shut their own eyes, and so think to blind the rest of the world. But I trow it is not for my father's sake that he posts here fresh from his journey; and other folk than I are commencing to spell—Dame Lucy Lamley."

"Give you good-day," said here a pleasant voice from the piazza.

Beatrice arched her eyebrows expressively at her cousin, and whirled about to face the newcomer. She had never looked fairer in his eyes. Her cheeks were as red as coral. Her brown eyes danced with mischief. Her brown hair hung in long curls on her neck, and in short thick curls about her face. She had a knot of ribbons on her cherry bodice, laced tight and trim, and an arched foot showed daintily from beneath her ruffled petticoat. She was plump, and fair, and dimpled, and peach-like; teasing and ensnaring both. Robert's eyes dilated, and he made a hasty step toward her.

"Oh! it is you?" she said, eying him coolly. "I thought, by the step, it was our loutish Tom," and then she turned her back on him to chirp to her bird. He had gone, she told herself, to teach her a lesson. He should find that she had not learned it.

Mrs. Lucy by this time had laid down her embroidery, and came to meet the mortified young man, with an undeniable rise of color in her olive cheeks.

"We welcome you back," she said, leaving her hand—a well-shaped hand it was—in his an instant longer than need be; and her manner said, as plain as words, "One at least is glad to have you back. Pray, come in, Master Lamley, and tell us what news from Master Venner's?"

"No need," put in Beatrice, wheeling about. "Master Lamley's news is always stale. It is easy to forestall his market. Master Venner hath a sciatica, for which he thinks he may thank the late rains; and the dame hath a new copper-plate print and is troubled for the brindled cow; and Mistress Frances—"

"Mistress Frances," said Robert, quickly, "is a beautiful young woman, and as discreet as she is fair."

Beatrice tossed her head.

"And so the puzzle is out, and Mistress Lucy knows what kept Robert so long at the fair. I told you, cousin, to beware, and that men would be fickle, even those in years."

"You run too fast," said Lamley, much embarrassed. "It was the flood that kept me."

"Oh! ay! the flood! which was at its highest when Mistress Frances would listen, and never above one's shoe-tie. I think I can see it. Master Venner hinting that there is good riding now, and Mistress Frances, who would like a younger lover—"

"Beatrice! this is past bearing," interrupted Mrs. Lucy, in much indignation. "Remember what your father was pleased to say to you but yesternight."

"And so I do," retorted Beatrice. "He bade me show respect to age, and it is out of that very respect that I am propping Master Lamley's most impotent invention."

"I wish that your rendering were the true one," said Robert, with a sudden sparkle of anger in his eyes. "Fairer excuse for lingering than Mistress Venner no man needs."

"Prithee go back to her!" snapped Beatrice, coloring vehemently. "A man looking backward is always dull."

"Why so I will, then," answered Robert, rising, "since it is plain I am not wanted here."

But here Mrs. Lucy interfered. She stepped quickly forward, laid her favorite hand on his arm, and "That would be to punish all for one," she said; "and I can assure you, Master Lamley, that there be those in this household who honor you and prize your friendship."

Here she raised her eyes modestly, and dropped them as modestly, at the which Robert winced; but there was no help for him, and he sat down, though sheepishly enough.

Beatrice shrugged her shoulders, turned to go, and in the doorway met Hugh Featherborough.

This was a brainless animal whom she slighted and cajoled at will; for there is nothing that shall equal a maid's caprices except a man's belief in them; and he was of that metal that he endured her yoke submissively, calling one his rose-days and the other his gray-days. Add to this a handsome pink and white face, and that he was particularly disliked of Robert, and you have the man whom Beatrice welcomed with both hands held out.

"You should come this way," she said, affecting to lower her voice. "Master Lamley hath been absent this month from Mrs. Lucy, and this is their first conversation. But if you choose there is the harpsichord in the further room, and I know you do sing, Mr. Featherborough!" And Featherborough, seeing that this would turn out a rose-day, followed her delightedly, though he had no more voice than an owl. The harpsichord was in the direct line of Robert's vision through the open door, as Beatrice knew; and she and Featherborough showed enframed in the door-way; she with her hands on the keys, looking cajolingly and close into his eyes; he twisting vine-leaves and the late roses in her curls, his fingers touching her white forehead. Robert looked, while Mrs. Lucy purred. The haughty, jealous lover, who would not have had any man look too boldly at her, saw his mistress, who denied him the commonest grace, courting—a fool. He answered Mrs. Lucy at random, and then he forgot her and answered not at all, and his whole soul had gone into his eyes. Mrs. Lucy, finding herself unheeded, drew up in offended dignity. The silence roused Robert. He started, looked hurriedly about him, muttered an incoherent excuse, and left the room.

Mrs. Lucy looked after him and turned white. Her anger was not a flame. It was a dull, cold, leaden, settling together of evil impulses. Her eyes were opened. Whatever Robert's behavior might mean, it signified no love for her. He thought not of her. She had been duped, and Beatrice knew it. The disappointment was dreadful, but she put it on one side. She would not taste one bitter drop, as yet, till she had learned why he came there, and what she herself had next to do.

Robert went to find Barlicorn, his man, and charged him with a message for Beatrice's maid, that she should come to him in the oak-room. Barlicorn listened with a sour and suspicious face, for he was Mistress Barbara's follower; and since her frequent interviews with the master she had chosen to carry herself high and mighty toward the man; and, finding her busy with Beatrice's ruffles, delivered his errand with but an indifferent grace.

"And what might he want of me again?" asked Barbara, reddening, and tossing her head. "Your master, Barlicorn, do always be teasing me."

"Ay, so it seems," retorted Barlicorn, dryly, "and that be the very question I asks myself."

"The question you asks yourself? and what question is that, fool?" asked Barbara, sharply.

"Just whether I be not what you call me, sweet-heart, to hang about you and not to know what my master wants with you."

"Oh! you are there, are you?" said Barbara, deliberately. "But there you may stay, Master Curiosity, for I promise your worship that you get naught from me," and with that she begins to slap and pat the ruffles between her pretty hands, as though they, and not Barlicorn, were the objects of her attention. Barlicorn waited, and looked hard at her. She looked hard at her ruffles, and contrived to pat them.

"Farewell, then," said Barlicorn, gulping down something in his throat. "I love you, Barbara; but my love must be honest as well as fair."

"Farewell," returned Barbara, indifferently, and looking over her shoulder, for women in such cases are always the best dissemblers.

Barlicorn walked away cut to the heart, calling her a heartless jade, and vowing to quit his master's service; and, as ill luck would have it, half an hour afterward he met Beatrice, who inquired for her maid.

"I know not," answered Barlicorn, still on fire and transported by his jealousy beyond respect; but I judge that she be with my master in the oak-room, as she be often enough before."

"With your master?" repeated Beatrice. "What phrase is that, prithee, to use to me?"

"No worse than the thing," replied the man, sullenly. "To-day it is in the oak-room, and to-morrow in the grove, and next day by the brook; and, if it be a shame for me to speak, it is worse shame in your maid. I'd ha' thought better of Robert Lamley, but I've quit her, and I'll quit him, whiles the morrow."

"You have left Barbara?"

"Ay, but now. I told her my sweet-heart must be honest, and so she must, Miss, or none."

"And they are together now in the oak-room," repeated Beatrice, a dark, red spot of anger beginning to glow in her cheek, partly that she was infected of Barlicorn's jealousy, partly that she blamed her lover for obeying her, and thought to find here the cause of what she called indifference. Her heart began to throb. She was on fire and deathly cold all at once; and, without noticing the astonished servant who stood gaping after her, she rushed back to the house to find and upbraid them with their treachery. The oak-room, where was their tryst, had a great garden window, of which, at that season, the leaves were set wide open, while within it was shaded by curtains, so that coming softly from the garden one could hide behind them unperceived; and here crept Beatrice, hearing already voices of two talking low and earnestly.

Now, if I shall declare that every word of this talk was so much fuel to Beatrice's flame, you may say, "Ay, so it is ever in books, but not in nature;" and yet it is, often in nature, that what we call circumstances are so much gunpowder to be fired by a word, or so many strands in a net in which an innocent mortal is entangled—and so it is proved here.

The first words that struck on her tortured ears were, "My dearest love," in Robert's voice, tender and pleading. To which Barbara answered, "Hist! I am in such dread lest we be surprised!"

Then the voices sank to a murmur. Beatrice strained her ears, but could catch nothing till she heard Barbara:

"Nay, Master Lamley, it hath cost me too dear already. There be those who suspect us, and have not—" Here her voice sank again, and then Robert answered, as if in taking leave, growing louder toward the close, so that she caught the words, "Remember, I will not be denied; and that I will have love for love or nothing."

Now these meetings were known to Beatrice, and really inspired by her; for through them she received her lover's homage; and it should have been plain to her that Robert spoke of his love for her, and did but give the maid a message for her mistress; but if Love's eyes are bandaged jealousy is born blind. Beatrice pulled aside the curtain, and, coming swiftly and lightly, confronted them with a pale and angry face that, before she could say any thing, told the story. With equal swiftness Robert and Barbara both saw their danger, and started guiltily, as hath happened to many an innocent person. Beatrice surveyed them with scornful looks.

"Spare yourself an excuse," she said to Robert, forcing out the words with effort from her pale lips. "My senses tell me that you, who were my hero and pattern of chivalry, are a seducer and a villain. Do me now the only favor that is possible. Relieve me from your presence, and never venture to approach me by word or letter. For you" (turning to Barbara), "you are even baser than he. Get you gone this night. To your uncle, to the shelter of Lamley Hall, for what I shall say—but get you gone!"

"My dear mistress," Barbara began, tears streaming from her eyes, and tried to take the young lady's gown in her trembling hands; but Beatrice rent it from her grasp.

"I said I will hear nothing. Eyes and ears could not both deceive me. If you touch me, though I be a woman, I am not sure that I will not strike you. I think nothing so base as ye both."

With this she opened the door, brushing as she passed a woman hiding in the shadow; who herself, white and trembling, yet looked after Beatrice, her wide mouth drawn into a sort of snarling grin. It was Mistress Lucy.

One of the most appalling features of suffering and disaster is the indifference of the physical world. The starving wretch groans and writhes in his straw, and the moon shines in on him as sweetly as it did on his cradle. No bird stints its song though the man rides straight to his doom, into the quicksand, or over the precipice. So the sun shone down unconcernedly, and the water rippled softly and caressingly about the dead upturned face of Barbara Eubank, floating where the current had lodged her against a pier of the bridge.

How she came there could not at first be divined; but they brought her back to the house, from whence she had been thrust the night before, and laid her there; the tiny figure once so lithe dripping with water; the fair curls dank and tangled with weeds, the teeth clenched, the eyes staring wide open, the whole face distorted into a look of unmistakable agony and terror—a pitiful sight! Beatrice cried out when she saw it that she had destroyed herself, and that it was she herself who had driven the poor girl to despair, and took to her bed, ill. Others came to view, and remained to gossip; for where there is such a taking off, people will be curious to cast about for the cause. They said that there was a strange livid mark about her neck, and that it was unreasonable to suppose that a God-fearing woman like this should have destroyed herself. It was whispered, Heaven knows by whom first, that Mrs. Beatrice had words with Robert Lamley because of Barbara; and that Mistress Lucy and Barlicorn had seen the maid and Lamley leave the house together, and from that hour no one had seen her alive. Master Lamley that night came home at midnight, his horse and himself reeking and splashed with mud; and, whereas the week before he was planning to build, he talked now of nothing but of sailing for England. These facts laid together looked darkly.

It often happens that those most concerned hear last of a matter. Sitting sullenly at home Robert knew nothing of Beatrice's illness, or the scandal concerning himself, till, as he was putting foot in stirrup to ride to the coast and take ship, he was arrested for the murder of Barbara Eubank. He listened at first with an astonishment that, if not genuine, was its best counterfeit. But men argued that his first surprise was guilty terror, and his subsequent composure a seared conscience. Not many came to him during the two long months that he lay in jail, and none from Simon Marson's household. There was reason for this. Simon was a prisoner to gout. Beatrice, lying in her bed, was thinking of Robert's danger. There are such things as spiritual storms, and when the wind blows in your teeth every straw also lies across your way. So there came to Robert not so much comfort as a word of remembrance from his oldest friend.

But, on the day of his trial, Beatrice, urged perhaps by some premonition, would ride abroad, though Mrs. Lacy, who was a witness for this trial, of which she had not had a word, made outcry for her health. So the coach was had out, and Mrs. Lucy got in, hoping that Beatrice might break her neck. Beatrice next would drive through the village, and seeing the stir at the court-house, asked what it was.

"The trial of Robert Lumley for the murder of Barbara Eubank," answered Mrs. Lucy, as if she would have the words stab her to the heart. And so no doubt they did. But Beatrice, pale blood, like the old baron's ran strong and red, and Beatrice grew not white but scarlet.

"If that be so," she said, with irony, "his friends should be beside him," and she ordered the coach to stop.

So, as the counsel for the people was bringing to his accusation, there was a bustle of an usher making strenuous way toward the front, and looking up, Robert saw Beatrice. Her bonnet was off, as his lover's eye could note, even then; and she darted him a look as she sat down—a look of loving pity for what he had undergone. He thought more of it than of his accuser, who was drawing toward the end of his speech.

"Upon what," he asked, "can he say, "it will appear that violence had been used to the woman. There was a crease about her neck, and a bruise upon her cheek. So she had been a murder committed, and Mr. Lumley was the last man seen in her company. I could wish he had not been so wild as he was. But that, too, is a very strange thing, being a friend and frequenter at Simon Marcon's house, that he should go away, on the night of his death, without leave-taking, as he did; stealing out by night with this woman, as two witnesses shall testify, and from the time that she was found still dead was not seen of any alive. It is very observable also, unless there has been a sort of fate in it, that though Lumley left at half an hour after easy riding from Simon Marcon's house, Robert Lumley came home at midnight, weary and muddstained; and though a frequenter of Marcon's, as aforesaid, strived not to see them when news came of this maid's death and of the discovery of the finding. He made at haste to sail for England, whereas the week before he talked of building and enlarging his grounds, to prove which we shall call one witnesses, and then I hope he may be put to give you some account of how these matters came about."

Here all was silence for the prisoner for those signs of guilt or innocence to which men take such heed, and the counsel for the people, with his face straightforward, and never blenched. Was that like a murderer or like an innocent man? But Robert turned to the fair young face. For Beatrice, she looked and listened like one in a nightmare, praying to awake. The man at the bar was her lover. His faces turned quickly at the word him were her friends and neighbors; the judge and jury—she knew them all. How could these friendly, familiar faces look on such a dreadful aspect? The talk of the witnesses sounded in her ears like the babble of delirium. She came to herself how he saw the dead girl by the water; another to say if she floated or hung; a third, how she was taken up, and of the marks on her neck. Then a surgeon proved that she drowned men die of suffocation, and talked much of when a body should swim and when it sinks. Mistress Lucy Marcon spoke upon the oath she swore that, walking in the garden on the night of the murder, she saw Robert Lumley and Barbara go away together. She, snatching up the shadow, she heard him ask her to go his road, and that the clock was striking eight as they came out. Both prisoner and witness were then being in hiding that night, because of his jealousy of Barbara and his master, he saw them go away together, and thought to follow them. But he should do them a mischief. That, though he walked, and his master was well mounted, he reached home at nine, and his master at midnight.

In those days a prisoner had the right to examine the witnesses, being allowed to have counsel than he was; but Robert suffered these damaging statements to pass without question, as he had the look of being asleep; and he had to say offered only the following answer:

"What I have to say is this. Here hath been a foul murder committed, but I did not do it, nor less I am innocent of the deed. For the rest, what these people have declared of me is in the main part true. I left Simon Marcon's house, and had of late had much talk with Barbara Eubank, the subject of which I shall keep to myself; only I desire to affirm that our conversation was in all innocence and honor. And on the night of which they speak, coming from Marcon's house I met this Barbara at the gate, and did ask her which way she went, knowing that she was that day dismissed by her mistress, to which she answered that she should go to her uncle the miller, and went her way, and I saw her no more. But being, for reasons which it concerns me not now, high distraught, I rode to that place they call the Hoppers, choosing the worst road, and wishing to break my neck, and resolved to go to England, because the country was grown intolerable to me; and I never heard that I was called in question of this murder till I saw the officers of the law; and here is all I have to offer."

Now here, on one side, was a story circumstantially built up by witnesses, every incident of which was a bloody and terrible finger, pointing at Robert Lumley seducer and murderer, and on the other side, a tale told by a man, his guilt all but proved, of an aimless rolling about, and of interviews, and a journey for which he could give no reason; but it had the ring of truth in it, and it shook men's prejudices.

All this time Joe Tibbitts, the cobbler, was running, breathless, up the hill. What has the cobbler to do with the trial? Why, every thing. And his baby, though the frowsiest imp in the village, had not commenced to cry, judge and jury had never struck. It was evident that the fleet had "pronounced." A communication was made to the authorities of the city to the effect that the nation was resolved to resent its liberties against those who had outraged it, and inviting Cadiz and its garrison to join the movement. Presently, from the arsenal and fortress of La Carace and San Fernando, came marching down two battalions of marine infantry, with drums beating and bands playing the popular air of Riego's Hymn, so long prohibited in Spain. They had "pronounced," and it was soon evident that city and garrison were alike prepared to do the same, with the exception of the artillery, which held out. There was some parleying with the colonel in command of that corps; it was pointed out to him that he was in presence of overwhelming forces, and that the insurgents earnestly desired to avoid bloodshed; in short, the arguments were sufficiently cogent and the position of the artillery abundantly hopeless to induce the commander to surrender his post, and his men remained prisoners of war, which they still were when the messenger who brought this intelligence left Cadiz. There was talk of sending a detachment to Cento to fetch a battalion there which was all in readiness to join the insurgents, but—and this is a great proof of the confusion felt by the chiefs of the rising—the Admiral declared they had plenty of troops and might leave the battalion where it was for the present.

Prim's entrance into Cadiz was a scene of almost delirious enthusiasm. The whole city was out, mad with delight, men and women crowding round the successful General, embracing and thanking him. The Gentianes are a demonstrative people, and on the occasion they need almost to have gone out of their senses with joy. One of the first things he did on shore was to send a message to Cadiz, was to send a message to Seville, and a well-known Progressista journalist was dispatched with the news to the capital of the Liberal party heard of the success of the movement at Cadiz they rose, and the garrison rose, and the whole city became the scene of a riot. Count-General of the province, old General Vigara, declared joining, received a pass and departed accompanied by a numerous retinue of guns, was at once formed, having for its president Signor Arrietoui, well known and much esteemed as a Progressista and Constitutionalist, who has never held office, but has always maintained a high reputation as an honorable patriot. Admiralty Minister Topete, Admiral of the Canary Islands; Serrano took command of the insurgent forces, which are estimated at 10,000 to 20,000 men of regular troops, comprising the whole garrison of Cadiz except the artillery, the troops from San Fernando and La Carace, and probably also the garrisons in Jerez, Chiclana, the Puertos, all of which places and many other Andalesian towns at once rose, while the whole garrison of Seville, with the advanced-guard of Pavia's (Novaliches) army passed over to the insurgents.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The distance from Omaha to Sacramento is 1719 miles—to San Francisco it is 1946 miles. By Christmas it is expected the Central Pacific Railroad will reach the vicinity of Great Salt Lake; and by July, 1869, the roads of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Companies will have met at some point one or two hundred miles west of Great Salt Lake, when communication between the Atlantic and Pacific ocean will be established. The extraordinary rapidity which has characterized the progress of this road has given rise to fears that it is imperfectly done. Yet when it is remembered that the grading, like twenty thousand men are at work upon it, that necessary materials are promptly supplied by the Company, that the road is now in the hands of the Commissioners of Government, who are bound not to accept it unless it is in every respect perfect, and will justly condemn that it will prove as well constructed, at least, as ordinary railroads.

The lands along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, in the valleys of the Platte and other rivers, are among the richest of the fertile fields of the productive West. Through the region of the Rocky Mountains, there are many valleys now being, only capable of cultivation to secure a profitable return. Immense forests of pine and other soft lumber grow on the Black Hills, and on other mountain ranges, and the great streams that tap these regions will float down the transportation of timber to the Union Pacific road. Mineral deposits of various kinds exist along the line of the road. Coal is found in Dakota, and in many other sections, enormous beds of excellent coal have been discovered. Iron is in semi-bituminous, and is said to be well adapted for use upon locomotives. It is stated that among the Rocky Mountains there is a great abundance of mineral springs, hot and cold, saline and sulphurous, and of almost every other known kind. It is probable that soon our most fashionable watering-places will be located in Wyoming and Colorado Territories. If it is, that very soon many new unexplored sections of the West will be teeming with a busy population.

From the most recently report of the Castle Garden Labor Exchange, it appears that during the last thirteen days in September there were 1836 applicants for employment—207 men, 629 women.

An "Electric Clock" has been recently exhibited in this city. The motive power is supplied by a weak galvanic battery, the currents from which, transmitted through two coils of wire, act upon electro-magnets set within the pendulum ball. The only attention the clock requires is to have a spoonful of acid placed in the battery about twice a year.

The pastor of one of our city churches, in a recent sermon upon the "Unity of Nature of the Christian religion, alluded to the transitory life of many opposing systems of religion, and, in connection, mentioned the following fact: Two years ago, the preacher said, he desired to obtain a copy of a work of Theodore Parker's, entitled "Discourse on Matters Pertaining to Religion," in which the author set forth a system of religion in the place of Christianity. He inquired at all the principal book-stores in New York and Boston, and from them he went and searched in second-hand book-stores, but not a copy could be find. He employed agents to investigate more carefully, but in vain; in less than seven years after the death of Theodore Parker, not a copy of the book which contained his peculiar system of religion could be found in the market, though while he lived his works entranced multitudes, who were swayed by him to adopt his views.

About two years ago a well-known New York publisher, being in delicate health, purchased a little farm in Aiken, South Carolina, moved thither with his family, and went vigorously to work. During the whole period of his possession of the farm his profit has averaged five hundred dollars a month. The enormous income has been derived from the sale of peaches, apples, and grapes—and they promise to be still more remunerative in the future.

Why are grossly intoxicated persons allowed in our city cars? One would suppose our rules in these crowded vehicles were sufficiently uncomfortable without the addition of such a grievance. Occasionally we have seen a conductor who valued the respectability of his car, and the comfort of his passengers enough to remonstrate without admission to one who was too much intoxicated to behave decently. But this is not always the case. Only the other day we chanced to be riding in a car where a drunken man seriously disturbed all the passengers. He first attempted to pay a newspaper, which in having with difficulty accomplished, he tossed it about the car, knocking it around with his stick. Then, also the conductor, with due unconscious apparently, but directly occupied in collecting fares, he commenced a noisy, tallest exercise, and finally got up and staggered through the car, falling against one and another of the passengers. A lady, alarmed at the approach of the drunken creature, repeated to the conductor, who was looking quite the other way, that he should introduce the people he allowed to do so in the cars?" The conductor glanced at the man, and, in a surly tone, replied, "I don't know my duty as well as you do?" He, however, induced the man to leave, when he was performing the same antics again in a moment, and so continued, until, to the relief of all, the man apparently reached the end of his route, and was shut out the car. This happened in Car No. 34, on the Eighth Avenue line. Some regulation would be made by which men and daughters should be exposed to such gross annoyance.

At the recent annual meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions the Treasurer's report showed that the receipts for the year had been $338,000, and the expenditures (including the last year's debt of $49,000) about $389,000, leaving a balance of $51,000. The general report alludes especially to the increased interest in missionary work among women, and a cordial welcome is given to a new auxiliary, the "Woman's Board of Missions," organized a few months since, but which has already assembled the support of seven single ladies—two in China, one in Ceylon, one in Syria, and two in Turkey. It gives in charge to the leaving to the American Board and its missionaries all care of details this new Society will aim to diffuse information, and to Frequent correspondence with the ladies it sends out to raise funds for their support, and to the interest of native women and Bible readers under their care, and especially to awaken a deep and prayerful interest in their labors.

It is stated in a Paris journal, which professes to understand the gastronomic tastes of the sovereigns of Europe, that the Queen of Spain is a dainty eater, while Isabella of Spain—if she can still be caused among sovereigns—is a great eater; that Alexander of Russia is very hearty, and his Prussian Majesty fond of drink and good things generally; Victor Emanuel is blessed with a wonderful appetite, and Napoleon is the selection of food; while the Sultan favors strong meats, pastry, and Burgundy. The Count of Portugal is said to be the smallest eater in Europe!

According to reports, Tennyson has a new poem in hand of great length and merit than any he has published, which will be in the printer's hands before the end of the year.

The Paris Illustration lets out the secret reason why the Sinaeus Twins desire to be cut asunder in their youth. "Each of them," it says, "is in love and we are happy as possible together; then Chang declared himself to Miss Eng, and Eng to Somebody, and so the quarrels have become often very violent. Query, why did not Eng accede when the Southern States did, instead of persisting to keep Chang?

There is a very unlucky farm in Erie County, Ohio. Every man who has owned it has been killed, and one member of each has lost a limb while working it, and in two instances life was lost. The last victim caught his leg in a reaping machine last summer, and was wounded so seriously that his leg was taken off. He died a few days after from the effects.

A party of Massachusetts hunters have been having a fine time in the forests of Maine. As proof of their success they have sent back to Boston the entire three bears, one of which weighed over three hundred pounds, and ninety-five pounds of lard.

A few weeks ago Mrs. Mary L. Hutchinson, mother of the renowned family of singers bearing that name, died in Milford, New Hampshire, at ninety-five years. She was the mother of sixteen children, and was herself a descendant of the Hutchinson family which, transmitted to her children, have rendered them so famous.

Not long ago a good deal of amusement was created in one of the courts in this city by the application of a lady who desired to be admitted to citizenship of the United States. The friend, who accompanied him as witness, was asked by the judge if he knew her, and "not through." "How is this?" asked the Judge: "are you not a citizen of New Jersey and a citizen of the United States already?"

"A New Jersey citizen, your Honor."

"Then you know her, Judge, to be just enough?"

"Ah, you know, your Honor," replied the man, "really Republican in her sentiments, speech." So free Jersey, and I'd like to be as—a—your Honor knows."

He was officially informed that he could not swear.

In the United States, and left the court with a long drawn face on which was depicted distress and lingering doubt.

The following is given as a sample certificate, where, by Dr. Thundergrist—any other name can be substituted—because so overwhelmed with customers that he was obliged to employ thirty assistants to sell his bottles: "Dear Doctor, I will be 95 years old next October. For ninety-four years I have been an invalid, unable to stir except when moved by a lever, but a year ago last Thursday I heard of the Grenadine Syrup. I bought a bottle, smelled the cork and found myself able to walk. I am now run two miles and a half miles an hour, and three nineteen double somersaults without stopping."

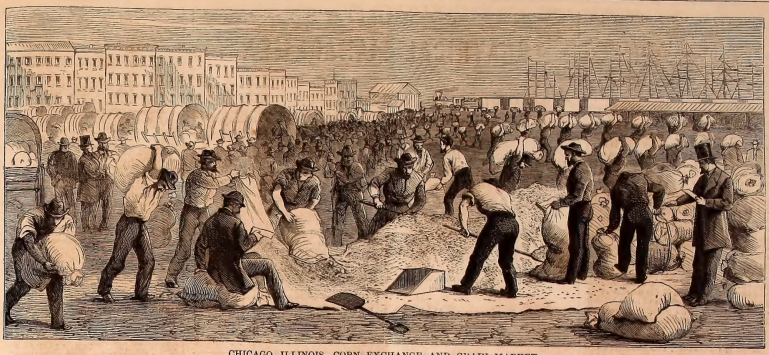
HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE, IN THE FIELD NEAR VICKSBURG July 3, 1863.

Lieutenant-General J. C. Pemberton, commanding Confederate Forces, etc.:

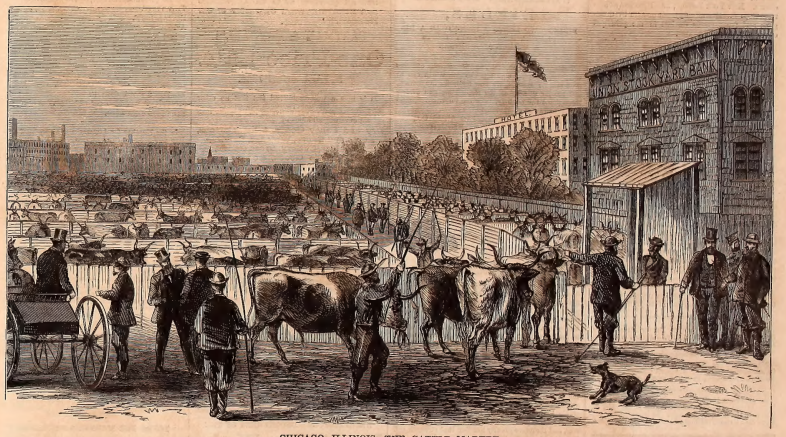
GENERAL,—Your note of this date, just received, proposes an armistice of several hours for the purpose of arranging terms of capitulation through commissioners to be appointed, etc. The effusion of blood you propose stopping by this course can be ended at any time you may choose, by an unconditional surrender of the city and garrison. Men who have shown so much endurance and courage as those now in Vicksburg will always challenge the respect of an adversary, and I can assure you will be treated with all the respect due them as prisoners of war. I do not favor the proposition of appointing commissioners to arrange terms of capitulation, because I have no other terms than those indicated above.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,



U. S. GRANT, Major-General.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S SPEECH TO THE NEW YORK RIOTERS.



MY FRIENDS,—I have come down from the quiet of the country to see what was the difficulty, to learn what all this trouble was concerning the draft. Let me assure you that I am your friend. [Uproarious cheering.] You have been my friends. [Cries of "yes," "yes"—"that's so"—"we are, and will be again."] And now I assure you, my fellow-citizens, that I am here to show you a test of my friendship. [Cheers.] I wish to inform you that I have sent my Adjutant-General to Washington to confer with the authorities there, and to have this draft suspended and stopped. [Vociferous cheers.] I now ask you as good citizens to wait for his return, and I assure you that I will do all that I can to see that there is no inequality, and no wrong done any one.—NEW YORK TRIBUNE, July 14, 1863.

"STOP THIEF!"—A SKETCH OF LIFE IN NEW YORK CITY.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS—CORN EXCHANGE AND GRAIN MARKET.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS—THE CATTLE MARKET.

DRIVING HOGS TO THE CHICAGO MARKET.—[SEE PAGE 702.]

CHICAGO GRAIN AND CATTLE MARKETS.

CHICAGO, Illinois, if her rapid progress in population is to be taken as a fair test of her position, is the great Western city. Her grain and her cattle and pork not only inundate our Eastern markets, but there is also left a large margin for exportation to Europe. Just now, when the drought in England makes an exaction upon the products of this country, the feature of exportation is a very important one.

One of the illustrations which we give on page 701 shows how the grain is collected at the Corn Exchange—how it is examined, picked, sacked, and loaded; another represents the scene at the Cattle Market; and a third illustration carries us away over a thousand miles from Chicago to the prairies, and brings before us a drove of hogs bound for the city. From these cuts we catch a partial glimpse of Western commerce. But time fail to tell the whole story. Chicago and St. Louis are two of the most active commercial cities in the world. The last ten years have witnessed many improvements in the machinery of exportation. Not only have railroads increased in number between these Western cities and our Eastern ports, but grain elevators have been introduced to facilitate the process of loading, etc. The enterprises of the Pacific Railroad will introduce a new era in the progress of St. Louis and Chicago as well as of other Western cities, making them the entrepôts between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts.

ADVERTISING may almost be said to be resolving itself, by careful method, into a science. It is certainly becoming an assumed necessity of the enterprising business man, with whom success by every proper, legitimate means is regarded a duty. Among the honorable and efficient men engaged actively and prosperously in the advertising business, we can refer advisedly to Mr. T. C. EVANS, who has earned in this calling a reputation that is itself wealth, for it inspires confidence in all with whom he has dealings, who are many, and confidence is a prime requisite in all business relations.—Watchman & Reflector (Sept. 17, 1868).

CAN it be possible that over five million bottles of PLANTATION BITTERS have been sold during the past year? It is almost incredible; nevertheless it is absolutely true, and is the most convincing proof of their wonderful medicinal and health-restoring qualities. Every family should be supplied with these Bitters, at whatever cost or trouble it may be to obtain them. Be careful that you get the genuine, and that you are not imposed upon by a spurious article.

SOL. SMITH'S THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT.

THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT IN THE WEST AND SOUTH FOR THIRTY YEARS. Interspersed with ANECDOTICAL SKETCHES; autobiographically given by SOL. SMITH, Retired Actor. With Fifteen Illustrations and a Portrait of the Author.

8VO, CLOTH, $2 00; PAPER, $1 50.

This autobiography of one of the first of American actors is immensely entertaining as a narrative; from the laughable boy Dedimodus to the anecdotal old Proteus it is irresistibly droll and comic. It is full of incident, character, and reminiscence, and as a piece of autobiography of Mr. Sol. Smith, but a complete history of the American stage, full of facts about the early life of the principal actors and managers of the present day, and of circumstances of the stage for the past fifty years and more. Besides, it forms a most pleasant and agreeable sketch of Southern and Southwestern society, so faithful that any reader who has ever encountered the peculiar people of those regions will instantly recognize its truthfulness.

The People know.

If there is any thing the people thoroughly understand, it is the comparative value of the various medicines offered for their acceptance through the advertising columns of the press. In Scriptural phrase, they try all, but only hold fast to that which is good. Hence, a medicinal preparation that has been growing in favor with the public for a period of twenty years, and has attained a larger sale than any other article of the class ever reached in any country, may be fairly entitled a STANDARD REMEDY, touching whose merit there is no room for controversy. Now this is precisely the position of

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

As a means of preventing and curing dyspepsia, ordinary indigestion, biliousness, general debility, and nervous affections, it has literally lived down all competition, and legitimately takes its place as the foremost vegetable tonic on this continent—indeed, on this hemisphere. In view of this admitted fact, which may be readily verified by a reference to the Revenue Returns, a few words of commendation are deemed out of the use of an article in such general request, will not be considered egotistic or out of place. There is no season when the HOSTETTER BITTERS in course of this agreeable invigorant more significantly than the Fall. The great contrast between the temperature of the nights and days, and the heavy nephitic mists arising from extensive surfaces of decomposing vegetable matter, necessarily have a depressing effect upon systems partially exhausted by the heat of summer, and therefore greatly needing that strength and vigor which are the best safeguards against disease. Acting as a tonic and stomachic, a blood depurent, an alterative and an antidote to malaria, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS exercise a wholesome influence upon every portion of the organization, and prepare it to resist every unhealthy influence. Hence its great value as a Fall medicine.

The Opium Habit.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Ready:

THE OPIUM HABIT, WITH SUGGESTIONS AS TO THE REMEDY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The writer and compiler of the volume has been himself a victim to the habit which he describes from long easten more than half a hundredweight of the drug with comparatively little suffering, and has for nearly fifteen years. He emancipated himself by a short but determined struggle of six weeks, by which he rescued from 80 grains a day by diminished doses to the entire abandonment. The story which he tells is interesting without being at all sensational; it is minute enough without being tedious, and the moral lessons of hope and perseverance are none the less impressive from the fact that there is not any attempt to state or enforce them. There is no cant nor preaching in the story, and but very little in the recollections which follow it; the author judges wisely enough that the facts speak loudly and forcibly enough, and that to the great majority of opium-eaters their own reflections furnish more profitable food than they care to hear or can consent to endorse.—Nation.

THE MOONSTONE.

A NOVEL.

BY WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "Armadale," "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Antonina," "Queen of Hearts," &c., &c.

With many Illustrations.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are the greatest of all in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought endless ingenuity and labor. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Athenæum.

* * * Altogether The Moonstone is one of the most remarkable novels of the day, its literary excellence being not the least of its many merits. * * * If anything of the time possesses the facility of interesting his readers in his work, it is Mr. Wilkie Collins. He possesses it in so great a degree as to withdraw attention from other faculties of his, which are full as worthy of admiration. The mass of his readers are so astounded at his skill in concerting and unravelling plots that they forget to observe his skill in delineating character. In The Moonstone the chimes sound the scenes through which they move are exceedingly life-like.—Athenæum.

Have just ready:

THE SECOND VOLUME OF

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

"... The polished diction and burnished style which first made Kinglake famous are fully maintained in this volume; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate and unapproachable excellence."

By a happy accident the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable epoch in history, with which the national honor is in a peculiar manner involved. He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what to him had become a labor of love. Hence he has obtained a careful survey of the localities; he has consulted and collected diligently and conscientiously without end; he has personally communicated with partners and survivors, with subordinate and leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured in the scene, and he has at his command a mass of information perhaps unequaled in pure severity for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Frederick's Magazine.

"... Mr. Kinglake in his present volume fully sustains his reputation as a fine writer and a charming historian. You have not only a comprehensive but a non-professional man have ever so completely mastered so large an amount of personal narrative and military events with such graphic power; fewer still can clothe their impressions in such pure and nervous English.—Examiner.

Mr. Kinglake has exhibited extraordinary powers as a historian in his account of the Battle of Balaklava. He minutely describes it, and traces all the movements of that terrible action—the rash charge, the wavering, the rallying, the rejoicing, and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and the power of military tactics which he displays—and the general vividness of the narrative, while often seeming to grow out of the battle-field, with the roar of mortal combat, the groans and the shouts of the combatants, is unsurpassed in any literature can boast. Sometimes composed in the spirit of military criticism, at others in that of a soldier, and at others in that of some modern prose Homer, who feels the inspiration of the fight, and describes with the personal heroism of individual actors, it does not seem to be the work of a master in this species of writing.—London Review.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1868. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition: Seventh Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $2 25.

From the Boston Journal.

TO AMERICANS GOING ABROAD.—Some six years ago Mr. W. Pembroke Fetridge, at the suggestion of the Messrs. Harper, published a little hand-book of Europe for the purpose of gathering materials for a Guide-Book adapted to the wants of American travellers. Mr. Fetridge passed a year abroad making notes and observations, and the book, published at the usual expense, besides visiting every place calculated to interest an American tourist. The success of Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe was published after his return to this country, and at once attracted the favorable attention of all who had occasion to visit Europe. The many suggestions which the volume contained, and its reliability, gave it from the start a high rank. The volume has now reached its seventh year, during which time the East has been embraced within its range. It is very mindful to be perfect in design and execution. Mr. Fetridge visits Europe every year, gathers additional information, and by keeping au courant with the progress of events and changes of Continental topography, is enabled to make each edition every way fresh and complete.

THE DEMOCRATIC HELL-BROTH.

Double, double, toil and trouble,
Fire burn and caldron bubble.
Round about the hell-broth go,
In the motley fragments throw:

Hand of Treason, reeking red,
Poison-fang of Copperhead,
Tongue and lip of perjured Lee,
Bitter tear of refugee,
Curse of planter, prayer of slave,
Blossom from a martyr's grave,
Rod of "Moses," which he lost
When he pardoned Pharaoh's host,
Skull of prisoner at Fort Pillow,
Blood of freedman at Camilla,
Hunyton's torch, Fred Douglass's fetter,
Booth's revolver, Blair's letter,

Toombs's whip and Forrest's sneer,
And a sigh from Dostie's bier,
Seasoned with guerrilla's oath.

Seymour stirs the horrid broth—
Round about his head a rag
From the Alabama's flag;
Cloak of canvas that the gale
Wrested from the pirate's sail;
Wand of withery that bore
Treason's flag in '64.
With a weird and hissing sound
Rocks the caldron round and round,
And he cries, "Ye very good!
Lo! the cup of Brotherhood!"

THE POLICY OF ASSASSINATION.

THE open threats of assassination made against General GRANT come, of course, from the vehement supporters of the Democratic cause—from the men who hailed WILKES BOOTH as a benefactor—and who hope for the election of SEYMOUR and BLAIR as the next best thing to the success of the rebellion for which they prayed and worked. And whence comes the tone of such persons and papers but from the traditions and policy of a party that sought to prostitute the Government of this country to a vast system of defenses of slavery, and that strives, now that slavery is gone, to perpetuate the hate and jealousy and crime that spring from injustice always and every where?

Such is the well-understood spirit of that party that when its candidate for Vice-President recently made a speech in St. Louis, in which he made a doubtful allusion to General GRANT, it was instantly interpreted as a threat of assassination. Those, however, who are most familiar with the reputation of General BLAIR probably do not hold him responsible upon all occasions for what he says in public. Even his party friends who called him into Connecticut in the spring of 1867 were, we understand, quite willing that if the General were not held responsible for his speeches, they should not be held responsible for the General. What words he actually used at St. Louis it is difficult to determine. Those which his friends are willing to have published as used by him, represent General GRANT as a military chief who, having reached the White House, will there intrench himself with a bodyguard and various other luxuries, and never go out so long as he lives.

Now in every country there are plenty of men who consider it right and praiseworthy to assassinate tyrants; and when, speaking to a crowd of which the most considerable element was that of the rebels who rejoiced in the murder of Mr. LINCOLN, General BLAIR points General GRANT

WILKES BOOTH THE SECOND.

"If he is elected by unfair means, or use of illegal power—if he does not receive a majority of the three hundred and seventeen votes of the Electoral College, fairly cast—if he seeks to override a majority in America, he dies before his term of office shall one-fourth expire, and the party that would thus unjustly elevate him to power shall be strangled in the blood it cries for."—The Democrat, Oct. 15, 1868.

as a despot who will subvert the Government, and establish himself permanently in the White House, he can no more escape the responsibility for the kind of interpretation that will inevitably be placed upon his words than Mr. SEYMOUR can shuffle off the responsibility involved in saying to a mob in the city of New York, at the time and under the circumstances in which the mobs his Academy speech, that a mob may urge the plea of military necessity as well as a government.

In his striking picture upon the first page Mr. NAST shows, with a few forcible strokes, more eloquent than much rhetoric, the spirit of reckless hate which animates so large a portion of Mr. SEYMOUR's supporters, and that of peace, which always accompanies the liberty of which General GRANT is the representative. The words of LINCOLN, "With malice toward none, with charity toward all," are naturally followed by General GRANT's expressive phrase, "Let us have peace." GRANT's administration will secure peace upon Lincoln's principle of charity and liberty. The man who hopes for peace from Democratic black codes, from Democratic Ku-Klux Klans, from Democratic hatred and murder of loyal men, hopes to gather grapes of thorns.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1868.

THE OLD PARTY AND OLD POLICY.

THE late desperate and hopeless attempt of some of the supporters of the Democratic party to change the aspect of the canvass illustrates a truth which should be very carefully pondered by every voter in the country. The principles and policy of that party, unflinchingly pursued for a generation, plunged the country into fearful war. The party was wholly controlled by its Southern element. Its real leaders were the Southern politicians, and its sole great purpose had become the perpetuity and extension of slavery. Free speech was annihilated at half of the country under Democratic domination, and in the other half the practical destruction of the most precious rights of the citizen was defended by the Democratic orators and press. The contest had become practically that of the two tendencies—the one toward a Union from which slavery should be peacefully and legally eliminated, and the other toward the supreme sovereignty in the Union of the slave power; and of the latter tendency the Democratic party was the political organization.

When its policy was repudiated in the election of 1860 the rebellion was plotted by Democratic leaders, and actively supported by the Democratic section of the country. Precisely as it was supported by the Democratic party every where. The Tweddle Hall meeting in the secession winter, at which HORATIO SEYMOUR was quick to speech, charging the threatening condition of the country upon the free States which had refused to submit to the further domination of slavery, was the most efficient aid and encouragement to the rebellion. In one sentence his Tweddle Hall speech was simply this: "We at the North have encouraged the Southern slaveholders by insisting that liberty is a better and more profitable thing than slavery, and they will rake just vengeance upon us if we do not humbly kneel and kiss their feet." The author of the Tweddle Hall speech is called a statesman. Yet there was never a meaner, baser, more unmanly appeal made in a free country than Mr. SEYMOUR's Tweddle Hall speech. Mr. SEYMOUR's ship he cowardice and huckstering; if statesmanship be advising a great and powerful people who have declared for liberty to accept the rebellious menace of slavery, then the author of the Tweddle Hall speech is a statesman—not otherwise.

During all the time the influence of the Democratic party favored the rebellion by a constant hostility to the Government. Those who denounced the war declared, those who sneered at the Union soldiers, those who exulted at the success of the rebels, were all Democrats. More than this, the most conspicuous enemies of the war, frank and open secessionists, were selected as the candidates of the party. In New England THOMAS H. SEYMOUR, in the WENDELL PHILLIPS vein, were its representatives, while the conventions every where discouraged the warm heart of loyalty and banished from the party those who declared unreservedly for saving the Union by every honorable means. At length, in 1864, the National Democratic Convention, with HORATIO SEYMOUR as its President and VALLANDIGHAM as its inspiring manager, denounced the war as a failure, and demanded a practical surrender to the rebellion. The people answered by overwhelmingly reelecting ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and unconditionally crushing the rebellion after a prolonged and unprecedented struggle.

The ground immediately taken by the Democratic party was that nothing was changed in the relations of the States to the Union, and that they might at their pleasure reorganize. The New York World, between the fall of Richmond and the capture of DAVIS, recommended the rebels to throw down their arms and rush to the ballot-box, and reappear in Congress at the opening of the next session. The assassination—a natural result of the kind of spirit fostered by the Democratic policy of injustice and inequality—and the tone of the President's earlier speeches, created this demand for a time. It revived with the President's unwise and illogical and partial statements of it as his policy. Gradually it became the sole political issue. The President and the Democrats on the one hand the remains of the rebellion were upon one side; Congress and the loyal people upon the other. A clearer perception of the situation, which could only come with time, shaped the policy of Congress. It demanded certain guarantees which were scornfully refused by the remnants of the rebellion, supported by the President and the Democratic party. But Congress and its loyal friends appealed to the country and were nobly sustained. The reconstruction policy had the same validity as any other law. But it could not be set aside by the Supreme Court, for the Supreme Court had itself decided that it was a subject upon which Congress alone could deal, and that its action was binding upon every other department of the Government.

As the Presidential campaign approached the fiction of the Democratic party which at present has the World for an organ, saw that the party with its old purposes, its old policy, and its old leaders, had been absolutely rejected by the country, and that the hope of its restoration to power lay exclusively in the acceptance of the settlement of the old issues not a fresh departure. The Democratic party was conspicacity, for it assumed that the Democratic party was willing to concede that the old issues were settled, which was not the truth. This was manifested at the Democratic meeting which the World by the old spirit and the old masters of the party, to which the paper instantly surrendered. Immediately the old party policy was rose reappeared in the national Convention. It was controlled by ex-rebel soldiers, WADE HAMPTON at the head, who declared "the lost cause" just, and by rebel sympathizers, whose heads represented by VALLANDIGHAM. The platform called for practical repudiation and denounced the reconstruction acts as void. The nomination were given to the leaders of the surrender Convention of 1864, the Tweddle Hall orator of 1861, and to the men who had just denounced the Executive supreme over the new governments in the disturbed States. It was the old purpose and spirit of the party that had sustained slavery and risen in rebellion—and again it appealed to the passions.

The October elections are the popular response; and smarting with the feeling that the policy for demanding which it was peremptorily snubbed, and which it was afterward forced to renouncing, might have saved its party, the World exclaimed, in the most alarming typography and rhetoric, "I told you so." It declared that General BLAIR should withdraw, and that the platform should be virtually changed by an explanation, saying that if it were not done the elections of November would be lost against those of October. It persisted for a few days, and was then scourged again into silence. The old party, the old spirit, the old purposes, remain; and SEYMOUR and BLAIR are now, as they have been since their nomination, the candidates of a party whose policy has been once vast and prolonged disaster to the country. After the defeat, which it is an insult to the American people to suppose is not reserved for them at the election, the World will again say that if its party had put in members with the Bourbon spirit it might have succeeded. The paper is not so likely to be whipped in again, and will have a greater influence upon its party councils than it has ever had. But the party will still be stronger than the organ, and the retrograde and perilous tendency in our political society will still organize itself as the Democracy. The Tory will never become the Liberal. The party that supported human slavery will never become that of human liberty. The same exclusive freedom which the Republican party has especially asserted in one direction, because it was there most assailed, it will continue every where to assert and to secure.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN AND THE DEMOCRATIC MANAGERS.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN's letter to the Union Square meeting, following his few words at the reception, were not very agreeable to the Democratic leaders in this neighborhood. The General was one of the "reserves" of which we have latterly heard, but his coming up was neither an old nor a convolution. The candidate of 1864 declined to take part in the election of 1868, and while he said that he should vote for SEYMOUR and BLAIR, he very peremptorily rejected a substantial part of the platform.

The soldiers who liked M'CLELLAN, and many of whom regretted to see him in the hands of unscrupulous and designing politicians, have probably seen with pleasure the quiet manner in which he says to these managers, "Hands off, gentlemen, if you please." Those soldiers can not cease to regret the want of will or of perception which made him four years ago the candidate of a party whose success would have ruined the country; and they must smile to see him now demanding that the public faith be honorably kept to the uttermost, and simultaneously saying that he shall vote for the candidates of repudiation. But he is an extremely vivacious Democrat who finds comfort in the letter of General M'CLELLAN.

There is something, however, which may not be lost upon the Boys in the rear to the country. It is, that if the General shows himself very cool toward his late political managers, they have nevertheless very little warmth for him. They think, indeed, that they have "made him," forgetting that in 1864 they hoped to steal into power under cover of his popularity. The Democratic party treating General M'CLELLAN a very conspicuous and popular man—whether justly or not is not now the question. It nominated him for the Presidency with a platform upon which he stood protesting—not a winning or dignified attitude for any man. Its nomination, of course, drew upon him the tremendous criticism of a hot political campaign, and he was left at the end with scarcely an electoral vote, and fallen immeasurably in public favor from the position he held when he left the command of the Army of the Potomac. He withdrew to Europe and from public observation.

He will certainly find any body ought to have been grateful to him it was HORATIO SEYMOUR, the President of the Convention that nominated him, and the Democratic managers. He had considered for a time that he was never regarded. What had they done for him? His name was still popular among the great mass of the Democratic voters. He was their last national representative. It was but natural and but fair that at their next national assembly they should at least mention his name with gratitude and regret. With that feeling resolutions of greeting and honor to General M'CLELLAN were prepared to be offered in the Convention. The party would send to its late leader a word of cheer and encouragement across the ocean. But the Convention was managed by the late rebels. The name of M'CLELLAN had some odor of loyalty to Union. Its introduction might make trouble. It might arouse inconvenient enthusiasm upon the part of some of the members. And so the President of the Convention, HORATIO SEYMOUR, kept the resolutions in his pocket, and the observant reader of the proceedings will remark the careful and significant silence in regard to the late candidate.

The claims of the party managers upon a man in General M'CLELLAN's position are, under the circumstances, ridiculous. The men who have received the distinguished compliment in Tammany Hall were very willing to have General M'CLELLAN preside at their great meeting. "I shall vote for SEYMOUR and BLAIR, of course," said a life-long Democrat the other day, "because I've always been a Democrat. But if the result depended upon my vote I should vote for GRANT." And if all who really hope that GRANT will be elected should vote for him the Southern leaders who are managing the Democratic campaign will see how the heart of the country really trusts the General whose life and character and principles all say, "Let us have peace."

THE PARTY OF VIOLENCE.

THE assault by the Baltimore roughs upon the passengers in the railroad train to Philadelphia on the evening of the Pennsylvania election was but an illustration of the method and spirit of the Democratic party. And nothing can be more feeble and silly than the talk of a Democratic paper in the city about the miscreants who were sent to Philadelphia from New York and Baltimore to neutralize the Democratic vote. It is useless for the Democratic papers to try to evade the truth. The most ignorant and vicious classes belong to that party, and it is not surprising that they do. The Democratic party has had but one policy for a generation—a policy of violence, injustice, and consequent disorder. Its great effort has been directed to saving and extending slavery, and its rule has been by force with the negro. It has appealed to every mean and miserable passion and prejudice, and it has therefore been the party of the violent and disorderly and depraved; and the city in which it is numerically strongest is therefore appropriately represented in Congress by a person whose only notoriety is that of a pugilist.

How many of the "miscreants" in this city, of those who are described by the technical term "dangerous classes," sympathize with the Republican principles or vote for the Republican candidates? There are instances of special bargain, of course; but who is foolish enough to assert that the huge Democratic majority of the city of New York is composed of the great mass of its intelligent and orderly citizens? By whom were the riots of 1863 instigated and carried on? Was the disturbance an outbreak of the "miscreants" who were sent to neutralize the Democratic vote, or of those who are Democrats because "Democracy" is identical with injustice and violence? How many Republicans swelled the mob of April, 1861, in Baltimore, that, with the countenance of KANE, a representative Democrat, massacred the Union soldiers? Just as many as were in the mob that raged through the cars in the same city a fortnight ago.

We have recently seen some amusing comparisons of the school system of the city of New York and of other parts of the country. Some two years ago a committee from Boston visited the New York schools and reported that in some respects they were superior to the Boston schools. And upon what? Upon what to suppose that therefore the population of the city of New York is of superior intelligence and character to that of Massachusetts. The truth is, that Massachusetts, which has as large a Republican majority as the city of New York has Democratic, is the community of the highest general welfare in the world, while Kentucky is distinctively the Democratic State. Those two facts illustrate the whole case. The Democratic papers sneer at what they call the Republican assumption of "all the virtue," and shout at the conduct of certain persons who belong to the party of "great moral ideas." Now, every party in power will have a horde of camp-followers. But it is not the character nor the principles of such followers that made the party successful. The real significance and tendency of the party are to be sought at head-quarters. The authorized policy and views of the Democratic party have been for a generation those of disorganization and violence. Every Democrat has not been violent; but the violent and disorderly have been Democrats. "I do not say," says MILL, "that all conservatives are stupid; but I do say that all stupid men are conservative."

The Democratic party, true to this instinct of injustice and consequent disorder, at its first National Convention after the war was led by the chafing and baffled ex-rebels, and nominates exultingly a man whose sole platform is a naked sword. This party demands repudiation of the national debt, and forthwith organizes Rifle Clubs organizations, and giving exclusive political power to a class—and then claims to be conservative, and law-respecting, and nervously anxious for the Constitution. The spirit of FRANK BLAIR, as expressed in his letter, is precisely that of the Baltimore rioters of 1861 and 1868. The Democratic organization is the spirit of violence and hate, whose great object was slavery, which produced the rebellion, and which assassinated ABRAHAM LINCOLN. If WENDELL PHILLIPS is the "miscreant," and JOHN WILKES BOOTH the conservative, then is the Democratic party the party of peace and order.

LORD STANLEY AND GOOD FEELING.

THERE has been another banquet in England at Liverpool in honor of the United States Minister, and Mr. JOHNSON made a speech, and Lord STANLEY made a speech, and Mr. GLADSTONE made a speech; and if dining and wining and talking could do the work the peace between the United States and Great Britain is secured. "Peace," says Mr. JOHNSON, "is beyond the possibility of doubt."

"It is the settled principle of England," said Lord STANLEY, "to respect, maintain, enjoy, the rights of every nation.....to seek no narrow, no selfish, no exclusive object," etc., etc., etc. Is Mr. JOHNSON aware that at the same kind as that of Lord STANLEY? His Lordship would perhaps hardly admit the opinion of China and India as to the wholly unselfish nature of its British foreign policy, and he listen more kindly to that of the United States? Does he seriously suppose that we think the British policy of the Government to have been just, generous, friendly, during the time the late war? LORD STANLEY proceeded to say that upon the Alabama question there is a "very good hope" that it may be settled to-day. Does the Alabama controversy grow out of the scrupulously liberal foreign policy of the British Government?

We certainly hope, with LORD STANLEY, that the feeling of bitterness toward England in this country may be diminishing. But when he says that that feeling was never reciprocated in England, we are compelled to congratulate his lordship upon his conveniently short memory. He has forgotten the performances of the London Times during the war; the part which is the peculiar and accepted organ of British opinion. He has forgotten that debate in Parliament, when the editorials of the Times became the hot speeches of eminent gentlemen. He has forgotten the eagerness with which British public opinion seized the opportunity offered by the Trent affair for war with the United States. LORD STANLEY must remember, however, that we have not. He ought to know that when he says the American feeling of bitterness was never reciprocated, he not only carefully forgets, but that his remark is almost a taunt, for our bitterness of feeling was the result of unspeakable amazement that Great Britain, the West Indian emancipator, joined hands with the insurrection of a slave-aristocracy to overthrow constitutional government; our bitter feeling sprang from the clear perception that the British foreign policy was directed to the "narrow, selfish, and exclusive object" of British aggrandizement at every cost.

We do not willingly, nor with any acrimonious or hostile spirit, unveil these truths. And sensible men in England, as well as in this country, ought to be tired of mere complimentary interchanges of gammon and spinage at public dinners. All truly intelligent people in this country consider the cause of England and the United States substantially the same; for it is the cause of constitutional liberty and pacific amorality as the foundation of material prosperity. But while that is truly the cause, it by no means always seems to be so. The official sentiments of England whose heart beat with ours in the most threatening hour of our existence. But Lord Stanley's recent conduct and Mr. Bright opposed the "selfish, narrow, and exclusive" official policy of England.

The anti-British feeling in this country is of course traditional. It dates from the last century, and was marvelously refreshed by the war of 1812. If it was kindled to its old hot point by the war of the rebellion, it was wholly by the conduct of the British Government. There were, indeed, considerations and excuses which we have formerly mentioned. But all reasoning, all sympathetic gauge by which sentiment or feeling which does not exist. There is a kind of impatience and even of suspicion occasioned by mere fine words. The American people will judge the conduct of the English foreign policy wholly by what the Government does and not in the least by Lord Stanley's hopes and wishes. If the Alabama claims are settled upon palpably fair principles the people of the country will ask nothing more. But Lord Stanley should beware how he invites us to contemplate the precedent of British unwillingness as a promise of the happy issue of our differences.

A LITTLE DUST.

When an old wag was near his end, and was ordered to take the air daily, a friend met him and hoped he would have a pleasant drive. "Don't mention it," replied the invalid; "I am merely going to expire in the air." Mr. Reuel Seymour has been upon a similar melancholy excursion. Its object is to distract attention from that terrible General Blair and his sword. It was considered a masterly stroke of policy for Mr. Seymour to emit a few plausible phrases, to talk about taxation, and the atrocious misgovernment of his "Republican friends," as a blind to the real political policy of the party. But smooth words can not baffle an honest instinct. The canvass has turned upon Blair, and upon him it will be positive point, and every body knows it. He is the representative man of the real Democratic purpose and policy, and nobody is deceived by the little dust which Mr. Seymour and his managers are gently trying to throw into the public eye.

"HELP ME, CASSIUS!"

President Johnson has written a dispatch to Mr. Seymour, whom his friends with bitter mockery call "the President," congratulating him upon taking the stump. The President hopes Mr. Seymour will not spare the enemies of constitutional government, but will warm the country against the efforts of the advocates of despotic power. He trusts, also, that Mr. Seymour may speak with "an inspired tongue to comfort the afflicted and distressed nation." Did the augurs smile or did they not? And what response does Mr. Seymour make to the hope that if he is elected he can do nothing; that if General Blair is elected he can't possibly draw that sword. He says that Congress will be opposed to him, but that however abused he will still remain true to his convictions.

Nobody questions, probably, the sincerity of Mr. Seymour's convictions, but it is precisely because of those convictions that he and his party are to be overwhelmed now as they were four years ago. Nobody doubted that at that time Mr. Seymour and Mr. Vallandigham and their friends sincerely wished to surrender to the rebellion, and it was for that very reason that they were terribly defeated at the polls. Nobody doubts that they would now gladly restore the late rebel chiefs to the supreme power in the Government which they formerly had, and that they would with equal alacrity restore the financial question to suit the same chiefs. In a word, nobody doubts that Mr. Seymour would be the faithful servant of the Southern policy that he has always been; and for that very reason the people of this country, who have had quite enough of that kind of leadership, will speak to Mr. Seymour in November much more emphatically even than they did in October. "I trust," says the President to Mr. Seymour, "that your voice may penetrate every just and patriotic heart throughout the land." Why, your Excellency, it has already penetrated those hearts. The just and patriotic hearts throughout the land were penetrated by Mr. Seymour's voice at Tweddle Hall, at the Academy of Music, at Chicago; and Mr. Seymour's heart in turn will be penetrated by the voice of those just and patriotic people on the 3d of November next.

"A FRANK ABANDONMENT."

Mr. John Quincy Adams made a little speech at his home after his return from his late Southern visit, in which he said that the ex-rebels said to him that "they had frankly abandoned what they fought for." Did they tell the truth when they said this? Does Mr. Adams not know that they did not tell the truth? If their words were sincere every thing they meant that the fair and logical results of the war were accepted by them. And is not that notoriously untrue, and does any man believe it to be untrue better than Mr. John Quincy Adams?

Slavery being abolished all the relations that grew out of it fell with it. This was a matter of course, and the victorious people refused to see if it would be recognized by the rebel States. Upon the demand of the President the State Legislatures accepted the new terms, and with such reservations, and in such a way as showed that it was not frankly abandoned. The first act of the same Legislatures was to pass infamous black codes in which the whole spirit of slavery was maintained, and under which orderly and tolerable society was impossible. The black codes re-established all of slavery but the name. The freedmen were made a pariah class; they could not bear arms; nor sit upon juries; nor follow any trade without the permission of their masters; their children could be taken and bound out; the criminal laws discriminated wickedly against them; the black code virtually compelled them to be vagrants, and the bogus "apprentice" law was a farce. Congress had said nothing about the suffrage; it had said nothing even about the protection of civil rights, by reference to the fact that if the Southern leaders "had frankly abandoned what they fought for."

Does Mr. John Quincy Adams think that the Black Codes showed such an abandonment? He knows, with all the rest of us, that the Southern leaders intended to save just as much of the old system as they could, and waited to see whether we had the courage to demand our victory. Then Congress, seeing precisely the spirit with which it had to deal, proposed the Civil Rights bill and the Freedmen's Bureau. The whole rebel interest opposed. Mr. Adams's Southern lambs thought that the Black Codes were a much better system than Freedmen's Bureaus. Then Congress proposed the Fourteenth Amendment, that the defeated States should not have gained political power by their rebellion. Mr. Adams was still very frankly abandon all their claims, scornfully insisted that Congress had nothing to do with the subject. In a word, these gentlemen who so dolorously reveal their condition to Mr. Adams demanded that the whole question of reconstruction and of the disposition of the freedmen and of other loyal men in the South should be left exclusively to them. And when Congress, speaking for all the people and for the common welfare, said, "Since you contemptuously refuse to accept the plain results of the war, and to reorganize your States accordingly, we will do it"—and it has done it.

GENERAL HAWLEY TO R. H. DANA, JUN.

General Joseph R. Hawley, the President of the National Republican Convention, has written a masterly letter to Richard H. Dana, Jun., strongly favoring his election to Congress in the interest of the national honor and morality. He says:

"General Butler's eminent services during the rebellion will always be held in grateful remembrance. His strong will, fertility of intellectual resources, and indomitable energy were never more sorely needed than then; but if he is to be upon the wrong side of the controversy concerning the national debt, starting as he does from among the staunch and trusted Radicals, he will be the most dangerous man in the United States. Some say that he cares nothing for the financial views he has pushed forward, but that he yields temporarily, with ultimate right purposes, to a powerful tendency that he thinks should be conciliated. If so, and the bad tendency should become stronger hereafter, will he not continue to accompany and accelerate it? But, if I suppose, he sincerely believes that he is right, we may be sure that what he believes he will fight for, and that he will do his utmost to carry other Congressmen with him. Shall New England send as powerful a man to act out the lies to heresies that were supposed to flourish only 'old time,' but have been finally rooted out of Republican fields in that region?

"Please count me among those who believe without doubt and say without hesitation any where that the financial policy pressed by General Butler would put a foul and eternal stain upon the honor of our country. If it is to be carried into effect, let it be done by the champions and abettors of slavery and secession. Let them do our party wholly free from the crime of repudiation, 'open or covert, threatened or suspected,' and then something of honor will be saved to the nation in any event. The Chicago Convention was overwhelmingly of that opinion. I was told that only two members of the Committee of Resolutions favored the views held by General Butler, and the strong tide in the right direction was not cautious of their resistance. That was made sure. In the Convention itself, covert repudiation made no sign. That body asserted its opinions with vigor and enthusiasm, and, as it supposed, with unmistakable clearness. For one, I have been as much surprised by General Butler's interpretation of the platform as I was originally by his perversion of the loan acts and Treasury circulars. It takes much ingenuity and more violence to make its declarations sanction, or to any degree cover, those of the Tammany Convention. Commonsense is not at fault in the understanding that the two Conventions are perfectly at issue upon the two matters of finance and payment in greenbacks."

He then proceeds in an admirable statement of the injustice and consequent impolicy of General Butler's financial plans.

"To 'pay the 5-20's in greenbacks' is to forcibly substitute protested demand notes for obligations that pay interest in gold, and whose principal is partly payable in that coin by the recognized money of the world. The objection to so paying the principal is that the holder will make too much money by it. When the greenbacks on the note shall have been put in place of the bond, depreciation will be hastened and the objection will grow stronger daily. Resistance to the downward course will never be so easy as it is now at the beginning.

"The plea of the Government is to pay first the debts that are due first. These are the greenbacks, the demand notes that have been daily protested for six years, and that stand in the market at seventy cents or thereabouts. The bonds are not yet due; nobody is in a hurry to have them paid, and the merchant would be either a fool or a rascal who, because he was compelled to receive them to substitute for debts not due for years to come, demand notes which he confessedly could not pay.

"These financial questions are to agitate the country for years. If the Republican party desires the respect of the world, the credit of the Government, it must take the positions demanded by commercial integrity and public honor, and maintain them without fear, favor, or compromise, 'welcoming recruits and shooting deserters.' There is no man living whom I would vote for, for any office, upon any other platform. Uncle Sam must be a gentleman. It is almost time that General Butler was silenced and promoted a representative of Radicalism that the party can not afford his defeat. Rather let us say that Radicalism can always afford it, for we can never afford to give up any thing of national honor in exchange for supposed advantages to ourselves or even to impartial suffrage. I can not say which I deem the more weighty and serious subject—the reconstruction policy of our party, or the principles concerning financial matters. As to the latter, General Butler is in deadly opposition and to their foundation and true Conservatism. If all Republicans were ready to consider bondtaxation and greenback-substitution issues non-essential and of little consequence would not the nation be rushing to repudiation and an immorality of honor? I do not like to go on. You have known what it is to stand out for sound principles against the pressure of old friends and great majorities, even in old Massachusetts. You will have it again if necessary. I admire and respect your course. 'Fight it out on that line.'"

General Butler's conduct of his own canvass will hardly commend itself to the sober judgment of his constituents. His elaborate personal ridicule of Mr. Dana, his absurd assaults upon the motives of the newspapers that oppose him, with his ludicrously inaccurate statements in regard to the writers of the articles, produce only the unscrupulousness with which the General pursues his ends.

Whatever the result of the contest may be, we shall remain of the opinion that honesty in public affairs, if not private, is the best policy; and that General Butler is in no just sense a representative of the profound conviction and the high moral honor which are the strength of the Republican party.

Mr. Dana in this contest, represents conscience and honor in politics; and the vote that will be cast for him will be able, so independently so manly, if it does not elect him, will yet stand as the emphatic protest of intelligent and self-respecting citizens against the worst form of demagoguery.

THE TREE JUDGED BY ITS FRUITS.

When the friends of Mr. John Quincy Adams in the late rebel States, who told him so touchingly that they had frankly abandoned every thing they fought for, thought in 1866 that the President was likely to prevail over Congress, and that the Philadelphia Convention was a sign of the coming power, the lighted massacres of Memphis and New Orleans showed what spirit still lingered in the lately rebel States.

Now that the loud boasting of the Democratic orators and press that the control of the Democratic Convention by the leaders of "the lost cause," the dictation of a platform by those who seek to dishonor the Government they could not conquer, and the nomination of a candidate who flourishes a sword as the only solution of the pending questions have all inspired a hope of Democratic success in conspicuous and manifest triumph again in that unhappy region, and forebow what would follow if the Democratic policy could prevail. If the mere hope of the election of Seymour and Blair causes the worst crimes of the Ku-Klux Klan, what are we to expect should they by any evil chance be elected? Mr. Seymour says that we are trying to change the issue to a civil war. Exactly the other way lies the truth. It was the Democratic platform that declared reconstruction void; it was the Democratic orators of the platform who unanimously told Wade Hampton that they would support that declaration to the end; is was the Democratic Convention over which Mr. Seymour presided which nominated him upon that platform, and which enthusiastically placed by his side a man whose only policy was the sword. Let the tree be judged by its fruits.

DINNA YE HEAR THE SLOGAN?

The Democratic party has more cheerful news, like that from Vermont, and that from Maine, and that from Connecticut, and that from Pennsylvania, and that from Ohio, and that from Indiana, and that from Nebraska. It comes this time from West Virginia, and it consists of a Republican majority of three on four thousand. "Dinna ye hear the slogan?" asked the New York World, speaking of West Virginia. Most distinctly. It is the same slogan that we have been hearing ever since September, and it grows louder and louder to-day. It will be heard in the crash which begins in November, and whose refrain is Grant and Colfax—Liberty and Peace!

A "WATERLOO."

A few weeks ago the World professed to like Republicans a "Waterloo," and said that however the Southern States might vote Seymour and Blair would get enough Northern States to elect them.

Now the World says, "New York is sure. So are Kentucky, Maryland, New Jersey, Delaware, Connecticut, and Oregon." These are all that it thinks sure, and of these Connecticut certainly, and New York and New Jersey probably, will vote for Grant and Colfax. This leaves Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, and Oregon as the sure States for Seymour and Blair. What a Waterloo for Grant and Colfax!

MORE STATESMANSHIP.

Mr. Seymour says that people may safely vote for him because Congress is sure to be opposed to him, and it will be impossible for him to do any thing. He promises us a continuation of the condition in which we have been for four years, the Executive and Congress at swords' points. What a persuasive argument! What great statesmanship!

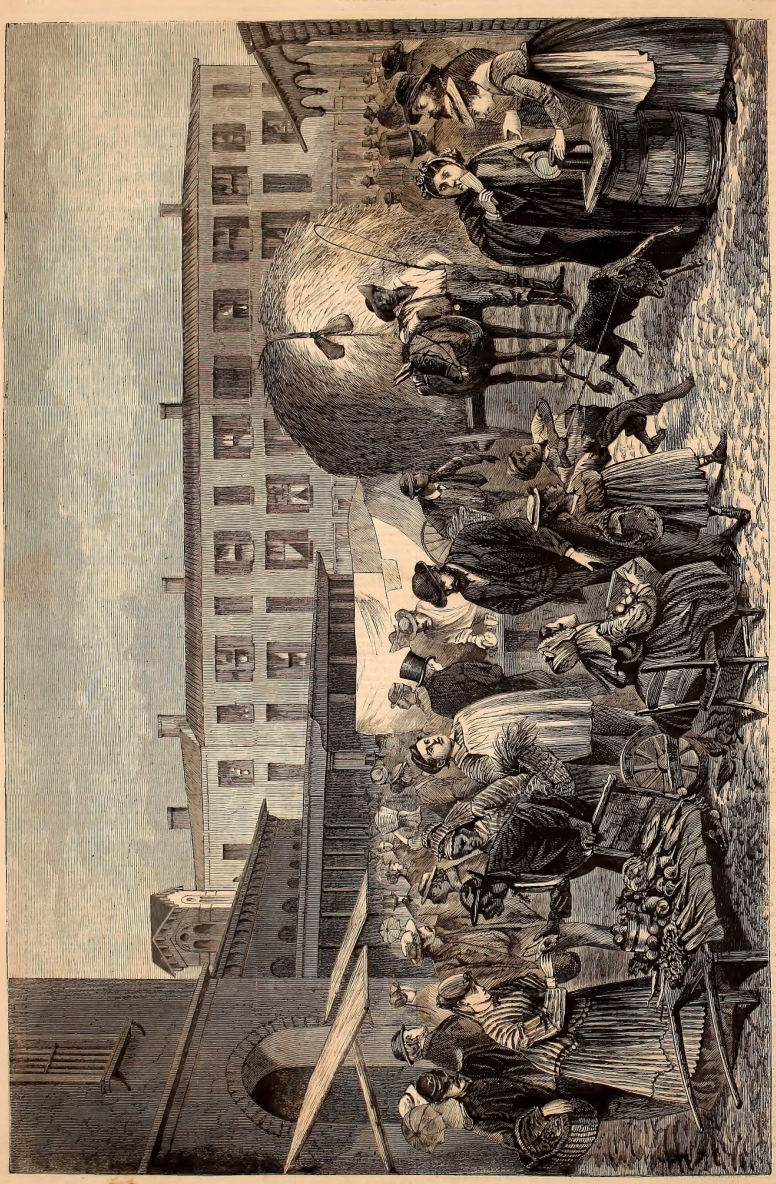
LITERARY.

Some time ago we spoke of a very admirable introductory book of arithmetic by J. Dorman Steele, Principal of the Elmira Free Academy. Mr. Steele has now published (A. S. Barnes & Co.) a "Complete Arithmetic on the Inductive Analytic Method;" a little work copiously and intelligibly illustrated, and telling the cardinal facts of the science in the most clear and attractive manner. It is designed for a class-book in schools; but we do not know a more useful and delightful little manual of the science to be always at hand for reference in the school or upon the family book-shelf.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The State election in West Virginia took place on the 3d of October. The result will be known only by three-fourths of the vote of the State, when a Republican majority of 4000.

News was received at Washington on the 29th of the assassination of Hon. James Hinds, Member of Congress from the Third District of Arkansas, and the wounding of the Hon. Joseph R. Brooks, of the same State by members of the Ku-Klux Klan.



There was a severe shock of earthquake experienced at San Francisco, California, on the morning of the 21st. A large number of houses, including the new tomb-house, were seriously injured; business was temporarily suspended, the people were driven in a panic into the streets, and about half a dozen lives were lost. There was no disturbance to the bay. The shock was heaviest east of Montgomery Street. The loss of property is estimated at from $500,000 to $2,000,000. In the interior Alameda County suffered most. The village of San Leandro and Hayward's are almost in ruins.

A terrible rainstorm happened at midnight, October 23-24, to the express train from New York on the Hudson River Railroad. It was thrown from a broken rail three miles below Greenbush. The train consisted of the baggage car, a passenger coach, the sleeping cars, a freight and baggage car, and an express car. The express car and two sleeping cars went down from the track, and are completely wrecked. One lady was killed outright, and a gentleman was badly injured about the head that he died next morning. A large number of the passengers were more or less injured.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Great Britain, France, and Italy have recognized the Revolutionary Government of Spain.

There is good reason to believe that the following is the substance of the protocol which has been agreed to by Mr. Johnson and Lord Stanley for the settlement of the Alabama dispute: A mixed commission, consisting of eight persons appointed by Great Britain and eight appointed by the United States, shall sit in London and examine every claim presented to them. Each of the eight persons on the part of the United States shall have the power to examine on oath and will make the final award. The question of international law is referred to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia. The protocol now awaits the approval of Secretary Seward.

AT THE MARKET, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

MISS DEVEREAUX'S VACATION.

IT was during one of the first warm days in June that Miss Devereaux fainted away while hearing the class recite in French. Madame St. André, the head of the establishment, being called, was heard to assert that Miss Devereaux had chosen the most inopportune moment for such a caprice; after which she discharged the classes and sent for her salts, with the intention of bringing Miss Devereaux to a reasonable and wholesome view of the case. But this young lady was incorrigible, and obstinately refused attesting to the efficacy of the several remedies which Madame administered, till, having lain insensible for the space of three-quarters of an hour, the posse were suddenly seized with a panic, and suggested that Dr. Van Eyck might possibly be equal to the occasion. To do Madame justice, she had thought of that person at the first, but prudential motives had urged her thus to delay introducing into her establishment, on the familiar footing of a physician, a somewhat young and a single gentleman, of whose antecedents she knew absolutely nothing.

"She has been overworked," was the Doctor's first assertion; "she has been overworked, and must have a vacation."

"When she revives," said Madame, reassured.

"I'm afraid it 'll prove a long one," whimpered hysterical little Miss Johnson, an under-teacher.

"Is she better?" whispered some half dozen of the scholars, looking in through a crack of the door, in a state of great excitement.

"Go away!" said Madame, with a turn of her black brows.

"They won't do any harm now," said the Doctor.

"Oh, you wolf in sheep's clothing," mentally ejaculated Madame.

"See!" he continued, "there's a rose-tint for you," and just then Miss Devereaux drew a sigh fathoms deep, and two eyes flashed intelligence into the Doctor's.

"That's all right," said he. "Now, Miss Devereaux, if you will drink this," and Miss Devereaux sat upright, or nearly so, and drank it off, saying in the soberest manner:

"Thank you; I am quite well now. I will return to my classes." And she stood up to go, but tottered back to her sofa, looking in dismay at Madame St. André and the Doctor.

"Am I—is there any thing—what is the matter?" she stammered.

"Nothing but overexertion. You must take a vacation.

"But I don't want a vacation!"

Miss Devereaux was always inexplicable, thought Miss Johnson, who was just dragging through the summer term with a prospect of the benches, new gowns, gay company, and any number of flirtations for August.

"But you need it," reiterated the Doctor; "you must look about you, and decide upon some quiet retreat; and in the mean while you are not to hear classes or any thing of the sort, if you care to—live. I will call again and see how you progress."

Dr. Van Eyck did not content himself with merely calling apropos; he informed Madame that

"I LOVE YOU, FELIX; I LOVE—"

Miss Devereaux was in a dangerously nervous condition, requiring instant attention and respite from care, and requested her co-operation in inducing the invalid to submit to terms.

"But if Miss Devereaux is indifferent, why do you care?" asked Madame.

"She is my patient," he replied.

In the mean time Miss Devereaux kept her room, ate almost nothing, and rarely spoke. Miss Johnson sat with her by hours in a vain attempt at sympathy, detailing her own commonplace experiences, and receiving polite monosyllables in return. Dr. Van Eyck came and felt her pulse, and brought her cordials, and scolded and vexed her into something like spirit.

"So you have no home, no friends, no money," he said one day, repeating the case as she had been forced to represent it. "In that case I shall think it my duty to insist."

"Upon what, pray? I should think it was plain enough that I must return to my classes at once."

"I shall insist that you join my sister, and spend some months at the mountains, and return a new creature."

"You are very kind," she replied, touched by his offer; "but—I can not accept."

"It is a great pity," he said, musingly; "if you only had some cousin now who could be hospitable for a season—almost any change would be preferable to none."

"Oh, I have an aunt in New York," she confessed, "but she is only housekeeper for the family of a Mrs. Adriance. She has no home of her own;" and after that he led the conversation into other channels, and Miss Devereaux believed he had given it up. He did not call again for a day or two, and she congratulated herself upon having gotten rid of him and his vexatious prescription, and was preparing to resume her duties, when he reappeared one morning, radiant and smiling.

"It is all arranged," he said. "You are to take the down-train for New York; your aunt will meet you at the dépôt; you will remain till you are recreated; you will have your vacation after all. Your ticket is bought: you are anxiously expected. The family of Mrs. Adriance are absent at the sea-side, and have left Mrs. Bevis the privilege of inviting a friend to bear her company. It is a charming-house—a picture-gallery, in fact; a piano to sing with; a piazza hidden in vines for summer reverie, a—"

"And pray, Doctor, how do you know all this?" she interrupted, laughing. The Doctor paused and colored violently. The fact was he had gone down to the city with malice prepense, and had arranged the programme to his own satisfaction.

"I am acquainted with Mrs. Adriance," he answered.

"Oh, but you are too good," she said. "What shall I do without you?"

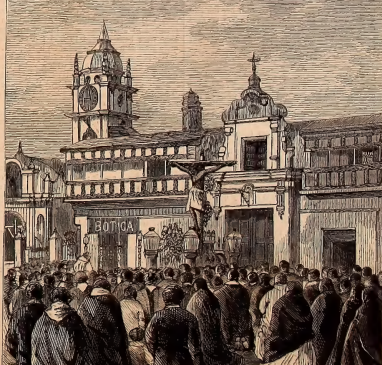
"I hope you will be able to—professionally, at least," laughing; "and you will consent to go?"

"How can I refuse? Give you all this trouble for nothing? Of course I will go, and enjoy every moment of it."

Dr. Van Eyck took her to the station in his brougham next morning.

"Now," he said, "I shall expect you to keep me informed of your improvement."

"Daily bulletins," she suggested.



"Weekly letters, if you please."

"But what shall I say? You terrify me with such great expectations."

"Imagine I am making a call, and you are chatting as usual."

THE EARTHQUAKE AT ICA—MEETING OF THE PEOPLE BEFORE THE STATUE OF CHRIST.—(SEE PAGE 714.)

"You will end by making an egotist of me."

"Better that than an invalid. Good-by. Be sure and enjoy your leisure, and think of nothing else." She turned to thank him at the last, her eyes swimming with grateful tears, but the inexorable steam-power had already whirled her out of his orbit.

One who has never labored exhaustingly through successive years can hardly understand the content and rest that made themselves guests in Miss Devereaux's heart as she slid along toward New York, with no tedious classes beckoning through the interminable to-morrows. She had always been a source of wonder and conjecture to the other teachers—she who worked on faithfully through term after term without complaint and without vacations; who was not known to possess a relative in the world; who out of a salary equal to theirs neither hoarded nor spent; who wore shabby gowns and bonnets passé; who was absent from her post but one day in the year, no one knew whither, always returning before breakfast the following morning a little paler, a little more silent, if that could be. She was a riddle which every one had given up long ago; and in the mean time had arrived this Dr. Van Eyck, with the power of penetrating her reserve and sending her wheresoever he would.

The first week of Miss Devereaux's stay in New York she spent on the sofa, listening to Mrs. Bevis's laudations of the family she served, to her recital of their customs and manners, the grand company they entertained, the jewels that had gone with them to the beaches. The following week found her a little stronger, notwithstanding all this; she even ventured out on the balcony, which the Doctor had recommended her to do, and into the long, dark drawing-rooms with their blinds all closed, their brocatel shrouded in brown holland, and their bronze chandeliers night-capped in pink tissue paper. In making the tour of the rooms she paused before a portrait hanging in a niche. It seemed to her as she looked the brown eyes beckoned and followed her; that the rich color on the oval cheek came and went with the pulsations of the heart; that the full lips now trembled into smiles, now shaped themselves to serious meanings.

"It is some dead ancestor of the Adriance line," she thought. "How I should like to have known him! how he illuminates this niche! Ah, well, I believe some people are born an age too early. To think that 'dust is in those beautiful eyes!'"

She did not speak of the portrait to Mrs. Bevis, but day after day she found herself returning to gaze upon it, clothing it in a history of its own—a romance; giving to the original all manner of peculiar fascinations and noble attributes. When she opened the grand piano, which privilege had been granted her, and played the tender German airs that seemed made to flutter, like beautiful moths, through the perpetual twilight of the room, she always fancied at such times that the portrait listened, bending out of the frame; that she could see the light flash into the eyes there, the pupil dilate with pleasure, the color shoot up the cheek. It was a delightful companionship she held with this portrait which gave to her life a something poetical and mystical. She was able now to sit out on the balcony on fine warm evenings, and watch the fire-flies among the vines in a phantom dance; to spend long mornings over the foreign plates in the library or over some long-desired book. She went singing about the house, too, sometimes assisting Mrs. Bevis in her light labors, sometimes lost in the mazes of embroidery, but she never went out. She had forgotten all about the world outside, so to speak. She felt as if her life had begun here, and would continue to flow on thus dreamily forever. But life is full of shifting sand-bars and treacherous currents, of strong and cruel maelstroms,

> "That split the wine-keg on the rocks,
> And lose the pearls."

She had been very busy one morning toward the end of the second week, and it was only after dusk that she left her room to sit a while on the balcony, and watch the flashing constellations prick themselves out against the dark, purple heavens. She sat there utterly lost in thought, the vine with its white stars fallen about her shoulders, the fire-flies heeding her no more than a statue, great dusty moths brushing her cheeks. The distant roar of the city, the toll of neighboring bells, the pathos of some sad singer, the voices of children and laughter of happy lovers came to her faintly, and chanted the chorus to her dream of peace. It was already quite dark upon the balcony; the vines themselves cast heavy, fitful shadows there, peopling the place with restless phantoms; all the light there was came from above, from the luminous depths of space. But as she gazed into darkness there grew upon her, as if shaping itself out of nothingness, the vision of a sweet, familiar face—the face of the portrait. It belonged, however, to a tall young man, who stood on the sill of the French window, and made a profound bow, holding his lighted cigar in one hand.

"I beg pardon," he said then, "I didn't know that the balcony was haunted by sweet spirits of the twilight. You are Mrs. Bevis's niece? Felix Adriance, at your service."

"Good-evening, Mr. Adriance," she returned, rising; "I will preface your service by requesting you to continue your cigar, while I go and find my aunt."

"Allow me to say that you will do no such thing," motioning her toward the vacated seat.

"But perhaps," in that embarrassment which always says the wrong thing, "my aunt is lonesome."

"So am I—and no perhaps about it. The night is too fine to waste indoors, and if you insist upon going in I shall follow."

She sat down then; her own will had nothing to do in the affair, had neither consented nor refused; but after all she was young, and not unhappy at being amused. He threw his cigar over the balustrade as he spoke, and went to bring a seat for himself beside her.

"Fate works with us, I believe," said he; "but it's a recent creed of mine; I could have said hard words to-night when the train dashed off without me; but you see it was all arranged that we should meet thus. Aren't you glad?"

Miss Devereaux answered him with a laugh. "How do I know whether to be glad or sorry, when I haven't seen you five minutes?"

"But you aren't displeased, or you couldn't laugh like that. Besides, Dr. Van Eyck told us so much about you that we're old friends already."

"The Doctor is very kind to me," she said, softly; "he sends me advice every week."

"And you reply to him most gratefully?"

"I write to him often."

"The deuce you do!" aside; then, "Do you want to know what I thought of you yesterday?"

"I didn't know you thought of me at all."

"But I did. Yesterday afternoon you were singing, you may remember?"

"Yes."

"I passed up, in order to procure a shawl which my sister desired me to bring her. I waited on the stair to listen, and I thought—shall I tell you what?"

"Just as you please."

"You're not curious at all?"

"You evidently expect it."

"Well, then, since you are so anxious; I thought, 'that voice is the recompense Nature makes to a woman without other attractions. If she were beautiful she would be irresistible.'"

"You speak plainly."

"But you see my first axiom was an error."

"And your second—"

"Is self-evident."

"Mr. Adriance," she said, laughing in spite of herself, and perhaps secretly pleased, "you are presuming on too slight an acquaintance."

"And yet I am not a presumptuous man," he returned, unabashed. "How do you account for it?"

"I don't attempt to account for it; that is your business. And now, indeed, I must go, for my aunt is calling."

"But you will sing that song to me some day? Promise me that."

"I promise," she said, eager to depart.

"And you will let me see you sometimes?"

"I don't possess the art of invisibility, Mr. Adriance. Good-night!"

"Good-night, Miss Devereaux."

Miss Devereaux dreamed that night that she went to look at her portrait, and it was but an empty gilded frame she found; but it was no dream that the next morning she found waiting outside her door—a bouquet of rose-buds and heliotrope in all their dewy sweetness. It was the first bouquet she had ever received; perhaps this was why she preserved the withered thing when it possessed only a remembrance of its youth.

She saw nothing more of Felix for a week, and then he came in some haste, to say that he had a few minutes to spare before taking the train, and would she redeem her promise?

"I thought you had forgotten it," she was artless enough to confess.

"My memory is not remarkably retentive, but there are a few things that never escape me," he said, looking at her with his large, melancholy eyes. They went together, after that, into the long twilighted drawing-room, and entirely forgot the existence of time, of imperative railway hours, of every thing, it would seem, but each other and the German lyrists. At last, when it occurred to Miss Devereaux to ask the time, they were both amazed to find the afternoon quite gone as well as the last train beachward.

"It is because the room is so dark," said she, shutting up her music-book with a sigh; "one never knows here whether it is daylight or dusk."

"I don't think it is that at all," he returned; "I think it is because you have the power of making one forget every thing but yourself."

"Your memory, you know, is not retentive, which detracts somewhat from the compliment. At least you must go now."

"Not unless you forbid me to stay."

"I forbid you? I have no right. Besides, you amuse me too well."

Then they opened the music-book once more and rung for a candle; but a draught blew out the one, and the first received no longer any attention. They had sung enough for one day, and now they conversed in soft under-tones, with brief, happy silences between, during which they listened to the wind shaking the vines on the balcony, to the beatings of each other's heart; and presently Mrs. Bevis, who had taken her tea alone, pulled the bell sharply and impatiently.

"That must be the tea-bell," said Miss Devereaux then; "I must go."

"And am I to have no tea?" he asked.

"I shall be delighted to pour you a cup;" and he followed her down to the dining-room.

"I didn't know you were here, Mr. Felix," said Mrs. Bevis, bustling about, "or I should have laid myself out."

"I have dined, thank you," he said, "and only want a cup of tea from the hand of your niece."

"There's cold fowl in the pantry," she persisted; "I'll ring for it."

"Not for me. Do you care for cold fowl, Miss Devereaux?"

"Not to-night, thank you," sipping her tea, reflectively.

"There's some of your favorite meringue, Mr. Felix," entreated the good woman, loth to have her dainties neglected; "I made it myself, thinking some of you might be in for a bite; and there's honey fresh from the hive, if you fancy it."

"Thanks, but I have all the sweets I desire," with a glance across the table.

"Bless you, what do you call sweets, child? Bread and butter and Indian fritters? Though the butter is as sweet as honey; I didn't think of that, and the bread's not bad, eh? But there, you must excuse me while I look after the linen."

"Perhaps you would have liked the honey?" he asked, when Mrs. Bevis had closed the door behind her.

"I don't care for honey. I like the poetical idea, but not the edible article."

"You are looking pale to-night," dropping the honey-comb. "I see how it is; this great solitude oppresses you; it is too dull for a young person of spirits; I shall think it my duty to drop in often and keep you from going mad."

He looked her full in the face as he spoke, and he saw that a helpless, terror-stricken anguish flashed across it, dilating the thin nostril, and darkening the cool gray eyes, till he could have sworn they were deepest black.

"It is in the family," she said, snatching her gaze away from his and half laughing. "I am used to solitude," she continued, turning her inverted tea-cup slowly about in its saucer.

"That means I should be de trop?"

"Not at all. I like solitude and—I like you."

"What an admission! And you have no preference? What are you doing there with your tea-cup, pray?"

"I am telling my fortune, if you are interested to know."

"I am interested in whatever pertains to you. What is your fortune like?"

"Tears," she answered, letting the lingering drops trickle down and hang upon the rim of the cup, like yellow topazes. "Tears, and cloudy skies, and rough paths, 'signed on every side with crosses.'"

"Dismal in the extreme. We will hope they are tears of joy and clouds with silver linings. Shall we retire to the balcony and discuss the probabilities?"

But out on the balcony the hours were no longer than in the drawing-room, and when Miss Devereaux said "Good-night," the hall clock was striking eleven, its silver chimes clashing on the silence and waking the echoes every where: she could not remember sitting up till eleven since her first ball, and that was so long ago that it seemed as if it must have been somebody else. She passed, however, a night of restlessness, for which she could not account, and woke in the morning oppressed and almost ill again. Why a little happiness, so quiet, so unsought for, should injure, was a problem she did not attempt to solve. It occurred to her now that Felix and herself were altogether too familiar and intimate for friends of so brief a period, and she determined to be more reserved in future, nor to suffer any more such long-drawn-out tête-à-têtes; but day after day, as fulfilling his threat, he dropped in for a light lunch, to bring some promised book, some rare fruit for her delectation; to fetch a paper from his desk, his cane; to change a coat or hat, or leave some order from his mother to Mrs. Bevis, Miss Devereaux found her fine resolves melt in the light of his mere presence, leaving only a slight sediment of reserve, which made her all the more charming in the eyes of Felix. Indeed, she could hardly have avoided him had she wished it, and it was becoming every day more plain that her wishes were under his control.

"I'm convinced that I knew you a great while before ever we met," he said to her one day, having surprised her alone in the housekeeper's room.

"Oh yes; Dr. Van Eyck told you about me," she said, mockingly.

"You are a little goose. By-the-way, have you written to your doctor lately?"

She colored and bent her head over the little bundles of straw and worsted with which she was busy; the truth was, she had barely escaped forgetting the Doctor and his famished expectations.

"I must write him to-morrow," she responded.

"Then you will say to him that you are in my hands and rapidly gaining my—"

"Approbation?"

"Please, don't take the words out of my mouth, Miss Devereaux; it's quite enough to possess yourself of other things that belong to me."

"Exchange is no robbery, I've heard. There, what do you think of that for a castle-in-the-air?" and she held up the result of her hour's work, a mesh of quivering straws secured by brilliant knots of worsted, and dancing and oscillating on the air like any bubble.

"A pretty piece of architecture, truly! I've heard of castles-in-the-air, I've built them myself—of straws too, but I never before had the felicity of beholding one!"

"See how buoyant it is, how it swings on a breath. One can imagine it to be inhabited with all manner of sweet fancies and delightful thoughts that pass in and out among its loop-holes, like swallows nesting in a sand-bank—little snatches of song, little bubbles of laughter, tender words and thrilling whispers and the odor of happiness."

"Is it impregnable? I mean to storm it with sighs. I covet these sweet fancies which you have built into it. I want to know if they have any thing to do with the thought of—of me?"

"I shall mount guard and 'let the portcullis fall.'"

"And if that shouldn't avail?"

"Then, I must do as the Romans do."

"Surrender; and the castle will be mine."

"It will be only a castle-in-the-air, you know, after all:

> 'Of this castle-in-the-air,
> Have a care, have a care!
> Enter therein, you who're daring,
> Only ample armor wearing;
> For no exit is, I know,
> Hope, herself, misleads you so.'"

"Hope is a gay deceiver, eh? Well, do you know, little girl, that I've only ten minutes in which to reach the cars?"

"Help me suspend my castle from the ceiling, first; for practically it is a fly-trap, and you shall see it shiver in all the little currents of air."

"You should have a chameleon to live in it," he said, having satisfactorily arranged it, and giving his gaze to her. "Now thank me properly, and let me go."

"I've not been keeping you, Sir."

"If you haven't, I should like to know who has."

"Caprice or accident or—"

"Renè, Renè," he said, taking both her hands in his. "You wound me with such words. Look up and smile on me, or as sure as Fate I shall—lose the train!"

"That is, you will stay here? I sha'n't smile then, if frowning will keep you."

"It's no use, I must be off."

"It makes no difference to you whether I smile or frown, after all."

"If you knew what a difference, Renè!"

But before she could reply he had closed the door behind him and was gone.

"He called me Renè," she mused, regarding herself in the old-fashioned beveled mirror. "No one has called me Renè since so very long!" and the picture in the mirror being quite blurred by this time, she went to look at the other picture in the dark drawing-room.

She had known Felix now for just two months, she had grown to look for his coming as one looks for a holiday, to hang upon his words; he made her world, his opinions, his tastes, his wishes were the contemplation of her lonely hours when he himself was not present; her thoughts revolved about him as the aerial current revolves about the earth; he threw a halo around the present, the future beckoned through rosy distances, the past was no longer but a picturesque dream; she read the books he advised, wore the colors he preferred, and forgot every thing he did not choose to remember. When he kissed her hand one day, quite unexpectedly, the happy tears choked her voice, while a strange transport of pain shivered through her being as if he had stabbed her to the heart instead. For years she had been starving for love, now that it was possible, now that the harvest was ripening, did any thing forbid her? But a first love has always the charm of a new horizon; what wonder then, when the horizon stretched away in endless and alluring perspective, if she yearned to follow, and forget that the sun sets at last upon every prospect, however fair and large?

She said to herself that she was quite recovered now, that she ought to return to her work, but still she delayed. She could walk and ride, and sit up late at night, and eat without caution; but a little while after any unforeseen excitement—and her life was full of such now—Nature would seem to demur and demand absolute rest. But she made light of these attacks, and was never happier than when Felix came to sit by her side, while his large, melancholy eyes softened in gazing at her, and became suffused with a tender mist through which they shone like two stars in partial eclipse. Indeed, she must have known that he loved her already; and what did oppressive languors or any form of physical pain signify after that? By-and-by they would pass and disappear, but this—this would last for ever and ever. In the mean while there was little or nothing of the invalid in her appearance, there was no attenuation of the body, the color palpitated on her cheek with every word or varying mood, her eyes had a steady glow and animation, smiles seemed the heritage of those full lips. Every thing spoke of the morning of happiness; nothing suggested that night and sorrow were at hand.

As for Felix, fortune had so persistently favored him hitherto that he doubted not but all his days would round themselves to infinite felicities; and if he discovered any sacrifices to be made in the near or far-away future I think he did not shrink from them, but rather gloried that it was possible to resign any thing for love and Renè. That Fate should require of him nothing but Renè herself was scarcely likely to enter into his calculations, since—in spite of his melancholy eyes, which were, perhaps, merely an affair of physical conformation—he bore the ægis of a sanguine temperament from which doubt and fear recoiled harmlessly. Every morning now he would take Renè out for an airing in the Park before going to business; sometimes extending the drive into the green country, where Nature was at liberty to work her miracles of song and fragrance and perfected leaf; often dining on rustic fare at some village inn, and returning silent and happy in the growing starlight. These were halcyon days for Renè, in which she experienced a novel sensation of buoyancy, as if she were indeed endowed with the wings of the morning. But by some strange contradiction, peculiar to moments of great exhilaration, the airs that seemed most to haunt her were the tearful adagios of despair rather than the inspirations of present joy.

"It is setting in for a storm," said Felix, coming in one gusty evening. "I don't like storms down at the beach. I shall stay here instead and have fair weather, so to speak."

"You don't like storms at the beach? Why, it is just what beaches are good for," said Renè, looking up from her work with a smile of welcome. "For my part, I should like to live in a light-house in mid-ocean and know what danger means.",

"For my part, I knew sufficiently well what danger meant," he returned, laughing. "Oh, it sickens me like the sight of blood, those heaped up waves, that resonant thunder!"

"It is thundering now," said the literal and quaking Mrs. Bevis, going to close the shutters. "I will light the gas; it kind of blots out the lightning and makes one feel more secure."

"It's just the night for cheerful company," said Bevis.

"Yes," put in Mrs. Bevis. "We made nothing of a storm like this when I was young. We had our friends in, and our game at whist, and—"

"We are to have our game at whist now; there are cards in the library. What do you say, René?"

"I am ready; but we are only three."

"Oh, I'll have dummy; I always had a fancy for her. She plays whist to some purpose, and she doesn't trump any of my tricks," said Mrs. Bevis.

"Which is better than we intend to do."

"What is it you like best in a game as whist?" asked René, taking up the ace of hearts. "Oh, what are trumps?"

"Ace trumps, of course; and I like my partner best," answered Felix.

"As for me," said Mrs. Bevis, "after I've once seen my hand the play is done; it's just the luck of the thing that interests me. If I can't take three tricks I haven't a morsel of interest left. I've had, René. Oh no, it's dummy's, to be sure!"

"Dummy leads trumps!" cried René. "I should always like to play second or fourth hand, there's less responsibility in either. But, after all, what I like in the game—"

"Is to take tricks," said Felix, suiting the action to the word.

"Yes. The manœuvring; the finessing, you call it; the judging my tactics to the best possible advantage; remembering the ins and outs, saving my knaves, making on my low trumps, and knowing whenever I have a sure hand."

"That was a dreadful clap," asserted Mrs. Bevis, à propos of the thunder; "it almost shook the teeth out of my head. How are the bones, Mr. Felix? I had two. Dear, no, I didn't; it was dummy who had the ace, after all."

"And René never had!"

"Dear, so she did. But the odd trick's mine."

"The thunder demoralizes your memory; you have the odd trick, but the honors belong to your niece."

"Well, it's all in the family," said René. "Did you ever read that blue flash, Felix? It was like cold steel, glittering and sharp!" and then she paused, and blushed, and made a mistake. She had called her friend Felix, that was all.

"I forgive the pretty blunder," he said, equivocally, throwing her an arch glance. "Pass the cards to Mrs. Bevis, René, we're not playing yet."

"What are you laughing at?" asked René, after the blush had subsided and she had stolen a look at Felix, who was smiling without knowing why.

"I was laughing at your dismay at losing the deal," he answered; "at least that was the beginning of it."

"And what was the end?"

"I shu'n't tell you, O daughter of Eve!" for the truth was, he had been thinking of his mother and sister down at the beach, and smiling at the picture he was painting of those high and mighty ladies suddenly arriving to find their drapery son and brother playing at whist with the housekeeper and her niece, and enjoying it, too! Not that he had become esteemed in such consideration on his part; but he knew too well their aristocratic ideas not to be amused at the shock these would receive from a knowledge of his present employment: for was it not worth his mother's indignation and his sister's sneers to be so near René that he might touch her hand, and Mrs. Bevis be none the wiser? So near that he could contemn her gaze and be assured that those eyes shone only for himself? So near he could hear her heart beat, the quick breath come and go as his whispered word, could see the blush painting on the cheek from her old bonnet and family pride and the cold shoulder of the world weigh in the balance against those! Let any lover answer. So there they were, long after the rubber had vanished them, talking in that delicious half-tone which only lovers and gossips know how to use to advantage, exchanging opinions and tastes, recounting a score of anecdotes of their childhood, going over the early events of their acquaintance, which already seemed an antediluvian epoch, till presently Mrs. Bevis, who had been obliged during the long chat occasionally bringing herself up with a lurch and asking some chaotic question of her oblivious companions, made a more strenuous effort than hitherto, and startled them from their sweet absorption with a loud query concerning the weather. René rose then and looked from a window. "The clouds are breaking," she said; "the storm is over."

Felix went to look out with her; he laid one hand gently on her shoulder while he counted her rings with the other.

"Loves me—loves me not. Haven't you another ring, René? A wedding-ring would remedy that. There's a star on the edge of that cloud. One? There's a handful. What are you saying, René?"

"'Star light, star bright,
The first star I've seen to-night;
I wish I may, I wish I might Have the wish I wish to-night.'"

"Is that a spell? And when does it take effect?"

"Oh, that's the star's business!"

"And you wished—"

"That is also the star's business."

"And I have no part in it, René? No more than if I were a dweller in that star?"

"No dwelling more, by sea or shore,
But only in thy heart,"

she sang, softly, without replying.

"You make me shudder whenever you sing that dismal distich," he said; "I feel as if I were already dead."

"I know," she answered, "that perhaps all these little gusts that blow across our faces and then are gone are caused by the disembodied in their passage through space; and I was wondering if you would recognize it, if I myself parted the waves of air and sent a cold current to ruffle your hair."

"You are growing spectral, René; I shall see through you presently. What put such fancies into your brain? Come, it's time you were in bed; these late hours are ruining the—ghosts."

They had good-night on the landing outside her door; a very tedious good-night, thought the estimable Mrs. Bevis, waiting for René in the sedanion of her own room.

It was a little singular that, going about his business on the morrow, the very lines he had forbidden René to sing should repeat themselves in the mind of Felix again and again; should spring to his lips in unbidden measures, only to be checked a dozen times during the day:

"No dwelling more, by sea or shore,
But only in thy heart."

One afternoon faded leaf blew across his path and reminded him that summer was at an end. That suggested a train of disagreeable reflections, such as the probable speedy return of the family to town, and the speedy retreat of René to her school-room. These had the effect of causing him to change his course, which had been in the direction of the station, and to return again to Ocean View, where, shivering over a wood-fire, for the evening was raw, a forerunner of early frosts.

"I have good news for you, Mr. Felix," said Mrs. Bevis, putting down the cream-pitcher and pussing a letter across the table to him. "Your mother writes that she shall return to the cove of a fortnight or so, and hopes to find every thing satisfactory. But why she should underscore that particular sentence I am at a loss to understand the perplexed matron. "Every thing has been satisfactory, hasn't it? I'm sure, Mr. Felix, I've done my best, and I'm thankful you have seemed to enjoy the summer amazingly!"

"I don't anticipate any trouble for you, Mrs. Bevis," he answered with his high-hearted courtesy; and then he put aside the little box containing Planchette, which he had been taking down to amuse the teachers, and went to speak with René.

"I'm dreadfully dour to-day," she said, half-smiling; "I've been shivering off or so one would a fever, but it won't be so lightly dealt with."

"I've brought a little friend who will exorcise it in a jiffy—a little French lady."

"Oh!" said René, who had a feminine horror of strangers generally, "is she like you?"

"I'll introduce her after tea; she's a wonder, fat little body, and will tell you the strangest things. Mrs. Bevis, may I ask you to tell me the other night that I loved my love with an R!"

"Was that one of the strange things?"

"Strange because it is true."

"I should like to see her," said Rosia, rising and beginning to suspect a joke.

"Why?"

"Both, of course."

Mrs. Bevis had been called down stairs just before by Rosia to superintend some household affair; and Felix, seeing that they were quite alone in the housekeeper's room, took René gently by the shoulder and turned her about before the old-fashioned bevelled mirror of the last century. The firelight fell across it and brightened the color in the cheeks, and lit a momentary spark in the wide grey eyes, and reddened the merry tint of her falling hair.

"What do you see, René?" he asked, looking over her shoulder at the reflection.

"I see a very pretty young woman."

"Speak well of her, if you please, Miss Devereaux, for it is the little person conferring whom I am guilty of such scurrosity—it is the little person whom I love!"

She staggered somewhat at that, and put away the arms that would have encircled her waist.

"Oh, I ought to have told you, I ought to have told you," she gasped; and then keen thought in the instant followed closely by Mrs. Bevis, and Felix strode to the fire-place and watched the embers whiten and fall till recalled by the sad and gentle voice of his darling.

There was very little eaten between the two that night; René made-believe sip her tea and broke her little crumbs, while Felix played with his fork, made true-love's-knots of his napkin, and gave Mrs. Bevis some account of a picture he had seen in town, in town, representing "The Lady of Shalott."

"Who is she?" asked the matron, quite innocently, but by no means relieving the embarrassment.

"True enough," he answered, good-naturedly. "Who is she? You are my neighbor or René maybe. Any one who is the prisoner of circumstances, whether mental or material.

"A curse is on her if she stay
To look down to Camelot.'

That must have been a weird life of hers; seeing hope and youth and love in her mirror, but utterly beyond her reach—as I just now saw you, René."

"I think it means that one should be satisfied with one's own work, and not be looking down to Camelot after shadows."

"But I contend that shadows are better than nothing. If I had been the Lady of Shalott, I would rather have seen Launcelot's shadow than not to have seen him at all."

"But the shadow would not have contented you."

"No," emphatically; and after that there was little said, except by Mrs. Bevis, who discussed the merits of white and colored servants, and had it all her own way till the tea-things were removed and Morpheus put in a veto, while Felix sat glowering over the red-hot coals, as if he was loft of the bright wood-fire, and René simply profiles in paper as if her bread-and-butter depended upon them. Felix had quite forgotten the existence of Planchette, with whose pranks he had expected to amuse René: instead he was wondering what it was she could possibly have to conceal from him—if she had ever been married, if she loved—Dr. Van Eyck, for instance; and then he thought how like that it might be as well to ask her, and dissipate or confirm his doubts and fears. He left his seat then, and leaning down over the back of her chair till his cheek almost brushed her own, he whispered, in his most resolute manner: "René, you said just now that you should have told me something. René, I am waiting to hear it."

The hand that held the scissors shook violently and snipped a fearful profile, in the cool grey eyes intensified in expression and deepened in shade as two in hue.

"I did not mean to keep it from you," she began, quite calmly; "I was so happy here I forgot it could ugly; besides, I had not been used to speak of it to any one; no one would have cared unless—unless— Oh, I should have given away long before, I ought never to have looked at you, spoken to you, thought of you; I should have gone back to my classes at once, and—and—you could have forgotten me and —I should have died!"

"Then it is not that you love some one else?" he asked, almost sternly, and gathering her in his arms. "I've been a jealous fool, René, for these two hours. When you are my wife, dearest, that also must be left behind."

"I do not think that will ever happen, Mr. Adrince. I may go mad, but not mad enough to marry. I am going to tell you the truth, as in the family: what would you say if I should tell you now, that my only brother is in the asylum at—?"

Miss Devereaux's secret was laid bare and she breathed more freely, though only waiting till she should perceive in the front of reserve some of the manner of Felix, his tone lost its pleading sweetness, his eye lack love and earnestness. But the blow was not delivered.

"Is that all? I should say I'm profoundly sorry, but that very fact renders it more imperative for me to marry you, and do not follow his example," he answered, possessing himself of her icy hand.

"But I may, you know. Insanity is hereditary. It was a little thing that sent him there, as the world goes; only a cross in love, and—"

"And, René," he interrupted, "do you love me?"

"Oh, you know I do."

"Then another word must marry you. From humane motives purely, in order to keep you sane. You see, I have you on the case!" And he gathered her to his heart once, unreasonably, and Mrs. Bevis pursued her dreams undisturbed, and the old family clock, that had struck the hour of Felicia's birth, and the hour of the confessions of his supremest happiness as composedly as the minutes of any ordinary day in the year; while Felix at the same time, but very insanely, Mr. Hamilton Hedge was telling Miss Adrience that he had met Felix quite often of late in company with "the loveliest creature, by Jove—pretty company excepted—met them at Central Park, at Delmonico's, looking at pictures, etc., etc.; a little fellow with a remarkably sweet eye, and such a way of using them, by Jove!" "Ah," says his fair listener, "it must have been Lucia Gascoyne; she is just home from her tour in Switzerland."

Mr. Hedge knows Miss Gascoyne, and it was not that distinguished traveler.

"Oh, I'm sure," says Miss Athrop; she has blue eyes, but one might easily mistake blue for gray."

Mr. Hedge is certain it was not Miss Althrop, and, having no further interest in the matter, proposes that they shall join in the next mazurka, which the band is beginning to manœuvre, and immediately they are floating gracefully down the room, as if nothing had happened.

Perhaps it was as well that Miss Felix was too full of happiness to conceal it, only it prepared them for the blow, gave them the vantage-ground, so that when he went down stairs and confessed every thing to his stately mother and sister,

"I hope you are not displeased," he ventured, when the tale was ended and he awaited criticism.

"I shall always be glad to know of your true happiness, my dear Felix," replied his mother. "I shall always do my best to promote it."

For, after all, what could she do? Felix was of age, his money was his own, to be wasted on a plebeian if he chose. What could she do? Well, nothing, perhaps, except it greatly depended upon the real character of the girl in question: it was of no use to storm to Felix, he was a free agent, and a storm of opposition would only fix his purpose. It was plain there was but one course for her to pursue, and she resolved to pursue it—that of the most complaisance.

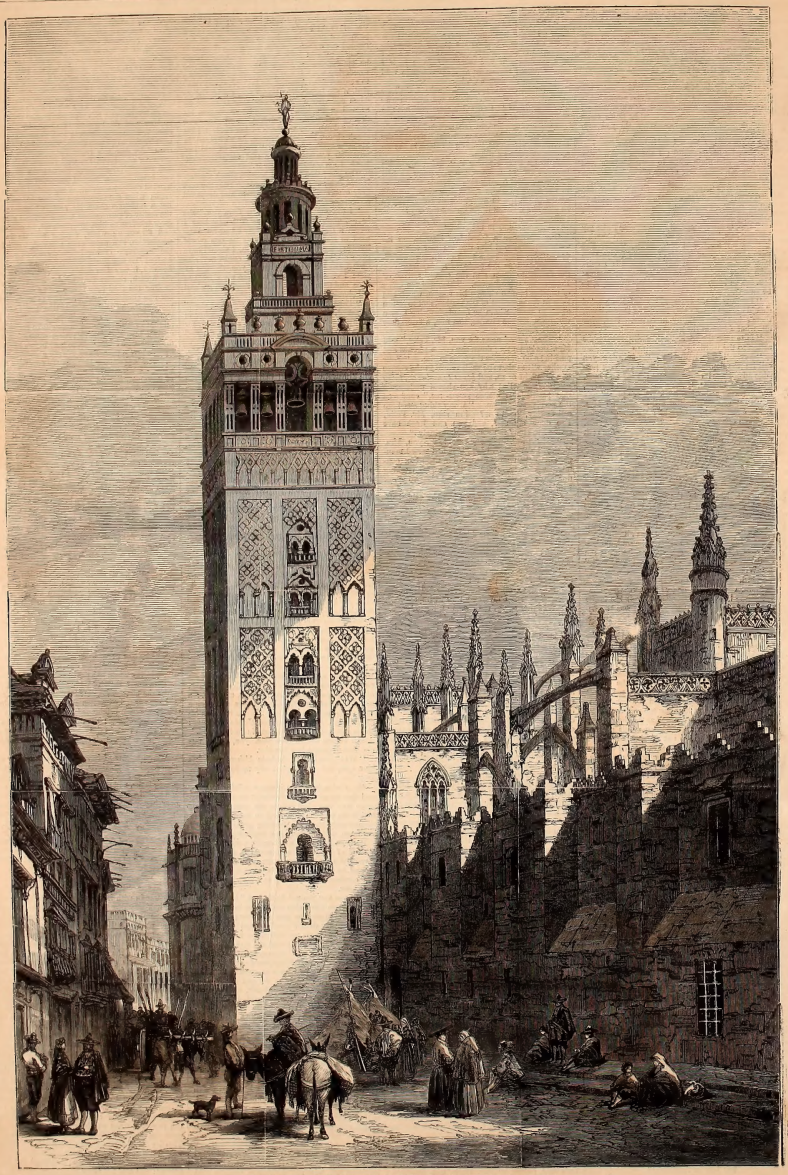
René had been idly sitting over her work in the housekeeper's room one morning, waiting for Felix, but in no hurry, something had detained him, that was all. In the mean while, since Mrs. Bevis buried the servants below, René sang softly to herself, looking out at the blue heavens that seemed to wear a smile, at the dead leaves blown up and down by the errant wind in a wild witches' dance, at the doves that cut the sunshine with their tremulous wings; when presently the rustle of silk, and the existence of some heavy odor, drove gaze inward, to where a haughty, brown-browed woman stood upon the threshold and surveyed her with a questioning gaze. Her heart gave a quick throb at this apparition, and Mrs. Adriance saw, with secret pleasure, that the rose dropped from her cheek as if it had been a mask; that she steadied herself against a chair, as though anticipating a blow.

It was not the way of Mrs. Adriance to dally with whatever ugly business she might have in hand. She went straight to the point now; no sparing of the rod here—no bending or swerving from the original purpose by any sudden flight of the steely glitter of tearless eyes, the constriction of colorless lips, the suppressed and painful utterances of a broken voice, a desolated heart. She had a strong will, this Mrs. Adriance, and a powerful eloquence; and when she painted, in no unsympathetic or vulgar terms, the social disparities and distinctions of class, the disasters ensuing from mésalliances; and, descending from generalities to personalities, when she entreated the tender woman's heart for generosity toward the man who loved her—all for his own peace and prosperity, entreated the beloved to defend her lover against herself, depicted the single-hearted combat occurring in one mated out of his rank; when she demonstrated that his love was but a millstone about his neck, which—such is the frailty of poor human nature—he might one day grow irksome to him, grow hateful, be cast aside and forgotten; when, waxing terrible in her prophecies, and never once relaxing her grasp of the nightmare of her basilisk eyes, Mrs. Adriance at last saw that the victim had surrendered her will, it was then only that she spared a little of her breath, and it may be for courage, before dealing the final coup. She well knew that all the fine rhododendron would be lost, but to so much rubbish; that if society threatened him, he would defy society; that distinctions of class and all that went to a feather's weight in the balance against love and fidelity; that something very different must be brought to bear before he would believe love a failure and fidelity a myth.

There was silence between the two for a little while, during which René seemed only conscious of a subtle, hateful perfume poisoning all the healthy air; only aware of the basilisk eyes still fascinating her, and of some sense of something having happened most fatal, of something being withdrawn. She heard the house-maid laugh upon the stair, a servant child in the second floor beam in a hollow sphere; her wandering eye, resting on the old beveled mirror of the last century, paused for the last time on her own face, and knew it had revealed one autumn evening, not so long ago as to be counted a thing of the past, when the fire-light played upon the ceiling, glittered in gold chins on the tea-table, glowed in the eyes of two lovers reflected there—two lovers who would never touch lips again on earth, never part on both, while the rose reveled on the cheek and love deployed in the eye. She had not observed that Mrs. Adriance had used that mirror, too, from her seat and approached her, speaking with an emphasis which René vainly exerted herself to understand.

"And in order that your renunciation shall be an affair not merely of words, you will write to Felix Adrience this morning—of course remembering how it is, but one must sacrifice to the utmost now and then; such effort is required of one but not to a lifetime—you will say to him, then, that you have ceased to love him; without this avowal your sacrifice will be null and void;" and she put pen and paper before her on the table. Felix. She had never done such a thing, she had had the occasion to do so; there was only one thing in the world she need thank Heaven for, and he knew that, indeed, already; but all the while the fingers clutched at the pen, and the eyes that had green and gold in their depths the hour began brightened a trifle as the thought flashed through them that she was free. Adriance again marred the silence. Mrs. Adriance who saw events marching "in grand accordance" with her will.

"And now, as I have some few words to exchange with Mrs. Bevis, I will leave you, certain that your generosity judgment, which has risen you thus far, will not fail you in the sequel;" and she glided from the room, without once glancing over her shoulder, all the power of her stately robes trailing about her and shaking out rare perfumes from their shining folds as she went.

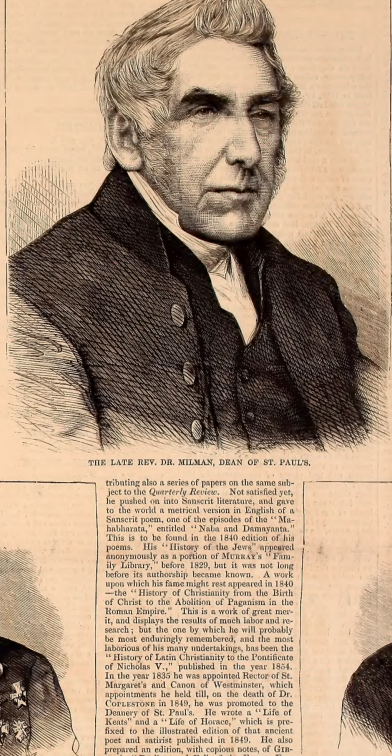


It was perhaps three-quarters of an hour later that Felix opened the hall-door and moved toward the housekeeper's room, humming as he went the familiar forbidden words.

"No dwelling more, by sea or shore,
But only in thy heart."

He came in with a light step and a lighter heart, but half-way down the hall he paused through some strange impulse, paused and listened to some phantasmal thing, some nebulous lustre seemed to sweep by him on a cold wind, that made him shudder where he stood, as it were it true the motes in the sunbeam that fell across his path? It was only the fruction of a second, however, for he stood in the doorway of Mrs. Bevis's room; the idle sunshine mapped out the window-shapes upon the floor, with the dancing leaves, but only to be again and more blushed deeper in its warm embrace; a late fly buzzed noisily through the room and gave a sense of summer to the place; and the castle-in-the-air, suspended from the ceiling, swayed slowly to and fro, as if moved by some gentle breath. The posture was exactly as in his eyes, though it was only the housekeeper's room, adorned by her taste and made sacred by her nieces. Why did not René speak to him? Why did she sit so still, with her head dropped above her hand? Why did she not even lift her sweet grey eyes to welcome her lover? In a breathless pace he had crossed the floor and bent above her. What did it mean, those words scrawled and blurred upon the paper, "I love you, Felix; I love—?" This icy hand stiffening about the pen? These waxen lids that refused to lift?

"René! René!" he called; but René did not answer: she was not there.



Miss Devereaux's vacation was at an end.

A STREET IN SEVILLE, SPAIN—THE GIRALDA.—[SEE PAGE 714.]

THE LATE DEAN MILMAN.

THE death of this accomplished clergyman, historian, critic, and poet was lately announced. HENRY HART MILMAN was born in 1791. He was the youngest son of SIR FRANCIS MILMAN, Bart., M.D., physician to KING GEORGE III., who conferred upon the father, in 1800, a baronetcy, now held by the present SIR WILLIAM MILMAN, of Levaton-in-Wcolland, Devonshire, first cousin of the late Dean. The mother of HENRY HART MILMAN was a daughter of WILLIAM HART, Esq., of Stapleton, near Bristol. His education was commenced at the well-known school of Dr. BURNEY, at Greenwich, whence he was removed to Eton, where he soon became distinguished for his skill in the composition of Latin verse. From Eton he went to Oxford, where he entered Brasenose College, and in 1812 he won the Newdigate prize for an English poem on the APOLLO BELVEDERE, taking also, in 1813, the Chancellor's prize for a Latin poem on ALEXANDER'S visit to the tomb of ACHILLES. He obtained his B.A. degree in the same year, taking a first class in classics. While pursuing his University course so successfully he found time also to devote himself to poetry, and wrote the tragedy of "Fazio," which he published soon after he had obtained his degree of B.A. It was taken possession of by the manager of the Surrey Theatre, where it was performed as "The Italian Wife," without asking permission of the author. It was afterward acted at Covent Garden, where Miss O'NEILL played the part of Bianca, the heroine, and it has continued to be a stock piece. In 1816 he was ordained, and the year afterward was appointed Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, a preferment which he held for eighteen years. In 1818 "Samor," an heroic poem in twelve books, which he had commenced while at Eton and had finished at Oxford, was published. In 1820 he published the "Fall of Jerusalem," a dramatic poem founded upon the History of Josephus; and in 1821 "The Martyr of Antioch," "Belshazzar," and "Annie Boleyn," also dramatic poems. In 1826 appeared a collected edition of his poems, including these and other pieces, and a second edition was published in 1840. In 1827 he was Bampton Lecturer, and, as customary, his lectures were published. He became Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1821, and during his ten years' term of professorship he was not idle in the study of his subject, for he passed from his own language to the Greek, and lectured on the Greek poets, contributing also a series of papers on the same subject to the Quarterly Review. Not satisfied yet, he pushed on into Sanscrit literature, and gave to the world a metrical version in English of a Sanscrit poem, one of the episodes of the "Mahabharata," entitled "Nala and Damayanta." This is to be found in the 1840 edition of his poems. His "History of the Jews" appeared anonymously as a portion of MURRAY'S "Family Library," before 1829, but it was not long before its authorship became known. A work upon which his fame might rest appeared in 1840 —the "History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire." This is a work of great merit, and displays the results of much labor and research; but the one by which he will probably be most enduringly remembered, and the most laborious of his many undertakings, has been the "History of Latin Christianity to the Pontificate of Nicholas V.," published in the year 1854. In the year 1835 he was appointed Rector of St. Margaret's and Canon of Westminster, which appointments he held till, on the death of Dr. COPLESTONE in 1840, he was promoted to the Deanery of St. Paul's. He wrote a "Life of Keats" and a "Life of Horace," which is prefixed to the illustrated edition of that ancient poet and satirist published in 1849. He also prepared an edition, with copious notes, of GIBBON'S "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

THE LATE REV. DR. MILMAN, DEAN OF ST. PAUL'S.

We publish on this page the portraits of some of the most prominent revolutionary leaders. Marshal FRANCISCO SERRANO, who appears to be at the head of the Provisional Government, is the Duke de la Torre. He was born about the close of the last century, and acquired his military experience in the war of independence. He assisted in bringing about the fall of ESPARTERO in 1843. After the restoration of the Queen-mother he coalesced with NARVAEZ in the attempts of the latter to overthrow OLOZAGA. Shortly after the marriage of Queen ISABELLA with the DUKE OF CADIZ he acquired an influence over the mind of his sovereign which occasioned differences between the King Consort and himself and occasioned some scandal. After the ministry of M. DE SALAMANCA had yielded to the storm of popular indignation which assailed it, SERRANO turned Liberal. In 1854 he was exiled on account of his connection with a rising at Saragossa, but soon returned and became an active supporter of the O'DONNELL and ESPARTERO Cabinet. In the rupture which followed between these two he sided with O'DONNELL. In the coup d'etat of 1856 he played into the hands of the latter, and was then created Duke de la Torre. In 1857 he was sent as embassador to the Court of France. In June, 1865, he was appointed Captain-General of Madrid. Since that time he has acted with the party of progress. His recent return from exile gave him a favorable position at the beginning of the late insurrection.

General DON DOMINGO DULCE, now about sixty years of age, was formerly Lieutenant-General of the Spanish forces. He was born in the city of Sotes, Spain. He is descended from an old and titled Spanish family. In the civil war he took an active part against the Carlist party, and for his able defense of the Queen's palace he was, in 1842, made Gentleman of the Bedchamber. Afterward he was rewarded with the post of Commandant of Seville and Saragossa, where he so distinguished himself that, in 1849, he was appointed Field-Marshal. He was associated with Marshal O'DONNELL in the Vicalvaro insurrection of 1854. He held the position of Captain-General in Cuba from 1863 until the summer of 1866, when, before returning to Spain, he visited this country, receiving a warm welcome from our citizens. Early in 1867 he returned to Cuba, where he was united in marriage with the Countess SANTOVENIA, a lady of wealth and high position. Returning with his bride to Spain he became implicated to such a degree in revolutionary schemes that he was ban-

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

AFTER more than a quarter of a century of misrule during which Queen ISABELLA and her parent impunity has fed upon the forbidden fruit of despotism, this sovereign has been driven from the parasites of royalty. Twelve days of revolution sufficed to clean out at least one of the Augean stables of Spain—that, namely, which defiled her palace. It is remarkable that a revolution so complete has been so quietly as well as so rapidly accomplished, and that a government so tyrannical and so indecent has been overturned without disaster. It can scarcely be called a fall, it was a collapse. The government proved a fola de se, its own rottenness procured its ruin. Even the Spaniards, who of all peoples upon earth are characterized by a sentiment of loyalty, refused to follow the standard of a notoriously licentious Queen. The movement against the throne was truly national. Progressistas, Moderates, and Democrats united against the common evil. Even personal jealousies were for the time forgotten. PRIM, SERRANO, DULCE, and TOPETE were in thorough accord. "The victory of the revolution," said PRIM, in the midst of the ovation of his welcome to Madrid, "was due to the joint action of the fleet, Marshal SERRANO, and the exiled generals." All of these leaders placed themselves at the disposal of ESPARTERO, who, however, while congratulating the nation upon its deliverance, declined to take an active part in affairs.

So impotent is the exiled Queen that her very protest, denouncing the revolutionists as felons, and the insurrection itself as a "death-blow to virtue" (!), is in contempt conspicuously placarded in the streets by the order of the Provisional Government.

GENERAL DULCE.

SALUSTIANO OLOZAGA.

ed to Tenerife, whence he recently embarked on the present movement.

Senor SALUSTIANO OLOZAGA has been residing in Paris for some time. He is a wise and moderate statesman, and though called upon to become a member of the Spanish Cabinet is reported to be like ESPARTERO, indisposed to enter into an active participation in affairs. He has been appointed Special Envoy to Paris and London.

Admiral JOAS B. TOPETE, formerly a representative from Cadiz in the Spanish Parliament, has taken a prominent part in the late movement. He strongly advocates a constitutional monarchy.

The revolution has succeeded, and the provisional chiefs is now disclosed to give place to whatever form of government the Cortes may dictate. During its brief rule it has abolished religious orders and suggested many other measures of reform in regard to the abolition of slavery, the establishment of civil and religious liberty, and the extension of the suffrage.

Spain will have indeed experienced a marvelous deliverance, if, with the revival of a constitutional monarchy, she shall be able to throw off the burden of priestcraft. She has 100,000 monks, besides nearly priests without number. Her clergy are intolerant and carefully cherish ignorance and fanaticism. We have seen within the last year with what enthusiasm the people of Roman Catholic Austria hailed their deliverance from their own priesthood. Thus it will be in Spain. It is where the burden is heaviest that it is most sensibly felt. In Spain probably not more than 100,000 out of her population of 19,000,000 (including the colonies) are Protestants, if we have, as in other intensely Roman Catholic nations, we find the revulsion against papal abuses the most violent when once it is aroused. The intimate sympathy which existed between ISABELLA and the Pope certainly did not benefit the Papal cause in Spain. It is a remarkable indication of the national feeling that in the ranks of the Papal army there are so few Spaniards as compared with the recruits from other Roman Catholic countries outside of Italy. The Pope in sending to ISABELLA the golden rose—the emblem of virtue—unless he meant to perpetrate a joke, certainly acted unwisely. Every communication of this sort bestowed by the Holy Father and the libidinous Queen was construed by the Spaniards as an insult to themselves. The Queen's consort—who held a sinecure in his dominions, and enjoyed by their political relations—is said to have fostered in her mind the most degrading superstition. Whether from this cause or some other, it is certainly true that her mind was a tool in the hands of monks and Jesuits. But the Queen is in exile, and it will be well for Spain if, with the departure, the country shall have been freed not only from ministers of the GONZALES BRAVO type and from Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber like DUKE RIANSARES, but also from her monks and her Bleeding Nuns. Let us hope that Sister PATROCINIO has gone out with her royal patron and dupe.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN PERU.

WE publish on page 700 two illustrations of the earthquake at Ica, Peru, on the 13th of last August. Ica is the capital of the province of the same name, in the department of Lima. It lies 168 miles from Lima, and near the Pacific coast. It is a beautiful city of about 30,000 inhabitants. It was noted for its fine churches and its industrial enterprise. In the year 1813 it was ruined by an earthquake. A little more than half a century has passed since that disaster, and now the city is again laid in ruin. The convulsion of the earth had been so violent that it completely overthrew more than forty houses and some churches, all the houses that remained standing being completely ruined. The fall of a store which contained inflammable materials occasioned a fire, which, although soon extinguished, consumed seven warehouses. The earth opened in several places, throwing up torrents of water, and the river which runs through the town ceased, for a considerable, bearing along water mingled with mud.

The shocks of the earthquake in the cities of Peru, on the 13th of August, were less destructive to life than those which took place several days later; the reason of this is to be found in the fact that the former occurred at about five o'clock in the afternoon, so that the people had time to get out of their houses. The shocks at Ecuador were an hour or two after midnight.

In regard to the earthquake in Peru the Panama Star of September says:

"The news in our columns to-day is the most appalling and terrible we have ever laid before our readers. Thousands upon thousands of lives have been called instantly into eternity—whole cities, towns and villages have been swept away from the face of the earth; and ships, with their crews, have been shivered from their anchorages by the receding sea and swallowed up. Such a picture of utter destruction and desolation extending for hundreds of miles along the coast, and reaching, in the Andes, to the most height of the Andes, can scarcely be imagined. The reader stands aghast with horror in attempting to contemplate and to comprehend the magnitude of the devastation which has occurred. It is impossible to say if the desolation is at an end. There are many points in the Interior and further south of which nothing has yet reached us from the Colombian frontier. But, consulting only what is known up to the present, the evil extends over more than 200 leagues. More than 100,000 persons have been rendered homeless and without bread in consequence of this horrible catastrophe, and with difficulty shall we be able to say an instance of a calamity which has embraced such an immense extent of country."

Our engraving representing the interior of the Church of St. Anne shows the destructive effect of the earthquake upon the fine edifices of Ica. When the shocks began the people of this city, as in their usual custom in such an emergency, thronged to the public square to implore the protection of their patron saint. In this instance they prostrated themselves before the statue of Christ, called El Señor del Lorin. This custom of fleeing to patron saints for succor in the face of any great calamity is universal in all Roman Catholic countries. In the same way the old Athenians in the time of the Great Plague gathered in one mass about their pagan altars.

THE GIRALDA OF SEVILLE.

THE picturesque and interesting city of Seville, in the Spanish province of Andalusia, has a very Moorish character; and its famous cathedral belfry-tower, called the Giralda, was originally the minaret of a Mohammedan mosque. It was built in 1196, by ABU YUSUF YACUB, when the Moors ruled all the southern parts of Spain. Its foundations are said to have been composed of the fragments of Roman or Greek statues, which the zealous Moslem had condemned as idolatrous, and had therefore destroyed. From the summit of the Giralda, in those times, the muezzin used to cry with a loud voice, several times a day, and summon the faithful to prayers. After the conquest of the Moorish provinces of Spain by FERDINAND and ISABELLA, at the end of the fifteenth century, the adjoining mosque was pulled down, and the Christian cathedral church was built in its stead. A heathen temple of ancient Carthaginian and next Roman, had existed there before the mosque. But this great tower was allowed to stand by the Christian conquerors. Its height, which had been 250 feet when first erected, was raised to 350 feet by FERNANDO RUIZ, in 1568, the elegant belfry, with eleven bells, was erected, open stone-work, constituted the addition then made. It is a square of 50 feet each side. The graceful intersecting arches form a beautiful feature of its design. It is sometimes illuminated at night, on grand festival occasions, when it seems to hang like a vast lantern over from the dark sky above. The name of the Giralda is derived from the vane on its top, which gira, or turns round, like other weather-cocks.

THE HORSES' MORNING OATH AT CALCUTTA.

THE habit of early rising, for the sake of taking exercise in the open air at the only time except, perhaps, an hour in the evening, when it can be safely taken and enjoyed in that climate, is decidedly commendable in India. From five to seven o'clock in the fine season the resident or visitor in Calcutta may improve his health and find plenty of amusement for his mind by rambling either on horseback or on foot, about the streets and the "maidan"; or may inhale the fresh breeze of morning on the banks of the Hooghly, where he will see many things worth looking at. The Botanical Garden, for instance, the elegant villas with their verdant lawns and tasteful flower-gardens, have a very attractive aspect, while the superb view of Fort William, and the stately houses of Chowringhee, as well as the Esplanade, with its monuments, the noble Government House, the Government House, the Townhall, and other public buildings, give an appearance of truly palatial grandeur to the metropolis of British India in Asia. The river itself, broad as an estuary, or arm of the sea, is thronged with vessels of many different kinds, both large and small, of English European and native construction, and where their masts and sails are seen through the stems and branches of an avenue of trees on the other side, singularly agreeable. The chief landing-place, called the Chandpal Ghaut, with the strand extending northward, is always full of many busy, some buildings of an ornamental character. The small, the other grave, or quays, are scenes of much lively bustle at all hours of the day, but when a multitude of native people, chiefly servants and workmen, come down for water. The sycee, or grooms, in the employment of the rich, are likewise accustomed to bring their horses to the river, and to plunge them into the river, while it still retains the pleasant coolness of the night. This, indeed, is the only hour of the twenty-four, during the hot season, in Calcutta, in which the mere physical sensation of life is a pleasure. When the sun once more mikes his tyrannical power felt by every living creature, the sensation of life is a burden to horses as well as to men.

YALE SCHOOL OF THE FINE ARTS.

THIS beautiful edifice, of which we give an engraving on page 717, was designed and erected under the superintendence of F. B. WEGRT, of this city. The Institution was founded in 1864 through the munificence of Mr. AUGUSTUS R. STREET, of New Haven, who proposed to the Corporation of Yale College to erect at his own expense, as a gift to the College, an appropriate building for a school of the fine arts. The work was immediately begun, and was completed in 1864. Before winter the foundation was laid, ready for commencing the superstructure early in the spring. The work was prosecuted forward during the summer and fall of 1865, and the roof was on before winter set in. During the spring and summer of 1866 the inside was finished.

The South Gallery contains the TRUMBULL pictures and some others. The first story or basement are divided into studios for instruction in the arts. The building is of Bellville, New Jersey, sandstone, with trimmings of Connecticut sandstone and Cleveland stone. It is very massive and substantial, and is built to stand for ages. Unfortunately it is not yet quite finished; but provision for its completion was made by Mr. STREET at his death.

The School is managed by a Council, consisting of President WOOLSEY, Professor SALISBURY, MESSRS. D. HUNTINGTON, D. G. MITCHELL, and Professor PORTER. These gentlemen, desiring to inaugurate the new School in an appropriate manner, have decided to open it to the public by an exhibition of pictures and other works of art. There have also been placed in the gallery several valuable works of art, as the gifts of friends of the institution, and patrons of art. Among these we may mention ALLSTON'S greatest picture, that of Mount Washington, by WUST; and a beautiful statue of Ruth, by LOMBARDI, an Italian sculptor. Besides those already mentioned, the paintings now in the room of SMYBERT, COPLEY, and later American artists. Since the Exhibition of 1867 the Jarves Collection has been added.

PARTED.

WE sang together, you and I.
In a quiet church, sweet songs of praise;
Your voice was like an angel's voice,
Your face was as an angel's face.

We knelt together, you and I.
In that dim old church, in sight of Heaven,
And you prayed a prayer that the angels know
That sin may be forgiven.

We walked together, you and I;
In the happy days that followed hard on wedding sin,
But sweeter were the pleasant words
That you kept murmuring.

They beat in time with our glad hearts,
Old words that sounded like new ones to me,
Laughing, you sang them, all for me,
As we two wandered on.

We talked together, you and I;
Wise things you spoke for one so young;
I listened, feeling I was not wise
That on your words a story hung.

We lived together, you and I,
In those old years, two friends no more;
Did we ever dream in the years to be
Could we span the years that were on before?

If we loved together, you and I,
Was it wise that the love was never told?
Was it better to let the time glide on Till both life and love were old?

MRS. BROWN—WIDOW.

WHEN Mr. Brown was living Sue Stuyvesant and I called upon Mrs. Brown one clear, cold winter afternoon. Sue was a grand girl—something of an old maid, though younger than who had not passed the silly, giggling age said; but I am sure there was not a sign of an old maid about Sue, with her face glowing as red as any girl's, and her hair as black as a raven's wing and always kept in such beautiful order. Standing on the Brown door-step I surveyed Sue from head to foot, thinking what a grand girl she was, such an angel of patience at home, such a merry, emotionable girl abroad, such a mixture of gentleness and industry, and so stylish withal! There I fell to wondering how Dick Brown could ever have jilted Sue, for according to the "tradition of the elders," Sue would have been mistress of the mansion on whose steps we stood but for the blue-eyed, golden-haired woman who stepped inside as Mrs. Brown, and on whom we had come to call in obedience to the social requirements of the time.

"If Sue were mistress," I thought, "Dick Brown's house would be in better repair." I was sure she would have had a coat of paint for the front, some hinges for the shutters, a new bell-wire, a half-hour's polish on the door-plate, a vigorous scrubbing of the door-steps, and a general clearing out of rubbish in the area. I was very certain if Sue had been the Mrs. Brown upon whose door I was to call, I would not have been obliged to wear out my gloves pulling at the broken bell-wire and wear out my patience waiting for a servant to answer my ring.

When we were at last admitted to the parlor I fell to thinking again of Sue as mistress. Perhaps the flimsy curtains to the window-panes suggested how dexterously Sue would have wiped away the stains; perhaps the littered carpet reminded me of the tidy way in which Sue handled a broom; perhaps the dust on the furniture made me think of the vigorous use Sue made of a duster; perhaps the smoky mantel-piece and the remnants of cake and wine on a sideboard brought to mind by contrast the perfect order of the rooms over which Sue presided.

Mrs. Brown met us at the door of the room, with a shower of apologies for her appearance. The apologies served to draw direct attention to her appearance, which was made up of golden hair in a tumble-down condition, a rumpled cap, and a crumpled skirt. She apologized for the shabbiness of the furniture, and more of the shabbiness, which was made up of a litter of scraps and children's toys, of dust and stains and general seediness. She apologized for her children, and we could not but observe the uncleanness apparent in their faces and the neglect apparent in their garments.

"It's very well for young ladies like you to look as if you came out of bandboxes, but if you ever get married you'll find it don't pay," Mrs. Brown assured us, half apologetically and half warningly. "Mr. Brown often holds up to young lady, and that one, and the other as patterns to me," she continued. "But I tell him he might as well give me a vest-pattern when I am making up book-muslin. The relation of married women to society are so different that the patterns have no fitness."

I knew Sue Stuyvesant's creed, that the law of attraction and repulsion that governed the love system the human mind also. I had heard her say a score of times that the bit of ribbon, the graceful fall of lace, the pretty adjustment of locks of hair, the delicate shades and harmonious dress, the sweetly-sung ballad, the winning tone and charming way that attracted the young man and made him a lover had power to drive the husband from his hand and keep him a lover. I had heard her say as often that the neglected hair, the soiled collar, the untidy dress, the slip-shod shoe, the indifferent tone and rough manner that repulsed a young man and nipped love in the bud had equal power to repulse the husband and blight love with the frost of indifference. But Sue Stuyvesant's creed was not to be spoken in Mrs. Brown's house for any second girl was a lady with true delicacy of feeling.

"How is Mr. Brown?" she inquired.

"He isn't very well," Mrs. Brown answered. "At least, he complains a great deal; but that's the way of men. They always think they are nearly dead if the least thing ails them. Mr. Brown has a bad cough sometimes, but it's nothing but a slight cold that every body is liable to. I tell him he is whimsical as any old woman."

"Sometimes these slight colds are more serious matters than they appear," I suggested, remembering how thin and pale Dick Brown was.

"Yes, I know," Mrs. Brown answered. "But you'll find it so, dear, when you are married a while to worry yourself about every whim and conceit your husband gets in his head. Men are always getting some new idea."

"Hobby?" I asked, with a view to gaining further knowledge.

"Yes," Mrs. Brown answered; "I couldn't enumerate Mr. Brown's hobbies. There's my hair, and dress, and the children, and the servants, and the house, and his clothes, and his habits, and domestics, and doctors, and his aches and pains, and the dear knows what else! What a lovely way that is of talking of one's husband!"

"It is very simple," I answered. "Your hair would do elegantly in this way."

"My hair, Mrs. Brown answered. "Oh, my dear, I wouldn't think of it. Its entirely too much trouble for a married woman like me. Mine is just as natural as it would be this way when I don't see any one but Mr. Brown."

"But you haven't given up society, surely," I suggested with surprise.

"Almost entirely," Mrs. Brown answered. "Mr. Brown had a great notion of inviting his friends to dinner, but I told him I was not going to entertain them; and, you know, it don't amount to any thing with married people. It's quite different with young ladies who have just acquainted and find a husband. With Mr. Brown's friends always coming here, I was obliged to keep the parlor in order, and that and my dress must be just so, and I had to make a martyr of myself, singing and playing. At last I got tired of it, and told him he could do it. It was ridiculous in Mr. Brown to expect it. He don't invite his friends here any more. He sees them at the store and at the club, and in the evenings in spite of his cough. That's the consistency of the man! Oh, my dears, men are most inconsistent creatures. I've found that out if you ever have much to do with them."

"Do you sing and play much?" Sue asked.

"I used to," Mrs. Brown answered; "but that's another thing. Mr. Brown finds fault with and begs for music sometimes, but it's such a bore to keep in practice. It's one thing to sing in company and have half a dozen gentlemen ready to turn the leaves for you and know that your singing will earn you invitations to concerts and operas, and rides, and all that. It's quite another thing to sing for one's husband alone. I tell Mr. Brown my patience is worn out literally. That's a lovely style of trimming, Miss Sue. I haven't seen a pattern like that across this season."

"I made it from one of last year's dresses," Sue Stuyvesant replied. "Almost any dress will cut over into one. The style of poplin I have seen you wear would make over into a very handsome walking-dress."

"Perhaps," answered Mrs. Brown, with a languid smile. "But I think the old poplin will have to do as it is. Those flutings must be a world of trouble to do, and I don't seem worth while for a woman whose market is made to spend so much time in trimmings. The easiest way of making dresses is the best way in my opinion. Oh, Miss Sue! Mr. Brown hasn't ceased to rave over the chicken salad you made for the church fair. He threatens to get you to make it for us, though I'm sure my cook will never be able to make it, and I mortally hate to go into the kitchen. Mr. Brown is very fussy in his tastes. He don't care for any thing that comes on the table, and craves all sorts of fancy dishes. If I catered to his appetite as he would have me do I might be cooking in the kitchen half my time, and I didn't get married to be any man's drudge. Oh, you'll find out, my dears, what unreasonable creatures men are, every one of them; and if you know when you are well off you'll stay as you are. Just tell Dick Peters that's what he proposes." And Mrs. Brown turned to me with a significant laugh.

The embarrassed blushes that I felt creeping over my face were happily put to flight by Sue Stuyvesant's rising. We had obeyed the social requirement of the times, and were at liberty to depart.

Down with painfully slow steps Dick Brown, waiting with painfully slow steps, Sue Stuyvesant sighed after he had passed. "Poor fellow! I think his wife is blind," she said.

As we turned the corner I glanced around, and saw that Dick Brown was looking after us. I wondered if he was not thinking, as I had been, of the cheerless home and slovenly wife and neglected children to which he was going, and the home it might have been if the one girl and boy side had presided over it "Poor fellow!" I said to myself, echoing Sue. Stuyvesant's sigh. "I think if he was blind once he now sees."

Last week Sue Stuyvesant and I called on Mrs. Brown, a widow of nearly a year's standing. Waiting on the door-steps I remarked the paint on the house, the hinges to the shutters, the new bell-wire, the shining door-plate, the clean steps, and the orderly area.

"There is all the difference between a cold-cinder and a diamond appearance," I whispered, contrasting the previous shabbiness with the present glitter and polish.

In the parlor there were the same marked evidences of improvement. The windows were clean, the carpets well swept, the furniture dusted, the tables orderly, and a delicious odor of violets pervading the apartments.

Mrs. Brown—Widow, soon made her appearance, and this time there were no apologies necessary. Her hair was arranged with taste and care, her dress was well-fitting and elaborately trimmed, and there was a very evident attempt at effect in stray curls, and sundry knots of ribbon, and graceful twists of tarlatan. The woman herself was animated, and rejoiced in all the fashions and gossip of the times. "There is the difference between the coal-cinder and diamond apparent here, too," I thought, contrasting the previous languor and dullness with the present sparkle and gayety.

"Pray tell me how you crimp your hair, and manage your back-hair so beautifully?" she asked of Sue Stuyvesant, with all a young girl's animation and interest.

"It is a great deal of trouble, and I sometime think it is a shame to spend so much time upon it. I would recommend a simpler style," Sue answered, a little maliciously.

"Oh! I don't mind the trouble so long as it is pretty," Mrs. Brown answered. "If people only think it becoming, I shall be paid."

Sue Stuyvesant gave me a significant look. I knew she was thinking of the new bonnet that was good enough for poor Dick Brown.

"Do you know of any pretty new music?" Mrs. Brown—Widow, inquired, turning to me.

"I thought you had given up your music," Sue Stuyvesant remarked, when I had made my reply.

"Oh yes: I gave it up for several years," Mrs. Brown—Widow, "but I am taking music lessons again, and devote several hours every day to practice. You know I have a good ear and a very tolerable voice."

"Yes," Sue Stuyvesant assented, a little sharply, with a look in her eyes that told me she remembered poor Dick Brown, deceased, had begged for music, and this woman had told him it was "played out."

Mrs. Brown—Widow, fell to the discussion of fashions. "The present style of flouncing is beautiful," she remarked.

"They are an immense amount of trouble," I urged in objection. "The binding, and gathering, and sewing on require a great deal of time and patience."

"I suppose so," Mrs. Brown replied; "but they add so much style to the appearance that they repay one for all the labor they cost. I am flouncing all my dresses after elaborate designs."

Sue Stuyvesant coughed to hide an angry, choking sensation in her throat, and was thinking of the woman who did not deem it worth while to spend much time on trimmings, because her market was made.

"A person in society must dress more, you know," Mrs. Brown said, apologetically, as if she herself remembered her previous conversation.

"Do you see much society?" I inquired.

"A considerable," Mrs. Brown answered. "You know, it isn't well to settle down all at once was quite dead."

Sue Stuyvesant pulled at the tassel of her glove until she broke it, remembering the man quite dead, whose friends this sociably inclined woman had driven from his house.

"My dear Miss Sue," Mrs. Brown—Widow exclaimed, turning to my grand girl, "I never came to you for a recipe for chicken salad that you promised me. Why, Miss Sue, I am getting to be quite a famous cook. I have invited a few friends to tea to-night, and I shall have them in the kitchen all the morning making fancy dishes. It don't do to trust to cooks at all. I will send around a receipt for that nice recipe. I am a gentleman friends is particularly fond of chicken salad."

Over my grand girl's face flitted the shadow of a sneer that the trouble this woman gladly took for strong and hearty friends she had begrudged him a husband.

There was a ring at the door and Mr. Peters was announced. I looked up to see John Peters, whose business had been so busy that he had made me less frequent visits for a few weeks past.

Mrs. Brown—Widow greeted her visitor with charming cordiality, thanking him heartily for the bouquet he had left the previous day. I began to suspect dimly that John Peters's heavy business' had some reference to Mrs. Brown—Widow; and now I observed how really beautiful the woman's blue eyes and golden hair were, and what a winning gentleness was in her manner one moment and what a pretty deprecation the next. I saw now how it had happened that Dick Brown, deceased, had preferred the blue eyes and golden hair and pretty manner to Sue Stuyvesant's plainer face and manner without art or deceit. And I—I was a plainer woman than Mrs. Brown—Widow, and her manner I had not. I gave up John Peters just as a few years before Sue Stuyvesant had given up Dick Brown.

John Peters took his seat in the window, but Mrs. Brown—Widow arose instantly and gave him an arm-chair. "The draught blows upon you cold," she said, with bewitching thoughtfulness.

John Peters smiled his thanks for the kind consideration, and the shade of Sue Stuyvesant's sneer fell on my face as I thought of the man whose sickness was unto death, and this woman had called it a "devilish provoking."

I came away and left John Peters to the smiles and winning ways and pretty toilet and fancy dishes. There was nothing left for me but the bitter cup out of which Sue Stuyvesant had once drank.

"My dear," said Sue Stuyvesant, as she bade me "good-by," "we will call on this woman two years hence, and if you feel at this moment wronged and aggrieved by John Peters's conduct, you will say that even in your bitterest hour with you had chosen lighter punishment for his folly than he will receive. Butterflies will go to the mud while they are butterflies, and afterward to their chrysalis state again; and that woman is certain to gravitate to her level and return to her normal condition again."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

SAN FRANCISCO has been visited with earthquakes again. On October 21 several shocks were felt, doing considerable damage, and thoroughly alarming the inhabitants. Many buildings were entirely demolished; the City Hall was reported a wreck; the patients were removed from the United States Marine Hospital, that building being considered unsafe; and the United States Mint was closed for repairs. Numerous other public buildings were more or less damaged. Four lives were lost by the falling débris. Business was suspended, and the streets were crowded by an excited multitude. Shocks were experienced at Sacramento, Stockton, and other places in the interior, as well as in many places along the coast. As yet there is the report of this disaster, as it first comes by telegraph. Further more severe tribulations will be revealed by later reports of the disaster.

It is related of Queen Isabella that as often as her majesty led her to go to Madrid she was dissuaded from her purpose by some friend, "Why, you are continually in a distressing state of indecision, which proved specially true when, during the railway station on one of these occasions she would have hardly exclaimed, "Oh, that I were only a man!" "And I, too," added he, "should be pleased at being reducing on the sense of the words which he used. It is said that he has happily broke into a laugh in spite of her despondency.

FROM Boston exchanges we learn that the American process of making silk, which is manufactured in Hartford, Connecticut, has been introduced into Lyons, and meant greatly exceeds the supply. The machinery is an enormous one, and the building in Lyons, France, with which the Boston firm who have contracted for the sale of the American silks have hitherto had dealings, has examined samples of the silk, and warmly commended its construction and fabric. Moreover, the Lyons house thinks that the sale of the new business will be much diminished in consequence of the introduction of this article. This success is an indication of what American industry may accomplish in the future.

A LOUISIANA planter, by adopting the following plan, has raised watermelons without vines. The whole vine is about two feet long cover it at a point intermediate between the roots and the end. After it has taken root where it is covered divide the vine between the cut and new root, and the result will be that the melon will be seedless, with unusually fine quality.

Among the sights which are pleasant to behold are a father at a piece of amusement with his children, a young man with his best girl, a fresh, virtuous, unshackeyed face; a shop-girl neatly dressed, and without sham ornamentation; a man of business going home at the usual hour with a basket in his hand; a shopkeeper civil to, and patient with a poor woman who has a baby to nurse, who ventures to buy a one-shilling article; a dress-maker who is content enough to perfect "a fit," and yet leave your breathing apparatus in tolerable possession of your lungs; a shop that is not an "emporium;" a milliner who didn't come from Paris; a jolly domestic man who likes "the family;" a bride with her pet, small house; a young father with his first boy.

In California cattle live upon green pasture in winter and upon dry fodder in summer. Sheep farming is confined almost exclusively to the mountainous regions of the interior, which, if taken at three times a day, after being well shaken (that is, the patient), will certainly cure:

10 drops of decency.
4 ounces of common-sense.

The dose is to be increased if one expects to promenade Broadway during the day.

A Maine paper tells of a miraculous fall of a Bangor man from a three-story building. While making his descent, he managed, with his mind to place himself in as good a position as possible to receive the shock of the termination of his involuntary journey. Accordingly he kept his arms close by his side, slightly drew up his lower limbs, in order not to alight on his feet, and then probably shatter his bones: and the result was, his injuries were limited to a few comparatively harmless bruises. A remarkable instance of presence of mind.

"I can't vote," remarked an old lady, in a Pennsylvania railroad car, when the vote of the passengers was taken; "but I am willing to vote for whichever man at home!" Evidently her political views were clearer than those of a solemn-looking lady who, in a recent canvass of the passengers on a Connecticut railroad train, was sportively asked which way she would vote. She didn't understand the question. It was repeated. "Are you for Grant or Seymour, Miss Sam?" "Grantorseymour?" replied the indignant female. "Don't know of any sich place! I am a-goin' to Norwich!"

In Lyons peaches have this year been a drug in the market. Fifteen or twenty can be bought for a single sou, and dealers are obliged to throw away basketsfull, being unable to dispose of them even at a low price. It is a pity we could not have some of them in our markets.

MR. Hughes, the working-men's candidate for Parliament from Lambeth, England, has refused to avail himself of the usual corrupt means for securing his election. He stands firm. He did not intend to use any public room in the borough, nor to "bill" himself all over the walls of the borough, nor to stick up "Hughes forever," but he would meet the electors at public meetings in every part of the borough, and explain to them the grounds of his political faith; that he did not believe in the old electioneering machinery, and would not use it. It was nothing but bribery, only bribery, in a form which brought the briber under no risk of losing his seat.

A NEW line of steamers has been entered into between the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (French mail steamers), the Panama Railroad, and the Pacific Mail Company, by which a new route is opened for shippers and passengers to the Continent of Europe. The regular time required by this new route is to be fifty-four days from Yokohama to St. Nazaire, France; but this is capable of being lessened by four or five days. If the Pacific Mail Steamship Company desirous of sharing in the carrying-trade in that direction, will take some little effort to expedite it. This route offers many advantages to dealers in silk-worm eggs, and they are already giving it a trial.

AMPLIAS is becoming a successful fashion among ladies in England. At Gordon Castle, on the Riser Spey, reports state that the Countess of Seafield brought two calves, one of seven pounds weight and one of five pounds. Lady Caroline Lennox caught a pair of seventeen pounds, and Lady Florence Lennox one of twenty-three pounds weight.

AN American gentleman, who was recently in London, declared to have an advertisement inserted in the London Times. It was on a Thursday that he carried it to the office, requesting it to be inserted the next morning, and on the same time asking the price to be paid. It will be seven-and-sixpence," was the reply, "and will go in as soon as possible." "But," said the gentleman, "when will it go in?" "Oh! by Monday or Tuesday," responded the clerk. "Put it in to-morrow," insisted the gentleman, "for I must remain in London for that alone. I will gladly pay any price." The deed was answered. "We don't do business in that way!" he replied gravely.

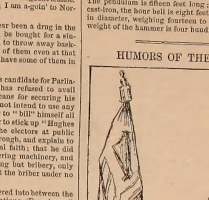
FRUIT is very good and healthful food. But it should not be crowded into the stomach when the appetite has been wholly satisfied with other food, nor should it be swallowed at all hours of the day any more than other articles of food. Ripe fruit, ripe fruit, taken at proper times, is suitable quantities, is one of our greatest blessings. Otherwise eaten, it becomes a fruitful source of disease.

A work has recently been published by M. Emile Andreoli, who took part in the last Polish insurrection, and who, on the capture by the Russians was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment in Siberia. He has given, on many occasions an electric battery has been used by the Russian police, to compel prisoners to answer questions. Even this was not more cruel than the "water cure" of the Turks, which is described by those who have endured it as terrible. Prisoners were confined in a well-warmed apartment, salted herrings with bread and water for the first few days being their only food. If they refused to answer the questions of their examiners, consciousness the bread was first withdrawn, and then the water; whereupon ensued a state of intense thirst commenced, depriving the sufferer of all power of speech, so compel prisoners to abandon the resolution which he had formed to die. Very rarely was this resolution kept when brought before the commissioners a second time.

One of the city physicians of Cincinnati, Ohio, reports that a young man who had for the heated term betried the following treatment for sun-stroke with success: Warm water was applied to the head, on clothes, or warm wet cloth was kept for hour without injury. Consciousness was very soon restored. Liquor ammonia was given in small doses internally as a stimulant. This may be worth remembering till next July.

A good story is told of a bright Chicago woman. Her husband purchased a span of horses, and during his absence, one time, she speculated a little by "exchanging" the steeds for a tract of five acres of fat prairie land. When he got back, he was in a terrible rage, and the other day she was offered twenty thousand dollars for the land.

AN experiment has now being made in Australia in regard to the preservation of fresh meat by a chemical process, founded on a late discovery of Professor Faraday. A method of freezing it by evaporation, but no exact description of the process has yet been published. The Australian Land Company subscribed £10,000 to carry on the experiment with, and 300 tons of meat have been shipped to England on trial.



A FOOL long ago made an oil building in this city was being taken down, the workmen discovered in an old nest a roll of bills amounting to two hundred and fifty dollars. They were the sum of the occupants of the house lost the money, and a young clerk boarding there was accused of the robbery, and, on being arrested, was convicted of the crime and sent to prison, with character ruined and bereft of friends. He gave way to dissipation, and recently died on Blackwell's Island. This sad story conveys its own moral.

A NEW journal, specially devoted to architecture, has been started in Philadelphia. It is called the Architectural Review and Builder's Journal, and is published by a syndicate of the United States devoted to this subject. It promises to be valuable not only to professional builders, but also to private individuals who are interested in the comfort or elegance of houses.

THE origin of the exultant interjection hurrah is as old as the Sclavonic race. The source of the word is in the primitive Oriental idea that every man who dies for his country goes to heaven—Hur-ri, the Slavonic derivative, meaning, literally, "To Paradise."

THE details of the size of the English Parliament clock are published. It is stated that the dials are twenty-two feet in diameter. Every half minute the point of the minute-hand moves nearly seven inches. The clock will go eight and a half days, and strikes only for seven and a half, so as to indicate by its silence any neglect in winding it up. The mere winding of each of the striking parts will take two hours. The pendulum is fifteen feet long; the wheels are of cast-iron, the hour bell is eight feet high and nine feet in diameter, weighs fourteen to fifteen tons. The weight of the hammer is four hundred weight.

GENERAL JOHN SEDGWICK.

LAURT THOMPSON'S noble statue of General JOHN SEDGWICK, of the Sixth Corps, of which we gave a picture two weeks ago, was unveiled on Wednesday, June 21, at West Point, with appropriate ceremonies. The day was unfortunately rainy and unpleasant; but a large number of noted officers of the war, many of them warm personal friends of SEDGWICK, was assembled, and the order arranged by the officers of the Corps was punctually observed. The parade of the cadets, the distinguished military groups upon the platform, the magnificent music, the natural charms of the spot, and the interest of the occasion made it all very memorable. The oration was delivered by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, and we print so much of it as our space will permit:

Under this October sky, among these historic hills, upon this historic river flowing at our feet; here upon ground that SEDGWICK trod, and which knew the darkest tragedy of the Revolution; beneath that flag—the bright morning-star of hope to the nations—the flag that now floats unchallenged from Arctic central ice to the remotest frontier; surrounded by fields golden with immeasurable harvests, by homes of happiness and peace, by hearts of fidelity to country and to man, we come to honor the memory of the brave and modest soldier who died to give to our homes that peace, to confirm in our hearts that fidelity, to keep those fields prosperous and secure; your father, men of the Sixth Corps, our soldier, fellow-citizens, the silent, affectionate, heroic leader, whom the eye desiring sees not, whom the ear attentive hears not; "whose part in all the pomp that fills the circuit of the autumn hills is that his grave is green." "Death hath this also," says BACON, "that it openeth the gate to good fame." But good fame in turn conquers death. He is not dead, although we no more see him. Behold how vast and various is his life! In his fair and noble statue he lives again. On the most heroic page of history he breathes and moves. In your hearts he is immortal. In the deeper splendor of the flag on which the supremacy of the Union he maintained, in the equal liberty in that Union which he secured, in the larger power and increasing justice of the regenerated country that he served, JOHN SEDGWICK lives now, and shall live forever. Natural and noble and beautiful is the instinct that inspires our hands to build monuments to the illustrious dead. We carve their names upon memorial stone, exquisitely the sculptor moulds their forms in bronze or marble; but they carve their own names upon history, they impress civilization with their likeness; and whiter than marble, more lasting than bronze, is the memory of those whose influence builds in the purer purpose and nobler life of a nation. The American Union is a great monument of WASHINGTON and the men of the Revolution—the AMERICAN Union, as the security of equal rights, is the monument of SEDGWICK and of 300,000 of our brothers who rest with him.

In Europe, three centuries ago, the cause of the people took form as the protestant Reform, and transferred to the battle-field was the thirty-years' war. In England—drawn to a finer point in the sermons of stern preachers, in the debates in Parliament, in the loud snort of pamphlets—it was known as Puritanism. But at length it was preaching and debating no longer. At Edgehill JOHN PYM's speeches had become pikes, and CHARLES's falsehoods swords. The Cavalier fought for privilege—the Puritan for the people. The struggle was fierce and long, and when the smoke of battle rolled away, Puritanism remained bivouacked upon the field. But its complete victory was reserved for another century and another continent. The old Puritanism was doubtless gloomy and severe—the tree that bore the rosy and delicate fruit of American liberty was knotted and gnarled. But while the Cavalier, the Tory, and the Aristocrat, here as every where, have always derided Puritanism, remember that the greatest of all English rulers was a Puritan—the great statesman of all England's poets but one was a Puritan. The Puritan policy almost swept the Mediterranean of pirates, and protected the Protestants of France and Savoy. The Puritan policy at home defended civil and religious liberty against despotism, united as a bishop and crowned as a king. Crossing the sea it planted the snows and rocks of NEW ENGLAND with the seed of popular liberty and equal rights. The harvest is as vigorous as the soil, for freedom is a rude plant and loves the cooler latitudes. In the auspicious air of a new continent the Puritan spirit became modified, mellowed, and enlarged. Out of strength came forth sweetness. Government by churchmembers became government by the people. JOHN PYM became JAMES OTIS. The larger and generous Puritanism of America inspired the Revolution. They were Puritan guns whose echo is endless upon Bunker Hill. It was the Puritan spirit that spoke in the Declaration of Independence. It was the Puritan will that shook the glittering hand of the Cavalier Burgoyne from the Hudson. It was to the Puritan idea that CORNWALLIS surrendered at Yorktown, and eighty-three years later it was the Cavalier who again surrendered to the Puritan under the Appomattox apple-tree. Those stern, sad men, in peaked hats, who prayed in camp, and despised love-locks, and at whom quibblers in politics laugh and sneer to-day, were the indomitable vanguard of moral and political freedom. If they muffled in gray they smoke in flesh—if they sang through their noses, the hymn they chanted was fervent—if they aimed at a divine monarchy, they also founded the freest, the most enlightened, the most prosperous, the most powerful Republic in history.

As we look back to-day upon that tremendous conflict, we see emerging from the bitter smoke the grim champion of the people, OLIVER CROMWELL, and by his side there rides a sturdy Puritan, Major-General ROBERT SEDGWICK. When CROMWELL became Protector he sent his General as a commissioner to America, and when the King returned the Puritan decided to remain in America. "I am in our ashes live their wonted fires." And more than a century after NEWBURY and WORCESTER, a descendant of ROBERT SEDGWICK, a major in the Revolutionary army, defended the good old cause at Valley Forge. At the end of the war he was made a Major-General of militia, and in honor, which the CONNECTICUT Tories had bursted while he was away, was rebuilt for him by his countrymen. It was in the little town of Cornwall, in the pleasant Valley of the Housatonic, in the northwest part of Connecticut, the State of PETER SAGE of WOOSTER; and there his grandson, our General JOHN, was born, on the 13th of September, 1813. He is remembered as a quiet farmer's boy, going to the common-school, and working in the peaceful fields of Cornwall Hollow. A generous, manly lad—a natural leader among his companions. But the spirit of the Ironsides trooper and of the Continental volunteer was in his blood, and as a little boy he called himself "General JOHN SEDGWICK." Thus a soldier, born of soldiers, on the 1st July, 1833, when he was twenty years old, he came here to the Military Academy, where, three years later, he was graduated, and was promoted Second Lieutenant of the Second Artillery. He served immediately in the Florida War against the Indians, a little later upon the northern frontier during the Canadian border troubles, and was engaged in recruiting at various stations.

In your name, gentlemen, and in your presence—here, in the school in which our officers are trained, I deny that to become a soldier is to cease to be a citizen and a man. "I deny that a soldier is a moral hermaphrodite for whom right and wrong do not exist. I deny that in a noble breast, whether in or out of uniform, the sense of loyalty to a flag will be deeper and stronger than that of loyalty to conscience and to manhood. And I say over Heaven-born stars and stripes should ever become the black flag of infamy and injustice, it is an insult to you as to your fellow-citizens, to suppose that you or they would imagine it to be an honorable duty to bear it. We are citizens of the world before we are citizens of a country: we are men before we are Americans, to interpret la patrie, and our duty as Americans is to make America the home of noble men, and that flag the flag of librety for mankind. In our late war it was not the resignation of their commissions by those who felt, however mistaken in our judgment, that they could not honestly fight under the flag which cast so deep an odium upon them. It was not the conscience, it was the want of conscience. It was not the honest conviction, it was the treachery that was so despicable. If Benedict Arnold, whose name is forever treacherously associated with this spot, had honestly resigned his commission, the consequences might for a time have been deplorable; but his name would not be infamous. It was the treachery that dooms him to eternal execration. It was not that Towson wished to leave the army, but it was his base surrender of the material that blackens his name. It was not the resignation of a Reed Smith, which was the cause of following the flag of a cause which he considered by now no honest one to sustain. The resignations of all West Pointers who resigned was not of that description, but of a different kind. It was that flag and the authority of States, which they said they had no true paramount, but their authority ordered, or to said that the flag of injustice and inhumanity. It may be said, by a soldier must obey command, whatever they may be. A reply that no honorable man will consent for a moment to disobey an order which demands infamy. Every Heroes order his officer to stay at home to be an officer of peace of duty, in the service which has a murderer Heroes, and if every officer did so, Heroes murderer would be left alone. The [illegible] Towson, Reed, says Alonzo Snow, "that when God does not say me into order I will not do it." I do not save my life but by doing an indecent thing. He does not say "and time but every time I should rejoice to do it, and when that time came he did resign it. He did not say that my King order my flag which I command his to said, my conscience forbids it, and he died.

It is not a question of law and expert, that I should trace our soldier step by step in his career. Before the last year of service was that all of the officers of his time, and he rose, by brave action, to the command of the 5th, and faithful to the last until the spring of 1861, which found him Major of the First. Lieutenant Snow engaged in the battle of Fort Wise, near Pike's Peak, in Colorado. From those remote regions he was sent at once to Sumter, with him into the constant and conspicuous service in which the brief remainder of his war was passed. In May, 1861, he was Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second Cavalry; in April, Colonel of the First; in August was appointed, to the place of Rosser B. Lee, Colonel of the Fourth Cavalry, and in the same month Brigadier-General of Volunteers, serving in the defenses of Washington until the spring of 1862, when, in April, when the Virginia Peninsular campaign opened Snow Snowden was a Division Commander, and his name to his death is that of the Army of the Potomac.

So long the story of need, for it could be told in a page. After the battle of Williamsburg the first considerable action was that of Fair Oaks and Seven Pines. The mass of the Union army lay upon the eastern side of the Chickahominy, a river which, in ordinary times of 50,000 men, were upon the other shore. A furious storm in the early part of the night swelled the river to impassable flood, and in the morning the whole rebel force burst upon the Union lines, and with the ferocious swing of the army in full sound and sight of their brothers, impassable and cut from them. But all the morning the battle hotly raged; the Union troops were driven back; the day was lost, and the rout was begun to rise. General Sumner, who was upon the eastern shore, with the Second Army Corps, then over commanded a division, was ordered to cross, and he sent word to Sedgwick, who, with his division, Snow Snow was come to his help, to advance; but as Snowwere came down to the bridge he saw that the flood had become a sea, sweeping directly by. For out in the middle of the river a quick, quiet, powerful current showed the channel; beyond the further end of the plank the water was for a quarter of a mile. It was a perilous task to feel his way through the water with a long pole, opened the batteries and with the trust a fruit, trembling plank for the passage of the channel. But the men, and rout of the battle beyond the flood came nearer and nearer, and he knew that his brethren were sorely pressed. At length, he said, thoughtful survey he gave the word "Forward." Into the waters moved the steady line. The plank passage sank almost to the guns—foundered, staggered; but, pointing Sedgwick on, soldiers and batteries moved the quivering bridge, which was whirled away as they left it. Safely, although the swift current and the mire, an hour and a half before sunset Snowcross came upon the field. The battle, flushed with success, was driving their victorious columns as a wedge between the centre and left of our wavering force. Snow like his trouble ancient, Snowcross swiftly advanced, opened fire upon the batteries and struck into the wedge. The wasted foe recalled before his tremendous fire, the whole division in blazing line of battle moved steadily on, seized the stricken enemy, hurled him back to the wood, and the battle of Fair Oaks was won.

On the 4th of July, 1862, Snowcross was made Major-General of Volunteers. In all that great army, struggling for the life of the Republic, Snowcross was no officer more trusted and beloved than the most unobtrusive, the most modest loved Army of the soldier. In person not tall, with dark hair, dark, still, almost, Snowcross was the type of tranquil aspect of power, who did not talk much or loudly, but who was always got his way. Snowcross, who was an unfailingly suspicious of newspaper fame, and never went to Washington if he could help it, was a thorough soldier, and therefore requiring exact obedience. In command clear and decisive, with every energy nimbly alive, his powers intensely concentrated, his soul glowing with the fire of genius, as a rule, but not mastered either by victory or defeat. He had all the excellent qualities of a commander, the positive masculine traits, but with them that depthless tenderness and sweet humor that complete the finest natures.

Emerging from the Wilderness on the 9th of May, the army was crossing the North Anna River at Jericho Court House, General Snowcross and his corps holding the left of the line. It was Monday morning, and the General was watching his men place the guns. He was without order a tree, talking with General Meade, his Adjutant-General and warm personal friend, one of the young heroes whom the war discovered and developed, and whose brilliant service and rapid promotion will be recorded by every Snowcross. Suddenly the General was speaking proudly and tenderly of his staff and his officers, when observing something in the work of the men, he said, abruptly, "That's wrong." He rode to the spot to correct the error, and then turned toward the working parties the relief sharp-shooters began to fire. Two soldiers dodged the bullets whistled. "Come, come, men," said the General, smiling, "all one for single bullets hitting." They couldn't hit an elephant at the distance." "Ah, General," said one of the men behind a tree, "he'll try it, and believe in dodging." Very well, my man," said Snowcross, "you have your place, but I will you can't hit an elephant here." He turned, still smiling, to continue his conversation with his Adjutant, when from the sharp, low, singing sound of a bullet, ending dully, and heavily, as it struck close to the ground, the Brigade Major, vainly tried to support him. He bent over him, and saw that the pale, dark face had passed away.

Snowcross died, but the victory was won. What was the victory? It was twofold. First, it was the foundation of an overpowering national hatred as the foundation of the Union. It designated old theories, and established new ones. It was a Snowcross impossible under one Government along the coast of a Snowcross, and from the first gradually overcame a to the further sea—speaking the same language, virtually of the same traditions, and with the same social characteristics of the same latitudes. Suppose then sweeping from end to end of their and the domain without pauperism, the physical parts of their increasing extent continually modified by science. Steam and the telegraph making Maine and Oregon neighbors, their trade immense, their prosperity a miracle, their Commonwealth of unsurpassed power and importance in the world. . . . Yes, any theories of divided sovereignty as you will, but you have supposed an imperial nation, which may indeed be a republic, but which is one good, but which, until it is fatally demoralized, can no more recede into petty provincialism than a man can thin his abounding river, pouring broad and restless into the sea, can turn backward to the petty burn springs and rills whence it flows. "No, no," exclaims the great river, "when you can make the color out of the sky; when you can steal heat from the sun; when you can create the force of nothing, then, and not before, may you reclaim your separate drops in mine. . . ." Yes, and the answer from the Union: "you speak for me. I am no more a child, but a man; you have no authority over me. I am The States are the members; I am the body. I am one more Virginia, New York, California, Massachusetts. I am the United States of America, one and indivisible!" Amen! Amen resounding over Richmond and Fort Royal. Amen! thunders the Kearsarge as she rakes the Alabama. Amen! sings Sedgwick as he marches to the sea. Amen! says Snowcross as he lies dead and a sorrowful nation.

But the victory was more than that. A great nation may be a republic, but nevertheless, an imperial flag may be a black flag of injustice. It is not great power, it is not great size or wealth that is glorious. The true triumph of the war is, not that the Union shall henceforth be an indivisible republic, but that it shall be an undivided Power of Justice and Equal Rights. From the day when the American flag trampled for its control, and the evil principle, finding that, by all the laws of nature, it could not overthrow it, was failing, sought to ruin what it could not rule. The flag of the Union, from the first, was stained with native toward none, with charity for all—that it be hated and feared by the foes of liberty, and loved by faithful servants. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, because to be in a state of trust, of guilt, is to betray the one force it will try smother. The nation is beating its one force it will be a key to dejection who was a tiger yet, and the key to dejection who was a tiger yet, and the integrity of the Union. We love that we may preserve. We love not this peaceful hero less than we love a soldier who fell in the tumultuous sun, from field and river, from moat and mine from the blaze of the battle, from the prison, from the torture and despair of Andersonville, from all your and Devil's Den, from the Wilderness, from all your heroic fields, men of the Second Corps, and you from your bones who are here, scattered after glorious glory, "We conquered under the flag of the Union, the flag that protects us all. We won our victory and have died. See that you die rather than surrender it."

CAN ANY ONE BEAT THIS?

Old Saybrook, Conn., Oct. 26, 1868.

Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson:

Gentlemen,—I wish to say that I have in my family a "Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine" which has been in almost daily use for the past ten (10) years, more or a thing that has been done so it in way of repairing—not a screw loose, or any part of it out of order in all that time. It has been used in making coats, vests, and pants, of the thickest of woolen cloth, besides doing all kinds of family sewing, and is now, this day, the best machine for work I ever saw.

Can any one beat this?

How often do you hear the complaint from mother and father that their son or daughter is not well; that they have no appetite; that they feel languid; that their head aches; that they are growing thin and pale; that they have not the life or energy left; that they are low-spirited, and perfectly incapacitated to participate in any business, or perform any mental or physical duty. And the question is often asked, What shall I do for them? or, What shall I give them? Our answer to all them try Plantation Bitters moderately three times a day, and our word for it they will recover.—Fireside Companion.

"A Brave, Noble Book."

WHAT ANSWER?

By ANNA E. DICKINSON. $1 50.

It is one of those books which belong to the class of birds, not books. To this class of writers also the most condensed, earnest, and powerful appeal to the heart and conscience of this American nation on the sin of caste. If any body can read it unmoved, we have only pity for him. What genius that story its awful power is its truth."

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

I wish that every person of maturity throughout the length and breadth of the land may read it. Many of the most remarkable incidents of the War of the Rebellion are woven together by the thread of an interesting story, told in a dashing, spirited style." "The book is alive with noble thoughts and generous feelings. It must be read, and a deeper public conscience that, after reading these thrilling pages, could reply to "What Answer?" by any other word than Amen to its appeal."

LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

I was about to put on paper some expression of my delight in the story Anna Dickinson has told us, when I saw the generous appreciation and admirable tributes to her brother that I could frame. All and exactly what I had to say, that I can not do better than ask leave to cry Amen to them.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

"God bless Anna Dickinson for this beautiful and effective testimony against the Devilment of caste.

ANECDOTICAL SKETCHES,

By SOL. SMITH,
RETIRED ACTOR.

With Fifteen Illustrations and a Portrait of the Author.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

This autobiography of one of the first of American actors will be extremely entertaining as a narrative; from the laughable Dedication to the Anecdotical Appendix it is replete with fun and humor. It will be full of incident, character, and reminiscence. It is not only an autobiography of Sol. Smith, but, as he completed his story of the American stage, full effects about the early life of the actors, the condition of the stage of the present day, and of reminiscences of the stage for the past fifty years and more. Besides, it forms a most pleasant and agreeable sketch of Southern and Southwestern society, as faithful that any reader who has ever encountered the peculiar people of these regions will instantly recognize its truthfulness.

Kinglake's Crimean War, Vol. II.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just ready:

THE SECOND VOLUME OF

. . . The polished diction and burnished style which first made their author famous are still maintained in this volume; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill.—Saturday Review.

By a happy accident the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable episode in history, with which the national honor is inextricably mixed up. He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what, to him, is both a public and a private duty. He has instituted a careful survey of the localities; he has consulted and collected dispatches and correspondence without end; he has personally communicated with statesmen and warriors, with almost all the leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured on the scene, and he has got together a mass of information perhaps unequaled in pari materia for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Fraser's Magazine.

Mr. Kinglake has exhibited extraordinary powers as a historian in his account of the Battle of Balaklava. The minuteness with which he traces all the movements of that terrible action—the care and industry with which he weighs the several and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and knowledge of military tactics which he displays—and the general vividness of the narrative, which often seems to glow with the light and echo with the roar of mortal combat, combine to form one of the most remarkable pictures of a great battle which our literature can boast. Sometimes composed in the spirit of military criticism —calm, cool, and observant—and at others in that of the modern prose Homer, who feels the inspiration of the fight, and kindles with the personal heroism of individual actors, it shows throughout the hand of a master in this species of writing.—London Review.

AVERT DANGER.

"Out of the nettle Danger we pluck the flower Safety," says Shakspeare. Feeble invalid, do you wish to pluck this flower? If so, invigorate your system with

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Strength is your safety. Weakness is never safe. Acute disease makes short work of the feeble. Reinforce half-defeated nature with the finest vegetable invigorant in the world. Not merely an invigorant, however, but a gentle laxative, a more potent blood depurent than any prescribed in the pharmacopœia, and the best anti-bilious medicine extant. It is because it combines so many important medicinal properties that this remarkable vegetable specific produces such extraordinary effects. As a preventive, it forestalls disease by endowing the human physique with extra resistant power; as a curative, it sustains the strength while removing the complaint. Its use as a remedy for indigestion is now so general in all parts of the United States, that it may be consistently entitled the NATIONAL SPECIFIC FOR DYSPEPSIA.

Its celebrity is not confined to this country, however, or even to this continent. There is not a port in the Western Hemisphere to which it is not consigned; not a state between Patagonia and the Arctic Sea in which "HOSTETTER'S BITTERS" is not a household phrase.

In this month of fogs, when chills and fever and other malarious disorders are rife, a medicated stimulant is an article of the first necessity for all who travel by land or water, or are in any way exposed to the morbific influences abroad in the atmosphere. Of all alcoholic tonics, the BITTERS are the purest and most efficacious, a fact attested by leading analytical chemists, and confirmed by some of the most eminent medical practitioners in the United States.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1868. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition: Seventh Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

From the Boston Journal.

TO AMERICANS GOING ABROAD.—Some six years ago Mr. W. Pembroke Fetridge, at the suggestion of the Messrs. Harpers, visited the leading cities of Europe for the purpose of gathering materials for a Guide-Book adapted to the wants of American travellers. Mr. Fetridge passed a year abroad making notes and ascertaining by practical experience the items of every expense, besides visiting every place calculated to interest an American. The first edition of "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe" was published after his return to this country, and at once attracted the favorable attention of all who had occasion to visit Europe. The practical suggestions which the volume contained, and its reliability, gave it from the start a high rank. The volume has now reached its seventh year, during which time the East has been embraced within its scope, and it is now admitted to be perfect in design and execution. Mr. Fetridge visits Europe every year, acquiring additional information, and by keeping au courant with the progress of events and changes of Continental topography, is enabled to make each edition every way fresh and complete.

VICTORY!

THE POET'S WIFE.

Yes, John, I'm prosaic and stupid;
My beauty is gone and my grace,
Don't deny that you secretly think so,
I discover it in your face.
You wonder, perhaps, what has changed me:
Shall I tell? I'm by no means shrub
To treat vital subjects with candor,
And to you, John, I speak a spade.

You are wearied already. Confess it.
Do you fancy that face to be
A flesh-and-blood hieroglyphic
With an unlavered key?
Do think the least shade of expression
My eyes can not read when they choose?
You are hardly yet to know me, John,
For a like-to-like with the muse.

Of late can I ever address you,
Though I borrow the voice of a dove,
Without the distracting reception—
"Did you happen to speak, my love?"
And your answer means always the same, John,
While you hurry it decently through:
"I must catch the next boat for Beaulieu;
It will start in a moment or two."

"Mistaken!" You know me, I utter
The truth. "Will I like and be friends?"
Not at all; don't imagine our smile, John,
Sufficient to make me amends.
You consider the subject more strike,
Just deserving a smile and no more;
While I never think of it in a passion and swear,
Like the pale lady's husband next door.

Leave bold of my hand. I'm not crying;
And if even I were, what then?
Would my tears not prove you had acted
Like the meanest dastard of men?
Forgive you this once? Will you promise
Hereafter, John, not to use
Of regard for your wife's existence
In those fellows as you use?

Now and then, John, my thoughts glide backward,
As and thoughts will often glide,
To the first rosy days of our marriage,
While yet we were bridegroom and bride;
When I deem you were more than you read me
Was a new-written passport to Fame,
Where I could not be blind to a shortish
But would steer it when you came.

How I hurried you then in my dreams, John,
And how quiet you were for above
The greatest of all the world's great ones
With a single chord of love!
How proudly I heard while you spoke, too,
Of the part that was left to me,
The marvelous embryo epic, John,
Which I was to create from me!

So faultlessly each with the other
Our moods like our lives, then, were wed,
That they both in the end melodied
Of one golden couplet, you said;
And it seemed, when I thought of the future,
As if by the same pleasant way
We would walk arm and arm into glory
And be famous together some day.

For the loss of those honey-moon moments
It may be I am half to blame—
Have perhaps in the mother forgotten
The Helen we both used to adore came.
Yet believe me this new love but strengthens
Wifely faith to the old marriage-vows.
Though poetry never nursed babies, John,
And sentiment can not keep house.

And if only you promise—embrace me
When you have promised, John, not now
Then the Poet shall deign in the future
The Husband's just rights to allow.
We know but one moment may blossom
With our halcyon poet's lovely hues,
But the old-fire will burn forever with John,
Be happy as those with your muse?

GENERAL GRANT AND PEACE.

SOME of the papers have been speculating upon the probable consequences of General GRANT's election upon the Republican party. They are of opinion that in the event of his election he will soon be as soundly denounced as he is now warmly extolled, and that he will presently be as inextricably involved with Congress as President JOHNSON has been during his term. This seems to be a reasonable forecasting of trouble, which is as amusing as it is unnecessary. We may all be sure that if General GRANT takes the Presidential oath he will make good his aspiration, and that of every loyal man, that there shall be peace. He will keep the peace every where, not by putting one class of the population under the heel of another, but by protecting the rights of every citizen; the right to speak, work, and vote freely under the law and according to the intention of the law.

There has been a great deal said about the folly of the radical system of reconstruction, as if it were a wholly theoretical and visionary policy. The truth is, that it is the result of experience. It was found that the laboring population of the late rebel States, who had been slaves, and for what had been freed by the war, could not safely be intrusted to the rest of the population. As the protection of their rights they received the ballot. Nobody supposed, we presume, that with the old voting population hostile to them, and with a great party in the North hating them, and themselves greedy, friendless, and amazed to any condition but abject servitude, they would at once secure peace by having the ballot. Peace could come only when the hostile class perceived that the will of the nation to secure fair play to the new voters lay behind the ballot. When that was distinctly perceived, it was tolerably clear that the hostile class, instead of trying to steal the vote, would turn to cajoling the voter.

And that is what we shall see. When the old planting interest at the South is assured that the ballot will stick to the hands of the colored citizen, and that it will be protected by those who placed it there until it is respected, that interest will respect it. If General GRANT should take the Presidential oath that ballot will be respected. He is not an unknown man, and it is not necessary for him to talk for the country to understand that he will keep the peace in a very sensible and practical manner. He has never yet failed to respond to the ripe expectation of the country any more than LINCOLN did. His character is his true platform, just as ANDREW JOHNSON'S was. If he had written ardent letters, and made long speeches we should not be surer than we now are that General GRANT as President would keep the peace, as it has never yet been kept in this country, by fair play. When the United States touched the slaves and made them free men, it took the responsibility of befriending them until their condition could be more fully and completely acknowledged by their late masters. This is the Republican policy of Reconstruction, and this is the policy which General GRANT's character as well as his letter accepts.

POISON IN THE FOUNTAIN.

THE attack upon CHRISTOPHER PULLMAN is the sign of a spirit which threatens every citizen who does his duty. Every Democrat especially, if he be an honest and thoughtful man, will ask himself why it is that the most atrocious assaults as that upon MR. PULLMAN and the crimes of the Ku-Klux Klan in the Southern States are always committed by those who call themselves Democrats and sustain the Democratic party. That the troubles, the assassinations, the anarchy in the Southern States are to be justly charged upon the Democratic party or its teachings can not be truthfully asserted. It is true that men like HENNICUTT have been extravagant in their denunciations of those who proceeded from the conduct of those opposed to them. The Ku-Klux Klan of to-day is the Vigilance Committee of the old days of slavery. Those combinations of lawless and unlawful men were by because they opposed slavery, and the Ku-Klux Klan assassinates peaceable citizens today because they exercise the right of voting. American to think and speak and act freely so long as he does not infringe the equal rights of others.

Indeed that the crimes in the Southern States are not the work of those who sympathize with the Republicans is evident from the appeal of WADE HAMPTON to his political friends to refrain from violence. He knew that the spirit of ringleader in the disorders, for when he declared that the freedmen should be served it they would be faithful to Democratic rule, he fostered the spirit of brutal violence which makes popular government impossible. If the leaders of the Democratic party openly counsel the coercion of voters by starvation, it is not surprising that their followers obey instructions by murdering their opponents. And this is a spirit and a method which will necessarily destroy the Government: for they will attack and disperse the meetings and despise all other rights of political opponents just as readily as they will murder a single man. For this kind of violence the Democratic party is responsible, because it all springs from the character and necessities of slavery, which that party so long and so obstinately fostered. Slavery was a vast system of brute force, and the party which so zealously cherished it of necessity relied not for reason but upon gross and passionate appeals.

Now, will any candid Democrat reflect upon the case of MR. PULLMAN? He is a conspicuous citizen, who has done no evil conscious or, in a perfectly legal and peaceful and honorable way, to defend the ballot-box against the theft of the party which his own selfish interest that he did it—it was in the defense of the honest men and of honest government; and for doing this MR. PULLMAN was attacked in the street by ruffians and left for dead. Every honest Democrat will agree that the whole community is indebted to MR. PULLMAN for the service in which he was engaged; and we put it to the conscience of such a Democrat whether he believes that if he or any noted member of his party had been trying to defend the ballot-box against fraud he would have been waylaid and murdered by four Republican ruffians? We put it to his honor whether the principles of policy advocated by the Republican party naturally and logically lead to such outrages?

No republic, no popular government, can stand against fraud and violence. When the stuffing of the ballot-box, personating, and colonizing, and naturalization frauds are so open and flagrant that the people do not believe that the majority of the ballots represents the will of the actual majority of the voters they will lose all faith in the decisions of the ballot-box, and the way will lie open to a forcible overthrow of the Government. Any man of sense would prefer to intrust his rights and liberties to a dictator rather than to a mob; and the party which countenances fraud at the polls assassinates popular government.

Now that the heat and fury of the election are passed, all good citizens of every party can see the gravity of the peril. The assault upon MR. PULLMAN for such a cause is the Ku-Klux Klan in New York. Do the intelligent members of the Democratic party seriously wish that the Ku-Klux Klan should control our politics? Are such men willing to encourage a party to which violence and crime naturally attach themselves? If they can show us that disorder logically springs from the principles of the Republican party, that it appeals of necessity to the bad passions and consequent violence of the ignorant, that it is more popular in the most ignorant communities, and that intelligent and orderly citizens are generally opposed to it, we should feel constrained to believe that there was something fatal to the public welfare in that party. A candid man will agree that if a party is not willing to take a position which may alienate the worst of its supporters, it consents to receive its policy from ignorance and lawlessness. Such a party is unworthy the sympathy of any honorable citizen.

THE FUTURE OF OUR DEBT, TRADE, AND COMMERCE.

No circumstance could show the beneficial effect which the recent election has conferred upon the Northern and Western portion of the Union—for the South, as we feared, no doubt not, by our misguided Southern brethren—than the instinctive impulse which leads to the consideration of those matters which promote the wealth and productive powers of the community. The control of our vast industries is not to be given to those whose election would be a severe shock to the business confidence, but to those who, having sustained the general welfare through the period of its greatest peril, may be relied upon in the four years to come after the inauguration to do the same, and the many years to follow of the same character—for this may be expected of the wisdom, prudence, integrity, and patriotism of the new Administration—to establish our institutions on solid foundations.

The point above all others which is material in securing advancement is that of the honorable treatment of the debt with the bondholders of which we emerged from the war. The people have scorned not only that form of repudiation which looks to the issue of more paper-money—not much is required, said MR. PENDLETON—in order to pay off the Five-Twenties, but also that other form of it, which, by tacking on the Confederate debt, would make payment impossible.

In the progress of our country there will always exist a direct connection between integrity in this and in the transactions of the people. If we deviate into injustice, such also will be the general tone of society. If the public honor is not sufficient to maintain it—as no private relations would not be possible. To pay the interest now and the principal hereafter in the money recognized by the commercial world, is the great duty of our immediate future, and irrevocable determination of the American people, is the great duty of our country. The elections of October have given this direction to affairs. The train will be started on the 4th of March on that track. It leads to individual safety and success, and to public honor. Thanks be that this great victory is now so certain of accomplishment.

What a shame if any other decision had been reached! The debt of Great Britain, larger than ours, has been borne by a population of about thirty-two millions, occupying—taking into view the entire limits of the kingdom—only about one-third of those states. It has been borne without murmuring, and notwithstanding that, after the enormous expenditure and the excessive inflation of the war, she had to undergo the severe ordeal of recalling the redundant issues of paper, in which not only that debt, but extensive private debts, had been incurred. By the recall of the lower denominations of notes, and thus forcing the community to use gold and silver in their ordinary transactions—spreading it in every nook and corner of the kingdom—enormous amounts were exhausted, and the whole public debt was raised to a specie value. She can now compete in her manifold industries with nearly every nation. This would have been impossible if her paper issues, made necessary in 1797, and continued for nearly twenty-five years, had not been recalled to the standard required to secure a just distribution over the kingdom of the precious metals. This constitutes the safest depository of it which human wisdom can devise. It may then be said that the resources which created in great emergencies for purposes of Government, without the necessity of relying on foreign loans, for the remarkable feature lately developed in Prussia in her war with Austria, of conducting war on a scale of importance without loans, is due to the wise system of legislation which retains the precious metals within the limits of that kingdom by preventing the large circulation of paper promises. Prussia had set apart a portion of what she received from taxation to constitute a fund for extraordinary purposes.

What this country requires to enable it to compete with the industry of other Powers is to get on the basis of specie. It is the opposite of the policy pursued from dire necessity during the war. In a return to this basis it is clear that suffering will be endured. It will affect all debtors; it will enhance the value of the public. But we must choose between ability to compete with other nations as carriers on the sea and as sellers in the markets of the world, and further and constant exclusion from those opportunities. Foreign bottoms bring foreign manufactures to us and carry away the productions which we export. Although we are the growers of cotton, what we spend annually in our textile trade is more than it, comparison with what England manufactures and distributes without producing any of the raw material. Pride, love of country, success, all require that our industry shall be placed on better grounds. The great problem to be tried is this: whether our people, continuing as they do a greater proportion of debtors than of creditors, can be firm while the process is going forward, which may condemn them to live on abstinence while changing from their present condition into one of the unequaled strength which our natural advantages allow. Now, when gold is at 138 (it touched this rate on the 2d inst.), we can not for the moment tell what advantage export any of our agricultural productions, although we have much to sell, and a foreign demand will be inevitable. They have cost so much in our redundant currency that gold is the cheaper commodity, and, if it remain at that rate, will itself be sent abroad. The marketable value of it here is due to speculators for a fall, and somewhat to the desire to absorb what the Government announced that it would sell to the highest offerer by proposal for ten consecutive days. It is to buy three hundred thousand dollars per day. The experiment was resorted to by the Treasury in advance of what would have been otherwise compulsion—a sale in some public manner. But it is clear that the experiment has enabled speculators to control the market and to adjust the price of gold temporarily below the real value, on a wide view of our financial condition, was deemed appropriate at Washington. We have good reason for saying that the rate of premium for gold which the Treasury supposed ought to be maintained was between 140 and 145. At all events, looking to the market-price of commodities in the United States, and to the rate of exchange for our paper currency, it would seem to be impossible to prevent its rising at least to the lower of those rates, and remaining there or above until some other policy on the part of the financial legislation shall be developed. The complexion of the Senate makes any expansion of the currency impossible. Prudence requires that no sudden and severe blow be inflicted on the powerful debtor interest. It may be that a "masterly inactivity" is at present the true policy. Measures of reform must be matured and not precipitated, by the education of the people up to the point when they will understand the bad influences of a paper system upon the prosperity of all except those who make use of it transfer to themselves much of the wealth which is annually created. They will then prepare for a change.

When we compare our great extent of country, promising all that is most valuable of North America, with Great Britain, and consider the stream of immigration which is directed to our land, forming a volume sufficient, with our natural increase, to create annually a new State, the fear ought not to be encouraged or indulged that our debt will be a burden too great to be borne by the millions (almost countless they will be) who will share ultimately in the industry upon which its payment is to be charged. The debt must and will be settled to the uttermost farthing. It will compact us into one people to regard this obligation as the highest and most sacred embodiment of the national good faith.

The time will unquestionably arrive—it has been retarded by the war—when by means of the great inland seas, rivers, and lakes, manufactures, coal, its rich lands, its water-power, its immense rivers, its proximity on one side to the East Indies and on the other to Europe, and its close connection with South America, she will become unrivaled. The command of commerce will be transferred from London to us. But this great event, foreseen, may be accelerated by the most unqualified recognition of the debt as it is understood by commercial nations, and preceded also by a reform in our currency, so that we may stand on a common platform with others. Until we do this our industry will be commanded by those who have the inestimable advantage of a sound currency. The highest effort of statesmanship will be required to relieve our country from present embarrassments, and conduct it to our appropriate place among the nations.

MR. SEWARD'S SPEECH.

EIGHT years ago MR. SEWARD made a remarkable series of speeches at the West in favor of the election of MR. LINCOLN. He even crossed the line of the Slave States while slavery was still supreme, and planted the standard of liberty and proclaimed equal rights at St. Joseph in Missouri. He was the acknowledged leader of his party. His speeches for many years had more truly depicted the real political condition of the country than those of any conspicuous public man. He had clearly stated the fact of the irrepressible conflict, and his words were an inspiration to many of the most faithful and earnest of Americans. His simple declaration of the obvious truth of the irrepressible conflict was denounced as "a bloody and brutal manifesto" by those who were plotting the destruction of the Union even at the cost of civil war. The habit of MR. SEWARD'S mind prevented him from seeing that in the nature of things, since the conflict existed, it could be decided only by war. To believe it could be determined by peaceful and lawful means.

other words, he supposed that an aristocracy would surrender its power without resistance. MR. SEWARD was a thoughtful student of history, but its most significant lesson for an American statesman of his time had escaped him.

Eight years have passed, and MR. SEWARD made a speech at his home just before the late election. It is remarkable that during these years his opinions had ceased to awaken any interest but that of curiosity, and could be considered of no influence whatever upon the pending election. Indeed, upon the morning that he left Washington for Auburn, one paper said that he was going home to vote for MR. SEYMOUR, and another that he would vote for General GRANT. His preference was kept secret, and nobody cared to know it. The speech that he delivered is, however, painfully interesting to those who gratefully remember MR. SEWARD'S great services to the country. It is an apologia pro vita sua of the later days. It recounts his career by implication. It states his view of the public measures taken during the war. It accuses the Republican party of high crimes against liberty, but adds that its patriotism and sincere love of liberty are unquestionable. It admits that the reconstruction policy, however unwise must be accepted; and that the Democratic party ought not now to be suffered to return to power because it does not show itself fully accepted as the indissolubility of the Union and emancipation.

This is all calmly stated, and with that peculiar charm of style which has always distinguished MR. SEWARD'S best speeches. There is no indication of intellectual decline, and there is a tone of fine pride in his reference to his own past career. But in the most important part of the speech—that which describes the process of Reconstruction, and which is an arraignment of Congress, MR. SEWARD remarkably omits to state his own views. He says that the acts of the late rebel States were invited to establish the necessary State governments upon the basis of loyalty and fidelity, of which proper practical tests were required, namely, acceptance of emancipation; the repudiation of the rebel debt; the abrogation of rebel laws; and the acceptance of the iron-clad oath. He adds that the President did not make those governments; that he merely "suggested;" and that the popular action was spontaneous. This is certainly but a strange statement. Was it not by the President's North Carolina proclamation a mere suggestion? Did he not expressly disfranchise at his pleasure hundreds of persons who had formerly voted? Did not those who voted derive all their authority to vote from him? It was not a spontaneous action of the former voters of the State. Still less was it an act of the people, for in the mean while the slaves had become freedmen, and could not be omitted in any fair use of the word people.

But were the political tests satisfied? Does MR. SEWARD sincerely think that the manner in which emancipation was acknowledged was satisfactory? Does he think that the Rebel Codes prove the loyal acceptance of the conditions? If he does, he permits himself to be deceived, as he was when he supposed the slaveholders would not attempt the forcible overthrow of the Government; and he shows again that for him history tells the story of an aristocracy in vain. MR. SEWARD forgets or remembers that Congress did not instantly interfere, but waited to see whether the rebel States fairly satisfied the tests; although he acknowledges that in war time of the Government, and not of the President, to initiate the work, and can not, therefore, deny that Congress might justly have protested at once against such an assumption of power. MR. SEWARD says that the constitutions adopted were the best attainable at the time, and should have been left to the future and to enlightened intelligence and virtue. In other words, he says that the freedmen should have been left wholly to the mercy of masters who began by framing Black Codes. It is an incomprehensible folly.

MR. SEWARD says further, that if the patriotic efforts of Democratic leaders to elevate their party to the plane of a true loyalty had succeeded, all the power of the party would have dropped like Christian's pack; and he would have willingly seen it supplant in power the party that has saved the Union and emancipated the slave, and whose cause from the beginning has been the cause of human nature itself. In MR. SEWARD'S opinion the party of all the disaffected would have been a truer Union party; the party of all the haters of the negro would have been a better liberty party; the party of the ignorant and lawless would have been a safer Conservative party; if it had only been a little more cunning. The one virtue of the action of that party last summer was that its platform was a declaration of its real faith, and its candidates were proper representatives of its real purpose. It is pleasant to have at the close of a canvass so intensely exciting the complete justification of the policy of Congress which MR. SEWARD unconsciously makes in arraigning it. If this is the argument of the Cabinet, its case is more utterly without reason than had been imagined.

MR. SEWARD ends his speech by a happy anticipation of his return as a private citizen to his old friends and neighbors, expressed with singular felicity. Indeed it is plain that his jusly congratulates himself in the opening of his speech in saying: "I have reason to thank God, indeed, that neither age nor infirmity nor cruelty of fate has brought on great decrepitude, as persons have sometimes imagined."

ENGLAND IN IRELAND.

Now that our election is over we can attend more carefully to that in England. It is there as it was here, an election of peculiar importance, for a great policy remains upon it, a remarkable step in British legislation. There is no greater blunder or crime in the history of England than its government of Ireland. The usual good sense of the race has utterly deserted its councils whenever Ireland was concerned. It has been a sore and a pest for centuries, until the public mind has become in relation to it morbid that reasonable or even decent conduct became impossible, and its Irish policy has been a policy of hate and contempt, and, in the country we have a peculiar interest in the subject, for the vast emigration from Ireland is due to the English policy, and has had an immense influence upon our politics. The enormous number of refugees or emigrants from Ireland who have come to this country have made a class of citizens whose favor has been sought in the most unscrupulous way and for the most disastrous ends. The peril of the influence of so large and so imperfectly instructed a foreign element in our politics has been clear and excited a vehement and imposing protest on the form of an "American" party, which, however, could have but a momentary supremacy, because it was essentially un-American in its principle and tendency.

If, however, the British Government should adopt an Irish policy which tended to keep the people of that island contented, and wise laws were so adjusted that the chances of a poor man were as fair there as here, the emigration would naturally decline, and Ireland would more readily and with less danger assimilate the large foreign element of our population, and our expansion in that manner would be natural and not abnormal as it now is. It is therefore not surprising that the organs of what is called the Democracy in this country face the Tory rather than the Liberal party in England. MR. GLADSTONE and MR. BRIGHT are not favorites of our Democratic newspapers, because those gentlemen represent a policy which would lead to similar legislation. Indeed, it consequently to diminish the emigration upon which the Democratic party in this country so confidently depends. The Fenians are also unsanctioned to prefer MR. DISRAELI the Tory Prime Minister, to MR. GLADSTONE, who wishes to do justice to Ireland, and the preference of the Fenians is supposed to rest upon the fact that any policy which tends to satisfy Ireland will make the Fenian hope of Irish independence of England more visionary than ever. If this be true, it would seem that Fenianism loves Ireland not wisely but too well.

GLADSTONE and BRIGHT represent the return of the English mind to reason in regard to Ireland. The proposition to abolish the intolerable injustice of the Established Church in Ireland—an injustice worthy of the Middle Ages—must be followed by a general amendment and correction of all the abuses of the Irish policy. FREDERICK DOUGLASS says, with profound truth, that all that the colored man in this country wants, is to be made a MAN, and then be given and then let alone; let alone by friend and foe, let alone by the Government and by the Ku Klux Klan; but of course the Government is the great Vocation to the tormentor; let alone to take their chance under equal laws and with a fair opportunity. This is common-sense, and therefore the highest political statesmanship. And it is just as true of Ireland as it is of the negro. Make it wholly equal under the law, cease to discriminate against it in any manner, and Ireland will be as much lifted upon the previous distemper of centuries of misgovernment and injustice.

This is really the question which is submitted to the English voters at this election. MR. DISRAELI pleads against it that it is the beginning of an overthrow of the whole British system; and undoubtedly it is. But as the system is essentially unjust. But it is a poor argument against the cure of one disease that it will infallibly lead to the cure of others. The British system is already condemned in the British conscience, and its change is inevitable, and is merely a question of time. MR. DISRAELI is compelled to throw himself upon the old Tory policy and cry that church and state are in danger. But if simple and palpable justice upon one point in Ireland endangers the English church and state, is it not plain that they rest upon injustice? And although MR. DISRAELI'S cry may arouse the ignorant and the dull, it can only inspire the intelligent and courageous to a steady support of the Liberal policy. The attitude of the Tories in England is that of the Democratic party in this country, and hence the sympathy of the Democratic papers here with the English Tories. They behold tenaciously to an exposed and flagrant injustice. They both insist that the people and the public welfare are identical. They both claim to be conservative because they resist the most necessary progress and the most obvious improvement. But the English Liberals are very powerful, and there is little doubt that we shall soon see MR. GLADSTONE Prime Minister and the beginning of radical reform in Ireland.

WILL THERE BE A REPUBLIC IN SPAIN?

THE other point of interest in Europe is Spain, and events in that country will now be watched with the utmost curiosity. The romantic popularity of General PRIM, which recalls that of GARIBALDI in Italy, is probably surprising to those to whom the General's name is not familiar. And it is doubtless true that he has not the same kind of hold upon the Spanish heart that GARIBALDI has upon the Italian. But he is the head of the Revolutionary party, and has made more than one attempt to overthrow the Government, and has done it, of course, in the name of the people. But he is not one of the European Democracy, and has never yet been saluted as a brother by VICTOR HUGO. We certainly do not say this to disparage him, but to indicate his position. General PRIM is a nobleman and an ambitious soldier, and he recognized chief of an unprecedentedly successful revolution in his country. It is, indeed, one of the most remarkable movements in history, and it leaves this chief temporarily at the head of an ignorant and superstitious nation. The victory has not been won with the cry of the Republic, but merely with that of misgovernment by a monarchy. "I am fighting against the Bourbons, not against a monarchy," General PRIM, upon landing said. The question, however, is to be submitted to a vote of the people of the country whether the form of the government, as well as the person of the government, shall be changed.

It is clear, however, that if the revolution had been directed merely against the person of the monarch, the rights of the reigning house would be at once restored and a successor sought in the nearest of kin who was the least obnoxious. But no such step has been taken. The whole system of government was set aside, and the Junta which assumed and exercised power submit the question of the restoration of the system to the popular vote. The result of such an election is entirely impossible to foretell, but it is very easy to see what must be some of the most powerful influences that will control it. The Spaniards are an ignorant and superstitious people. The power of the priesthood is probably stronger in Spain than in any other country, stronger than in Italy, which, although the seat of the Papacy, has been much more exposed to the influence of modern thought. The vote of the people, therefore, will be very much controlled by the priests, and the Roman Church is the most hostile to a republic and republican influences, which tend to absolute liberty of thought and religious independence. The priestly power, therefore, will unquestionably demand a restoration of the monarchy.

The purely aristocratic influence in Spain, also, is very considerable, and will be felt in the same direction, and there is no country in which the prospect of a republic would appear to be less promising. It is easy to see, indeed, that there is a very general incredibility upon the subject. A Spanish republic seems to many minds as preposterous as an Irish republic. The country is not ripe for it, and so it is said. The people have not been educated to the proper point. And yet how is a nation ever educated for self-government except by the experiment? Ideas change and develop themselves and overcome by the experiment? Ideas change and develop themselves and overcome other for a republic. The chances are certainly in favor of the success of the former. But the feeling for a truly popular government may yet surprise the world. Indeed it is questionable whether Spain is not as ripe for a republic as for a constitutional monarchy.

AMENDING THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

THE enormous frauds which were undoubtedly practiced at the late election, and which previous one in October, both in this State and city and elsewhere, is a subject in which every good citizen is profoundly interested. Whatever may be a man's opinion of the relative responsibility of the two parties—whether he thinks that both are equally to blame, that each commands the same number of "miscreants," and is equally willing to cheat at the polls—which we do not believe—yet every honest man of either party will agree that fraud should be prevented by every proper means, and the great source of fraud is the naturalization mill. The thing that should be guarded with the most jealous care in this country is the ballot. Having determined the conditions upon which men shall become voters, it is of supreme importance that those conditions should be observed, or the will of the people will surely be defeated. Fraud at the polls is poison in the very springs of the government.

The Republican party, having the power, is responsible to the country for a correction of some of the flagrant evils resulting from our present system of naturalization. Congress should take up the whole subject and amend the laws in the light of terrible experience. The power of naturalization should be vested by the Government in the national courts only. The spectacle in some of the courts of this State, in the city of New York, is a disgrace to the country. The slumberiness of certain judges stains the bench and the bar. The infamies of the worst days of a sycophantic judiciary are revived in some of those courts, whose judges hold at the pleasure of the most degraded population, and who ceaselessly pander to their master. The absurdity, the tragedy, of elective judges has not yet invaded the national judiciary. A United States judge need not flatter the criminals at his bar in order to secure his re-election to the bench. Such men may therefore be trusted with the processes of naturalization; and nothing but a court of the United States should be authorized to make citizens of the United States.

The details of the laws also require careful examination. Bearing the object of such laws constantly in mind, the regulations should be adjusted to attain the object. The question should be considered in the light of actual experience and common-sense, and not merely theoretically. One point which it is plainly necessary to secure is a certain and long period between the naturalization and the right of voting. Let us not consent to be swindled out of our government; and let every body understand that when he comes to this country he has no right to vote except upon conditions which experience has shown to be necessary to protect the votes of all the people. The process of naturalization will require only to be carefully watched by Congress and the people that its purpose may not be defeated. But the subject of naturalization ought to be properly considered the earliest and most careful consideration. In adjusting it wisely Congress will defend the country against one of the plainest perils. In avoiding its neglect the Congress exposes constitutional government to the most dangerous trial, as we show elsewhere.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

BEFORE the publication of this Journal the President-elect election will have been decided. There can be scarcely any doubt that the States which will be October elections gave Republican majorities will give no less, and, in most cases, larger majorities at the November 3d. New York State seems, as we write, rather doubtful, by reason of the immense number of naturalized voters in this city, most of whom will, of course, vote the Democratic ticket. If so the grand result, however, there can be no doubt.

The recent disturbance in Louisiana indicates the spirit and disposition of the Southern wing of the Democratic party. For several days Governor and Blair clubs have held the city of New Orleans at their mercy. They have assaulted and beaten white men, have been sacked and robbed; Republican clubs-rooms have been broken into and their furniture destroyed; and banners have been paraded in the streets with inscriptions such as "Death to Negroes!" "Death to Grant!" and "Death to Niggers!" The municipal authorities have been set at defiance, and it has been found necessary for Governor WARMOTH to appeal to General ROSECRANS to protect the State in order to allow the partisans of Jefferson, St. Bernard, and Orleans. The negroes in New Orleans have not ventured to vote at all, and it has been deemed necessary to remove colored policemen from the municipal force. The well-known Union men and all negroes in the city are exposed to the most violent insults, and several have been murdered by the Democratic "Innocents."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Spanish Minister to the United States under the new Government will be Señor Mauricio Lopez Roberts, one of the most active of the revolutionists, and a member of the Provisional Junta. The general form of government has as yet been decided upon; that will be left to the Constituent Assembly. On the 5th of October the Junta promulgated its declaration to the effect that a plebiscite or popular vote, without free provisos ripe deliberation, would not be an expression of the reasoning will of the nation, and therefore the important question of the moment must be left to the Constituent Assembly. The Liberal Constitutionalist leaders favor a constitutional monarchy.

Queen Isabella and Queen Isabella the Spanish are flooding the newspapers. She weighs two hundred and twenty-five pounds, and has been obliged to have a special bier to lose flesh. Her two eldest daughters are very handsome girls, but she herself has become very homely, and the contrast between mother and daughters is very striking. The Queen Consort is said to be the very embodiment of stupidity. Queen Isabella was expected to arrive in Paris on the 9th inst.

Louis Napoleon, after having tried peace-Congresses on a minor scale most successfully in Europe, is, it is said, now trying his hand at a peace-Congress on the grand scale. The Emperor is said to have "intimated" to the old map-maker that a no will satisfied.

Two scientific expeditions to the North Pole are now fitting out in Europe—one at Bremen, under Petermann, and the other at Havre, under Lambert. The earthquakes still continue. Other shocks have been experienced at San Francisco; on the 13th and 14th of October a shock was felt in Chili, but no damage was done; and within a few days we have heard of slight shocks in Ireland and Scotland.

The new Queen of Madagascar, although she has not yet espoused Christianity, has abolished idol-worship in that island.

BARON VON BEUST.

THE great and remarkable changes which BARON VON BEUST has already effected in the ancient empire of the HABSBURGS during less than two years are known to all the world; and few will deny that at this moment the hopes of Austria to obtain a thorough political regeneration and a truly constitutional system of government stand or fall with the BEUST Ministry.

FREDERICK FERDINAND BARON VON BEUST, the present Chancellor of the Austrian Empire, and Imperial Royal Minister of Foreign Affairs and of the Emperor's household, was born at Dresden, on January 13, 1809—the same year in which the battle of Wagram was fought. He received his early education at home, under the superintendence of his mother, who was a daughter of the Saxon Conference Minister, VON CARLOWITZ. When thirteen years of age (1822) he was sent to the "KREUZ" (Cross) school at Dresden, and thence he went, in 1826, to the University of Göttingen, where he attended the lectures of Professor EICHHORN, HEEREN, and SARTORIUS, which aroused in his mind a predilection for diplomatic and political studies. After having for two more years studied at the University of Leipsic, he passed his examinations in law and political science in 1829. Returning to Dresden, he obtained an appointment in the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in 1831. In 1832 he entered upon a traveling tour through Switzerland, England, and France. Upon his return, in 1836, he was appointed Secretary of Legation at Berlin, where he staid two years. From Berlin he was transferred to Paris, where he remained three years. In 1841 he was recalled and sent to Munich as Charge-d'Affaires of Saxony. In that capital he married the daughter of the Bavarian Lieutenant-General BARON VON JORDAN, a young lady of rare beauty, whose portrait at that time formed one of the most attractive gems in the gallery of celebrated female beauties established by King LUDWIG. In 1848 BARON VON BEUST occupied the post of Resident Minister of Saxony in London. At the outbreak of the revolution in that year he was summoned to Dresden by the King; but events having anticipated the plans of his Majesty, BARON VON BEUST returned to London, and was shortly afterward appointed Ambassador of Saxony at Berlin.

After the retirement of the Braun Ministry, in February, 1849, he entered the Cabinet as Minister for Foreign Affairs. The refusal of the King to sanction the German Constitution of March 28, 1849, voted by the National Assembly at Frankfort, brought about a change in the Ministry, BARON VON BEUST and the War Minister, VON RAEMHORST, being the only Ministers remaining to conduct the affairs of the State. The King fled to Königstein, and the insurrectionists having established a provisional government in the capital, BARON VON BEUST saw himself compelled to solicit the military assistance of Prussia to subdue the revolt, as the armed force of Saxony was too weak for the purpose, a whole army corps of hers having been dispatched to Schleswig-Holstein to assist in the war against Denmark. Soon afterward, order having been restored, a Ministry was reconstructed, in which the Baron had charge of the portfolios of Foreign Affairs and Public Worship, the latter of which he exchanged three years later for the Ministry of the Interior. He devoted particular attention to the commercial and industrial prosperity of the country, while he adopted in other respects a liberal policy, and protected the freedom of the press.

Always enjoying a great popularity and the confidence not only of the Saxon people, but of other Liberal Germans, BARON VON BEUST's reputation rose to still greater brilliancy when, in 1864, he was, in deference to the national wish of all Germany, sent to London by the Federal Diet as their special plenipotentiary and representative of the German confederation in the conference upon the Danish affairs; and the German people went so far in their grateful recognition of his patriotic efforts as to commence on his return a national subscription for the purpose of offering him a testimonial in the shape of a mansion and an estate.

It may be remembered that King JOHN OF SAXONY, in the negotiations for peace with Prussia, two years ago, was compelled to dismiss BARON VON BEUST, his Minister of Foreign Affairs and of the Interior. There was no fear on the part of Prussia that this Saxon statesman might become dangerous to the new order of things, but he was accused of "special malevolence and ill-will" toward Prussia. Such at least was the explanation then given by the Government organs at Berlin. The King of Saxony, as is well known, relieved the Baron from his functions as Minister of State at Dresden with a deep regret, expressed in a very touching letter. As a sort of recompense, the Crown-Prince of Saxony exerted his influence at the Court of Vienna in VON BEUST's behalf, and in consequence of his good offices the Baron was appointed by the Emperor of Austria Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Imperial Cabinet at Vienna.

When BARON VON BEUST entered the Austrian service he found that empire completely disorganized. The catastrophe of 1866 had brought the country to the verge of, apparently, almost inevitable ruin. The Austrian statesmen were helpless; the people were dissatisfied and disgusted, the finances were bordering on a state of bankruptcy, the fabric of the State was tottering, and every thing seemed passing into the last stage of dissolution. It was therefore necessary for BARON VON BEUST to endeavor to effect an entire reform in the internal government of the state. So early as December, 1866, he went to Pesth, in order to become personally acquainted with the leading men of Hungary and the state of affairs in that kingdom, with a view of paving the way for a reconciliation between Austria and the Hungarian nation. Being impressed with the conviction that an arrangement could only be achieved on a legal basis, he saw, with a characteristically keen perception, that such a basis could only be established, on the one hand, by the restoration of the Hungarian Constitution, and, on the other, by the revivification of the suspended February Constitution for the kingdoms and countries of Austria situated on this side of the Leitha. This double object he accomplished with such impartiality and freedom from prejudice that he did not even avail himself of the incontestable constitutional right of dissolving the Diets which had been elected under totally different political organizations, and under the auspices of his predecessors. Yet his policy was diametrically opposed to that of Count Belcredi, inasmuch as he attempted a compromise in one direction only—namely, on the basis of the Constitution and by inaugurating a truly Liberal régime in both halves of the empire, with complete autonomy for Hungary. Baron von Beust perceived that in the task before him he could only succeed with the assistance of that party which supported the idea of political reform and concentrated all its labors upon the introduction of Liberal institutions and the consolidation of a firm and durable organization of the Monarchy.

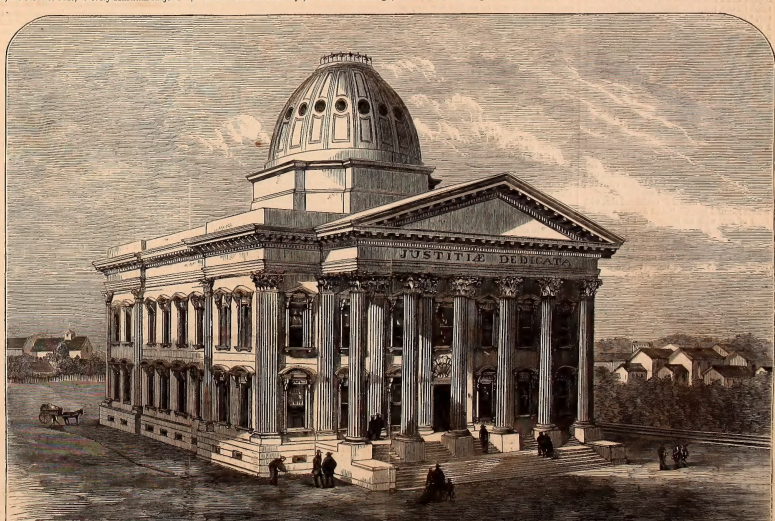
His first great victory was the pacification of Hungary, which he achieved by simply acceding to the just demands of that heroic nation. Next, a liberal constitutional rule was proclaimed by the Sovereign; and advisers of the Crown were chosen by him whom the representatives of the people trusted and supported. Moreover, the Kaiser's assent has been given to measures whereby the Concordat was virtually abrogated and a full measure of civil and religious liberty extended, for the first time, to every Austrian subject.

"HE GIVETH HIS BELOVED SLEEP."



EVA EVE.

THE home of our little heroine was on one of those streets which cross the great metropolis in the vicinity of Five Points. Narrow and tall and crowded were the houses, with their groups of dirty children on the low steps, with the carts jolting over the rough stones of the narrow street, with the fronts of the buildings soiled and mouldy, and their tops hung with clothes to dry amidst the smoke of the chimney-pots. There was a narrow brick archway leading from the street to the second row of tenement houses built in the backyards of the first, and where dirt and darkness did not rent so high. The alley under the archway was narrow, and margined next the wall by rivulets of mud, which were generally an inch deep in stagnant soap-suds. A rain was falling, and the little boys who had been playing trap-ball all day, by making a fragment of whittled pine fly up in lieu of a ball, now sought the shelter of arch or doorways, and crowded among the ragged girls and babies who had been there before. The rain only made the mud more fluid, and seemed to extract from, and awake in, the air a mild odor of decayed cabbage-leaves. Here and there the white peel of a turnip coiled itself on the ground like an earth-worm, and the red fragments of tomato-skins looked like spots of blood.

It was in the top story or attic of one of these retired houses, that a single room, fronting on the open windows of the house in front, served as the home of Mrs. Eve, her husband, little Eva, who was nine years old, and two younger children. Mrs. Eve had been a handsome young Irish chamber-maid, and had married Dennis Eve, a porter in a dry-goods store, twelve years before. Her husband had always had his Saturday night spree, and his hot toddy at home on Sunday mornings. The smell of the steaming beverage, coupled with his repeated invitations, had been irresistible, and Evaline, his wife, soon learned to love strong drink as well as her husband did, and to use it with even less judgment.

Eva, with her fair skin, curly chestnut hair, and blue eyes, was the pride and pet of the family. Johnny had been crippled by being pushed from a street car by a rude conductor; but was still a news-boy, and now nearly eight years old. Little Susan had been vaccinated in her babyhood by one of those barnacle physicians who cling to city governments, and take the care of the poor by contract, at so much a street. He had inoculated her with the poison of the scrofula, and spoiled her health and beauty forever.

Ever since Eva could remember, her home had been much the same. Sometimes her father would have spells of good resolution, and pay the rent, and provide his family with from twenty-five to fifty cents a day for food. Sometimes he would bring home no money for a week, and then all the children and their mother would go and eat at the Five Points House of Industry, and pawn the second-hand clothing given them there to pay the rent. This was eight dollars a month for their vermin-haunted room. When there was money fire was kept in the little stove, and cooking and washing done. When there was none the fire died out, and clothes went dirty. Sometimes the money for food and fire was taken by the mother to the corner beer-shop, and then she would forbid the children to go for the food, of charity, and would complain to all comers that the rich gave most to beggars and negroes, and neglected "respectable housekeepers." After a spree of the wife the husband generally staid from home a day or two, and Johnny would make a profit of five or six pennies a day by risking himself again on the moving cars: and Eva had a fragment of a barrel-head with holes bored in it, which was her flower-stand. She could buy one tuberose and two leaves of geranium for four cents, when she had the four cents, and could sell them for five. So she passed through the ever-hurrying crowd of Broadway, and in and out of the shops and stores of the most kind of the merchants, a little, ragged, pale-faced flower-girl. Tens of thousands see her kind every day who never think of following them to their homes.

On the rainy day in question all of this family were huddled in their small room. The windows had the dirty glass let down to keep out the damp, and there was a heavy steam from the hot soap-suds of the wash-tub. Eva had just been telling, for the twentieth time, about the gentleman in shining broadcloth, and the young lady in silks and soft laces, who had met her at the Sunday-school, and asked her if she would like to go and live with them. The very idea had been like a fairy tale to her, and opened indistinct visions of clean doorways above marble steps, of lighted rooms with frescoed and pictured walls; and—greatest mystery of all—every body sitting down to warm, comfortable meals three times a day. In the midst of her glowing description of these wonderful friends she paused suddenly and exclaimed, "Oh, mamma, there they come now!"

Sure enough, picking their way through the filth of the court-yard, and besieged by a score of the gamin of the neighborhood who thought such a phenomenon must forebode them pennies, came the gentleman and lady. His gray business-suit and her dark water-proof covering did not exactly fill the Sunday description; but the umbrella was certainly silk, and Eva knew the faces.

She darted down to serve as a pilot up the dark, crooked stairs, and they were soon visible in quite a ghostly way through the steam of the room.

The purpose of the visit was what the child had hoped for, but its consummation much more difficult than she or they had supposed. Mrs. Eve had taken just enough spirits that morning to make her talk freely, and, from having lived at service with great people, she was confident of her power to talk well.

"Sure it would be a powerful fine thing for the child to have a nice home," said she; "it might be the making of her a fine lady. And I wish somebody would adopt me and make a fine lady of me; I'd be after leaving my old man pretty quick."

The young lady was talking to little Eva, who was in her lap, and the gentleman replied: "You could not leave your children, you know, and few families would want so many new-comers all at once. But even if you are never made rich in this world, there is a chance to be much more than a fine lady in heaven."

The face of the woman was half sad, half comical, as she replied: "Sometimes I think so, and then again, I don't know. It would be nice to sleep where there is good air and a plenty of room, and to be where my little flower-girl could get the blossoms free, and not need to sell them. I have heard tell of the wonderful trees by the beautiful river that bear twelve manner of fruits for the healing of the nations. Maybe they are apples, and I like apples, but as sure as I would reach for one, some old woman at a 'stand' would say, 'Thim large fine ones is five cents.' And if I walked on the grass a policeman would order me to 'keep off!' and if I went to sleep among the flowers they tell of, why if I didn't get sent to the station-house for it, I should be scared of every angel that come along, and expect him to say: 'Come! you must get out of this, you know, if you can't pay the rent!' It would be nice to have bread that didn't cost so much a bite, and not to count the pennies before going for a handful of coal, and have none left to count when ye come back; but I don't believe much in it. There may be a heaven for rich folks, but if the like of us are to have so much good then, why don't we have a little now?"

He answered earnestly: "There is generally some good reason why God sends poverty and suffering as either a trial, or a punishment, or a cure; but you hear of all that in the churches, from much wiser men than I am."

"The churches indeed!" exclaimed she, with a little scornful laugh. "And do they want the likes of me, with no bonnet, and my patched calico, and my hoop-skirt broken in a dozen places—do they want me in their soft-cushioned pews, to rub against their cloth and white linen, and hear the fine music and soft easy preaching that they pay for? No indeed! I've been to the doors more than once, and I tell you the sexton could see every body but me!"

He looked troubled, but continued: "That may be so, and I fear it is, yet there are free chapels built by nearly all the great churches. Trinity has one, Grace Church another; and besides the free chapels every where and the free churches like St. Albans, the galleries of nearly all the churches are open to all strangers."

"An' you'll catch me agoing to them!" was her unexpected rejoinder. "Who wants all the dandies in kid gloves and side whiskers to be lookin' at the holes in my stockings as I go slip-ily-slop up the steps in my old shoes; and who wants to see the one in the pew before you move to the far end as if one had the small-pox, and have stuck-up girls giggle behind their handkerchiefs at the patches and the darns on old faded clothes? Let alone the preacher, who, the minute he catches sight of a body, is sure to crack up what a nice thing it is to be a washer-woman with hopes of heaven; as if a gold harp and a white night-gown fifty years from now was equal to a beef-steak and a cup of nice tea and a warm bed just now! Let 'em build churches for the poor and fill 'em with rich folks as they do. I reckon the poor will go, an' like to go, when they have decent clothes and enough to eat."

"Do you have the same objection to the Divine service at the Missions and the House of Industry?" he asked.

Her face softened as she replied, "They are good at some of those places. One place—where they tell my children that I and their father get drunk, and when I go for a bit of soap, or a loaf of bread, ask me if I am going to trade it for a dram—I don't go to. Poor people have feelings if they are poor, and an insult goes as deep into us as if our bosoms was covered with lace. Maybe it hurts us a little worse when we deserve it a little. But I hate to go to the Episcopal House. It takes three thousand dollars a month, Mr. Halliday tells me, to feed the hundred or so children that lodge there, and the three hundred more women and children who eat there three times a day. Other shops shut up, and other schools and churches have summer vacations, but they never shut the doors day nor night; and I tell you it makes me cry when I hear them little children set there and sing:

> "'We won't shut the door against one of Christ's poor, > Though you bring every child in the city.'"

The visitor asked, "Do they really do so much good as that? But I suppose they have a plenty of money."

"Indeed they don't," was her quick reply. "They don't have any money hardly but what comes from kind people, as a gift, and that is uncertain. It takes about fifteen hundred pairs of shoes for all the children of a winter, and a sight of pants, and jackets, and stockings, and skirts, and little dresses. The most the children get are made out of old clothes and boots and shoes that people send there; but then they don't last so long as new, and children can't eat old clothes and shoes, you know. I hate to go as I told you, for they do so much, it looks wrong to seem to be looking for more, and there are people poorer than we, that need help, and I seem to myself to be in their way."

The gentleman had walked to the window, and his voice was somewhat husky as he asked, "Would you go to church if you had a better dress?"

"Oh yes, I'll be powerful religious if you hire me to be," was her ready response.

"I do not wish to hire you to be good, but pray that you may be," was his answer, as he placed a ten-dollar bill in her hand, and turned to where his daughter was earnestly talking with little Eva. There, at least, poverty was not regarded as a kind of curious snake, worth seeing but not safe to touch; for the uncombed hair of the flower-girl nestled on the shoulder of her friend; and the gray eyes of the up-town beauty were certainly in full sympathy with the blue ones of the little pauper who looked in her face.

The conversation had been going on long enough to become interesting, and Carrie Adams—for that was the name of the half girl, half woman—had just asked, "How do you know, Eva, that Christ feels for you and for all of us in every trouble?"

"Because," was the instant reply, "the Bible says that he is touched with a feeling for our infirmities, and was tempted in every manner as we are, but yet without sin."

"Where do you learn such things?" asked Carrie.

"Oh, I go to the Sabbath-school, and good men come and talk to us, just like easy short sermons, and I remember all they say."

"Tell me some things they say, won't you?" asked the red lips and the bright gray eyes both at once.

"Why last Sunday a gentleman told us the German story about the wooden Christ in the market-place, that used to get down from the place under the lamp every night, and go about giving shoes to the barefoot children and food to the starving, and mending the broken wagons and tools of the poor work-people. Nobody knew who did it all for a long time, till one morning about day the shoemaker saw the place of the image empty, and pretty soon saw the image come up the street and climb up to the cross again; and then he knew it was Christ who did it all. The gentleman told us that no image ever did that, but that the real Christ, when he was on earth, went about doing good just that way, only in a better way."

"Do you remember any thing he did which makes you love him?" asked Carrie.

"Yes, something he told us in the same little talk. He said that one day Jesus was walking along the streets of Jerusalem, or some place, and was dressed in that clean and beautiful white robe which had no seam, and which the soldiers cast lots for when he was crucified. His disciples all followed him, dressed in clean white too, and presently they were met by some women of the city, and every woman had a child by the hand or in her arms. Then the gentleman asked us if we thought they were the children of the rich, and wore beautiful embroidered dresses and silk stockings, and had curly golden hair, like the children in the Park? and when we did not know he said he thought not, and would tell us why he thought not. He said if they were beautiful and clean children the disciples would have been glad enough to have Christ notice them, and even to play with them themselves. But they were poor, and so the disciples thought: 'Well, now, our Master is too kind-hearted; and if he stops to notice these dirty little things they will soil his clothes, and his white robe will have to be washed, and he will have to comb his head with a fine comb; and then these rich Pharisees and Sadducees are looking at us, and will think we are low people to associate with the like.' So they wanted to send the children away."

"Did Christ let them go?" was the suggestive question.

"No, he didn't; for he took them right in his arms, and said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'"

"You have a good memory, Eva. But when Christ arose from the dead, with the affrighted soldiers of Rome flying from the opening tomb, and with all heaven bending to crown the Great Conqueror of hell and the grave, do you suppose he had time to care for poor people then?"

The blue eyes opened wide in wonder as she said, "I know he did; for while the poor woman stood weeping and troubled near where she had seen the two angels in the deserted tomb, he was sorry for her, and came and asked, 'Woman, why weepest thou?' and when she thought he was the gardener, and asked to know where he had laid the body, he only said 'Mary,' and she looked up and knew him. Then he knew how sorry Peter must be because he had denied him, and how troubled he must be to remember that last sad look in the judgment hall, and so his first message to the disciples had Peter's name in it."

The eyes of Mr. Adams had filled with tears as he listened and thought how from the mouths of babes and sucklings God had perfect praise. But willing to test the memory and the faith of the little theologian to the uttermost, he said, "Do you not think that the kindness of Christ may have been because he had suffered so himself, and so recently? Do you think that after he had been in heaven for many years, among all the adoring angels, and had become used to the diadem and equal glory of God's only Son, that he would stoop from that high throne to talk to one of his old friends and be as kind as he was?"

The questioner knew of but one such instance, and was surprised that the little girl knew it as well as he did. "Oh, yes!" she said, "it was over sixty years after, and ninety-six years after Christ was born, that John—the one he loved, you know—saw him in Patmos. He writes about it himself, and says, when he saw his face like the sun, and the seven stars in his hand, he fell down at his feet as if dead; and Christ laid his hand on him and said, 'Fear not, I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore.'"

"I wish that all the children of the land knew as much of God and his holy book as you do," said Mr. Adams, tenderly, as he stooped and kissed her. "Now we must go; and your mother tells me I may come at three o'clock next Sunday, when your papa will be at home, and see if he will let you live with us and be my other child."

Then they were gone, and there was only the dirty room, and the filthy court, and the slow, dreary drizzle of the rain.

Eva knew too much of the uncertain temper of her father to mention the matter to him before the important hour should come; and his wife did not. So the hours passed, and she wandered in bare feet over the cold damp of the pavements, reaping her slender harvest of cents; and the mother sometimes encouraged her hopes by talking of the fine times she was to see, and then depressed them by asking how she could bear to be better off than her own flesh and blood, and predicted that when she once had fine clothes and rode in a carriage, she would forget and despise her poor mother, and crippled brother, and weak-eyed little sister. At such times Eva would shed silent tears, and think she must be very wicked to even want to go; but could not entirely give up the sweet hope.

Sunday evening came, and bitter disappointment. Dennis Eve was half drunk and proud and sullen. A pig could not have been more obstinate, nor a peer more proud and dignified. Yet he had law, and nature, and human right on his side, for he was the father, and she was the light of his dark home. He was even civil to the man who wished to take his treasure from him, and argued that the child could never be as happy as with her own mother, and that he, a strong-armed man, would be degraded in his own eyes to leave the care of his own flesh and blood to strangers—strong positions, to which there is no reply which one freeman can properly address to another. The mother was just sober enough to feel silly and degraded, and broke into the conversation frequently with suggestions that it would be just as nice to dress up the child and give her money, and still leave her there, while Mr. Adams thought how soon the clothes would go to the pawn-shop and the money to the bar-room, and did not reply.

The parting kiss and the promise to aid her all it was possible through the institutions of charity, was all the consolation for little Eva as the evening sunshine and her friend faded up the street together.

He did not forget her; but an orphan of less mind and beauty shared his name and home.

Eva thought it was all for the best; but as winter came the shrunken skin over her temples grew whiter, and the red spot on her cheek was not a health rose.

One night she had a strange dream. In her dream she was no more a little girl, but a white lamb feeding with a large flock of sheep and other lambs in a wide, dreary plain bounded by dark woods. The ground was rough and stony, with little grass and scanty pools of water. The wind was cold and strong, so as to sometimes almost blow them away, while briers and thorns tore the fleece, and sometimes drew blood. The sheep were mostly poor, with soiled and torn wool, and sometimes wolves from the woods would grow so bold as to try and pluck the young lambs from the very arms of the shepherd. This shepherd seemed to her to be quite young, and yet his face was so marked with care and sorrow, and his eyes so tender and sad that he seemed old. The strangest thing was, that he seemed to be a great man in that country, and all the people who passed by on the highway did him reverence and seemed anxious for his notice and favor. His conduct toward these was as singular as his lonely life on the cold plain. He would stop some richly-clothed traveler in the very midst of his protestations of high regard, and would ask, "Lovest thou me?" Then the man would say, "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee!" And the shepherd would point toward the scattered flock and say, "If thou lovest me, feed my sheep."

All the people who heard these words would say that they intended to feed them bountifully, and some few would busy themselves with gathering grass and tender herbs for them in the coldest days; but the most part passed on, and said they were then in great haste. When they had more time, and the wind was not so cold out there, they would come and do it, but not then. Then the shepherd would look sorrowful, and lead the sheep himself to the greenest pastures and stillest waters; but these were few and wide apart, and often picked over.

Then Eva awoke, and while the dream was a sad one, yet the face of the shepherd had been so kind and sweet, she could not avoid telling it all to her sister and brother, and talking of it to her mother all that day.

She felt hardly strong enough to push her way through the hurrying crowd of Broadway, and she had a little cough.

In a few nights more she had the same dream, and heard the same words with the same results. Again she told her dream, and her mother told her it was eating at night made her dream. Eva thought she did not eat enough to hurt her, but did not say so.

A third time the dream came. A third time the lord of the waste stopped a sleek and well-clothed man in the midst of flattery, and anxiously asked, "Lovest thou me?" The person looked astonished, as others had done, and said, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee!" Then the shepherd pointed to where she was lying with other lambs on the hill-side, and said, "If ye love me, feed my lambs." But the man, and all others who came by, were too busy to attend to it then, and the cold had killed all the grass. So the shepherd came to her, with tears in his eyes, and said, "Come, little one, I must take you to a far distant fold, or you will perish here." And he took her to his warm bosom and hastened away, while she slept warmly in his mantle. When at last he paused and loosened its folds, the cold waste and dark woods were gone. There were wide green meadows with butter-cups and daisies and sweet violets—there were blue murmuring streams that wandered through the rich grass, or sparkled in cascades and made rainbows of their mist—there were tall trees which tempered the warm sunlight with cool shadow, and which had glossy leaves and snowy flowers, with beautiful and wondrous fruits—there were vast flocks of sheep feeding in peace and safety every where, and among the happy, frisking lambs Eva knew some that she had missed, one by one, from the cold waste she had left. Then she hardly knew the shepherd who had brought her as the same one. His robe shone like illumined snow, the care and sorrow had passed from his face, and his shining hair was brighter than a crown. But the same soft and tender light beamed from his loving eyes, and it was the same sweet voice which said, "You are to stay here, my little lamb; this rest is for you."

Then Eva awoke, and, half crying with bewildered excitement, went again to tell her brother, her sister, and her mother. That night she even ventured to tell the three dreams to her father, as, in more than usual kindness, he took her on his knee. But he laughed as the mother had done, and said: "You sleep on your back, and that makes you dream. Sleep on your side, and you will have no more trouble about it."

"But," whispered Eva, "I love the dream so much; the man looked so kind and good."

"Nonsense!" said he, and began to promise a visit to the Museum when he had made more money.

At last came a morning when the bright cold air was tremulous with the clangor of bells; when the churches were bright with flowers and evergreens; and when the music of every choir seemed to say:

> "Lo! on thy hills, Jerusalem!
> The Saviour now is born,
> While bright on Bethlehem's sacred plains
> Bursts the first Christmas morn."

The two other little ones were soon out of bed, but Eva seemed sleeping sounder than usual, and both parents turned to her little pallet to wake her up. Her eyes were closed, but there was a marvelous brightness on the fair face, and a wondrous smile on her lips, as if some strange vision of beauty and glory passed before her mind and penetrated the closed eyelids.

Her mother was the first to speak, and said: "The dear child! I do believe she has had that same dream again."

The quicker eye of the father had read the truth. Eva had seen the vision again—seen it where God wipes all tears from their eyes, and sorrow and sighing are done away—seen it where the River of Life flows softly by the city of the saints of God—where His sheep pasture free on the green savannas of the future, and the lambs of the fold keep their eternal holy-day.

COURT-HOUSE AT SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA.

It has lately been proposed to remove the Legislative Assembly of the State of California from the city of Sacramento to San José, in the county of Santa Clara, which is now a thriving city, with broad graveled thoroughfares, long lines of substantial brick stores, stately public edifices, hotels, seminaries of learning, city hall, elegant churches, and a handsome Court-house, the use of which the authorities of Santa Clara County have proffered to the State, in the event of their removing the capital thither. We publish a view of this building, from a photograph by Mr. J. A. Clayton, of San José. It is situated in First Street, between St. James and St. John streets. It fronts the east, and a broad plaza lies directly opposite the main entrance. The architect is Levi Goodrich. The building was let out by contract, and will have cost, with the ground, the sum of $130,000. The apex of the dome is reached by flights of steps (172). The building is two stories in height, besides basement and attic. It is designed in the classic style of architecture. The order employed is the Roman Corinthian, with elaborate enrichments of capitals, medallions, and richly-carved mouldings, all in cast iron and wood. The building has a front of 100 feet, with a depth, including portico, square, of 161 feet. The height from the ground to the top of a level cornice is 56 feet; to top of dome, 115 feet; to the top of flagstaff, 185 feet. The base of the dome is 50 feet through, and is 17 feet across the top. The first floor is 8 feet above the ground line; the portico has a depth of 15 feet, with a height of about 76 feet, and is reached by a flight of thirteen granite steps and landing, which landing supports a colonnade of ten Roman Corinthian columns, a little less than 4 feet in diameter and 38 feet high, supporting an entablature of 9½ feet high. The building contains twenty-one rooms.

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

OUR engraving on page 724 represents a scene in Madrid at the first outbreak of the revolution there. The people took possession of the Government buildings, removed the royal arms, and pitched the portraits of the Queen, King, and other members of the royal family out of the windows into the streets, where they were trampled upon and destroyed. This took place at the Ministry of Works especially, the scene at which is depicted in our engraving.

A correspondent, writing from Madrid on the afternoon of the 29th of September, thus depicts the enthusiasm of the citizens after the fall of the Alcoles, which had resulted the day before in the surrender of the Queen's army: "I have been out into the streets, and in and in my way into the Puerta del Sol. The whole population is out, with will joy in every countenance. The scene has changed as if by magic. Not a shop window that had not its festive decorations. Crowds of men, armed and unarmed, with flags at their head, are parading the streets, and every priests are setting up their most joyous peals from every steeple. From every tobacconshop, from every public office, the Queen's arms are torn down and trampled in the dust. Her bust, her portraits, her name, and those of the Princess and the rest of the family, are held hold of wherever they are to be found, and subjected to every ignominious ill-treatment. The Puerta del Sol is one dense mass of people. The Jacio de la Gobernacion (Home Office and General Command) has been invaded by the mob. The doors are forced; but the people have not drawn, and break in at every window. The Novedades, a Progressista paper, is already being hawked about, and it contains the new number of the country stipulating for freedom of conscience and worship as the most sacred of popular liberties. The destinies of the country are referred to the vote of the National Assembly, but the Progressistas have evidently the upper hand. The quietness of popular excitement is indescribable. It is one of those moments which a man does not see many times in his life, but which, once seen, are never forgotten."

Within half an hour after the retirement of General CONCHA and the triumph of the revolution the palace formerly known as the Hotel del Sol was richristened the Plaza del Popolo. The names of several other streets and squares have been changed in a similar manner. The Plaza Isabel II. has become the Plaza de Prim; the Plaza de Herradores the Plaza de Serrano. The proprietors of the Café Principe have set off the last two syllables of its name, and it now stands as the Café Prin, the nearest approach which the old name formed to that of the new revolutionary general.

The Progressista clubs of Madrid have entered into a union for political purposes. At a recent meeting of the united clubs SEÑOR OLOZAGA informed them that Queen ISABELLA would not exist in favor of DON CARLOS. The election for members of the Constituent Cortes will take place on the 20th of November. This body will determine the form of government, which will probably be that of a constitutional monarchy.

STREET-SWEEPERS AND RAG-PICKERS.

THE street characters represented in our two engravings on page 733 are familiar to all of our New York citizens who are early risers. At early dawn we shall find the street-sweepers gathered together in groups at their morning rendezvous, near the City Hall, at Jefferson Market, and other localities, awaiting the arrival of their various inspectors. The inspector comes and calls the roll, striking off from the pay-list all who are not present to answer to their names; then the signal is given, the brooms, scrapers, etc., are seized, and the workmen disperse themselves over the city and enter upon their daily tasks. The working day is from 6 A.M. until 3 or 4 P.M.

The rag-pickers are out before the street-sweepers, their best opportunity being during the hours before the stores are opened. They are to be seen in the most unlikely numbers in the lower portions of the city. The scene in ANN STREET, which is represented in our engraving, may be witnessed every morning between 6 and 7 o'clock. Women and boys with their paper bags and their bundles of dirty rags throng about the entrances to the shops of those dealing in this street-litter. Upon the balances are placed the uncouth bundles of these wretched customers, who in the mean time are often engaged in angry disputes among themselves as to the monopoly of their respective hunting-grounds. Their profits are variable. The price obtained for rags is from two to four cents per pound, that for waste paper ranges from one to three cents. The earnings of a single rag-picker amount to from thirty to forty dollars.

INDIAN FUNERALS.

ON page 732 we publish four illustrations representing the custom of burial as observed by the Kow Indians. The bodies of the dead are sacrificed to the place of interment by the friends of the deceased. The chief mourners then make their appearance, bending the bows, which is, according to custom, to be strangled on the grave, and carrying the pole which is to serve as a mark indicating the place. They are decorated with the scalps, horse-tails, and bits of scarlet cloth. The grave is then dug by squaws, and while above, all the strangling with all his acquaintances on, and the grave is covered up. The men show that they are in mourning by painting their faces black, the women by painting the front of their heads with white clay. Mourning is continued daily at the grave during a period of from three to six months.

EVERY process, mechanical or otherwise, which tends to cheapen without degrading art is a positive benefit to the public, and a means of art education which is not to be lightly disregarded or criminally neglected. The universal distribution of good engravings is as necessary to the art instruction of the people as the introduction of school books is to their general education; art schools are as necessary as public colleges; and it is for these reasons that we hail, with no notice, as we have heretofore, the disposition to erect statues and monuments to the heroes and soldiers of the late war, which have multiplied, and the discovery of any new process for cheapening art works. Among the most notable of these are photo-sculpture and chromo-lithography.

The new art of "photo-sculpture," as it is called, has been practiced in Paris for two or three years by a company which has the exclusive patent of the invention of the process—M. Willeme, the sculptor. The process by which the photographic is translated, if we may be allowed to use the term, into clay or terra-cotta is as follows: Supposing a person, for instance, wishes to have a statuette of himself, he requests that he should go through the preliminary process of having a series of photographic segments, as it were, of his person. This is produced by a "posing" him in the attitude selected, on a sound platform, in the centre of a circular photographic room. Around this platform, at equal distances, twenty-four cameras are placed, each instrument so arranged as to take a longitudinal twenty-fourth section, while of course the total number representing exactly his entire figure. From the segments, which form what may be termed the lateral drawings of the model, enlarged copies are taken of the size required for the statuette. These preliminaries being accomplished, the process of translating the lateral drawings to the soft lump of clay takes place through the agency of the pantograph—an instrument, the principle of which was invented by the great WATT, and is known and practically used in this country under the name of the copying machine. The pantograph, which requires having a tracer at one end, and a knife, or stile, at the other; and it is put in operation by two persons, one of whom applies the tracer to the enlarged outlines of the photograph, and the other directs the opposite end to the lump of clay. As the one pen cuts more equally, the outline is thus translated to the knife; and as fast as the tracer can follow the lines of the photograph, the knife cuts out the rough outline of the figure. The more delicate work is produced by the same agency, and when the statuette is completed, it will be found to correspond line for line and crease for crease with the sun-picture, of which, in fact, it is a mechanical copy. In this manner the most absolute truthfulness is obtained.

To understand how chromos are made, the art of lithography must first be clearly elucidated. The stone used in lithographing is a species of limestone found in Bavaria, and is wrought into thick slabs with finely polished surfaces. The drawing is made upon the slab with a sort of colored soap, which adheres to the stone, and dries into a hard, waxy consistency after the application of certain acids and gums. When the drawing is complete, the slab is put on the press, and dampened with water. The water, which necessarily indicates the smooth surface. The oil color (or ink) is then applied with a common printer's roller. Of course, the parts of the slab which have been previously gummed, resist the ink; while the drawing itself, being oily, repels the water, but retains the color applied. It is then transferred to paper under great incision—as in common printing, wood cuts, and steel engravings—lithography produces printed drawings from a perfectly smooth stone.

In a chromo, the first proof is a light groundtint, covering nearly all the surface. It has only a faint, shadowy resemblance to the completed picture. It is in fact rather a shadow than an outline. Each succeeding proof, or printed color, contains all the shades of another color. This process is repeated again and again and again; occasionally as often as thirty times. The number of impressions, however, does not necessarily indicate the number of colors in a painting, because the colors and tints are greatly multiplied by combinations created in the process of printing one over another. In twenty-five impressions, it is sometimes necessary and possible to produce a hundred distinct shades.

The last impression is made by an engraved stone, which produces that resemblance to canvas noticeable in all finer specimens. English and German chromos, unlike the finished work made by Louis Prang of Boston, and other less extensive publishers in this country, do not give this delicate final touch, although it would seem to be essential in order to make a perfect imitation of a painting.

AT A LITTLE DINNER-PARTY.

FIRST OLD HUMBUG.

Dear brother Brown, if we could take Such limbs as these,
As just to back his fatal cock
To mark our early prime.
When we were barely twenty-three,
And prodigal of Youth,
And thought all women were divine,
All men with all sorts of truths;
If we could feel as then we felt,
And know what now we know,
We'd take more pleasure than we did
Twice twenty years ago.

SECOND OLD HUMBUG.

Dear brother Smith, I'm not so sure,
'Tis heart that keeps us young,
And heart was ever ignorant
Since Eve and Adam sprung.
And if we knew in youthful days
As much as we know old,
I fear that heart would turn to stone,
And blood run very cold.
Yet now the less, for sake of life,
Though life should bring me woe,
I'd gladly be the fool I was
Twice twenty years ago.

THIRD OLD HUMBUG.

Dear Smith and Brown, of parted hours
Your talk is void and vain,
They're gone—God wot! Let's bless our lot!
They can not come again.
Each age has its appointed joy,
And each its heavy load,
And I for one, have had my fortune
My footsteps on the road.
I know no Time but present Time,
And if the rose be red,
And we enjoy it—why recall
Twice twenty years ago?

I know I've had my share of joy,
I know I've suffered long,
And I've tasted of the cup of life,
Although I've done the wrong.
I know mid all my pleasures past
That sleep has been the best,
And that I'm weary, very weary,
And soon shall be at rest.
Yet all the same if I'm to live,
'Tis be' is all I know,
And if I'm dead, I know no more,
Twice twenty years ago.

THE YOUNG HUMBUG.

You dear old humbugs, Jones and Smith,
Thou dear old humbug, Brown,
You live like oysters, though not half
So useful to the town.
I'll lead a nobler life than yours,
While yet my youth remains,
And gather honey all the day
To heal old Age's pains.
You've had your pleasures as you went
In dribblets through your thin,
I'll have my pleasures in the lump,
And end where you begin.

I'll carve and care, I'll stint and spare,
And keep my head from sun,
To make myself a millionaire
Before old Age shall come.
I'll flaunt the fact I feel the poor,
And on the scroll of Fame,
So large that all the world may read,
I'll write my humble name.

CHORUS OF OLD HUMBUGS.

Yes! Fool! and when you're old as we,
You'll find, on verge of death,
That little pleasures are the best,
And Fame—not worth a breath.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ONE is almost tempted, as he reads the daily records of accidents on railroads and steamboats, to wish for a return of the old times when the Queen's highway was the favorable vehicles for public travel. People were content then to jog along at a moderate speed; or if, by chance, some nervous individual became impatient, he might safely rent his vexation upon the gentle drivers, who would not suffer his faithful old horses to be startled from their regular trot. Nowadays, if we recklessly expose by the management of our public conveyances. A collision occurs between two steamers on the Sound—the passengers, as we have good reason to think, though not sorry. The newspapers comment on the casualty for a day or two, and what is done about it? Why, of course is taken to prevent the like occurring any night? A frightful calamity occurs to-week place on the Hudson River Railroad—to be sure, such an event is nothing rare or strange on the Hudson or on any other railroad. Scores are killed, many wounded, all the passengers in imminent danger of most horrible death. Almost every day of the present accident is reported, not always one fatal to life—usually a bare escape from death, and sometimes some similar trifle to make the ordinary cause of exposing travelers to fearful perils.

The carelessness and recklessness of railroad management has been abundantly discussed—with what good result perhaps facts will best show. But the "spirit of the age," in America at least, tends toward rush and haste, unwarrantable exposure of life, unwise imputing of property—any thing to "get on" in life. People are not content to be moderate and sure: they want to hurry to the end of their journey, to hurry to become rich, to hurry to gain repute, and then they would hurry through life. Courage is a grand quality; "nothing venture, nothing have," is a sensible precept:

> "But there are human natures so allied
> Unto the savage love of enterprise,
> That they will seek for peril as a pleasure."

On behalf of those who need to be reminded that "All's to be feared where all is to be lost," a member of the views of a philosophical old negro may not be useless. It may make them contented on a slowgoing train. To be sure, the old negro had run away from the Union army about the time of the capture of Fort Donelson—a proceeding not to be approved; but supposing he had run away from the Hudson River Railroad cars, his philosophy would not be much at fault:

"Were you in the fight, Sam?" inquired a white man of the colored veteran.

"Had a little tas-e of it, Sah."

"Stood your ground, did you?"

"Yes, Sah, I stood it out."

"Run at the first fire?"

"Yes, Sah; and would hab run sooner had I know'd it was coming."

"Why, that wasn't creditable to your courage?"

"Dat isn't my line, Sah. Cookin is my profession."

"But your reputation?"

"Reputation don't belong to me by the side of life. Life is worth more dan all dis world; for what would dat be worth to a man wid de bref cut of him? Self-preservation am de first law of nature, Sah."

"But traitors might have broken up the Government without resistance; and even if you were killed your company would have scarcely missed you."

"Maybe, Sah. But I'd a missed myself, and dat was de plut wid me."

If "self-preservation," rather than speed and money, were the "first law" with railroad and steamboat managers and passengers, the list of "casualties" would be diminished.

A destructive fire recently occurred at Hunter's Point. An explosion, caused probably by a lighted lamp, took place on the brig Washington, which was loaded with petroleum. The brig was entirely consumed, and many lives were lost. Two years since five, and an immense quantity of oil which was there stored, and a large kerosene warehouse in the vicinity, were destroyed.

Those interested in the important matter of obtaining pure water for domestic use, and desirous of knowing what kind of pipe has the approval of scientific men, can not do better than to examine the report of Messrs. Colwells, Shaw, and Willard, manufacturers of the "Lead-Incased Block-tin Pipe." The pipe consists of two, three, or more of pure block-tin drawn screwed with lead, and both so thoroughly soldered together that the presence or secession of air is regarded as impossible. Among the many who have examined and approved of it are Professor Doremus, Professor Draper, Professor Chandler, of the School of Mines; Professor Booth, of the United States Mint; Professor Silliman, of Yale College; and numerous medical and scientific men. Professor Doremus says of it: "After repeated experiments upon the action of the inner surface of your incased block-tin pipe, I found no exposure, not even at the joints, for galvanic action—hence it is as safe as a pipe constructed wholly of tin." Dr. Pohlé states that the pipe thus constructed, and when used in the conduit leading to the main liable to galvanic action than if made of tin alone. Benjamin R. Winthrop, Esq., Assistant Engineer of Croton Water-Works, declares the union of the tin and lead is so complete that it is quite impossible for the moisture to get between to form galvanic currents. Dr. Aulisell and Professor Ewell give it as their opinion that galvanic action is impossible in the leadincased block-tin pipe. The testimony of practical analytical chemists is ample to satisfy those who have had doubts whether any new invention was essentially better than the old-fashioned lead pipe, which has been proved to impregnate the water with salts of lead. As the only objection to the metallic tin pipe in working the incased tin-pipe, it is to be hoped that the time may soon come when the public may be relieved from the unpleasant sounds of hissing generated by the use of Nature's beverage.

Matrimonial advertisements are very popular in Sweden. Recently a young man in Leipsic requested through the newspapers young ladies who wished to marry him to correspond with him, and he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment in the Penitentiary.

During the darkest hours of the first day's fighting at Pittsburg Landing, April 6, 1862, Major-General Don Carlos Buell arrived on the field. He had ridden in advance of his own army a long distance. Seeing the desperate state of affairs, he asked Grant:

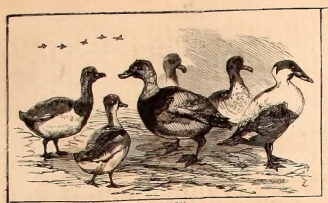
"What preparations have you made to secure your retreat, General?"

"We shall not retreat, Sir."

"But it is possible," added Buell, "and a prudent General always looks after his contingencies."

"Well, there are the boats," said Grant.

"The boats," said Buell. "Why, they will not hold over 10,000 men, and we have 20,000."

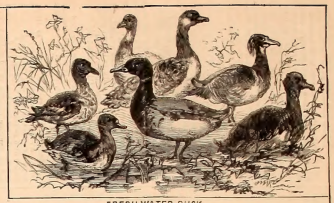


"They will have to hold more or shall retreat with. We shall whip them yet," was Grant's characteristic reply.

A treaty has lately been entered into between our country and Madagascar. The object is to secure closer relations of commerce and friendship. Citizens of the United States will, while in Madagascar, enjoy the privilege of a free and unmolested exercise of Christian religion and its ceremonies, and places of worship, however, will not be built by them without the permission of the Government. Missionaries will be perfectly free with all the privileges under which the most favored nations now or may hereafter be treated. The details of the treaty tend to secure the rights of both contracting parties.

The Chicago Tribune states that the lives and likenesses of one hundred and ten of the leading citizens of Chicago have been published in a series of portrait pictures in that city, in a volume of seven hundred pages, at $50; also an edition without the portraits at $20. It is said that the proposed list will soon be filled for long publish the "lives and likenesses" of the remainder of the 150 leading citizens of Chicago.

An instance of unusual faithfulness and perseverance is that of a carrier of the New York Sun, who has not failed to go through the same route on his evening rounds for the last twenty years. Last winter he was very ill, and the doctor told him that he must endeavor to expose himself; but though he fainted twice one morning before daylight, when passing through the cold creek with his load of papers, he came to again and performed his task.



Steinway Hall is greatly improved, and will now be a delightful concert hall. The stage and its accessories have been altered, the organ is concealed by a handsome screen, and a private box on the opposite side preserves the symmetry of the whole. Busts of Beethoven and Mozart, and two statues, representing Poetry and Music, are on either side. The latter were imported from Berlin, and are very beautiful. The ceiling is frescoed, and appropriate ornamentation has been artistically made. Additional lights have been placed in the Hall, and a new system of ventilation adopted.

THE HEBREW TEMPLE EMANU-EL.

THIS temple, situated at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Forty-third Street, New York city, was consecrated on the 11th of September. It is considered one of the finest specimens of church architecture in this country. It belongs to the Moorish style. The corner-stone was laid in October, 1866, and it took nearly two years to complete the structure. The design of this edifice, and the perfection and delicacy with which the details have been executed, do credit to the genius and taste of LEOPOLD EIDLITZ, the architect, who has, while adopting the Saracenic style, yet allowed himself much freedom in the composition of his design. The walls and ornamental work are of light freestone. The building contains 1800 sittings on the main floor and 500 in the gallery. The colors in the decorations are red, blue, yellow, white, and gold, and the effect is most brilliant. The ceilings are of a deep blue, set with diamonds of stars. The gilding is profuse. When illuminated by its five hundred jets of gas the interior of the edifice presents a splendid appearance. This building cost upward of $800,000.

MOUNT VESUVIUS.

VESUVIUS is again in a state of volcanic activity. A considerable flow of lava has taken place and a violent eruption is apprehended.

The announcement of an approaching eruption of this mountain, which has already been twice in eruption within the past twelve months, indicates an unusual activity in the South European volcanic district. It is a remarkable circumstance that the temporary cessation in the action of Mount Vesuvius, which since the end of August has done nothing but fume and grumble, has been marked by the occurrence of several earthquakes in the south of Europe. Two shocks were experienced in Gibraltar; then a large portion of Turkey was shaken, and, lastly, a sharp shock was experienced in Malta. These disturbances following each other within so short a space of time suffice to confirm the opinion that the subterranean forces whose effects have been experienced from time to time over a district extending from the Canaries and Azores across the whole basin of the Mediterranean into Syria, form a single system, of which Vesuvius, Etna, Stromboli, and the volcanoes of the Grecian Archipelago are the outlets. We do not remember any former instance in which the evidence has been so decisive. The fact that Ischia and Vesuvius are intimately associated with Stromboli and Etna had been confirmed by several striking phenomena. When Ischia was in full activity before the great outburst of Vesuvius in 79 the fires of Etna had seemed to be gradually expiring, insomuch that it was ranked by Seneca among extinct volcanoes. But during the long interval of rest which Vesuvius experienced before the great eruption of 1500, Etna was in a state of unusual activity, a circumstance which Sir Charles Lyell considers to indicate that "the great Sicilian volcano sometimes serves as a channel of discharge to elastic fluids and lava that would otherwise rise to the vents in Campania." But although such facts as these had been noticed, and the connection of the Italian with the Archipelagic and Syrian volcanoes had been suspected by many geologists and seismologists, yet we do not remember any former instance in which the temporary quiescence of Vesuvius has been followed by earthquakes occurring in portions of the South European volcanic system so widely separated as Turkey, Malta, and Vesuvius.

It is worthy of notice that from the time of the great eruption of 79 Vesuvius had been in activity only at distant intervals until the eruption of 1066. In 1631, indeed, it seems as if the mountain were gradually assuming the condition of an extinct volcano. At that time BRACINI wrote as follows: "The crater of Vesuvius is five miles in circumference, and about a thousand paces deep; its sides are covered with brushwood, and at the bottom there is a plain on which cattle graze. In the woody parts wild boars frequently harbor." One is reminded by this description of the condition of the mountain before the convulsions which preceded the eruption of 79. At that time the mountain presented so small an appearance of activity that the bands of slaves and pirates which flocked to the standard of Spartacus found refuge within the very crater of the sleeping volcano. In December, 1631, the mountain behaved much in the same way as in 79. It first blew away, by a violent eruption, the covering of rocks and cinders which had supported the woods and pastures described by BRACINI. Then seven enormous streams of lava poured from the crater. Resina, built over the site of Herculaneum, was entirely destroyed; and torrents of mud, caused by heavy showers of rain which fell on the heaps of ashes and volcanic dust around the cone, effected an amount of destruction scarcely less terrible than that which resulted from the lava streams.

But since the eruption of 1666 Vesuvius has scarcely ever been at rest for ten years together. Many of the eruptions also which have occurred during the last two hundred years have been as remarkable as any which took place before the eruption of 1666. In the great eruption of 1779 molten lava was propelled vertically upward to a height of at least 10,000 feet. According to the account of Sir William Hamilton, Vesuvius was surmounted continually by what appeared as an enormous column of fire, the heat of which was distinctly perceptible at a distance of at least six miles on every side. Equally remarkable, but quite different in character, was the great eruption of 1793. In place of lava streams millions of red-hot stones were propelled into the air. DE CLARKE relates that these stones reached a height at least equal to half that of the cone itself. Enormous masses of white smoke were vomited forth by the disturbed mountain, and, gathering themselves together at a height of several thousand feet above the cone, they formed a huge and resplendent canopy, constantly illuminated by the glowing fires within the mountain, and seeming to open from time to time to hurl down dark streams of volcanic dust and vapor, mixed with cascades of red-hot rocks and scoriæ. In the great eruption of 1822, so enormous a mass of earth and rock was propelled from the crater that an abyss was formed extending for 2000 feet into the very heart of the mountain. The same eruption flung down the whole of the upper part of the cone, so that the mountain was reduced in height by about one-fifth.

In the eruption which took place twelve years ago lava poured down the slopes of Vesuvius for three weeks together. A river of flame has swept away the village of Cercolo, and streamed nearly to the sea-shore at Ponte Maddaloni. Ten small craters were formed within the principal one. In the eruption of last winter these ten craters united into one, and continued pressure from beneath actually converted the crater into a cone within the great exterior crater. This cone rose gradually until it reached beyond the rim of the crater, and then the natural result of which it consisted poured in streams down the slopes of the mountain.

After this tremendous outburst a long interval of rest was anticipated; but the mountain continued to fume and mutter as if its pent-up forces had but half found relief. At length, on June 13, the cone began to show signs of renewed activity, flinging out large quantities of basaltic stones. Nine days later Vesuvius was so violently shaken that the inhabitants passed the night in the open air, fearing lest they should be crushed beneath the ruins of their houses. The throes of the mountain grew gradually more violent, and the quantity of erupted matter (chiefly basalt stone) greater until the beginning of July. The cone was rent in several places by the violence of the mountain's internal throes. The disturbance continued throughout the whole of July; and, after a fortnight's rest, began again and lasted until toward the end of August. Since then the mountain, as we have said, has been comparatively at rest; but Gibraltar, Turkey, and Malta have been shaken by more or less violent earthquakes. It seems that the mountain has not yet vomited forth the elastic gases which have been disturbing its repose during the past year; and we shall, in all probability, soon witness a renewal of the energetic eruptive processes which prevailed last year at the corresponding season.

DUCK-SHOOTING.

THIS sport is not confined to any particular section of our country, for the inland lakes and streams furnish as good a shooting-ground as the favorite shores of the Chesapeake. We have in this country as many as thirty different varieties of duck.

The ducking season is at its height in November and December, but the game-laws of the different States permit this shooting from the 15th of August until the 1st of February, and then only in what is known as a sportsmanlike manner. That is to say, only with a gun which may be raised to the shoulder, and from an artificial blind or brush screen, not more than one hundred yards from the shore.

This is to prevent what is known and despised by every honest sportsman, namely, Pot-hunting—a method of slaughtering ducks in vogue among market-men and others to whom ducks mean dollars, and not sport.

The game-laws of the State of Delaware, and some other seaboard States, forbid citizens of other States from shooting on their waters under penalty of a heavy fine and forfeiture of boats, tackle, and sporting implements.

To the sportsman who delights in duck-shooting the shores of the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries afford peculiar facilities. During certain seasons of the year vast numbers of ducks of different varieties are in the habit of resorting to this locality. In no other section of the United States is this peculiar branch of the sportsman's pursuit followed with greater vigor and success. In fact, so famed for quality and quantity of game has this spot become that nearly the whole of both shores of Chesapeake Bay and its inlets has been portioned off in sections, and either bought or leased by numerous Duck-ing Clubs for the more convenient and profitable following of their favorite amusement. Most of these clubs have built upon their grounds spacious and comfortable club-buildings for the accommodation of the members and their many visitors and friends. As represented in the larger sketch in the illustration, a long pier is constructed running out into the bay, at right angles with the shore. At the end of this causeway is placed transversely a structure resembling a long wooden box to contain the sportsmen who are waiting the approach of the unwary and deluded fowl. When the season for the shooting is at hand this whole structure is disguised by branches of evergreen trees, which are tied at intervals along the causeway and around the "blind," as it is termed. A number of decoy ducks are anchored off the end of the structure, which attract the passing flocks, the individuals of which suppose the assemblage to indicate a good feeding-ground. Taking the "blind" to be simply a point of land the ducks fly toward the decoys, and only discover their mistake when they are within reach of the guns. They endeavor to fly past, but invariably leave many of their number behind them. The dogs are concealed within the "blind," and so well trained are these sagacious animals that they will not stir until the proper moment for them to dart into the water and bring the struggling victims to the shore. Sometimes the duck is wounded only in the wing, and, filling to the water, is enabled to swim off faster than the dogs are capable of doing in pursuit of them. At such a moment the leader loses into requisition, and many a "lame duck" is thus secured. The clubs have the most rigid rules regarding the time of the season, the admission of the spoils, and other matters, which are invariably observed. The sport begins about the 1st of October and continues with intervals until April. During the extreme cold weather, when the bay is much blocked with ice, the ducks go further south. The inducement for the markets is carried on principally at Havre-de-Grace. Men have frequently shot over 100 ducks in one day, and a club of ten or a dozen will capture at times three or four thousand in a single day. Much of the excellence of the sport depends upon the direction of the wind. Every shore upon which it is blowing will receive the great proportion of the game, as ducks fly with the wind. Consequently, therefore, the club upon one shore will not be able to capture a single fowl the men upon another shore will be abundantly supplied with sport. The gun used throughout this section is the M'Comas gun, manufactured by A. M'Comas, Baltimore. Duck clubs, as may be supposed, are much interested in their respective shores, and vie with each other in their attentions and hospitality to visitors. The "club which we have been illustrated belongs to the "Japanese Ducking Club."

THE BROKEN MUG.

La Napoule is, it is true, but a small village on the sea-shore; nevertheless, it is well known in Provence. It is surrounded by lofty pine trees and dark orange groves; but to this it does not owe its celebrity. It is said that the most juicy grapes, the sweetest roses, and the loftiest girls in the world grow there. I can not speak from experience; but I believe it, and can only say, that it is a pity that La Napoule does not produce a greater quantity of juicy grapes, sweet roses, and pretty girls, as in that case some of them would certainly be reached us.

As the women of La Napoule have been celebrated for their beauty ever since the village was built, Marie Marriette must have been the eighth wonder of the world, for even the chronicle makes mention of her. She was born, it is true, "Little Marriette;" and yet she was as tall as girls of seventeen generally are, that is, her forehead reached exactly to the lips of a grown-up man.

The chronicle of La Napoule had good reason for mentioning Marriette. In the chronicle's place I should have acted in the same manner, for Marriette (who, with her mother, Manon, had hitherto resided in Avignon, when she returned to her native village, almost turned it upside down. Not exactly the houses, but the heads of the people, and especially of those whose heads and hearts are always in danger when in the vicinity of a pair of expressive eyes. I speak from experience, and know that in such a case it is no joke.

Madame Manon would, perhaps, have done better had she remained in Avignon, but she had inherited in La Napoule some land and vineyards, together with a pretty house sheltered by a grove and surrounded by orange and African acacias. This was not to be rejected by a poor widow, and in her own opinion she was now as rich and happy as if she were Countess of Provence.

The good people of La Napoule did not fare so well on the occasion; but they foresaw no mischief, and from never having read Homer, they were not aware that a pair of dangerous ears caused all Greece and Asia Minor to arms.

Before Marriette had lived a fortnight in the house surrounded by olive-trees and African acacias, every young man in La Napoule knew that the most charming girl in Provence dwelt there.

When, looking like an angel in disguise, she walked through the village with her waving petticoat, pale green bodice, with a bouquet of orange blossoms and rose-buds in the front of it, and her lovely face shaded by her gray hat trimmed with flowers and streamers of ribbon, then the old became eloquent, and the young became dumb. And doors and windows were opened one after another as she passed, in order to say "Good-morning," or "Good-evening, Marriette!" and she smiled and nodded right and left.

When Marriette entered the church all hearts (that is, the hearts of the young men) were turned from heaven, all eyes from the saints, and fingers became entangled in the rosary. That must have been a great offense to the religious people; and the young girls of La Napoule must have been at that time especially pious, for they were the most established church members. And over the sin scarcely blame them; for, from the time of Marriette's arrival, more than one intended had grown cool, and more than one fiancée faithless. There were quarrels and reproaches—tears and refusals. Instead of weddings broken-off matches became the order of the day—betrothals. Pledges of faith, rings, and ribbons were reciprocally returned. The old people took up the quarrels of their children, and disseminated them in every house. It was a lamentable state of affairs.

Marriette is altogether to blame, said the young girls; first their lovers agreed with them, then their fathers; and at last even the young men were of the same opinion.

But Marriette, in her modesty and innocence, like a rose-bud in its dark green calix, little suspecting the mischief she was doing, continued unconcerned to fill the village with admiration of the young men, and they exclaimed, with "Why should we the sweet, harmless child? She is so blessed with beauty," said the same thing, then the mothers, and at last even the pious young girls. For no one could overview with Marriette for a quarter of an hour, before six months had elapsed every one had spoken to her, and every one loved her.

But the heart of Marriette was aware of how much she was liked, and before she had been quite unconscious that any one hated her. Yes, hated her, the so-often-trampled violet suspects its value!

The inhabitants of La Napoule now endeavored to atone for their injustice, and Marriette was greeted every where with smiles, and invited to all their dances and rural amusements.

But the heart of one young man, far from being endowed with compassionate feelings, are hardened like that of Pharaoh.

A monstrosity—such of such hardness of heart was young Colin, the richest proprietor and farmer in La Napoule, who possessed olive-gardens, vineyards, and orange groves, were so extensive that one could scarcely walk through them all in one day. What was more proved his cruel hardness of the heart is this fact, that he had already attained the age of seven-and-twenty without having ever inquired why women were created!

It is true that many persons (especially ladies) who had arrived at a certain age considered Colin the best young man under the sun. His figure, his unrestrained manner, his look, his smile had the good fortune to please, and no one mentioned Beelzebub. But the decisions of such judges are not always to be depended upon.

While old and young had become reconciled to the innocent Marriette, Colin alone continued to feel no compassion for the poor girl. If the conversation turned upon Marriette, he became silent as the grave. If he met her on the road he grew alternately pale and red from indignation, and cast furious glances at the proves.

When the young people assembled in the evening at the ruins of the castle on the sea-shore, in order to sing, dance, or play at various games, Colin never failed to make one of the party; but the moment Marriette appeared the malicious Colin became silent and gloomy, and left the circle. He would not have induced him to sing another note. It was such a pity, for his voice was so sweet and powerful that it could move him with pleasure; and his songs were inexhaustible.

All the girls liked Colin, and he was civil to them all. He flattered them, but he madness both fear and love; and when he smiled one would have wished to make him sit for his portrait. But, unmoved by all, the beautiful Marriette never looked at him, and therein she was perfectly right. It was a matter of indifference to her whether he smiled or not, and as to his roguish looks, she would not even hear of them; and there again she was right. If he related an anecdote, just when he was the most attentively she commenced teasing her neighbors; three vowels sometimes at Peter, sometimes at Paul, and laughed and chattered the whole evening. This vexed the proud gentleman, and he generally broke off in the middle of his story and walked gloomily away.

Revenge is sweet; and Madame Manon's daughter might have felt triumphant; but Marriette was too good, and had a tender heart. When he ceased speaking she was grieved; if he looked melancholy her laugh was hushed; if he withdrew she did not remain long; and, arrived at home, she wept bitter tears of repentance.

Father Jerome, the priest of La Napoule, an old man of seventy, had all these things in mind, and but one defect; namely, in consequence of his advanced age he was very deaf. This defect, however, did not spoil his sermons to be the less edifying to his congregation, and he was always listened to with attention. It is true he had only two or three hearers, which he preached as invariably as if his whole religion consisted therein. Either "Little children, love one another," or "Wonderful are the dispensations of Heaven." They contained, however, so much faith, hope, and charity that one might, if driven to extremities, be saved by them. The little children loved one another most obediently, and waited for the dispensations of Heaven; but his sermons had no effect upon Colin with his heart of flint, who, when he appeared to be well-disposed, had always some evil design.

The Fair of Vence is a great source of amusement to the inhabitants of La Napoule, who, although they may not have money to purchase much, see at least a great variety of merchandise.

Marriette and her mother went to the fair; and Colin was also there. He purchased various nick-nacks and bonbons for his fair acquaintances, but not the most trifling thing for Marriette. And yet he was perpetually at her heels. He did not speak to her, nor she to him, and it was evident to every one that he was brooding mischief.

Madame Manon, stopping suddenly at a shop, exclaimed, "Oh, Marriette, look at that beautiful mug! I wish you would not disdain to put the white dove with its green neck is perched opposite the vulture, as if they were about to bill and coo!"

Marriette could not sufficiently admire it. "Oh! mother," she exclaimed, "if I had such a mug I would not drink out of it; it is too beautiful! I would fill it with flowers, and fix my eyes constantly on the Garden of Eden. It is in it now, mother, and I look at it—the picture, I feel as if I were in Paradise."

So saying, Marriette called her young companions, others followed, and the large half of the inhabitants of La Napoule were standing opposite the beautiful mug. The price was timidly asked. The merchant answered, almost timidly, whereupon they all walked silently away.

When there were no longer any of the inhabitants of La Napoule in the shop, Colin stole up to it, threw a hundred livres on the counter, laid the mug in a box filled with cotton, and carried it off. His malicious joke was unknown to any one.

On his way home, in the dusk of the evening, near the Fount of Love, he met old Jacques, the servant of the judge. Jacques was as good a fellow as ever lived, but as stupid as an ass.

"Hallo, Jacques!" said Colin, "if you will leave this box at Madame Manon's house. Should any one inquire who sent it, say a stranger, and that is all. I shall never forgive you if you betray my name."

Jacques promised to attend to his direction, took the mug under his arm, and walked toward the house surrounded by olive-trees and African acacias.

Before Jacques had reached his destination he met his master, Judge Hautmartin, who said to him, "What have you got there?"

"Because, Monsieur Colin said that he would never forgive me if I betrayed him."

"It is a good thing that you can keep a secret; but as it is so long since you had better give me the box. I am going to-morrow, at all events, to Madame Manon, and I shall execute the love commission which Monsieur Colin." It will prevent your having to go out of your way."

Jacques, accustomed to obey his master implicitly, delivered up the box to the judge, who carried immediately into his house, and commenced examining it with the greatest curiosity. On the lid was written in large red chalk:

"For the amiable and beloved Marriette."

M. Hautmartin knew well, however, that this was only written in jest, and that there was some wicked trick in it. He accordingly opened the box with great precaution, and found that either the mug or what might be concealed in it; but when he had caught a glimpse of the beautiful mug that he had seen that morning at Vence, he was astonished.

For M. Hautmartin was a man who was quite as well versed in justice as in injustice. He perceived immediately that Colin's design was to injure Marriette by asserting, when the mug was in her possession, that it was the gift of some lovesick person in the town, and thereby cause her to be shunned by all honest people.

To prevent all misunderstanding, the judge resolved to acknowledge himself as the donor. He was in love with Marriette, and would have been well pleased to have seen her in his possession. To do him justice, he had no personal defect; and although Colin was the handsomest man in La Napoule, M. Hautmartin had the advantage of him in two particulars—namely, in years, and in the possession of a large, of an enormous house and garden, like a castle, which always preceded him, in order to announce his approach, was positively an elephant among the houses of mankind.

With this elephant, his good intentions, and the mug, the judge went the next morning to the house surrounded by olive-trees and African acacias.

"Nothing appears to me too costly for the lovely Marriette," said he; "you admired this mug yesterday at the fair. Permit me, charming Marriette, to lay it and my enamored heart at your feet."

Madame Manon and Marriette were astonished and delighted when they saw the mug. Madame Manon's eyes sparkled with pleasure; but Marriette, turning to the judge, said: "I am not unkept of either your heart or your mug." Her mother became furious, and exclaimed: "I shall, however, accept of both. Oh, you little fool, for whom are you waiting? Do you reject the Judge of La Napoule in the expectation that a Count of Provence will make you his bride? I know better what is your advantage. M. Hautmartin, I shall consider it an honor to be able to call myself your lady-love."

Marriette walked out of the room weeping bitterly, and detesting in her heart the beautiful mug.

The judge stroked his nose with the palm of his hand, and wisely observed: "Madame Manon, do not be angry. You are right. Time does will acquiesce when it knows me better. I am not impatient. I understand womankind, and I feel convinced that, before three months have elapsed, I shall have crept into Marriette's heart."

His nose is much too long for that, thought Marriette, who stood listening at the door.

And, in fact, three months passed away without M. Hautmartin's having forced even the end of his nose into her heart.

But during these three months Marriette had enough to occupy her mind. The mug, and something besides, caused her a great deal of annoyance.

The mug formed the subject of conversation for a fortnight in La Napoule. Every one said that it was a present of the judge's, and that all things were arranged for the nuptials. The more scandalous-minded of the younger young companions that she would rather throw herself into the sea than marry the judge, that she had been petrified in teasing, by saying: "Oh, how blessed it will be to repose under the shadow of his nose!" and other such like impertinences.

Then Madame Manon was so barbarous as to force Marriette to wash the mug every morning in the fountain, and to fill it with flowers, that she hoped thereby to accustom her daughter to the mug, and the love of the donor; but Marriette continued to detest the mug, and the giver, and she considered her employment at the fountain an actual punishment. Annoyance the second.

Then regularly, for a week, she found on the rock, beside the fountain, a bouquet of the choicest flowers, appearing to have been arranged expressly for the beautiful Marriette. There was not a slip of paper twisted round the stalks of the flowers, upon which was written "Dear Marriette." Annoyance the third. There was no use to believe that there were still fairies and magicians in the world. Consequently the flowers had been left there by Monsieur Hautmartin. Marriette would not even smell them because they had been contaminated by the breath from his nostrils; but she took the bouquet home, as it was prettier than wild flowers. The slip of paper she tore into a thousand pieces, and scattered it over the fountain, that it might sink to the bottom. But this did not vex M. Hautmartin in the least, for his love was as immeasurably great after its kind as his nose after its kind. Annoyance the third.

At last, however, in the course of conversation with the judge, she discovered that he was not the donor of the flowers. Who could it be? Marriette was astonished when she made this unhoped-for discovery, and, as she could not find out, she took the flowers with much more pleasure from the rock, but—Who had left them there? Marriette's heart beat—it was quite a thing for a young girl) very curious. She guessed first one, then another, young man in La Napoule, but it was not the right one. She reasoned and listened until late at night; she rose earlier in the morning; but she watched and listened in vain, and yet, every day, with the miraculous flowers lay upon the rock, and on the slip of paper that was wound round them she read the tender sigh addressed to "Dear Marriette!" This was sufficient to have excited the curiosity of the most indifferent person. Unfortunately, however, Marriette was at last positive torture. Annoyance the fourth.

On Sunday Father Jerome again preached upon the text: "Wonderful are the dispensations of Heaven;" and Marriette hoped that, by some wonderful dispensation, she would be enabled to discover who left the flowers. The father Jerome, thought she, is always right.

One summer's night Marriette was awakened by the opening and shutting of the door of her room, and, having dressed herself, she went out to wash her face and hands at the fountain. She took her hour-bas with her, as she intended remaining for an hour on the sea-shore, and perhaps bathe in it secluded spot that she had discovered.

But in order to get to the secluded spot it was necessary to ascend the rock at the back of the house, and thence descending to pass by some outmeasured path. Before she left the house Marriette could not pass by; for under the youngest of the palm-trees lay a young man, and asleep, quite beside him lay a bouquet of the most beautiful flowers. She also saw a piece of paper twisted round the stalks, which probably contained an address to her. How could Marriette pass by?

She stood still, and trembled from head to foot. Then she determined to return home but before she had gone many steps she stopped, and looked back at the sleeper. At this distance his face could not be recognized: now it never was the secret to be discovered. Curiosity tripped lightly toward the palm-tree; but the sleeper appeared to move, and she again ran away. The movement, however, had been not imagination on her part, and she again approached the tree. Could it be possible that he is pretending to be asleep? thought she, again running toward home. But who would run away on a count of a mere possibility? She commenced her journey to the palm-tree with renewed courage.

During this wavering of her mind, between curiosity and fear—this tripping backward and forward between the house and the palm-tree—she had advanced one time some steps nearer the sleeper, for curiosity was overcoming her fear.

"Of what consequence is it to me whether he be asleep or awake? The path leads him, and I merely pass by."

But, instead of passing by, she stopped in order to examine the sleeper's face, and sat an end to all uncertainty concerning the donor of the flowers. He seemed to the continued sleeping as soundly as if he had not closed his eyes for a month before. And who was it—who else could it be—but the regretted Wilhelm?

And so he it was, who, by sending the mug, had caused the poor girl so much annoyance, and had involved her in the vexatious affair with M. Hautmartin: he it was who had wasted her by leaving the flowers on the rock, in order to excite her curiosity. And why? Because he hated Marriette, and treated her on all occasions in the most unpardonable manner. Whenever it was possible he avoided her; but if that was not in his power, he made a point of doing something to annoy her. There was no girl in La Napoule to whom Wilhelm was more obliged than to Marriette. Only think! he had never asked her to dance with him, and she danced beautifully.

There he lay now, caught, betrayed. Revenge took possession of Marriette's breast. How could she chastise him? She took the bouquet, unfastened it, and strewed the flowers with joy, indignation over the sleeper. But the slip of paper, upon which "Marriette" was written, she stuck hurriedly into her bosom. She wished to preserve this proof of his handwriting for future occasions. Marriette was not without thought of going away. But she was not sufficiently revenged: she could not bring herself to leave the young man without giving him his own coin. Accordingly she took the violet-colored ribbon from her hat, twisted it tightly round the sleeper's left leg, and fastened the three knots, fast to the palm-tree. When he awakes how astonished he will be! How tortured by curiosity to know who has played him such a trick! That he could not possibly discover, and so much the better. He deserved it.

Marriette was so merciful to him that no sooner had she carried her plan into execution than she began to repent of what she had done. Her bosom heaved vigorously, and if she could, even a tear stood in her eye as she looked compassionately at the criminal. She walked slowly back toward the palm-trees, and once more looked round while slowly ascending the rock. Then, hearing her mother's voice, she hurried home.

That very day Colin played another trick. What did he do? He resolved to pat poor Marriette to the test. Ever since he had made mention to her that her violet-colored ribbon was known to every one in La Napoule! Colin knew it only too well. He wanted to ascertain in his mind, and played it every where as a trophy. Every one exclaimed, "It has been given him by Marriette!" And the young girls exclaimed, "The villain!" and all the young men, who liked Marriette, exclaimed, "The villain!"

"What, Madame Manod," shouted Judge Hautmartin, as he entered her house, and he shouted so loud that his words were echoed marvelously in the room, "what is that! is it possible that you have allowed my intended bride to give her hat-ribbon to farmer Colin? It is high time to solemnize our marriage." When that has taken place I shall have a right to dictate."

"I quite agree with you," replied Madame Manon. "If matters have come to that, we must have the wedding immediately. That will put an end to all such nonsense."

"But, Madame Manod, your daughter perseveres in refusing my proposal."

"Prepare the marriage-feast!"

"But she still persists in one kind knot; and if I sit down beside her, the little wild thing jumps up and runs away."

"M. Hautmartin, prepare the marriage-feast!"

"But if Marriette will not consent?"

"We shall take her by surprise. The ceremony shall take place on Monday by the rock Derome. We shall easily induce him to consent; for I am Marriette's mother, and you are the person of the greatest authority in La Napoule," she shut obey. But Marriette must not know any thing about our plan. I shall send her early on Monday morning to deliver a parcel to Derome, in order that she may not suspect any thing; and he must endeavor to persuade her to comply with our wishes. Half an hour afterward we shall make our appearance, and then, without a moment's delay, to the altar. And even if Marriette should be frightened out of it, will be of no consequence, for the old gentleman can not hear. But do not say a word on the subject to Marriette or any one in La Napoule."

Thus the affair was arranged between them. Marriette little dreamed of the happiness that awaited her. She could think of nothing but Colin's cruelty in having made her a subject of conversation for the whole village. Bursting with bitterly she may have repented her indiscretion with respect to the ribbon, in her heart she forgave the ill-treatment. Marriette was more than good-natured. She said to her mother and her young companions, "Colin found my ribbon: I did not give it to him. He is now trying to vex me about it. You know he has always endeavored to annoy me whenever he had an opportunity!"

Alas! the poor girl little knew that the malicious wretch was meditating new enormities.

The next morning Marriette carried the mug as usual to the fountain. No flowers lay upon the rock; but it was too early, for the sun was only beginning to make its appearance above the surface of the sea.

Soon afterward she heard the sound of footsteps, and looking up she beheld Colin with the flowers in his hand. Marriette blushed deeply. Colin stammered, "Good-morning, Marriette! I found some flowers that come from his heart;" he uttered it with difficulty.

"Why do you wear my ribbon so publicly, Colin?" said Marriette, as she placed the mug on the rock. "You know I did not give it to you."

"You did not give it to me, dear Marriette?" inquired he, and pressed her hand tenderly.

Marriette, ashamed of having told a falsehood, cast down her eyes, and said, after a pause, "Well, I did give it to you, but you ought not to have exhibited it. I request that you will return it to me."

While slowly taking it off his hat, his vexation was so great that he could neither suppress a sigh which rose from his breast, nor conceal a tear which stood in his eye.

"Dear Marriette, allow me to keep your ribbon!" said he, softly.

"No!" answered she.

Thereupon his rancor turned to despair. Looking first with a sigh toward heaven, then gloomily at Marriette, who stood very downcast eyes quietly and innocently at the fountain, he wound the violet-colored ribbon around the bouquet, and exclaiming, "Here, you have it!" he dashed the flowers so spitefully against the beautiful mug, that it fell from the rock and was broken to pieces. He then ran exultingly away.

Madame Manon, who had been listening behind the window, had seen and heard all that had passed. When she saw Colin depart she was so horrified that she lost her sight, hearing, and almost her speech. While squeezing herself through the narrow door, in order to peruse the criminal, the mouldering stones in the wall gave way, and the window frame, falling with a terrific crash on the ground, was broken to pieces.

So many misfortunes at once would have caused any other woman to have lost her presence of mind; but Madame Manon quickly recovered herself. "What a fortunate circumstance that I witnessed his violence!" exclaimed she. "He must appear before the judge, and he shall pay the weight of the mug and window in gold. That will pay for your trousseau, Marriette! But when her daughter brought her the fragments of the mug—when she saw Paradise Lost, Adam without a head, and nothing remaining of Eve but her legs; the serpent triumphing unhurt, the forbidden apple and the little blue lamb had disappeared even to its tail—as if the tiger had swallowed it—then Madame Manon broke out into lamentations against Colin, and concluded by saying, "It is I who am evident that it was broken by the devil."

With Madame Manon the broken mug Madame Manon betook herself to Judge Hautmartin at the ninth hour, that being his appointed time for sitting in judgment. Exhibiting the fragments and Paradise Lost, she vociferously made her complaint. Marriette wept bitterly.

When the judge saw the broken mug, and when he saw his betrothed in tears, he was filled with such just indignation against Colin that his nose became the same violet color as Marriette's renowned hat ribbon; and he instantly dispatched bailiffs to summon the transgressor.

Colin arrived, handcuffed, under a special Madame Manon repeated her accusation with considerable eloquence in the presence of the judge, bailiffs, and Colin. Exhibiting the relics of the ewing, walked up to Marriette and whispered: "Forgive me, Marriette, as I forgive you. I have only broken your mug sentimentally; but you—you have broken my heart!"

"What is the meaning of all this whispering?" inquired Judge Hautmartin, in his official majesty. "Listen to the charges that are brought against you, and defend yourself."

"I can not defend myself. I broke the mug without intending to do so; and Colin—"

"I almost believe him!" said Marriette, sobbing; "I was much to blame in the way for had I not offended and exasperated him, he would not have thrown the flowers and ribbons so impetuously. He could not help it."

"Good Heavens!" shrieked Madame Manon, "is the girl going to vindicate him? Judge Hautmartin, I appeal to you. You insulted my mug, that he does not attempt to deny; and he was the cause of my breaking the window; should not deny that, I can swear."

"As you can not defend yourself, M. Colin," said the judge, "you must pay three hundred livres for the mug, and three for the value of it; and for—"

"No," interrupted Colin, "it was not worth so much; for when I bought it at the fair of Marriette, I only paid a hundred livres."

"You bought it, M. Impudence?" shouted the judge, his whole face becoming the color of Marriette's ribbon. He would have said more had he not been afraid of unpleasant explanations.

But Colin, indignant at the imputation, exclaimed, "I must open my servant with the mug to Marriette the day of the fair. There he is, standing at the door. He can bear witness. Jacques, did I not give you the box to carry to Madame Manon's?"

Notwithstanding M. Hautmartin's endeavors to interrupt him, the simple Jacques said—"Subject yourself, Judge Hautmartin; you know you took M. Colin's box from me, and carried the contents yourself to Madame Manon. The box is lying there among your papers."

The bailiffs were ordered to turn simple Jacques out of the room; and Colin was also desired to withdraw until his presence should be required.

"Very well, M. Hautmartin!" said Colin; "depend upon it this is your last trick in La Napoule. Your having endeavored to insinuate yourself into Madame Manon and Marriette's good graces at my expense is not the only transaction that has come to my knowledge. If you want me you had better ride to Grasse and inquire for me at the governor's." So saying, Colin walked away.

The mug perplexed M. Hautmartin so much that he scarcely knew what he was doing. Madame Manon shook her head; for the affair was beginning to assume suspicious appearance. "Who is to pay me now for the broken mug?" inquired she.

"I," answered Marriette, with a glowing countenance—"I am almost paid for it."

Colin rode that very day to Grasse, waited on the governor, and returned early the next morning. When M. Hautmartin heard of his having done so, he laughed and lulled all Madame Manon's suspicions by saying that he would advise his nose to be cut off if Colin had not to pay three hundred livres for the mug. He also went with Madame Manon to Father Jerome to arrange about the wedding, and to enjoin him to impress upon Marriette that it was her duty, as an obedient daughter, not to oppose her mother's wishes. The pious old gentleman promised to do what they desired, although he had not understood the half of what had been shouted in his ear.

As to Marriette, she now, for the first time, valued the broken mug, which she carried into her sleeping apartment; and it seemed to her as if the Evening Star had disappeared from it had been placed in her bosom.

On Monday morning Madame Manon said to her daughter, "Dress yourself nicely, and carry this myrtle wreath to Father Jerome; he wants it for a bride. Marriette put on her holiday dress, took the wreath unsuspiciously, and carried it to Father Jerome.

On the way she met Colin, who saluted her in a friendly manner, and when he heard where she was taking the wreath, he said: "I am going to the same place in order to pay Father Jerome the money for the mug." Colin walked on in silence he took her hand; upon which they both trembled so much as if they had some evil design upon one another.

"Have you forgiven me?" whispered Colin, timidly. "Ah! Marriette, what have I done to cause you to act with such cruelty toward me?"

She could only say, "Never mind, Colin, you shall have the ribbon again; and I shall keep your mug. It was sent by you, was it not?"

"Oh, Marriette! can you doubt it? I should like to give you every thing I possess. Will you in future be kinder in your manner?"

She made no answer; but as they entered the priest's house she acted as a sidelong look at him, and observing a tear standing in his handsome eye, she hoped, "Dear Colin!" He seized her hand, and in the act of kissing it, when the door of an adjoining room opened, and the venerable Father Jerome stood before them. The young people imagined to have become suddenly giddy, for they held each other fast. I can not tell whether this proceeded from the kissing of the hand, or from consideration for the old man.

Marriette gave the myrtle wreath to Father Jerome, who placed it on her head, saying, "Little children, love one another!" And he then exhorted the good girl in the most impressive and affectionate manner to love Colin; for the old gentleman either on account of his deafness had not heard, or in consequence of his failing memory had forgotten the name of the intended bride and naturally concluded that Colin was the bridegroom.

On hearing the exhortation of Father Jerome Marriette was so overcome that she burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Alas! I have loved him this long time, but he knows me."

"I hate you, Marriette!" exclaimed Colin. "My soul has been wrapped up in you ever since you came to La Napoule. How could I either hope or believe that you loved me? Are you not adored by every one in the village?"

"Why should I? You did you avoid me on all occasions, and show such a decided preference for my companions?"

"Oh, Marriette!" whenever I saw you I was overcome by fear, dejection, grief, and love. I had not courage to approach you; and yet when I was not near you I was miserable."

During this conversation Father Jerome, imagining that they were quarreling, put his arm round both, and joining them together, he said, imploringly, "Little children, love one another!"

Thereupon Marriette sank upon Colin's breast, who clasped her in his arms, and perfect bliss was depicted on their countenances. While Colin pressed the lovely Marriette's pretty mouth to the priest—the whole world—was forgotten. In fact, so completely had they lost their recollection, that Father Jerome slowly followed Father Jerome into the church and up to the altar.

"Marriette!" sighed he.

"Colin!" sighed she.

There were many pious persons praying in the church, who were much astonished when they witnessed the marriage of Colin and Marriette. Many departed before the conclusion of the ceremony, in order to announce the event in La Napoule.

Father Jerome led the bride and bridegroom back to his house instantly rejoicing that they had made so little opposition, and that he had been able to perform his task with so little difficulty.

Just then Madame Manon arrived, completely out of breath. She had waited at home for the bridegroom, but she had waited in vain; and as the last sound of the church bell died away her anxiety increased to such a degree that she went herself to M. Hautmartin's. There new horrors awaited her; for she was informed that the governor had made his appearance, and having examined the records and accounts of Judge Hautmartin, had placed him immediately under arrest.

"The impious Colin has brought that about!" thought she as she hurried to Father Jerome, in order to make an excuse for the delay of the wedding. The good old man, proud of his work, smiled as he led the new married pair up to her.

Madame Manon really became speechless when she was told what had occurred; but Colin, who was now more sure of his tongue than he had had during his whole life, commenced a speech all about his love, the broken mug, the duplicity of the judge, and how he had unmasked him in Grasse. He concluded by begging of Madame Manon to give him her blessing; for neither he nor Marriette could be to blame, and what was done could not be undone.

Father Jerome, who for a length of time could not conceive what had happened, was at last made to understand the mistake about the bridegroom; whereupon he folded his hands, and piously raised his eyes to heaven while exclaiming, "Wonderful are the dispensations of Heaven!" Colin and Marriette kissed his hand, and Madame Manon and the young couple were blessing remarking, at the same time, that her head was so confused that she did not know what to think of the whole affair. When, however, she discovered the extent of her son-in-law's riches she was quite satisfied with him, especially as M. Hautmartin, together with his nose, had been taken as a prisoner to Grasse.

The broken mug has been preserved as a relic in the family until the present day.

TUCKER-BED HOSE.—A hose which had his breed improved by means of a nailer, constitutes a fellow with a long whip, till he ain't worth 18 cents for any purpose except standing hostler.

TUCKER-BED GENTLEMEN.—A bob tail coat, a 3 cent paper collar, a white kotton weskit, taller trowsers without any feet in the legs, slight coffee colored boots, pair of veiler gloves, and inside of'em all, a thing as big in circumference as a man, but, as for nourishment fle-factors any, poorly executed and not kalkulated to flourish. Mind and body unimpaired, and brain sick here. Mustash indispensable, brains unnecessary.

"Why Pa, I'm going to dye my doll's pinafore red."
"But what have you got to dye it?"

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION OF PETROLEUM ON LAKE ERIE, OCTOBER 26, 1868.—[SKETCHED BY T. T. SWEENY.]

EXPLOSION ON LAKE ERIE.

IN the explosion on board the bark H. L. Clifton, on the evening of October 26, we have a new illustration of the perils to which human life is exposed in navigation. This vessel cleared from the port of Cleveland for Liverpool, England. According to her manifest there were on board 1460 barrels of spirits of petroleum (or naphtha), 499 barrels of oil of petroleum, the value of which was set down at $12,428. Besides the above there were 17,500 staves and 1100 boat oars, of the value of $1610, the aggregate value of the cargo being $14,038, as made out at the Custom-house.

The crew consisted of the captain, two mates, steward, and six seamen. The captain's wife was also on board, making eleven persons in all. The vessel and cargo were valued at $50,000.

GEORGE L. DE WOLF, the captain of the bark, states that he left port at twenty minutes to five o'clock, Sunday afternoon, in tow of the tug W. D. Cushing. About three-quarters of an hour after leaving the tug, the canvas being set, and all hands on deck cleaning up the vessel, a sudden and terrific explosion was heard. The whole deck seemed to heave. Barrels, oars, and staves were blown into the air with great force. The explosion seemed to extend the entire length of the vessel. One man was blown overboard. Every person on board was thrown into the air, some of them as high as twenty or thirty feet. The deck settled back, all out of shape. As soon as the explosion took place the flames burst out, and the vessel was soon wrapped in a sheet of fire. The sails and rigging caught immediately, and in the next moment were all burning. The small boat was got down as soon as possible, but not a moment too soon, as the flames were raging with great fury, and time was hardly given to get all on board. MRS. DE WOLF was in the cabin at the time of the explosion. The boat then put out in search of MR. HEARNS. He was soon found; but when the boat reached him he was nearly exhausted, being badly bruised. After taking him on board the boat headed for the harbor. When about half-way into port they met the tug Friendcille, and were taken on board. Captain DE WOLF also states that he can not account for the explosion. There was no light or fire in the stove in the forecastle, and only one light in the cabin. There were no lights above deck except such as the navigation laws compel all vessels to carry. Every thing on board was lost. The ship's papers and the clothing of the officers and crew were all destroyed by the explosion and the fire. Some of the men came ashore with scarcely any clothing on.

The scene presented by the burning vessel just after the explosion was as magnificent as it was terrible. The water was perfectly calm, reflecting the burning ship upon its surface. A light breeze inland fanned the great volume of smoke over the city. The lurid flames illuminated the lake for miles around. The light was perceptible upon the fronts of houses and faces of people along the shore. The wind, shifting from point to point, by 8 o'clock was blowing a stiff breeze to the eastward, carrying the vessel before it, and leaving a line of burning oil upon the surface of the water behind.

As remarkable and miraculous as it may seem, there were no lives lost. Nearly all on board were more or less injured. MR. HEARNS, who was blown overboard, was so badly burned that he was taken to the Marine Hospital as soon as he came ashore. The steward's wife was injured, and had to be carried severely injured. It is fortunate that the explosion did not occur in the middle of the Atlantic, where it would probably have been disastrous to the crew.

PROGRESS.—COLUMBUS sailed to the American coast in a few hundred-ton ship, and first landed upon the Island of St. Domingo. This is but a few weeks' supply of this article, which these gentlemen use in the manufacture of the celebrated PLANTATION BITTERS. We are informed by an exchange that MESSRS. DRAKE & CO. have not advertised a dollar for a year, but that the sales of this article continue at the former enormous figure. WORKS OF LITERATURE AND ART.

THIS Association has been formed for the dissemination throughout the country of

THE STANDARD PRODUCTIONS OF LITERATURE,

As well as artistic works of the highest class, at a moderate individual expense. It is thus proposed to assist the progress of our national knowledge and to elevate our national taste, while by a partial application of those principles which have generally insured the success of all co-operative and business Unions, the actual advantage of the immediate direct effected will be placed almost wholly in the hands of the purchaser.

GENERAL PLAN.

In accordance with this design, the following plan has been adopted, and is submitted to the public, in full confidence that it can not fail to receive their unanimating sanction and support.

The management of the Athenæum will be under the direction and immediate supervision of

MR. H. W. DERBY

Its Business Superintendent, and a council of five of its most prominent members, whose services are given to the patrons of the Athenæum with the sole view of making it a thorough and, at the same time, a permanent success.

A spacious Bookstore, with Art Galleries adjoining, has been established at

680 BROADWAY,

In which the most valuable and prominent publications, in every branch of Literature and Science, with all the leading American Periodicals, will be sold at their publishers' lowest regular price. In addition to this,

Every Purchaser to the Amount of $5

WORKS OF ART,

the Management of the Athenæum guaranteeing that such distribution shall take place within four months.

In order that the public may judge of the value and high order of the Paintings and other Works of Art which will be at the First Distribution, they have been placed upon

AWARDED TO THE PURCHASERS

FREE EXHIBITION

AT THE GALLERIES OF THE ATHENÆUM,

Their actual value being

One Hundred Thousand Dollars.

It may, therefore, be at once seen that every purchaser will not only receive the direct value of his money in the books or other goods purchased, but at the same time have an interest in the distribution of

THE WORKS OF ART NOW ON EXHIBITION.

No person is limited to a single certificate of membership, but can receive two or more, according to the amount of purchases.

BUYERS OF BOOKS

Will see the advantages in making their purchases from the Athenæum, which is ready to supply them with every work published in the United States at the current time, as they receive, on so doing, a gratuitous Ticket—provided their purchase amounts to FIVE DOLLARS—with the books, which are

MARKED AT THEIR LOWEST ACTUAL VALUE

The Principals of Schools, Colleges, and Public Libraries, will, it is believed, readily perceive the advantages derivable to their institutions by becoming patrons of the Athenæum, as they will, in addition to their purchases, become the actual

ONCE A MONTH.

A New Literary Magazine, Unique in Size and Style, and first-class in every essential requisite.

We shall issue at an early day the first number (for January, 1869) of a new magazine, to embrace all the most popular features of The Atlantic and The Living Age.

Besides giving original articles from leading American writers, the editors will select, with care and discrimination, from English and Continental periodical publications, the best literary matter to be found. This will give them so wide a choice of articles that they can offer the readers of "ONCE A MONTH" the finest productions of the best writers for periodicals on both sides of the Atlantic.

While the publication of a mere story-magazine will be avoided, the editors will so carefully avoid the heaviness of political, financial, and polemic discussion. Fresh, racy, instructive, curious, progressive, and imaginative articles will only be published.

In the department of fiction, "ONCE A MONTH" will give its readers a rich and varied feast. The first number will contain the opening chapters of a NEW SERIAL Story, written especially for the magazine, by an American author already recognized by the public as one of our first novelists. It is a story that will attract wide attention.

SIZE AND STYLE.—"Once a Month" will be a 16mo, of 96 pages, double columns, and contain a large amount of reading. In size and style it will be unlike any of our magazines, and present a pleasing novelty to the reader that will be at once recognized as a desirable advantage.

The Great Medical Mistake

Of former days was an utter neglect of sanitary precautions. No efficient means were adopted for the prevention of sickness. Sewerage was unknown in cities; drainage was rarely attempted in the country. Heaps of offal were left to rot in the public streets, and domestic cleanliness, the great antidote to febrile disease, was sadly neglected. It is not so now. Wise laws, philanthropic institutions, and a vigilant sanitary police, have, to a great extent, remedied the evil. Not so this ail. PREVENTIVE MEDICINE has helped materially to lessen the rates of mortality. It is not too much to say that TENS OF THOUSANDS EXCEPT sickness in unhealthy seasons in consequence of having AVOIDED THEIR ATTACK IN ADVANCE by a course of

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

This pure and powerful vegetable tonic and alterative comprises the extracts and essences of a variety of roots and herbs, selected for their strengthening, soothing, vitalizing, and purifying properties. These medicinal agents are incorporated with a spirit absolutely free from fusel oil, combined with deftine, more or less, all the liquors of commerce, and their effect is diffused through the whole frame by this active, yet harmless stimulant. Nothing is such a promoter of the system as readers it all but impertious to the exterior causes of disease, such as damp, fog, sudden alternations of temperature, &c. Strength, and the perfect regularity of all the functions of the body, are the best safe-guards against atmospheric poison and the effects of miasma. In fact, HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS are the best strengthening and regulating medicine at present known. For dyspepsia and biliousness they are an effectual and absolute

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

At the very height of the festive rejoicings, toward the close, and apparently as a climax to the banqueting, the chairman introduced Mr. LAIRD personally to Minister JOHNSON. The two distinguished personages on this grasped hands firmly and shook hands cordially. In the embrace they still retained hold of each others hands, while exchanging some words which were evidently intended to be private between them.—London News.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 621.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

PETROLEUM V. NASBY.

THE portrait of this prominent personage, given below, suggests the propriety of quoting from the "Profit of Interdenary Change" of his historical work, entitled "Swingin Round the Cirkle," a paragraph or two explanatory of the origin of that celebrated volume. He says: "There is a vacancy in the mind uv the public for just sich a book ez this, else it had never bin published. There is a vacancy in my pocket for the money I am to reseeve ez copy-rite, else I had never slung together in consecootive shape, the ijees wich I her from time to time flung out thro the public press, for the enlitenment uv an ongrateful public and the guidance uv an obtuse Dimocrasy. I didn't put these thots in mine upon paper for amoozement. There bean't bin anythin amoozin in Dimocrisy for the past five years, and the standard-bearers, the captins uv fifties and hundreds, the leaders uv the hosts, her led a rather rough time uv it. Our prominence made us uncomfortable, for we hev bin the mark uv every writer, every orator, ez well ez uv every egg-thrower, in the country. Twict I wuz drafted into a service I detested—twict I wuz torn from the buzzum uv my family, wich I wuz gittin along well enough, even if the wife uv my buzzum wood occasionally git obstinit, and refooze to give me sich washin money ez was nessary to my existence, preferrin to squander it upon hired and clothes for the children—twice, I say, I wuz pulled into the servis, and twict I wuz forced to desert to the Dimocrisy uv the south, rather than fite agin em. When finally the thumb uv my left hand wuz accidentally shot off, owin to my foot becomin entangled into the lock uv my gun, wich thumb was also accidentally across the muzzle thereof, and I wuz no longer liable to military duoty and could bid Provost Marshels defiance, I only steered clear uv Scylla to go bumpin onto Charybdis. I coodent let Dimocrisy alone, and the eggins—the ridin upon rails —the takin uv the oath—but why shood I harrow up the public bozzum? I stood it all till one nite I wuz pulled out uv bed, compelled to kneel outo my bare knees in the cold snow, the extremity uv my under garment, wich modesty forbids me to mension the name uv it, fluttrin in a Janooary wind, and by a crood uv laffin solgers compelled to take their oath and drink a pint uv raw undiloted water! The oath give me inflamashun uv the brane and the water inflamached uv the stumick, and for six long weeks I lay a wreck uv my former self. Ez I arose from that bed and saw in a glass the remains uv my pensive beauty, I vowed to wage a uncensin war on the party wich caused sich havoc, and I hev kept my oath.

"I her bin in the Apossel bizniss more extensively than any man since the time uv Paul. First I established a church uv Dembcrats in a little ossis I diskivered in the ablishn State uv Ohio, to wit, at Wingett's Corners, where there wuz four groceries, but nary church or skool-house within four miles, and whose population was unanimously Dimocratic, the grocery-keepers bein mortgages on all the land around em—but alas! I was forced to leave it after the election uv Lankin in 1864. Noo Gersey bein the only State North wich was unequivocated, to her I fled, and at Smith's Rest (wich is in Noo Gersey) I erected another tabernacle. There I stayed, and et and drank and was merry: but Ablishism pursood me thither, and in the fall uv '65 that State got ornery, and smash, and went Ablisin, and agin like the wandrin Jew, I wuz forced to pull up, and wend my weary way to Kentucky, where at Confedrit X Roads I feel that I am safe. Massychoosets ideas can't penetrate us here. The aristocracy bleeve in freedom uv speech, but they desire to exercise a supervision over it, that they may not be led astray.

"It is proper to state that the papers uv which this volume is composed wuz written at various times and under various circumstances. They shift from grave to gay, from lively to severe, with much alacrity. I might say more, but wherefore? Ez the record uv a year uv hopes and fears, uv exultation and depression, it may possess interest to many not—owdin to the style uv the reader. Whatever may be its fate, one thing I am certain uv—to wit, I am a regiely commissioned P. M.; and while the approval of the public mite lighten the toils uv offisil life and sweeten the whisky with the salary purchases, the frowns uv the said public can't reduce me to the walks uv private life. They can't frown me out uv office, nor from P. M. General Randall's name off my commishn."

PETROLEUM V. NASBY, EX-POSTMASTER.

THE SUBMERSION OF ARICA, PERU.

WE have already placed before our readers some account of the terrible earthquake which lately visited the western sea-board of South America, destroying eight cities, the most important on that coast, and making its terrible influence felt northward from Arica, the central point, to Callao, a distance of about 650 miles, and southward to Cobija, in Bolivia, a distance of 280 miles or more. The worst fears are fully confirmed, and the horrible scenes and incidents at first but vaguely imagined are set out in later accounts in pictures but too real. The Peruvian sea-port town of Arica, the submersion of which is depicted in our engraving, was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 1605, and now, with seven other cities, it has actually ceased to exist. Arica, as we have said, seems to have been the focus of the shock. In the mountainous parts of the country, at the back of this populous coast town, a sensation was experienced as from the collision of two heavy masses; and the hidden revulsion was followed by three fearful undulations of the earth, each undulation accompanied by a tidal wave, the second of greater lateral extent than the first, and the third larger, in turn, than the second. A witness of the disastrous effects at Arica says:

"The hour was that when by custom most of the inhabitants had just closed their daily labors and were at their homes. The first of the startling indications of an earthquake were felt: there was a general rush for uncovered spaces which were reached by many uninjured, but not by all. The streets became a scene of terror. All the houses in the city trembled like a person affected with the ague. Then they surged, and some of them fell to pieces with crash after crash. At this juncture, when the undulations were active, the earth opened in several places in long and almost regular lines. The fissures were from one to three inches in width. The sensation was distinct, as though something was rolling underneath. From every fissure there boiled forth dry earth like dust, which was followed by a stifling gas. Owing to the demolition of buildings and the general destruction of all kinds of property, and the dust belched forth as well as that set in motion by the general tumult, a dense cloud was formed over the city and obscured the light. Beneath the cloud was the gas, which oppressed every living creature, and would have suffocated all these if it had lingered longer stationary than it did, which was only about ninety seconds. The undulations were three in number. Each succeeding one was of greater magnitude than the former. When the undulations ceased the cloud of dust ascended and dispersed, and the light was restored. Then quakes at short intervals succeeded, as though subterranean explosions or collisions were taking place. At this time people from all parts of the city fled to the hills, amidst falling stones and timbers which descended from swaying walls and broadly-rent buildings just on the eve of crumbling into perfect ruin. Some were struck down dead by the falling materials, and others were maimed, while all were made to stagger, from side to side like people in a state of intoxication. Many of both sexes carried children in their arms, and those who had not these carried articles of value. The avarice of some was stronger than fear, even amidst this terrible confusion; and hence there were those who dallied to collect valuables, many of whom suffered for their temerity either by the sacrifice of their lives or otherwise. As the rush for the hills continued, and stones and materials of all kinds were falling, and houses and parts of these were crashing, numerous people were struck down and either killed or dangerously hurt. The water in the harbor was now receding from the shore, bearing with it all the shipping, at rapid speed. Then the current changed, and, before an almost overhanging, tremendous wave, the vessels came back, tossed one way and then another, or whirled about as though they were only floating logs; and on the very summit of this immense volume of water rode the United States steamer Wateree. The huge wave dashed against the stone mole or pier and shattered it to pieces, then swept from its path what was standing of the Custom-house, and almost every vestige of the ruins of other buildings. It rolled over the densely populated house of the city, and set a myriad of articles afloat which eddied in every direction; while, at the same time, the vessels and floating materials were forced over the wave's at this time curling and foaming summit. Every thing which it encountered in its course was swept away in an instant. Even great masses of stone were lifted and carried over. When the force of the wave was spent it retired, and in a short time the equilibrium of the ocean was restored, and then it occupied about the same line and presented nearly the same appearance as it did before the earthquake. The vessels carried inland were a terrible sight. Most of them were bottom upward. Their masts had been snapped like sticks. All this dreadful picture the refugees on the hills were now beholding. Many of them did so with the most mournful evidences of fear, because quakes of the earth were still felt at short intervals. The Wateree was grounded inland, at a quarter of a mile from the beach, in the line of a railroad. As far as heard from, only one life was lost on board. Near the Wateree a Spanish man-of-war vessel was grounded, and so gently that none of its rigging nor any of its timbers were impaired. On board the Peruvian war steamer America, which is a total wreck, eighty lives were reported to have been lost. The United States store-ship Fredonia was spared all her crew except one who drowned, according to report. Those who escaped were the captain, surgeon, and a paymaster, who were on shore when the earthquake occurred, and sought refuge on the hills. A British vessel, called the Chanarcillo, lost many of her crew, who were drowned overboard. A United States brig, name unknown, foundered with all on board. The vessel, it is reported, was laden with guano. The fate of the shipping-agent and were South American cousters. The fatal casualties in the city were about fifty, and the other casualties about one hundred. The fate of the shipboard was about three hundred, principally fatal. The refugees remained on the hills for two days, during which time they subsisted principally for food; at the same time the quakes continued as before at intervals. In time their sufferings became so intense that the male part set to go in search of food, a limited quantity of which they found in a damaged condition, and with this they served their families. The following morning after the earthquake a light-draught coasting-vessel entered the harbor, but did not remain long at anchor. As soon as the crew became aware of what had happened he took on board a number of people and left with them for Callao; thence one of the parties got to Lima.

In different places the shocks were felt from two to seven minutes, and caused greater ravages than any similar calamity that ever befell the same country before; for not only were whole towns shaken down, and their destruction completed by fire, but the sea, retiring to extraordinary distances, returned on the coast at the rate of a few miles an hour, with a wave fully fifty feet high, that covered the towns and swept away in its reflux every thing within its power, leaving big ships high and dry.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1868.

THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE.

THE triumphant election of General GRANT is not only the ratification, but it is a final interpretation of the war. From the moment that General LEE surrendered to General GRANT in the field there has been a loud shout and a general significance of the war, and what was actually settled by it. The Democratic theory was that nothing had happened but the suppression of a riot, during which slavery had ceased to exist in the old form. The President's theory was partly this, and partly something else which was not very intelligible. He declared that the States were suspended, lying in a kind of political catalepsy, from which he proposed to awaken them by assuming absolute power, which he did in his North Carolina proclamation. This was, of course, a hopeless confession, and gradually the President has disappeared in the Democratic embrace. The Republican party have contended that with slavery fell every thing that sprang from slavery, and they have insisted that not only justice and honor, but common-sense, required the equal suffrage in the recovered States as the only security of order and of the restoration of the normal situation under a free popular government.

The election was joined upon this issue. The Southern leaders returned to the Convention at Tammany Hall, and took their old places at the head of the party. They repudiated every thing in the Republican policy of reconstruction, declared for the national debt, and denominated candidates that pleased them. The consequence was that there has been no obscurity as to the real point of the canvass. Shall the general Congressional policy of reconstruction be sustained or abandoned? was the question. Are the people of the United States resolved that they will reconstruct the Union upon principles agreeable to them, or do they prefer that the late rebels shall reconstruct it as they prefer? Are the people afraid of negro supremacy, or do they believe with General LOUISSTREET, and with the testimony of all experience, that the cry of negro supremacy is the sheet anchor of a conspiracy? Do they think that they can not constitutionally say a word upon the subject of reconstruction, or is their authority, under the circumstances, supreme? Have they learned that the Democratic cry of "nigger," which has been sounding for a generation, is merely a noise to confuse the public mind that it may not see that ignorance and injustice of every kind mean endless agitation? Is the North resolved that its idea shall govern the country as the idea of the South has governed it for many a year?

These were the questions, simple, sharp, clear, and the answer is tremendous. A fitful effort was made to obscure the real point, and to fix the public attention upon financial questions. But every man instinctively knew that the political interest necessarily takes precedence at such a time as this of the financial. When a great party, which, as a party, has favored the rebellion of its chief wing, returns to the control of affairs, the natural effect is that wounds not a change of policy, not new measures under the Government, but the forcible overthrow of national law, it is a question of national order and existence. And it was as foolish to hope to divert the public mind from it as it was in 1864. The result shows that it was so. It is not a defiant assertion of the assertion of the Democratic theory of the situation. It exposes its utter ignorance of the nolder American heart, and the great purpose of a victorious and united people.

The Democratic appeal has been twofold—to the meanest form of selfishness in the pocket, and to the hatred and jealousy of race. They have both been met. The Democratic newspapers ingly rejected as its proposition in 1864 to surrender to the rebellion. Of the old free States the SEYMOUR majority comes from only one of two—New York, which, by fraudulent means, gives him five or six thousand majority; and New Jersey, which, by the same method, may reach two thousand. The vote in all the great slave States and Georgia, in which the directions of WADE HAMPTON, to starve those who would not vote for SEYMOUR, have been followed and improved; and Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware vote for him, the three States in which the old slavery Democracy is still supreme, But the country, with the exception of Georgia, the industry, the enterprise of the country, the indomitable spirit that pushed the war to an unconditional surrender, that emancipated the slaves, that sent the Army of the West in full sympathy with every liver of liberty in the world, and that will greatly mould the future of the world, have all resistlessly declared against DEMOCRACY, and the inhuman and un-American policy of which he is the fit representative.

This is the end of the old form of the Democratic policy in the country. The Party can loose from the corpse to which, thirty years ago, it so exultingly chained itself. Its old Southern leaders have lost their prestige. Yet they have one hope, and it is the weakness of their followers. The Southern chiefs are the men of conviction and of purpose in the party; and such men, as experience has shown in the history of all parties, are very powerful. Hopeless of reversing the accomplished action of Congress, the wisest of these will now endeavor to influence the vote which they could not destroy; while the more stupid will continue to thwart and delay a work which they can not prevent. But the duty of Congress is clear. The country has amply sustained the policy that secures equal rights, and which forbids all kinds of evasion and special pleading. The country means fair play to white and black in the Southern States, and the new Administration will take care that they both have it. As to the "oppression" under which the Southern whites are suffering, the whole country, north and south and Georgia, and the universal terrorism, show who is oppressed. In every one of those States there is nothing but the most outrageous. The meanest citizens have equal rights; and the Administration of General GRANT, sustained by the enormous majority of the people, will see that those rights are protected.

MR. JOHN T. HOFFMAN.

MR. JOHN T. HOFFMAN is apparently elected Governor of New York. Last year, when the contest for the mayoralty in this city was plainly between MR. HOFFMAN and MR. FERNANDO WOOD, we spoke a word for MR. HOFFMAN as the least of two evils. Had we then believed MR. HOFFMAN capable of so grave an offense against public morality as he committed in his proclamation of October 31 of this year, just before the election, we should not have perceived his superiority to MR. FERNANDO WOOD.

It was notorious that vast naturalization frauds had been committed, designed to affect the election. Whether the Republicans or the Democrats were the guiltier party was not the question. Every good citizen who understands the inexpressible importance of a pure ballot-box was interested to expose the frauds. They were not subjects of common rumor merely. We, in common with hundreds of our fellow-citizens, knew individual cases in which fraudulent naturalization papers were held. There were few men in or near the city taking practical part in the election who did not know of them, and who were not doing, as MR. PULLMAN did, all that they could to keep men from voting upon such papers. Similar frauds had been legally exposed and judicially denounced in Philadelphia. Nobody denied the frauds or their vast extent: nobody doubted that if there were vast frauds in the city of New York which were not found to affect the election, whatever the Republican effort may have been, the great weight of the fraudulent vote would be cast for the Democratic candidate.

Now a good citizen, of whatever party, who was also the chief magistrate of this great city, would use every power, and all the influence of his official position, to baffle the frauds. Knowing what every body else did, he would declare the situation, and warn all offenders that they should be prosecuted and punished to the utmost, because their crime was fatal to popular government itself. Such a course would have earned the respect of every honest citizen of every party. But what did MR. HOFFMAN do? He issued a paper in which he declared the charges of fraud against those high in authority to be "gross and unfounded." He declared that these false charges were made by his political opponents to conceal their own schemes of fraud, and to excite violence and disorder. And he called upon all citizens to assert their rights boldly and resolutely, and to rely upon the State laws against the "United States Government officials."

Such a document could have but one purpose and one interpretation. It was a hint to fraudulent voters not to be afraid. It was an assurance that MR. HOFFMAN would sanction the Academy of Music before the riots, that the authorities were the "friends" of evil-doers. In issuing such a proclamation under the circumstances, MR. HOFFMAN established facts, and with the necessary tendency of promoting his own election, MR. HOFFMAN was guilty of an offense against public morality which ought not to be forgotten. He has forfeited the respect of all honorable and patriotic men. He has thrown the mantle of his high official position, and of what he personally was called his "respectability," over the most shameless conspiracy to defeat the will of the honest voters of New York. The offense is the more flagrant because he was a candidate; and there is not a man in the country who does not know that if there were frauds he would be benefited by them. MR. HOFFMAN has succeeded in being elected Governor of New York. But it is an election without honor, and without real significance, because every reflecting man in the State is morally sure that he was not honestly elected.

OUR CROPS, AND THE FOREIGN DEMAND FOR THEM.

THERE are two parties to the question whether the demand for grain from abroad will be extensive. We suppose any that it will be, are not merely the representatives of large consuming populations across the Atlantic who systematically attempt to break down our market as the season of purchase approaches, but there are others who, actuated by a gambling propensity, apply it in their dealings in the staff of life. Producers are appealed to by both sides, and what the public at large gain is carried up suddenly, and it as suddenly falls, as was the case lately at Chicago with Indian corn, which rose from 50 to 70 cents, and soon came down again, the vicissitudes of the stock market seem to them to attend the great farming interest of the country.

There is but one mode of punishing effectually the habit; and that is, for our farmers to hold on to as much of their grain as they can conveniently store, so that the temptation for gambling, which is created only when the market can be controlled, may be rendered inactive by danger.

The recent report from the Agricultural Department at Washington, which shows only a moderate increase above the average of the quantity of wheat harvested this year, occurring chiefly in Indiana, where much more severe damage to corn in the Northern States than the country was prepared to expect, ought to prevent any one on the part of our farmers of the food they have to sell. It is clear beyond all question that the foreign demand, between this and the next harvest, for all descriptions of food, will be sufficient to absorb our whole surplus; and as the suffering from drought when very severe—as was that of Great Britain and of adjacent portions of the Continent—can not be overcome by one harvest, the policy of not allowing any sacrifice of such articles of food as our farmers may safely store can not be doubtful. It will not only contribute to their advantage, but to the general safety.

The policy of pressing every product upon the market promptly is supported by those who want the advantage of a brisk trade, and the stimulant to manufacturing industry which arises from cheap food; but the situation of the country—deeply in debt to foreign people—makes it far more important to the general interest that we shall take the opportunity which the failure of crops abroad furnishes to obtain a remunerative price for what we have to sell. The strength that derived will enable us to reduce a portion of our debt held on the other side, and ultimately benefit all interests.

We have all of us seen of the estimates presented by MR. SANDERSON, and more recently by MR. CAIRD in the London Times, as to the crops of all descriptions harvested in 1868, and particularly as to wheat, and some of us put their estimates as to wheat are not at all extravagant, and that this crop will be larger than usual, we feel entirely sure of our ground. The loss on account of the partial destruction of hay, roots, and pasturage, is far more serious than would have been the loss of wheat. MR. CAIRD admits that the deficiency is the food of live-stock, and a very serious loss in that branch of agricultural industry." The number of animals slaughtered in England in July, August, and September exceeded all precedent. Butcher's meat was lower than it had been known. Lamb's-wool had fallen, attributed to the quantity of lambs thrown upon the market. The Scotch farmers felt the detriment the effect of the drought, but it constitutes one of the causes for protracting recovery from its effects. The general condition of 1800 carried up the average price of middling or mealing wheat, which, in 1799, was £3 15s. 8d. per quarter of eight Winchester bushels, to £6 7s. in 1800, and £6 8s. 6d. in 1801. In 1802 it fell to £3 7s.

The long-continued necessity of calling upon the grains to supply the want of deficient pastures, and the general condition of the soil when it is required to be plowed, are two of the chief causes which carry the influence of such a calamity into succeeding years. The drought was well to Spain—which has, in addition to drought in some portions of the kingdom, the disadvantage, so far as its industry is concerned, of a revolution—as it does to Russia and those countries which have been severe sufferers. A newspaper printed in Paris on the 3d of October attributes the recent order of the Russian Government, forbidding the export of grain within Russian limits except he can prove his ability to maintain himself, to the deficiency of the Russian crops for two years. It presented, at an early period of the Russian harvests, statements of the extraordinary deficiency in the product of grain and hay due to drought, and the most extensive fires had run over large districts of country invited by the parched surface. Russia is a large country, and contains districts exempt doubtless from this misfortune. The diminution in the export of grain from the Great Britain from Russia, and also from Prussia, is due to this cause. Our most important competitors in the trade are under restrictions.

MR. CAIRD, in the letter which appears in the London Times, with a view to affect the price of grain, states that "a system of transport has been arranged by the Illinois Central Railroad for the shipment from Cairo to New Orleans of 10,000 quarters daily (80,000 bushels of Indian corn meaning), in the expectation of orders from the north of Europe for Indian corn to that supply." We doubt whether this can be done, or whether such an arrangement would be deemed desirable at English markets. It is here that purchases are expected, because the risk of transit is not endured, and the lines of ocean transportation do not need to be created. When the voyage is long, and the latitudes are trying, grain becomes compacted into a mass and is dug out with a spade.

We repeat, therefore, that our farmers need have no great fear of the result if they can but act for all they have to sell. No safeguard is more important than the annual storing and hoarding of part of every year's crop until economy permits the most advantageous consumption of new grain. It can then be shipped also with the greatest advantage. Our wheat-growing region is extensive with the Union, and although we may be visited with drought it is scarcely conceivable that in such a diversified and immense country it can be general; still, it is so necessary to provide for the event that it is one that has been properly called—should be abundant and within the reach of all, that we hope the practice may become general to provide ample means for storing wheat, and to be sure that the crop shall be annually stored to carry the country through any period of distress. Wheat is endowed with a capacity for preservation beyond that of any other grain. It may also stand better than any other grain the trials of severe weather in the process of growth. If the estimates of MR. SANDERSON and those of MR. JAMES CAIRD were correct it would appear that an unparalleled drought was of great service to the growth of the wheat. We must do MR. CAIRD the justice to say that he lops off from MR. SANDERSON'S estimate of the total product about seven millions of bushels, and admits that "on shallow gravels and light soils" the production does not equal the average on other soils. In the early stages of the drought the correspondents of Mark Lane Express did not limit the soils in which wheat was plowed in to that grown on shallow gravels and light sands, but stated that this occurred in many light soils. The omission of both these gentlemen to speak of the fate of spring wheat, which is largely sown in several districts, can not be explained except on the hypothesis that they need all the wheat lands to enable them to arrive at their extravagant grand total.

If these statements were made to inform the English of their exact condition, and had the effect to produce care in the use of what had been gathered, we should have no objection to make; but as they appear to be framed with a view to influence foreign markets, and have the effect which the Wall Lane Express feebly attributed of encouraging waste, we have no hesitation to show their inaccuracy, and to advise our producers on this side not to part from their products except at remunerative prices.

The low price of gold at this market on the 6th instant, when it reached 132, left no margin for the export of our grain, or indeed of any of our agricultural productions, excepting, perhaps, the products of the dairy and some articles required in feeding animals in England. The partial recovery of their pastures, the slaughtering of cattle and sheep on an extensive scale, and the general disposition to economize in the use of food for men and animals, which has attended the high cost of the dearth, have mitigated its effects; but the need of large imports into England can not be avoided, although it may be postponed with a view to break down foreign markets.

London and Liverpool stand face to face with our merchants on the exchange here, and refuse to advance their offer up to what will be a remunerative price to our farmers. The latter are able to hold with perfect steadiness; and if they make no sacrifices to temporary necessities they will be amply rewarded for the labors of the year, and will contribute to the general welfare.

THE DEMOCRACY OF GENERAL GRANT.

SINCE General GRANT has been elected by so immense a majority, it is generally asserted by the Democratic journals that he is, and always has been, a real Democrat. Undoubtedly he is, and this is his first radical difference with the Democratic party. General GRANT is a Democrat, and the Democratic party is, and has been for a generation, the instrument of an aristocracy. For what is the party which is Democrat in the true sense of the word? Certainly it is not to do what slave-lords command, and to vote as a King ordains. But that is what Democracy has been for many years. The policy of the party was just what the slave-masters thought the interests of slavery required. The great measures of the party during the twenty years before the war were the annexation of Texas and the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, while every minor measure was tested by its degree of service to the supreme end of the supremacy of slavery in the government. This system was the denial and outrage of every human right: but the party existed and struggled for no other end, and called itself Democratic. To be a Democrat was to apologize for slavery, and defend it; to sneer at as a part of the population of an inferior race to be abused at pleasure, and consequently to outrage the moral sense, to sophisticate and prevaricate, and to struggle endlessly with every generous human instinct, in the religion of patriotism.

This was to be a Democrat. It made no difference that there was a plea that it was a subject upon which nothing could be done, and therefore upon which no right should be defended; that there was an incessant talk about State rights, and reserved rights, and limited powers, and strict constructions. The one fact that was steadily clear through all the obscurity and confusion was that a Democrat was a man who supported the practical assertion that slavery had to do, and could only be upheld were bound to respect. And it was this tragical absurdity which has been driving the best men out of the Democratic party for twenty years. And it was true Democratic paper in this city is the Evening Post. How long since it has been technically a Democratic paper? Is the true sense of the word any or respect to equal rights, who are and always have been stancher Democrats than its editors, Mr. BRYANT, Mr. GODWIN, and Mr. NORDHOFF? But that party has to do, and could only be true to do, with a "Democracy" which drew its inspiration from CALHOUN, with his doctrine of slavery as the only sure foundation of a free government; which followed a dozen years ago the leadership of HAMMOND and his associates, sneering at free laborers as mud-sills; and which accepted in this last election the dictatorship of WADE HAMPTON and ROBERT TOOMBS, their hands dripping with the blood of loyal citizens—of FORREST fresh from FORT PILLOW, and SEMMES from the Alabama?

To be a true Democrat is to reject with scorn every distinctive principle that the Democratic party has professed for a generation, and to disown all its acknowledged chiefs from CALHOUN to SEYMOUR. To be a true Democrat is to believe in the equal rights of men, not of States, and to organize good faith in law; it is to reject the resolutions of '98, and to acknowledge the necessary subordination of the States to the Union; it is to oppose every kind of hostility of race, of interest, and of section in the country; it is to insist upon an economical and honest administration of government; it is to be neither a bully to the weakest of foreign states nor a sycophant to the strongest, but reasonable, firm, and self-respecting with all; it is to foster to the utmost free schools and churches; to demand absolute freedom of speech and action every where in the land; to keep the national honor untarnished; it is, above all, to see that justice is expediency, and that the maintenance of the equal rights of men is identical with true policy. This is Democracy, or the practical assertion of the rights of man. This is exactly what the Democrats who voted for Mr. SEYMOUR have opposed. This is precisely what General GRANT accepts. If he be a Democrat HORATIO SEYMOUR is not. The Democrats of to-day will find small comfort in General GRANT until they renounce what is now known as Democracy.

THE FACTS OF THE FRAUDS.

THE Union League Club has appointed a committee to investigate the frauds. Will the Manhattan Club do the same? Fraudulent voting is a matter of the highest public concern irrespective of party, and it may fairly be assumed that when a great successful party is indifferent to such an investigation, or is hostile to it, it is because of a consciousness that it will appear to owe its success to the frauds themselves. If the Republicans have stuffed the ballot-boxes, "led on by General SICKLES," as a Democratic journal suggests, as a cold fit for an exposure of the facts, and we promise to aid in parts to hold up General SICKLES, should the charge be sustained, to the same public censure that we should pronounce Mr. TILDEN if the same charge should be sustained against him. But is not Mr. TILDEN, as a good citizen, quite as much interested in this investigation as General SICKLES? Mr. TILDEN'S long experience has probably the profoundest faith in the incorruptibility of the Democratic voters of the Sixth Ward in this city, and in the spotless purity of its ballot-boxes. He believes, of course, that every vote of Mr. HOFFMAN'S apparent majority is an honest vote. If he supposed by his friends in Baltimore that he is an intelligent man, understanding the real foundation of a popular government, he would prefer that the Governor rather than seek to destroy the system, wouldn't he? At least let us suppose so.

Now it appears that the fourth district of the Sixth Ward has 1,200 votes by the names, but it returned 842 votes for HOFFMAN, and 21 for GRISWOLD—thirty-five more ballots than registered names. The fourth district of the Eighteenth Ward had a registry of 600. It returned 455 votes for HOFFMAN, and 124 for GRISWOLD —one hundred and seventy-three more ballots than registered names. The twenty-third district of the same ward had 322 registered names, and returned 470 votes for HOFFMAN, and 30 for GRISWOLD. The poll was nearly double the registry. The twenty-second district of the Nineteenth Ward had a registry of 320 names, and returned 438 votes for HOFFMAN, and 134 for GRISWOLD—one hundred and fifty-two more ballots than registered names. These are but a few, from this state of facts, the Evening Post justly remarks: "With perhaps 900 legal voters in the four districts, there are 1,876 names voted, and they return an actual majority for JOHN T. HOFFMAN of 1896, or twenty more than the whole number of names on a registry already doubled by fraud."

Now, certainly, this is a matter in which every honest citizen has an equal interest. But what is the duty of the Democrats who have naturally benefited by this fearful fraud? It is not a denial, for the facts are indisputable. It is merely a assertion that Republicans had better be silent about these frauds because there are many Republican as Democratic inspectors. But that is not the point. If Republican inspectors have connived at fraud, as we have the proof, and let the party bear such responsibility as may fall to it. But the real point is, that there have been frauds, and frauds that necessarily vitiate the poll in the districts where they occurred, and the result of the fraud is an eighth or a tenth of Mr. HOFFMAN'S entire majority. Does that indemnify anybody for having benefited by fraud? Is there any body in the State who, in the absence of facts already established beyond denial, ought to be so interested for his own character as to investigate these frauds as Mr. HOFFMAN? Is it not even worth while for Mr. TILDEN, interested with the rest of us in an honest ballot-box, serenely to look into this matter a little?

As for the cheerful philosophy which asserts that one party is as bad as another, that the devil is not as black as he is painted, that naught is every thing and every thing is naught, we have only to say that the loud assertion may tend to prevent the timely knowledge of offenses, but it can not avert their consequences. If a hole is being bored in the bottom of the ship we may dance and sing upon deck in the liveliest and most delightful manner, but it will not help all that. It is bad enough to have the candidate of the Ring elected Governor of New York according to law; but to have him foisted upon the State, not by lawful election, but by cheating, is something which the people will thoroughly investigate, unless they feel that it is hopeless to contend with what the Democratic District-Attorney, MORRIS, described in the convention that nominated Mr. HOFFMAN as "the Tammany clique, with its unfinished Court-house and its thousand other schemes of robbery and plunder." This is the clique, described by one of its own party, which such friends as we have described have put into power in this State.

AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION.

ON the afternoon of election-day we met a friend who had left his place at a rural poll for a moment, and who said, "There is really no fraud of any being there; every thing is as serene as TILDEN." Upon reflection, however, he agreed that it was because of the presence of those who meant to keep order that order was maintained. If the city election was also as serene as the chairman of the Democratic State Committee, whose astute management nominated Mr. SEYMOUR, it was very much due to the public vigilance that the Governor of the State was in the city, and that he had made ample preparations to suppress the disorder which the Mayor's proclamation tended to incite. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. The action of the Governor secured tranquility and order. Of course, in the Democratic judgment, he is a usurper, and a satrap, and a tyrant, and the people are "disgraced who "made this man a Governor," and "the Democratic fame of this imperial city" has never been tarnished with any excess—especially when orphan asylums were burned, and the most helpless and unfortunate of the population were murdered in the riots of 1863.

Four years ago, at the last Presidential election, the example of this wanton insult of a "miscalled Governor" to the peaceful Dead Rabbits and gentlemanly rioters of this metropolis was furnished by the Government of the United States, which sent General BUTLER to command in the city during the election. It was rumored that this precaution was at the time for the purest patriots, the most devoted friends of the Union, such as AUGUST BELMONT and his friends, who had begged the President Minister to persuade his Government to interfere in the way, and assiduously told them that he hoped the peace would not be broken! In the midst of a city which the year before had been in the practical possession of bloody rioters for three days? The peace was not broken. There was never a quieter election. Could there be any stronger proof of the orderly disposition of the late rioters? Could any thing show more conclusively the folly of the action of the Government in providing for the public peace?

The truth is, that at that time General BUTLER was to be was in New Orleans, so far as public order was concerned, the right man in the right place. And what he was then, Governor EATON was upon the day of the late election. Under his vigilant eye the general knowledge of his will and intention to preserve order at all hazards, preserved order. It was not the "friends" of GOVERNOR SEYMOUR, nor the incendiary populace of the city mayor, that kept, or tended to keep, the peace, but the Governor and the Police Commission. Had the Governor of the State been the Democratic candidate for President, as the Mayor of the city was for Governor, and had there been no resolute and experienced Police Commission, the loyal Republican voters of the city would have been as wholly at the mercy of the "friends" of MR. SEYMOUR as they were in New Orleans.

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON AND MR. LAIRD.

OUR Minister to England, Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, is likely to be as unpleasantly famous for talking at his predecessor was apparently distinguished by his reticence. We have not yet heard any cordial approval of his conduct in any part of his own country, and if Mr. JOHNSON is not careful no act of the new administration would be hailed with more general applause than his immediate recall. Yet Mr. JOHNSON is a man of personal ability, and his conduct is to be explained only by a singular want of practical good sense and by his unclouded sympathy with the old regime in the United States. He is a man of humanity; and, when it was evident that slavery or the Union must go, he did not, with HORATIO SEYMOUR, declare for the latter, and called for emancipation. But his sympathies are of the kind called conservative, which means aristocratic; and, in his natural desire to signalize his official service by settling the disputed questions with Great Britain, he forgets plain facts and profound feelings.

MR. LAIRD is a Liverpool ship-builder. He had all that dull British hatred of the United States which a genuine John Bull might be supposed to entertain. He agreed with Mr. ROEBUCK when that gentleman proposed, in June, 1863, that the English Government should recognize the Confederacy upon the ground, as MR. ROEBUCK stated it, that the United States would not bully the world if they were divided and subdivided. MR. LAIRD supported MR. ROEBUCK in Parliament. He voted that England should lend all her power, first morally, and then as might happen, to destroy this Government; and he built ships and ran them out to sea, eluding the laws of his own country, that he might give the rebellion material aid. More than any Englishman, except Lord WHARNCLIFFE, who shares the odium with him, the name of LAIRD is most detestable to this country, and justly detestable. He not only wished us ill, but he did all that a great shipbuilder could do "in aid," as JOHN BRIGHT said, speaking of ROEBUCK'S motion, "of the most stupendous act of guilt that history has recorded in the annals of mankind."

Having already dined gratefully with MR. LAIRD at Sheffield, and having said with enthusiasm that the name of WHARNCLIFFE would be always precious to the American heart, it only remained for MR. JOHNSON to receive the forgiveness of MR. LAIRD, and this he has now done in the most humble manner. "Former differences are forgotten!" exclaims the American Minister as he bows to kiss the gracious hand of the builder of the Alabama, "and the heart of Liverpool is a heart full of friendship for the United States." This is so unexpectedly kind that indignation is almost laughed away. When General ROSECRANS went to Virginia and said to General LEE: "I know you are a representative man in reverence for your region for the Union, the Constitution, and the welfare of the country," there was only a smile of contempt for the General's folly. But the performance of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON before MR. LAIRD is really an insult to the country.

We repeat what we have before said, that the better portion of the people of United States has not forgiven the conduct of MR. LAIRD and of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, and the speeches of MR. ROEBUCK. It certainly cares nothing about them, as long as those persons remain quiet. But this country very distinctly remembers who were its friends in its mortal agony, and does not forget who were its enemies. If MR. LAIRD has any regret it only proves as a man for supporting an insurrection to perpetuate human slavery, and as an Englishman for aiding the destruction of a formidable power, let him speak if he will. But the loyal citizens of the United States, still bleeding and burdened with the cost of the effort to save their national life, have the right to demand that their Minister does not so grossly and ridiculously misrepresent the sentiment of his country as MR. REVERDY JOHNSON is constantly doing. He need not express hostility to any person or to any party in England, but he should not select for especial honor the persons and parties who have striven most bitterly to dishonor and destroy his country.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

THE result of the Presidential election is very gratifying. General GRANT and SCHUYLER COLFAX have been elected President and Vice-President, obtaining the electoral votes of Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Tennessee, California, Nevada, Missouri, Kansas, North Carolina, Minnesota, and Florida. SEYMOUR and BLAIR have carried New York, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Georgia, Louisiana, Oregon, and South Carolina—in all eight States, which give 80 votes in all for SEYMOUR. It is still doubtful on which side the 9 electoral votes of Arkansas and the 8 of Alabama will be cast.

New York State was carried for SEYMOUR by over 8000 majority, while HOFFMAN is elected Governor by about 10,000. In this city the vote for SEYMOUR was at least 18,000 behind his own ticket. The Democratic have failed to elect a majority in the Assembly, which, according to the latest returns, stands 78 Republicans to 50 Democrats.

In Pennsylvania the Republican majority is nearly 30,000; in Massachusetts, over 60,000; in Rhode Island, over 8000; in New Hampshire, 7000; in Rhode Island, 6500; in Connecticut, 6000; in Ohio, 56,000; in Illinois, 50,000; in Iowa, 85,000; in Tennessee, 30,000; and in Missouri, 70,000.

The Republicans have carried, of the region that was formerly occupied by slavery, Missouri, Arkansas, West Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Alabama (probably), and Louisiana. They will have unquestionably carried Georgia and Louisiana but for the fraud known as the Democratic White Man's Party and Republicans from the polls.

The Democratic majority in Kentucky is the State election was 90,000, which, in November, was reduced to between 50,000 and 70,000.

General GRANT has not only gained over two-thirds of the electoral vote, but also a large majority of the popular vote.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Spanish Republicans appear to be persistent in their opposition to a monarchy: but upon the construction of the Cortes, this faction (which is a small majority) will probably submit to the rule. General PRIM has been confirmed by Serrano as Commander-in-Chief of the army. The situation is, however, as has compelled the departure from Spain to that island of 9000 soldiers for batteries.

The Papal army is being reduced by desertion.

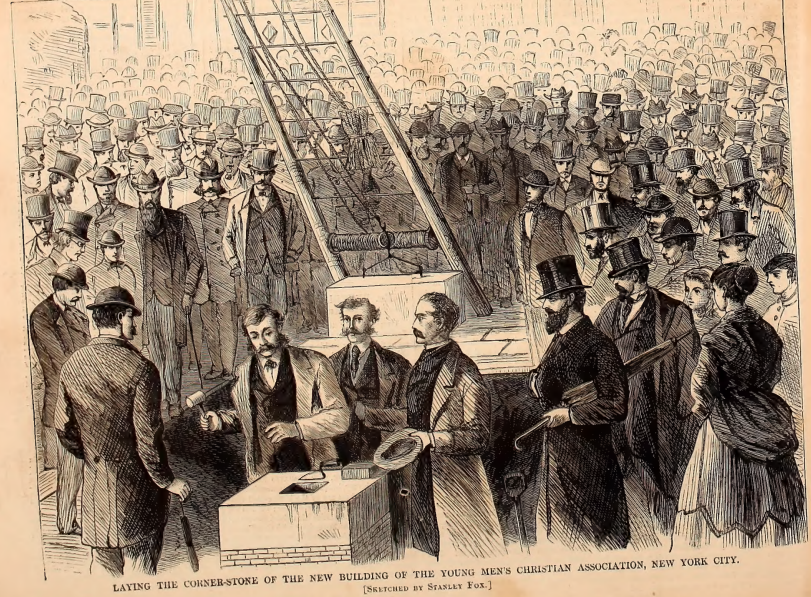
The late British Parliament was dissolved on the 11th, and the elections were to take place on the 17th and 18th. The Liberal party estimates that it will have a majority of at least 100 members in the new House of Commons.

Reports received in Lisbon represent that an expedition consisting of 800 Portuguese soldiers had been massacred in Mozambique, South Africa. They had been sent into the interior for mere purposes, and the natives fell upon them and slaughtered nearly every man. Only one escaped to tell the story. All the arms, ammunition, etc., with the expedition, all fell into the hands of the natives.

MURDER OF THE REV. B. F. RANDOLPH.

ONE of the most satisfactory results of General GRANT'S accession to the Presidency will be peace in the South, involving protection to life as well as property, and a toleration by each political party of the opinions of the other. It is mainly chiefly the fact that GRANT has been elected President which will secure this result, but nathe utter defeat which that election brings upon them in the South who as a habit intimidate their political opponents and slay all whom they can not intimidate. It is now settled that the national law means Liberty and Equal Rights, and that those who violate that law must be punished as law-breakers. We give on this page a portrait of the Rev. E. F. RANDOLPH, a Methodist clergyman of South Carolina, and a Senator of that State, who, on the 17th of last month, fell a victim to assassination for his political opinions. Shortly after the murder the Charleston Christian Advocate published the following account:

"We are called upon to record one of the most darling and cold-blooded murders that ever darkened the pages of history, committed upon the person of one of the members of our Conference. The Rev. B. F. RANDOLPH was, on the 17th inst., assassinated. He was on a lecturing tour in one of the upper counties of the State. Wesley morning to go to Anderson, where he was to lecture in the evening. When he got upon the Greenville train at Hodge's station he put his carpet-bag and shawl on a seat, and then retired to the platform of the car to speak to a colored man. While engaged in conversation with this person he was shot down, behind by three ruffians, simultaneously, and fell dead, the shots taking effect in his head, lungs, and bowels. These murderers came to the depot on horseback, and immediately after committing the deed remounted their horses and rode quietly away. The report is that they are unknown and can not be identified. This speaks for itself, when it is remembered that the deed was committed in open day, and in the usual throng of passengers on the cars and around the depot. No one starts in pursuit, and all seem to concede that it is useless to make any effort to identify or arrest the murderers. Brother RANDOLPH'S remains were taken on the cars. Brother RANDOLPH'S remains were taken on the cars. Brother RANDOLPH was buried in Columbia and interred on Sabbath, following day to do appropriate religious services, on the 19th inst., with large following them to the grave. vast concourse of people following them to the grave. Mr. RANDOLPH was born in Kentucky, and was educated at Oberlin, O., enjoying the advantages of the classical department. He was duly licensed and ordained as a minister in the Old School Presbyterian Church. Having received the appointment of chaplain in the army, and assigned to a colored regiment in that capacity, the fortunes of war brought him to our State. After the organization of the South Carolina Conference, he felt that the field opened by the Methodist Episcopal Church in this section would afford him a greater opportunity for usefulness than he could enjoy in continuing his connection with the Presbyterian Church. He consequently united the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was subsequently admitted on trial at the session of our Conference in the spring of 1867. His first appointment was in connection with the Freedmen's Bureau as Assistant Superintendent of Education in this State. His next appointment by the Conference was to Columbia. Although he was connected with our Conference, he received no fund from our Missionary Society. When the Charleston Advocate was started he held to it the relation of an assistant editor, in which he was continued until the resignation of the entire editorial corps in anticipation of the appointment of an editor, as arranged by the last General Conference. At the time of his death Mr. RANDOLPH was a member of the State Senate and Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee. In these official positions he was doing good service for his race and the cause of human rights. He took the position which he occupied in connection with the political interests of the State from a sense of duty which he could not well resist from the peculiar state of political affairs here."



THE LATE REV. B. F. RANDOLPH, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.—ASSASSINATED OCT. 17, 1868.

THE NEW BUILDING OF THE Y. M. C. ASSOCIATION.

THE corner-stone of the new building of the Young Men's Christian Association was laid in Fourth Avenue, corner of Twenty-third Street, on the afternoon of October 31. The attendance was large. Hon. WILLIAM E. DODGE, Jun., stated the objects of the proposed edifice. He said that young men should be taught the All Christian young men would be cordially welcomed to this institution regardless of their creeds or beliefs, for the Association is founded on the simple basis of love of Christ. The Rev. Dr. ADAMS, the Rev. Dr. FOSS, and the Rev. JOHN HALL followed with appropriate remarks. The Rev. Dr. TYNG also spoke, and his remarks were listened to with attention. The cornerstone was laid after the usual manner. A hymn was then sung, and the benediction pronounced by Chancellor FERRIS.

The building to be erected extends 175 feet on Twenty-third Street, and 83 feet 3 inches on Fourth Avenue. It is to be constructed of variegated Ohio and Belleville freestone in the French Renaissance style. The edifice will be three stories high, divided by the cornice of the second story. The frieze of the upper cornice will be highly enriched; that of the lower one paneled. At the centre of the front part of the building there will be a projecting tower terminating in a grand dome. The main entrance will be beneath the tower. Coupled columns will support the cornice of the first story, from which will spring the arch, adorned with mouldings and enrichments, terminating beneath the cornice of the second story, and forming a bold and dignified portal. On the arch will be inscribed the name of the Society. The piers of the towers will be rusticated for two stories, each alternate one being ornamented with rich engraved work, the intermediate ones being channeled, affording a rich contrast. A tablet underneath the cornice of the second story provides for a bass-relief. In the spandril formed by the arch over the door, rich rosettes will give lightness and vivacity to the whole. The cornices on which rest the bosses of the Doric columns that flank the tower on either side are to be highly ornamented with rich designs. The windows will be subdivided between the columns by pilasters carrying straight lintels. The fluted columns will support the cornice of the next story. The whole of the first story will be rented as first-class store-rooms, with the exception of the Twenty-third Street entrances, a court-yard, and a gymnasium in the rear. On the left-hand side of the entrance, on the second story, will be the reception-room, out of which opens the reading-room. Connecting with the reading-room are parlors, and attached to them are dressing-rooms, with a wash-room and bath-room. From the reception-room a flight of steps, covered in with glass and ornamented iron-work, will lead to the gymnasium below. On the right-hand side of the entrance staircase will be the great hall, capable of seating 1300 persons. In the third story, on the left-hand side of the entrance hall, will be a lecture-room and a library; the former measuring 45 by 36 feet, and the latter 72 by 31 feet; also three large class-rooms on the same floor. The fourth and fifth stories are to be divided into rooms for artists' studios, and have attached to each a bedroom. There will be ten studios and three offices on each story. In the fifth story will be a fine picture-gallery. The entire building will be warmed and ventilated by steam. It is to be finished next summer, at the cost of $300,000. The lot on which the edifice stands was purchased at the cost of $142,000.

GRIGNON.

IT was a pleasant event in my life when I was thrown into the company of Grignon, the famous conjuror. I was on my way to California, and had taken the overland route in preference to any other. It was while on my journey across the Plains that I made his acquaintance. Our party overtook a single wagon. It contained a solitary man. The horses were dead, the man nearly so. This man was Grignon. I paid the utmost attention to his wants. Being a medical man I gave him all the benefit of my skill and care. As he recovered he naturally entertained a strong friendship for me. His wagon had fallen behind the train to which he belonged, and they had been compelled by their own necessities to desert him.

The conjuror, however, was destined for a far more glorious fate than to die miserably in the desolate American desert. He was to become an astonisher of the natives (Indians), a savior of civilized lives, and a lion in California.

We resumed our journey. We had started, however, like many others in those days, with insufficient preparations. As soon as we found out our mistake we had to be very economical with our provisions. We killed buffaloes whenever we found them, and always replenished our water-casks at every stream. At length, however, we came to a dry and parched waste, where there was scarcely a drop of water, scarcely a blade of grass, and not a single living animal of any description.

"THEN FOUR OF THEM KNELT DOWN."

And now began the real troubles of our journey. We had come into the country of the warlike Indians, and they were not slow to acquaint us with that fact. Every day they prowled around us in great numbers, threatening and insulting us. Occasionally they used to snatch up something and dart away on their fleet horses. We did all that we could to be friendly, and determined to avoid an open rupture as far as possible, for there were only twelve on our side, and on their side apparently twelve hundred.

Every day, however, only made matters worse. In spite of our precautions the Indians grew more and more insolent and insulting. We became watchful, and tried to be more forbearing, but our forbearance was taken for cowardice, and the savages began to think that they could do any thing with us.

We held a council of war, and determined to bring matters to a crisis at once.

The crisis soon came.

One day a big Indian came riding along by us. He began talking in a contemptuous way, and gesticulating furiously. At last he asked one of our men for his gun. The man refused. The Indian repeated his question, and attempted to take the gun from his hand. The man drew back. The Indian sprang forward, flourishing his knife, and threatening. At this the man calmly leveled his piece, and shot the Indian through the heart.

As the wretch fell shrieking from his horse the Plain seemed to become alive with other Indians. From behind every clump of trees, every hillock, every rock, and every rising ground, they poured forth in countless numbers. We had never before seen so many assembled together as now.

And now our companion the conjuror came out conspicuously. He had been once in the French army, he said, and understood all its admirable discipline. A few words of warning and a short explanation sufficed to make us form a circle of the wagons, and draw up behind them, with baggage heaped up for a breast-work. There we waited for the savages.

But they did not come just then. With loud whoops and screams they gathered upon the plain at a distance from us. The wretched cowards, as soon as they saw our slight preparations, were actually afraid to attack.

They waited till night.

Night came. Our defenses were made. Our wagons were arranged more closely, and the barricade of baggage was made higher, deeper, and more effective. In the centre were our cattle. Behind this little fortification we awaited our foes.

Shortly after dusk the tramp of thousands of hoofs shook the plain. Down upon us thundered the Indians. Shouts, screams, and yells burst around.

On they came, nearer and still nearer.

We waited in breathless suspense.

At last our volley burst in thunder upon them.

Shrieks arose from amidst the gloom. We saw not what the effect of our shots had been, but could only conjecture that it had been deadly.

There was a wild uproar—the confused sound of trampling horses, the noise of men calling to one another, intermingled with groans and cries of pain. Without giving them time to recover from their confusion we poured in another volley, and yet another, loading as rapidly as we could, and firing revolvers where we had them.

The effect was terrible. Many must have been wounded or killed, judging by the awful uproar that arose. For a long time there was a confused hubbub of sounds. Howls were transfixing, man calling; groans were mingled with cries of rage. During all this time we fired at intervals whenever we heard a sound, husbanding our ammunition, and not willing to waste a shot.

At last there arose a wild tramp of horses, the sound moving away from us, and seeming to show that our enemies had retired baffled from the assault.

Yet we were afraid of some plot. Grignon made us keep up our watch, and all that night we lay on our arms, expecting every moment to hear the Indian yell which announced the assault of the savages.

After a long night, which seemed interminable, morning dawned. As the light illumined the wide plain we looked around anxiously for our enemies, but none were to be seen. We took a hasty breakfast, and then deliberated on what we ought to do, whether to take advantage of this repulse and move on, or wait for a time. Most of us thought we had better hurry on; but Grignon gave it as his opinion that the Indians were yet in the neighborhood, and were waiting to attack us on the march. He thought that it would be better to wait at least another day. We all yielded to his opinion, and waited as we best could.

We did not have to wait long.

After a few hours, at about ten o'clock, ten or a dozen horsemen appeared over a hillock in the distance riding slowly toward us.

"They want to have a parley," said Grignon. "Some of you step forth, and see what they want. I wish to have a little to say, but will wait."

One of our men was selected, and went outside of our inclosure to meet them.

Meanwhile Grignon lifted a trunk out of the wagon which belonged to him, drew it outside, and busied himself coolly in arranging and turning over the things. We all thought that this was done for the purpose of assuming an air of indifference. So none of us noticed him particularly.

Our representative stood outside waiting for the Indians. As they drew themselves together, one of them dismounted, and then walked toward us in a friendly manner, while the rest held the horses.

One of them addressed our man in broken English.

The Indians, he said, did not want our lives. They wanted powder. If we would give them that what we had they would let us go in safety, and protect us from other tribes till we got beyond the Plains.

Give them our powder! A pleasant request. It scarcely needed debate. We refused.

Well, then, would we give them our bullets? They were very much in want of bullets.

One of us said in a low voice that bullets were the only things we could get from us, but the Indians did not hear him. Our representative refused very mildly.

The Indians now stood talking with one another, and Grignon advanced toward them. He whispered something in a low voice to our representative, which he translated.

Grignon then stood facing the Indians.

"Are you the Captain?" said the spokesman of the Indians, presently, as he noticed Grignon.

"No, I'm the medicine-man; you can't shoot these men, or these horses; I save them."

The Indian pondered this to his companions, who burst into roars of laughter.

Grignon advanced more closely. He was looking steadily at the Indians, and we noticed that the latter appeared to be uncomfortable under his gaze.

"See," said Grignon, "you can't shoot me. Here"—and he drew a pistol from his pocket, a revolver—"fire at me."

The Indian laughed.

"You don't want me to kill you?" said he, scornfully.

"Yes can't."

The Indian's eyes flashed.

"Shoot!" cried Grignon, folding his arms.

The Indian hesitated a moment. He looked at us suspiciously. Then he looked at his companions and said something in their language. They all responded unanimously.

The Indian took aim.

"You tell me to shoot," said he.

"Shoot!" cried Grignon again.

The Indian fired.

Grignon smiled, and, walking forward to the Indian, he handed him a bullet.

The Indians looked paralyzed.

Grignon allowed him here to fire it again.

The Indian fired the other five shots.

Grignon caught each bullet, sometimes seeming to catch it from his breast, sometimes from his face, and each time he handed it to the Indian.

The other Indians were now in a state of wild excitement.

"They may all shoot if they choose," said Grignon, with a smile, he went in the wagon, drew out nine pistols, and coming up to them proceeded to load each one. He took the powder and put it in, then the wadding and bullet, and the Indians saw him do it. He handed a pistol to each on loading it. Suddenly one of these fellows took aim and fired. Grignon, without seeming to have noticed him, raised his hand and seemed to catch a bullet from his forehead. He tossed this toward the Indian, who picked it up with an air of stupefaction.

Then he stood off, and told all the rest to fire. Eight reports sounded in rapid succession.

Grignon took off his hat and walked up to the Indians. To their amazement eight bullets were in his hat. Each man took one and looked at it in wonder.

"Do you want to fire again?" asked Grignon. They all expressed a wish to do so.

"Well, hand me the pistols."

To their amazement the pistols were gone.

They looked at one another in wonder.

"You see," said Grignon, "they fired the pistols at me too; and I swallowed them."

"Swallowed them!" faltered the Indian, and he told this to his astounded companions.

"Yes; do you want them?"

The Indian nodded.

Whereupon Grignon opened his mouth, and rolling back his eyes, he inserted his fingers and drew a pistol apparently from his throat. Another followed. Then he threw forth a third, then a fourth, and so on until he had drawn forth eight pistols from his throat, while the Indians stood looking on after bewildered amazement. And no wonder, for we ourselves felt no less astonishment. We could not account for it; we were as much surprised as the Indians themselves.

After this Grignon calmly drew forth six or eight more pistols, then a number of cartridges, and finally a carbine.

"I'm the medicine-man," said he, solemnly.

The Indians said not one word

"Do you want to fire again?" said he, and he offered the pistols to the Indians.

They all shrank back in horror.

Grignon tossed the pistols, cartridges, and carbine over to us, and smiled benignantly on the astounded savages.

He then shook his hand.

A knife fell out of the palm. Another followed, and another. He shook three more out of his left hand, and then drew a score or so more out of his ears.

"Perhaps you would like something to drink?" said he, smilingly, to the Indian who spoke English.

The savage looked at him suspiciously.

"What'll you have? Rum, brandy, gin, whisky, ale, porter, wine, or cider?"

The Indian hesitated, and spoke to his fellows. They all preferred whisky.

Grignon asked the Indian to lend him a loose blanket which he wore. The Indian took it off doubtfully. Grignon shook it; a bottle rolled out. He shook it again; a glass fell out. He shook it a third time; three more bottles fell out. Finally he shook it again, and a corkscrew tumbled down.

"Will you take it raw or with water?" asked Grignon, as he proceeded to unscrew the cork.

The Indian said nothing.

"Don't like raw whisky?" he asked Grignon, as he poured out a glass.

The Indian smelled it suspiciously. Then he tasted it. The taste was enough. He drank it off, smacked his lips, looked around triumphantly on his companions, and then—held out his glass for more. All the Indians, encouraged by this experiment, clamored for some. Grignon poured away from his bottle. Each one drank off a tumbler. Grignon was quite willing to pour. He was not forgetful, however, of the duties of hospitality. He walked off to the Indians who were holding the horses, who had been watching the scene in stupefaction, and offered some to them. The smell of the whisky was enough for them. They drank, and wanted more.

But Grignon shook his head.

"Not now," he said to the spokesman. "I'll give you a bottle apiece to carry home with you." And going up to the blanket he took out a dozen bottles of the same kind as the last.

By this time the Indians were in the jolliest mood conceivable.

"Before I give you any more," said he, "let me make you so that you will not get drunk."

He walked up to the Indian, and held both hands in each of his, and looked at him steadfastly in the eyes for some time. Then he stroked his brows, and left him; then he did to each. The Indians had got over all suspicion, and merely expected that something good was coming. So they allowed him to do as he chose.

Grignon then stood off at a little distance, and in a loud voice ordered them all to look at him.

Whether understood English or not made no difference. They certainly all did look at him.

I had seen plenty of experiments before in mesmerism and electro-biology, so that the present scene did not surprise me so much as it did my companions and the Indians.

Grignon simply stood at a distance, waving his arms at times, and giving words of command.

Every word was English or not made no difference. They certainly all did look at him.

First they all began to dance.

Then they all knelt down.

Then they touched hands, and could not sever themselves from one another's contact. The Indian who had been spokesman rushed wildly around, with the others in a string to him, trying to free themselves, but utterly unable, yelling and howling like wild beasts.

At last, at a shout from Grignon, the charm was dissolved. They sprang back from one another and stood motionless, like so many statues.

Suddenly they all began to shiver as though they were suffering from intense cold. They gathered their blankets closely around them, their teeth chattering and every limb trembling. Grignon spoke.

In an instant they were panting as though suffering from extreme heat, drawing difficult breaths, gasping, and flinging off those blankets which but a moment before they had wrapped so tightly about them.

Then this passed.

They began to balk like dogs. They went down on all fours, and evidently imagined that they were of the canine species.

Then they tried to imitate the motion and the croaking of frogs. After this they went through performances too numerous to mention. At one time they became rigid, and arranged themselves like the stakes of a tent—heads together, feet outward, the hands of them down upon them, and tried to run about with four others on their backs; then they all jumped wildly up in the air, and began to shake hands. At last they made a furious onset upon one another with fists, nails, and teeth, and if they had not left their weapons behind, they would certainly have done some frightful injury.

The two Indians who held the horses looked on in horror. Grignon at last stopped, and knowing what to do. They would have fled in their flight, but dared not leave their companions behind. Grignon stood calm, with frowning brows, watching the uproar, himself the presiding spirit of the scene. My companions were confounded. Even some of these, who had otherwise told me, thought that Grignon was the devil.

At last Grignon gave a loud shout.

The Indians, all on the ground.

They lay there for some time as if dead. Then Grignon waved his arms, and they rose to their feet. All looked bewildered and frightened. With terrified glances they regarded first Grignon and then one another.

The Indians are superstitious, like all savages; in fact, like all human beings. These men saw in Grignon a terrible demon, who could exert over them any power which he chose.

He advanced toward them.

They receded.

He walked up nearer.

They turned and ran toward their horses.

Grignon shouted after them.

In a frenzy of terror each man flung himself upon his horse.

Grignon ran after them.

Away they went. They urged on their horses at the top of their speed.

Grignon followed for a short distance.

Then he turned back, and came into our inclosure.

"Gather up those bottles," said he. "Tackle up the cattle, and let us march."

Instantly our men arose and obeyed.

Grignon drank a heavy glass of whisky, and then lay down in one of the wagons, utterly exhausted.

We traveled all that day and all the next night unmolested. Grignon slept long and soundly. After resting for a time we pushed on our teams, so as to get as far beyond the hostile Indians as possible.

We saw nothing of them.

"They won't trouble us for some time," said Grignon, confidently. "They'll go back and tell such a story as will be the wonder of the savages for many a long day."

Grignon was right. Not only did they not pursue us, but for all the remainder of that year, and for all the next, no travelers on that route were molested.

"I don't see," said I, "how you managed to get those tricks on the open ground without a table."

Grignon smiled.

"Only clumsy performers use tables," said he. "I could have done far more wonderful things, but they would have been thrown away on those savages. I'll reserve my good tricks for San Francisco."

And so he did; for of all the wizards, magicians, and conjurors that have visited the Golden State, none have won such fame or excited such wonder as my friend Grignon.

WILD HORSES IN TEXAS.

OVER to the eastward of the Sakatcho Mountains is an uninhabited tract of country, about eighty miles long and forty miles wide, that abounds with wild mustangs. There are three ways of catching them in general use—"walking them down," "surging," and "creasing." The general impression is that wild horses are all lassoed; but that method is of no use except to break down "ground-hawks," to illustrate geographies, and to embellish watch-cases; it is not practiced to any great extent on the prairies.

Whichever way you choose to operate, first and foremost you must find where the horses "water." Their drinking-places in this dry country are few and far apart; a "bunch" of mustangs will often graze in the same vicinity and drink from the same waters for weeks at a time, if undisturbed.

If it is proposed to catch the whole herd by walking, it requires four men, and about two "relays" to each man. These go to the watering-place and wait quietly the appearance of the herd, when two of the men, with their extra horses, show themselves and start slowly after the herd, taking care not to frighten them into a run.

The mustangs keep a respectful distance, very much astonished and puzzled at two men who act so strangely, running neither toward them nor from them.

The men take it very easy, do not move faster than a walk, and aim to get a position upon the flank of the herd, and quite barely keep them moving, so that they can not eat.

The season of bright moonlight has been chosen, and the herd in the tail grass is easily followed through the long night, until the gray light of early dawn reveals the drove a trifle nearer and a trifle nearer than before, but still full of the nervous fire that would carry them far out of harm's way upon the first note of alarm from their leader.

The men, who by this time are fifteen or twenty miles away from their friends at the water-hole, and have tired one horse and rode one of the extras part of the night, now head the mustangs and start them on the back track with little trouble, for they are tired and just begin to thirst for another drink from the familiar watering-place.

But when they arrive, nearly crazy with thirst and hunger, what must be their despair at seeing two more men, with three fresh horses apiece, on their trail!

This second relief takes them out for another twenty-four hour trip, never letting them feed a moment; and when joined by their companions at the water-hole on the third evening, the mustangs having been driven constantly without food or water for sixty or seventy hours, they are generally so tired and dispirited that the four men can drive them across the country and into the nearest corral by the next morning without further trouble.

Instances have been known where a herd was kept on the move seven days and nights before being sufficiently subdued to be corraled.

The next method used for capturing these horses is the "snare," practiced by Mexican Comanches, who are too lazy to do any thing else but hang a rope on a tree and watch till it catches something.

For this to be successful the water-hole must be surrounded by thick chaparral, with only a narrow path or pass leading down to the water; then they take several lassoes and fasten one end of each to a heavy clog of wood, and hang the noose in the path. When the herd comes to water and approaches the first noose the Mexicans jump up behind them with a loud yell, while the horses rush through the narrow path as best they can, and two or three are certain to be caught; then such a jumping and kicking and plunging and screaming is not to be described, where, I fancy, an hour's business exhibit until they are tired out and choked down.

The "crease" is purely American, and is practiced by hunters who only want one horse, or by travelers who have been unfortunate enough to lose their mount, and who are good rifle-shots.

It simply consists of lying in wait for the drove at some convenient place—usually a water-hole or—taking your life in your hands—through the top of the neck, touching but not breaking the spinal column. The horse falls as if dead; but by the time you get him down he revives, and his slight wound is healed with little trouble.

HARLEM LANE, SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

ON every fine Sabbath afternoon all the best roads leading out of New York are thronged with vehicles bearing the pleasure-seeking citizens of our metropolis—for Westchester County, Coney Island, and elsewhere. The most celebrated and most frequented of these is Harlem Lane, of which, on page 744, our artist gives a representation as it appears upon these jolly occasions. The Lane is a continuation of the Central Park Drive, and leads into Eighth Avenue near One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street.

The different sorts by one hundred is a sort of microcosm—a representation of Vanity Fair on wheels. There is the gay young cleek with his smiling companion; the dashing millionaire with his magnificent turn-out; the young spendthrift with his gay, carouse-loving comrades; the rout and the jollity; and a long, never-ending procession of pleasure-seekers. Fast men, fast women, and fast horses hold a sort of monopoly over the Lane on Sunday afternoons, and as they emerge into the Avenue the road on either side is usually almost lined with curious or admiring spectators. This fleeting procession wears, after all, only the mask of gayety, which hides below it the rottenness and dreary desolation of a life devoted to fashionable vanities

SKETCHES IN THE ADIRONDACK REGION.

IF you choose to "rough it," there is no section of country more favorable than this for your purpose than that in the immediate vicinity of the Indian Pass through the Adirondack range of mountains.

Via the wagon road from Crown Point on Lake Champlain the distance is just fifty miles to Adirondack Village. Thirty miles of this road is corduroy, which is so rough that the buck board wagon is our ought to be the only vehicle used to convey the tourist into the wilderness.

The deserted village of Adirondack was built nearly thirty years since by a wealthy company of gentlemen of Chemical extensive iron-works there, and finally discovered that, after transporting iron pigs fifty miles by wagon, the cost on the market prevented its profitable sale. Then the works and the village were abandoned. Furnace-men and charcoal-burners were their several homes, and the population soon died out in its circulation. The huge iron chest, heavy with specie, was sent from the source to the mouth of the Hudson. And one family, that of ROBERT HUNTER, was left to inhabit the village and take charge of the works.

There is a handsomely well-balanced boulder which you will see by the road-side twenty miles from the village, a huge mass of rock, to all appearance so nicely balanced that you may, by means of a fence rail used as a lever, throw the boulder from its resting-place on the rock.

MR. L. TREADO and JOHN CHILENY, both well-known as successful hunters and skillful trappers, make their home at Ta-have-hus, a small settlement ten miles from Adirondack. With them you may tramp through the forest, camp out, hunt and fish, until, satisted with sport, you are weary of the woods and long for civilization.

The top of Mount Marcy, the highest peak in New York State, is within thirteen miles of Adirondack. The Great Indian Pass runs near by from Lake Henderson, which is not more than half a mile distant.

IN SEVILLE.

I WAS in Seville a few weeks ago when Isabella still was Queen. A traveler's first impression in Seville is that of being perpetually stared at. In the streets, at the theatres, in the churches, at the Mesa rodonda (table d'hôte), it is all the same. Spanish politeness seems to have gone the way of Spanish debentures; a stranger who is inclined for a lounge will attract about the same amount of respectful attention as a giraffe taking the air in the Strand. A good wholesome English beard is the thing of all others to excite wrath; it would be less conspicuous, perhaps, to wear a tail. The full-grown beard of Britain is too nearly allied to the Moorish or Israelitish appendage to be tolerated by orthodox believers, who shave off the whiskers, and trim the hair on the chin to a fine Vandyke point. An Englishman with a white beard was not long ago pelted in one of the squares of Seville. The city is very sensitive also on the subject of bonnets, or ladies' hats. It would be about as safe to wear a Moorish turban. Probably it is only intended as a tribute of respect to the national Mantilla that fashionably dressed young men stand still and laugh aloud as an English lady passes by.

Whether the tired traveler will sleep at night in Seville depends upon the view he may take of street-noises. If he has gone through a preparatory course of having chain-cables hauled over his berth on board ship he may possibly be soothed to rest by mule-bells, which are like tin-kettles with stones in them, and the rattle whereof is incessant. Mellowed by the distance of a mile or so the sound may have a charm; but it certainly is not to be discovered when it is continued all night immediately under your bedroom window.

The watchmen, too, are very obliging. They prowl about with halberds and lanterns, and insist upon telling you the time every half-hour, accompanying their intimation by a prolonged howl, which is supposed to be "Ave Maria purissima," and so on. By about three A.M. the church-bells are stirring. These instruments of torture are suspended to a beam which revolves on pivots, and the bell is pushed by a man, like a swing, and turns over and over, ringing as it goes. So, between mule-bells on the earth and church-bells in the sky, the traveler may improve his sleepless nights by extending his acquaintance with campanology.

If the people of Seville be dirty it is their own fault, for the town abounds in excellent and well arranged baths. The only difficulty is in getting the water cold. You state your wishes, the attendant shrugs his shoulders, and, while your back is turned, secretly lets a quantity of hot water in, under the impression that you are mad, and that no created constitution could survive the shock of a cold bath.

Hotels in Seville are good and reasonable. As a rule they are kept by foreigners, Italians or French; for the Spaniard still clings fondly to his notion of what an hotel ought to be—a place where you and your horse may sleep, with the privileges of a common fire for cooking any provisions you may chance to have brought with you.

Communication with foreign nations has done much to destroy this national institution, and the result is that in Southern Spain board and lodging may be obtained for less than would be demanded in most parts of France or Germany. In Seville, for example, first-floor apartments are to be rented in an hotel which commands a view of one of the most fashionable thoroughfares at the rate of two dollars a day for an adult, and one dollar for children. This includes two capital meals at the table d'hôte, with a fair proportion of inferior wine. Most reasonable people would be content with this when it is remembered that a Spanish breakfast is almost a dinner, or rather an early luncheon, and, besides meat and pastry, winds up with dessert. A repetition of this meal at five or six o'clock will be quite as much as most digestions can safely undertake. But, if the bill of fare be princely in its dimensions, there are one or two drawbacks to a public meal which render a less sumptuous repast in private more to the taste of travelers with English-bred notions of politeness. In the first place every Spaniard smokes. Meet him when and where you will, there is the inevitable cigar. So he is pretty sure to bring it in to dinner with him, and the smallest delay between the courses finds him puffing away with such vigor as to make a stranger wonder whether, for some unknown cause, the dinner is being served in the smoking-room of the establishment. In the next place Spaniards seem to suffer from cold and bronchial affections to a most alarming extent. A priest at the altar, an actor on the stage, a man of fashion at the club, your next neighbor at the table d'hôte perform such prodigies of expectoration as can only result from the chronic derangement of the national mucous membrane. Bating these little peculiarities there is nothing to hinder an enjoyable meal.

The bedroom is sure to be cool, for houses and streets are so constructed as to keep out as much sunshine as possible. Some of the streets have wires drawn across from house to house, over which canvas is spread during the heat of the day; and, as many of the shop-keepers dispense with window-fronts, and allow their goods to lie exposed in tempting profusion, the sensation is like that of walking through a gigantic fancy fair. There are three things to be noted in streets devoted to private residences: First, that all the houses have projecting windows from the first-floor to the top. This gives much the same sort of character to a house that a good nose does to a human face. The effect is further enhanced by the frame-work being painted in all kinds of bright colors, according to the taste of the owner. Secondly, in place of a solid street door there is always an iron gate, tastefully wrought in filigree-work, and affording a most captivating glimpse of the marble court, or patio, with its fountain in the centre, and orange-trees and heliotropes grouped around. Thirdly, the windows on the ground and first-floor are furnished with stout iron bars, raising an unpleasant suspicion that burglaries must be of very common occurrence in Seville, or that a somewhat unreasonable portion of the city is devoted to sponging-house accommodation. The custom, however, is not altogether due to fear of thieves, but to fear of intrigue. Spanish ladies not being allowed to see their lovers with as much freedom as among ourselves, make up for the restriction by private assignations. Two or three unpolite proverbs are in existence as to the amount of vigilance that should be exercised over women; and the iron bars in question are the proverbs put into practice.

If asked what is the most prominent feature of ordinary street-life in Seville—as I saw it before the present Revolution—the unhesitating answer would be, Soldiers. Supposing that other towns are as liberally supplied with defenders as the capital of Andalusia, her most Catholic majesty must needs have had a good-sized army. Anticipations of a pronunciamento on a small scale may help, on occasion, to swell the Seville garrison to a portentous size; but the everyday aspect of the city is enough to drive a stranger into a frenzy of perplexity, if he begin to think where all the swarms of soldiers come from—how they are paid and fed—and what they do for their money. The last thing at night and the first thing in the morning there they are, prowling about in pairs: lean and gaunt and hungry. Waspish waists and an air of faded gentility are the characteristics of the officers. If ribbons and decorations be any sign of valor, most of them must be perfect lions in fight. An unprejudiced observer might be inclined to think that a little more bone and muscle would not detract from their warlike capacities; but what they want in height of body they make up in length of sword. Privates, as well as officers, wear their side-arms at all hours of the day and night—an arrangement that helps to swell the list of cutting and wounding for which Seville is deservedly renowned.

A timely notice placarded in the patio of the hotel announces that on such and such an evening Señor Somebody, with his company of ladies and gentlemen, will execute all the favorite national dances. The payment of a dollar by a stranger, and of a quarter of that sum by a more highly-favored native, introduces the visitor into a long and dreary room, along the sides of which are seated rows of gloomy-looking individuals, who appear to be awaiting the commencement of business with the amount of cheerfulness usually manifested by patients in a dentist's anteroom. The entrance of four women in short petticoats, and the same number of men in preternaturally tight small-clothes—each of them a dancer of renown—fails to arouse the company from its abject despondency. But as the mysteries of the dance begin to unfold themselves with a grace and dignity that leave all conceivable ballets at a hopeless distance, it turns out that most of the grim spectators have castanets concealed beneath their cloaks. As the pulse begins to quicken, the castanets begin to play; first feebly, then loudly, then madly. Some banjo-like guitars catch the enthusiasm and set up a twanging that speaks well for the strength of catgut. The whole is crowned by a general stamping of feet, in the midst of which half a dozen or so of the spectators fling off their cloaks, rush into the midst of the dance, and display an activity and vigor which are only to be surpassed by their professional brethren. Is it pretty? somebody may ask. That depends upon taste. The figures of the dancers are graceful beyond all words; but the din of the castanets and the general uproar are calculated to interfere with enjoyment. In the open air, and with plenty of space at command, the performance would be charming enough; but none save the strongest nerves ought to try the experiment under a roof.

It is difficult to decide whether Spanish theatres are to be classed as places of entertainment, or whether they should not be regarded as partaking of the nature of a severe penitential discipline. The air of depression that pervades the audience, and the absence of any thing which could be interpreted as a symptom of enjoyment, would favor the last supposition. The men shroud themselves in their cloaks, and lapse into a state of coma. The women telegraph with their fans to favored acquaintances, and pay as much attention to the play as they do to the admonitions of their duennas. Tragedy, in an unlimited number of acts, seems most in vogue, and best harmonizes with the wobegone aspect of the audience. A prompter is ensconced in a little box in the middle of the foot-lights, as in France and Italy, and as he not only reads every word of the play in a key that is audible half over the house, but tells the actors where to stand, and what to do, the interest of the drama does not flag from the audience not knowing what is to come next. The one advantage of theatre-going (next to a pretty and well-ventilated house) is that, judging by time, full equivalent is given for your money. A uniform charge is made for admission, but this must be supplemented by a further sum, varying according to the part of the house that is chosen. The entire outlay need not exceed two shillings.

There is one impression that a stranger can hardly fail to bring away from the theatre, which is, that Spanish ladies are the best gloved women in the world. And so they ought to be, when, besides the natural advantage of well-shaped hands, they make glove buying part of the serious business of life. A Seville glove shop is a curiosity. The counter is adorned with a row of small cushions, the probable use of which gives rise to a variety of wild conjectures on the part of a stranger. These are intended for ladies' elbows to rest upon, while the shop assistants (always men) pull the gloves on for them. No lady would dream of fitting herself with gloves any more than with shoes. As señoras rather pique themselves upon not wearing the same gloves more than once, the glove-fitting operation has to be often repeated. Whenever a row of women are seen undergoing the operation, the picture is sure to be garnished with a fringe of admiring cavaliers.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE Imperial Library of Paris is the most extensive in the world, containing more than a million printed volumes, besides a large number of manuscripts, pamphlets, maps, and charts, and over a million of engravings. This valuable collection is constantly increasing by gifts, purchases, and by the action of a law passed in the time of Henry II., which requires the deposit of a copy of every new work printed in France. Not long ago two new reading-rooms were opened in the Imperial Library. One is wholly public; any one can enter. It is provided with ordinary tables and chairs, and about twenty thousand volumes of the more common works are allotted to it. The other reading-room is open only to persons furnished with tickets of admission. Each desk and chair form a sort of alcove, where the student may pursue his investigations almost as quietly as if in his own study. With the exception of the rarest works, all the treasures of the Library are at the disposal of the readers in this room. Applicants are required to state the general nature of their researches; but tickets will be liberally granted, especially to foreigners. There are numerous public libraries in Paris, many of which are freely opened every day. It is stated that they contain altogether between six and seven millions of volumes.

The Library of the British Museum numbers not far from 820,000 printed volumes. This is not exactly free to the public, since a ticket of admission must first be obtained, and the one applying for a ticket must be a respectable person of twenty-one years of age, and have a specific literary purpose in view. In order to obtain admission he must write a letter to the principal librarian, stating the needful particulars, and also obtain the written recommendation of some responsible friend. The regulations for readers are stringent, but perhaps not unnecessarily so. About eleven years ago a new and commodious reading-room was opened in connection with the British Museum. It contains sitting accommodations for three hundred persons. Some of the tables are reserved exclusively for ladies, though they have the privilege of taking seats where they please. Comfortable chairs, pens, ink, blotters, paper-cutters, and similar conveniences are supplied. Moreover, the room is well warmed and ventilated.

It is said that the supply of books in the Library of the British Museum is "unlimited." What exactly that term may mean is a little uncertain. But it surely seems to be quite an undertaking sometimes to put one's hand upon a particular volume. An American gentleman visiting London a few months ago went to the British Museum, and requested to examine a particular book. As he had complied with all the preliminary regulations there was no delay on that ground, yet it was a full half hour after he made the request before he obtained the volume.

We are to have no more Christmas stories from Dickens, it is said. He has also commenced his farewell series of readings in London. The manuscript of Victor Hugo's new novel, entitled "By Order of the King," will bring him $40,000. The Danish novelist, Hans Christian Andersen, is expected to visit the United States next February.

It is said that a poor German mechanic of this city has invented a sounding-board which prolongs the sound in the piano. The invention is of such a nature that, if the report is true, the piano will become a very perfect musical instrument, and the inventor's fortune be made. Time will show.

Professor Robbins, of Boston, claims to have invented or discovered a method of learning to play on the piano-forte by which months and even years of painful study and practice may be avoided. It is entirely original, say the music-teachers who indorse it—"a marvel of scientific ingenuity and a wonderful art." Surely there will some time be discovered "a royal road to learning."

A Rochester paper states that a new species of shad has been discovered in Lake Ontario, off the Irondequoit Bay. This fish is about a pound in weight, and differs from an ordinary shad in having more of a "snub" nose, is a little flatter, and, unlike other fish, has a "gizzard," as in a fowl. It has the fins, forked sawbones, and white and black meat of a shad. It is fine eating.

A San Francisco correspondent of one of our daily papers, after giving a detailed account of the destruction of life and property by the recent earthquake in that vicinity, remarks that it has been demonstrated that properly constructed brick, stone, or iron buildings, on natural ground, in any part of San Francisco, will stand uninjured the heaviest earthquakes ever felt in that latitude; and that good frame structures, in any part of the city—even on made ground, if care is taken with the foundations—will pass through heavier shocks unharmed. He states that every fatal casualty was the result of criminal carelessness in constructing brick cornices without supports or proper attachments to the walls, fire-walls, battlements, or chimneys.

A strange story is related in the Lancet of a young boy living in Kosk, Western Russia, who had some disease of the knee which rendered him lame. While riding on horseback in a violent thunder-storm he was struck by lightning and thrown to the ground. When he returned to his senses he found his right leg was entirely gone. He was rescued and conveyed to a neighboring village, where the violent hemorrhage was stopped. The severed leg was found on the grass, several days after the accident, just where the boy had been thrown from his horse. It was quite dried up, and emitted no smell, the tibia being quite black, and stripped half down the leg.

The London Lancet gives a "certain cure" for toothache. Add one drachm of collodion to two drachms of carbolic acid and a gelatinous mass is precipitated, a small portion of which inserted in the cavity of an aching tooth will give immediate relief.

The weddings of a hundred years ago were certainly grand affairs, after the fashion of those days. On the occasion of a marriage which occurred in England in 1760, the entertainment consisted of one hundred and twenty quarters of lamb, forty-four quarters of veal, twenty quarters of mutton, and a great quantity of beef; twelve hams, with a suitable number of chickens, eight hampers of brandy made into punch, twelve dozen of cider, a great many gallons of wine, and ninety bushels of malt made into beer. Five hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen were present, music was furnished by twenty-five fiddlers and pipers, and the whole was conducted with the utmost order.

A Chesterfield farmer, having noticed that every farm advertised for sale is situated in or near some city or village, easily accessible to railroad stations, churches, and school-houses, has new and commodious buildings, is well watered, etc., advertises his farm as being very far removed from any public road; the buildings neither new nor in good repair; and the land needs enriching. The cattle, such as they are, raised upon the fodder of the place (brakes, dogacamus, and hardhack), he will sell or give to the purchaser of the farm.

English oysters are inferior in size, and Englishmen speak of the large American oysters as a luxury. Years ago, when Thackeray visited this country, he was the honored guest of some distinguished men—in Boston, we think—at a dinner party. Raw oysters were served; and, by special arrangement, the waiter placed before Thackeray a plate containing bivalves of unusually huge dimensions. Thackeray looked at them in amazement and uncertainty. He hesitated, but finally attempted to divide one monster with his spoon. "Oh, you must not cut oysters," remonstrated a friend at his elbow, who with others was enjoying the joke, "we always eat them whole." The English author gazed doubtfully at the immense oyster, but made a violent effort and—swallowed it. "How do you like our American oysters?" inquired an amused spectator, sitting opposite at the table. "I feel," replied Thackeray, solemnly, "as if I had swallowed a cold baby!"

Among the curiosities to be deposited in the Municipal Museum, which is in course of formation at the Hôtel Garnavalet, will be all the maps of the city of Paris, from the earliest period down to the great works recently drawn up by order of Baron Haussmann. One of these is a manuscript, representing Paris about the year 1400. Since the commencement of the eighteenth century the plans of Paris may be counted by hundreds.

The Nashville Banner gives a thrilling account of an accident which befell a lovely girl in that city. She was apparently the possessor of a "great wealth of golden hair;" but while standing on the sidewalk, chatting with some companions, this "golden hair" attracted the attention of a hungry mule which was harnassed to a fruit-wagon near by. The vicious creature caught the beautiful tresses between his teeth, and gave them such a jerk as pulled them entirely out of her head! The unfortunate girl was in a distressed condition, but all attempts to rescue the precious article from the wicked animal were in vain—he was resolved to chew the choice morsel to his heart's content. The young lady was conveyed home in a hack, and, at the last accounts, hopes were entertained of her recovery.

There recently died in Paris a French journalist, Dunan Mousseux, whose sole business for some years past has been to get up striking advertisements for Parisian dry-goods dealers. He received, in some cases, as much as five hundred francs for a single advertisement. He would often say to the merchants: "You throw your money to the dogs the way you advertise. People like to deal with witty merchants. Get up a sprightly advertisement and you will attract twice as many customers as by pursuing the same dull and heavy way in which Adam and Noah advertised."

Portraits of Abraham Lincoln are to be found in many European households. Mr. Thomas W. Knox, in his journey through Siberia, two years ago, frequently saw portraits of our martyred President hanging on the walls of the way-side stations and in the hands of the wealthy citizens. At Ekaterineburg, in the Ural Mountains, he was shown a bust of Mr. Lincoln that was being made to the order of a wealthy Russian. The bust was five or six inches high, and cut in topaz from a model procured from America for the purpose.

An unpleasant story is told in connection with Mademoiselle Schneider while she was residing at a French hotel in London. After one of the representations of the Grand Duchesse of Gerolstein was over Mademoiselle Schneider gave a Champagne supper, which assumed an exceedingly gay character. Long after midnight, when the guests had departed, the landlord expressed a wish to see Mademoiselle. Being admitted to her presence, he said: "Mademoiselle Schneider, I regret exceedingly that I can not keep you any longer at my house. It has always borne an excellent reputation, which it would lose in case I should tolerate in it a repetition of such drinking scenes as have just taken place in your rooms. My porter will, to-morrow morning, convey your trunks to any place you may designate." The actress, it is said, responded by throwing a tumbler at the landlord's head.

There is a curious story of an Italian nautical adventurer, who thinks he has discovered an island of great richness and vast extent somewhere on the coast of China. He offered to sell it to Prussia and France, but they don't want it; so, disgusted by the refusals of the European powers, he came to America, as the story goes, to call on Mr. Seward. He expects soon to conclude the business transaction, and to set out to take possession of the island in the name of the Great Republic.

In 1861, says the Pall Mall Gazette, 3323 tons of ice were carried from Norway into England; in 1865, 43,359 tons were imported; and during the last year the quantity has been much greater. And still a good market might be found for much more ice in England.

Adelina Patti was warmly welcomed on her first appearance in Paris as "Lucia." There was no little curiosity to see the prima donna who had become a marquise. It was generally conceded that her voice had gained in richness, and her style improved in taste and precision.

The British Medical Journal inquires "What is soda-water? And is the absence of soda from 'soda-water' a generally understood fact?" It was stated in a recent discussion upon the subject that not one of five samples proved what it ought to be, even in cases where the name of the maker might be expected to be a guarantee of good quality. Several speakers insisted that the less soda the soda-water contained the more it was relished. One person said that four years ago they manufactured soda-water with fifteen grains of soda per bottle, and people complained and said, "What is the matter with this soda-water? It tastes like soap." They then decreased the quantity of soda, and in proportion as they did so their trade increased. He could not state the exact quantity now dissolved, but perhaps it was the fraction of a grain.

Two-thirds of the population of Calvin, Michigan, are stated to be colored people: their entire valuation in landed property, $576,000. They have, in addition, a large amount of other property. They are industrious, determined to educate themselves and their children, and to be honorable and respected citizens—a benefit to their State, and an honor to themselves.

UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER GRANT.

THREE WEDDINGS IN A DAY.

"I do wonder," said Miss Polly Whittlesea, suspending her knitting and her rocking, and sending an indignant gaze across the street, where a young lady, dressed in the cloudiest of white muslins and the bluest of blue ribbons, was being helped into a carriage by a young gentleman—"I do wonder what's the sense of a woman's getting married! making a slave of herself, when she might be comfortable, and being dictated to by somebody in pantaloons! There's that Jenks girl," indicating the young lady before mentioned; "she had every thing she wanted at home, and her Pa was worried if she scratched her little finger; she could dress as she liked, go where she liked, and do what she liked; and here she must up and marry that ridiculous snip of a clerk, who earns six hundred a year! Of all the foolishness! Six hundred! I wonder where she'll get her ribbons and her Cologne! It's a melancholy example of blindness and perversity, and I hope you girls will profit by it."

But for Miss Polly's last remark the reader might have supposed she was alone in her shady parlor that afternoon. It would have been a mistake; her niece Jane, a tall, demure-looking young lady of twenty-five, sat at the table near by, dotting an embroidery pattern. Her niece Mollie, a curly-headed damsel of seventeen years, sat in the open window, swinging the sprays of blossomy lilac abstractedly, and watching the couple who had excited Miss Whittlesea's indignation with envious eyes. It was a little, old-fashioned parlor, with a high gilded looking-glass, a few quaint pictures, claw-footed chairs, spare curtains, and a great vase of syringa set on the mantle. Miss Polly, an antiquated female of forty-five, looked quite as old-fashioned as the room, as she sat knitting vigorously in her starched cap and black silk apron.

"I hope," continued Miss Polly, after waiting a reasonable time and receiving no response to her former remark, "I shall never see either of my nieces making a fool of herself."

"No, certainly, aunt," said Jane, bending down to pick up her reel of cotton.

"Oh no!" echoed Molly from the window.

"As I have always said, I want to save you from the universal stumbling-block of the sex. I want you to keep what health and happiness you have, and not slave yourself to death for other people."

"Yes," was the subdued response of her two listeners.

"I see you understand me. Why, Mollie, there comes Mr. Wilkins home to supper, and there's no fire made. Run, child—oh, stop a minute—I forgot to say that I am going out to tea to-morrow night, Mr. Wilkins and I, to Mrs. Green's. She's been talking about having a tea-party for two years, and now it's coming off. It's a regular party. We're to go at three, and stay till nine."

Mollie whirled about suddenly in the doorway, and there was a peculiar expression in Jane's gray eyes as she raised them to her aunt's face.

"Shall you stay so late?" she asked.

"I mean to, if I'm well. I don't go merely to get my supper; I go for the sake of social intercourse. What are you waiting for, Mollie?"

"Nothing," responded that damsel, dancing off with sudden light-heartedness. "Supper in fifteen minutes, auntie."

I hate explanations, so I will only say that Miss Polly was a maiden lady with a moderate fortune, living in the village of Belton. Jane and Mollie were two orphan nieces whom she had educated, and whom she loved as if they were her own daughters. Like most maiden ladies, Miss Polly disapproved of matrimony, and she had striven, with apparent success, to impress her own opinions on the minds of her two charges. The Mr. Wilkins obscurely mentioned above was an elderly gentleman whom Miss Whittlesea was boarding for the summer, driven thereto by a scarcity of pocket-money. He was a tall, spare man, a widower, with stiff gray hair, and a curiously puckered face, which wore a perpetual feeble smile. He always had most amazingly stiff shirt-collars, and the squeakiest boots in the world, and his whole conversation was a prolonged meander among words—a hopeless search for terms that should sufficiently praise Miss Polly. Perhaps this was the reason that the latter endured him with such wonderful patience, and reproved Jane and Mollie for laughing at his personal peculiarities.

If any one had been looking for Miss Jane Saunders immediately after breakfast the next morning, he would have found her in her chamber hastily scribbling a letter. Of course we can not make her correspondence public, so we will merely watch while she puts the letter in her pocket, dons a gray shawl and bonnet, and starts for the village, walking gravely and innocently as if that pocket was empty. After doing one or two small errands she goes into the post-office. Now we are on the look-out: the letter is directed to Mr. Lyman Ellis. The postmistress smiles a little as she sees the name, and Jane turns away with flushed cheeks.

"She must have thought it a business letter," Jane soliloquizes, perturbedly; "but, to be sure, she must have wondered why I didn't call at his office. I don't care what she thinks! Surely it is not wrong. Aunt will never know it, and I have so few chances to see him."

Nevertheless Jane's conscience troubled her a little, and she walked more slowly than usual, as she came near home. Mollie was out at the gate, looking as pretty as the morning, ostensibly occupied in breaking dead branches off the rose-bushes with a reckless disregard of thorns.

"Why, where are your scissors and gloves?" inquired Jane.

"I don't want them," said Mollie, hastily. "I can work as well this way. Isn't there a prayer-meeting to-night?"

"Yes," replied her sister, feeling her cheeks grow hot again.

"You're going, I suppose?" questioned Mollie, becoming very busy with the rose-bushes.

"I think so, if you're not afraid to stay alone."

"No indeed," was the quick answer, delivered with unnecessary earnestness. "Don't think of staying on my account."

"Very well."

The instant Jane was out of sight Mollie, after looking suspiciously at the front of the house, that looked back at her meekly with closed blinds and vacant doorway, and after peering down into the recesses of the garden on her right, called in suppressed tones to a tiny Irish child on the opposite sidewalk,

"Mick!"

"Yis'm."

"Going past Mr. Bent's store?"

"Yis'm."

"Give this note to Mr. Hall—remember to Mr. Hall. If you'll be back in ten minutes, and won't tell any body, I'll give you the biggest piece of cake! Will you?"

"Yis'm;" and the small urchin was off in an instant. Mollie listened to the patter of his bare feet with a very satisfied smile, then went on trimming the rose-bushes demurely.

Mick, having returned in precisely seven minutes, was duly rewarded with an immense bar of cake, duly cautioned never, never to tell, and dismissed well content. Then Mollie opened the letter; for, of course, like all communications written by females, her note had required an answer. It ran thus:

"Dearest Mollie,—I will be with you to-night at precisely half past seven. I'm inclined to bless both the dragon and my stars. Tom."

At three o'clock that afternoon Miss Polly came into the parlor, where her nieces were sitting demurely, cutting bits of bright silk for patchwork. She wore a lace cap tied with yellow ribbons and a green silk dress. (Let the reader be not shocked, for Miss Polly was fond of bright colors and went to tea-parties but seldom.)

"Be good children," she said, patronizingly, regarding herself in the glass with great complacency. "Don't sit up for me. I shall take a key and we can let ourselves in. Does my dress look well, Jane?"

"Very well, aunt."

"What flowers shall I get for a bouquet? London pride is pretty and sweet-williams—don't you think so?"

"I think smaller flowers would be better. I'll go and cut you some," said Jane, dutifully.

"No; sit still. I hear Mr. Wilkins on the stairs. I'll pick some myself as I go out."

You might have heard Mr. Wilkins at the other end of the town, such amazingly stiff boots had he seen fit to assume on this occasion. It was quite a wonderful thing to watch him as he stood in the little path, awkwardly holding the bouquet of clover pinks and yellow coreopsis that Miss Polly had given him, remarking every other minute that "the—hum—the flowers were—hum—excessively pretty," and finally offering his arm laboriously.

The two girls regarded this scene from the window and turned away without comment, only there was a good deal of wonder in Jane's eyes and a good deal of fun in Mollie's. They sewed industriously the rest of the afternoon, scarcely once speaking to each other, until the clock struck five and Jane went out to prepare supper.

"What a beautiful sunset!" said Mollie, as she rose from the table. "How long does the meeting last, Jane?"

"Until half past eight; but I may not be home then, for I'm going to carry old Mrs. Dobbs some medicine. Don't sit up for me. You can leave the back-door open, or I'll take the other key of the front one. I shall be back before auntie," she added, guiltily, seeing Mollie's surprised face.

"You'd better take the key. I think I'll go to bed early. Don't come into my room and disturb me, Jane. I never sleep well if I'm waked."

As Mollie put the last dish comfortably away in the closet she heard the clock strike seven, and saw Jane passing out the gate, basket in hand. Mollie felt very guilty. How good Jane was, and what a difference between them! Jane was going to do good and attend a prayer-meeting, and she was going to disobey her aunt, stay at home, and see Tom! But, somehow, Mollie thought the prospect was pleasant.

At half past seven she was stationed down by the gate. She had little time for anticipation, for somebody came up the street at a very quick pace, somebody sprang through the gate, or over it, and greeted Mollie with the freedom of an old acquaintance. It was a merry-faced young gentleman with blue eyes and brown curls.

"My respects to the dragon," said the new-comer, bowing to the house with great deference. "My respects to Wilkins and your unfortunate sister. How have I become blessed with the opportunity of seeing you?"

"Auntie and Mr. Wilkins are at a tea-party, and Jane's gone to a prayer-meeting. Hurry, Tom. Come down in the garden, or somebody'll be sure to see you. I've locked up the house. You can stay till just half past eight."

"One hour. Momently expecting that the dragon will fall upon me. I don't care if she does."

"Stop calling her a dragon, Tom; and don't talk so, if you have any pity for me."

"Quite tragic! Excuse me for saying so, Mollie; but how ridiculous all this is! Here we have been engaged a year, and you frown if I bow to you on the street; you scarcely let me show my head near this house, and you won't hear of my speaking to your aunt. If I walk past here, I discover Miss Polly glaring out of the parlor-window, or Wilkins squinting from the front-door. If I look at you twice in church, I'm the object of Miss Polly's furious attention. Now, I say it's ridiculous. I'm not a Gorgon—I'm a respectable young man, at least I always thought so. Can't you go and tell your aunt you want to get married, if you don't think I'm competent to arrange matters?"

"You know I would if I dared, Tom; but aunt is dreadful. I do try sometimes, but I can't; really I can't."

"What's to prevent? Will she put an end to your existence, or shut you up on bread and water?"

"She'd disown me, Tom. She'd cut me off with a shilling, and never hear my name spoken again."

"Is that all? I'll own you, and give you twenty shillings for every one she won't give you, besides bestowing my name upon you. Come, that's an offer!"

I will not give the conversation in detail. Suffice it to say that it was nearly nine o'clock when Mr. Hall, having exhausted all his arguments without effect, finally became indignant, and determined to depart. He was making one final appeal to Mollie, who, still unconvinced, and still lacking in courage, sat sobbing on the bench before him, when they both heard the gate closed softly, and saw, dimly, two figures turning toward the garden.

"Mercy on us!" exclaimed Mollie, in terrified accents. "Tom—the pear-trees!"

Before Tom quite knew what he was about, he had followed Mollie, or had been dragged by Mollie, under the shadow of the trees, and was stationed behind a flourishing clump of rhubarb plants.

"This is a proceeding!" he began, then suddenly checked himself to listen.

The voices were very near them now, and a moment after another miserable couple seated themselves on the same bench which the concealed pair had left so unceremoniously.

"Poor little Mollie," said Jane, mournfully, glancing back at the dark house, "she's gone to bed long ago, I dare say. I wish I was as happy as Mollie. Oh, what would she think of me, if she knew?"

"Think?" replied the voice of Mr. Lyman Ellis. "I own it wouldn't be very agreeable to be discovered lurking about the house in this fashion, but if you will allow me to go to your aunt to-morrow morning and tell her I wish to marry you, she could think or say nothing unpleasant. You are sacrificing your happiness and mine to a miserable caprice. Your aunt happens to have a prejudice against marriage, and so you promise yourself to remain single till she dies."

"Oh, don't speak so. I owe Aunt Polly every thing, and her death will be the greatest misfortune in the world to me."

"All the benefits in the world give her no right to dictate in a matter like this."

"I know."

"Well, then, consider me a little—you consider her so much—let me come here to-morrow and speak to her plainly."

"Oh, I daren't! Oh, Lyman, what shall I do? There she comes now."

In fact two more figures were discernible coming through the gate, unmistakably the figures of Miss Polly and Mr. Wilkins. They seemed in no hurry to go in, but stood leaning on the fence in the moonlight and talking. Presently—oh disastrous movement!—they were seen sauntering slowly toward the garden.

"What shall I do?" gasped Jane, again, in the very extremity of terror.

"Come under the shade," said Mr. Ellis. "She won't perceive us."

In a moment they were crouching so close to the retreat of their fellow-sufferers that the recumbent Mr. Hall could have touched Mr. Ellis's coat-tails.

"This moon is delightful!" was the first remark of Miss Polly's that reached their ears.

"It is!" responded Mr. Wilkins. "Hum—it is. Enchanting."

"I love to walk by moonlight."

"It makes me quite—hum—sad—lonesome."

"Ah!" said Miss Polly, sympathizingly.

"I—hum—feel as if I hadn't a friend in the—hum—the world."

"That's strange"—Miss Polly stopped to gather a rose—"when you have so many."

"You are—hum—mistaken. Hum—I haven't one."

"I'm sure I'm your friend, Mr. Wilkins," said Miss Polly, speaking lower, and putting the rose before her face.

Mr. Wilkins immediately became bewildered in a desert of "Hums," "he—hum—hum—he wished she would—hum—ah—he wished he could—hum—believe it."

"I should think you might," rejoined Miss Polly, "when I say it. I suppose the thought of your past happiness is rather trying," she continued.

"Hum—no. I—hum—could be—hum—happier than I—hum—ever was."

"Indeed!

"I—hum—assure you. If—if—you—hum—thought so."

"Don't!" exclaimed Miss Polly. "Remember your—think of Mrs. Wilkins—dead and gone."

Mr. Wilkins was so abashed by this outburst that he said absolutely nothing for five minutes. Miss Polly got out of patience.

"You weren't congenial," she said. "I see. Ah, that is trying!"

Mr. Wilkins was betrayed again, and declared he—"Hum—never knew what—hum—congeniality was till—hum—till lately. Would she—hum—hum—let him say so?"

"Don't speak to me!" exclaimed Miss Polly, sinking down on the much-enduring bench. "I'm a disgrace to myself. Oh! if those girls should hear this, what would they say?"

Those girls! There was such a merry shout of laughter behind her! It pealed forth upon the startled ears of Miss Polly and Mr. Wilkins, frightening them nearly into fits. When they recovered a little there were Tom and Mollie on one side, Jane and Mr. Ellis on the other, the last two looking very surprised.

In an instant Mollie's arms were round her aunt's neck, and she was crying,

"We'll say you're the dearest auntie in the world! Be good now."

"Be magnanimous," put in Tom. "You see we've all found each other out."

"And are all equally culpable," subjoined Mr. Ellis.

Miss Polly Whittlesea was a wise woman. I shouldn't have written about her if she hadn't been wise. And when she saw that Fate favored her desires she did not try to undo the doings of Fate. For reasons of her own she had determined to try her fortunes matrimonially; and when she found her nieces inclined thus also she agreed to let them go along with her for shipwreck or prosperity, remembering that if she did otherwise her example and precept would contradict each other. Oh, acute Miss Polly! Thus it happened that three weddings took place in one day.

A DAY IN ANCIENT ROME.

At break of day the noise of the city rose like the hoarse murmur of the distant sea. Artisans hurrying to their daily labor; the touting of the shopmen, as in London in the olden time; the rushing whirl of rapid wheels; the cries of itinerant dealers; and the mingled sounds that ascend from every crowd, "murdered sleep;" and rich and poor alike shook off their drowsiness. Among the earliest passengers in the streets might be seen assiduous Clients hastening to their Patron's mansion, and swarming around his half-closed gates, within which the more privileged were alone admitted. The "first admissions," as they were called, consisted of the intimate friends of the great man, who were favored with a private interview. The "second admissions" were also allowed to pass within the house, but obtained merely a collective audience. At length the gates were thrown open, and the expectant crowd rushed into the Atrium. Forth came the Patron, robed in his toga, and preceded by the first and second admissions. Slaves announced his approach. The hum of conversation subsided, and all pressed around their common Patron. The most flattering compliments, the most obsequious inquiries as to his health, were addressed to him. He was styled "lord" and "king." Accompanied by his "nomenclator," he proceeded in state through the opening ranks. With some he affected to converse confidentially; others he would even embrace; with these he shook hands; to those he simply wished "good-day;" others, again, he barely noticed by a slight inclination of the head, or heeded not at all.

Thus passed away the first two hours of the day. Precisely at eight o'clock the Patron "descended into the Forum"—such was the phrase—reclining in a litter borne on the shoulders of six or eight stout slaves, or perchance bestriding the back of an ambling mule. The "cohort" of Clients closed him in, and in this style he reached the arena of public business. The more numerous his Clients the more onerous were his duties. For one he would have to plead before the Prætor's tribunal; for another he must appear at the Columnia Mœnia to answer the petty charges alleged against him; for a third he must find bail; for a fourth he must make an arrangement with impatient creditors. Such labors occupied the morning hours of the rich, who worked the more diligently because it was only thus they could hope to acquire popularity, and attain to the highest honors of the state.

Meanwhile the tribunals were sitting, the money-changers were seated behind their counters, the shopmen displayed their wares, the citizens pursued each his respective employment, and the streets were thronged with horsemen and pedestrians, with senators and slaves, with knights and artisans. But all at once the bustle ceased as if by enchantment. It was noon, the sixth hour of the day. The glowing pavements of the streets were suddenly deserted, and all returned to their homes save only those who earned their daily bread by manual labor. The others, more fortunate, after partaking of a light repast, threw themselves on their beds or couches and snatched a brief repose.

At three in the afternoon work of every kind was given up, and recreation became the order of the day. The tide of population then set in toward the Campus Martius, where men of all ages, ranks, and professions gathered together. Here the strenuous, able-bodied youths exercised themselves in all kinds of athletic games, especially those connected with a military career. They hurled the javelin, discharged the sling—and with such skill and force as to strike an object at the distance of two hundred yards—fenced at the effigy of a man, vaulted on horseback from the right or left, broke in young colts, leaped to the ground sword or lance in hand, ran races, contended in jumping and in lifting weights, and, with their bodies rubbed all over with oil, wrestled for the first fall. These rough and hardy sports they would terminate by plunging into the yellow waters of the Tiber, the temperature of which nearly equals that of the atmosphere.

In another direction the discobuli were throwing the discus or quoit, made of iron, lead, brass, or marble. This they generally discharged by means of a leather thong, which they first waved round their head to give the quoit a greater impetus. At other times they threw it simply from the hand, after the manner of modern quoit-players. Some, again, would prefer the trochus, or hoop of iron or brass, set round with rings, which they trundled rapidly along by means of a short iron staff or rod. A third set might be seen engaged in pugilistic encounters, but with their hands enveloped in loose gloves padded with wool or other soft substance. Still more numerous were those who delighted to display their address in games of ball, of which there were five varieties, all requiring quickness of eye, hand, and foot.

Each of these contending parties had its own convex or ring of spectators, who entered warmly into the spirit of the game, applauding the successful, ridiculing the awkward and inexpert, and backing their favorite champions to sometimes a heavy amount.

At four o'clock a brazen disc or gong announced the opening of the public baths, and soon the thronged and noisy plain became once more the abode of silence and solitude. After bathing, the Romans sat down to supper, which they sometimes prolonged to a late hour of the night. As the sun sank below the horizon, carts and wagons were permitted to circulate freely through the otherwise deserted streets, and all night long the dull crushing sound of their slow-revolving wheels fell heavily on the ear of the sleepless watcher.

UNLOOKED FOR.

THE brown front of the house where I lived was not "brown stone," although it might have been, for stones were plenty as bones in a shot all over the back of Bedford behind it. But, however, the house had a brown front all the same, and a round window with diamond-shaped panes in a little alcove at the south corner, where my rocking-chair, my work-table, and my writing-desk always stood; and where, my house being small and soon kept, I spent many hours every day.

I had had my experiences and troubles in life, but they were past, and I had come into a quiet place at last, where, living alone with my flowers and my books, I could look out upon the tumult and struggle of other people as one in a lighthouse looks out upon the surging and unrest of the waters below.

Opposite my window was a great, old-fashioned house with large chimneys, and with points and gables all over it, and a deep, green yard in front shaded by horse-chestnuts. Here in the house one saw the river with its boats, then the houses of a village on the opposite shore, and a high stone monument rearing against the sky on a hill behind. A peaceful picture but full of unrest. The still, white monument memorized the clangor and shedding of a battle; the placid water flowed over the wreck of many storms, and the quiet house was alive with the passions and yearnings of human hearts.

In this house, which came from dead generations to them, lived two spinster sisters, Miss Louisa and Miss Amy Sabea; but though they were the only sisters of their family they were by no means the last of their race. They had brothers at California, brothers at India, brothers at the Sandwich Islands, and brothers ready to turn up every where. And all the brothers had sisters, sisters who were forever being sent to their aunts here in Landfordshire for one reason or another. Because the climate was unhealthy, or they were delicate, or wild, or in the way. So there was much coming and going and stir of young life as though the Misses Saben had kept a girls' boarding-school.

And because their house was full in every corner, if any body wished to be sad or quiet they came across the way to me; so I always had a rocking-chair standing by, a pillow on the sofa, and was myself ready for talk or for silence.

One morning, early in the heart of July, I had finished all my house-work in the cool of the day, and sat by the window when the Tregellis omnibus crept and creaked up to the Misses Sabens' door and a young man jumped out. Now a young man was a very unusual sight, for, although there was coming in stages were plenty as daodelions; there was never a nephew among them all. So I looked out with a little surprise, and saw Miss Louisa herself coming to the door to receive him, which was another unusual thing—Miss Louisa being very much given to state and ceremony in her way.

A portmanteau or two was handed down, then the stage-driver and guard drove off, creaking and wheezing as though it had asthma; and presently I saw the young man sitting by the open parlor window looking over photograph albums with the appearance of amusing himself. And then I fell to reading "Brownlows," and forgot entirely the house over the way, until Adaline Saben, the youngest and most talkative of all the nieces, and whose father lived in China, ran in looking like an animated apple-blossom in her white gown and pink ribbons with her white face and pink cheeks.

"Oh, Mrs. Chaney!" she began, "we are having such a funny time at our house! Aunt Louisa had a letter from a gentleman, was the son of a very old friend of hers, so nice, and dreadfully rich, asking permission to bring his niece, Miss Saben; but without saying which niece; and now he has come before she had time to reply. We had all seen him excepting Bessy and me; he was here once with his mother, just before we came; and we can't guess which he has come to see. Aunt Louisa doesn't like to ask right out, you know; and so there it is. We keep going into the parlor one after another, and nasty introduces us as 'My niece, Miss Saben;' or if she isn't, there, on the girls says: 'My cousin, Miss Saben;' and he looks bewildered every time, but doesn't light up at all as though the right one had appeared. Dear me! It is such fun!"

And with that little Adaline floated away like a bit of thistle-down, disappearing a moment after within the house over the way.

But before tea-time Clementine, one of the Sandwich Island cousins and another my favorite of them all, came in. Clementine was out of health, and always out of breath; so she sank at once upon the sofa, and sat and panted for a while. By-and-by, without waiting to breathe quite easily, she gasped: "I think it is Pauline. He talks most to Diana, but he keeps looking at Pauline!"

Then Clementine laughed, lying and shaking all over on the sofa, upon reflection that Miss Amy of us hopes it is she the Prince has come to marry," she continued. "Each but me: of course I am bright enough to know that no Prince in his senses would look a second time at a medicine-chest; but all the others, even down to little Adaline, are so full of hope for themselves, and so jealous of the rest, that it is good as a poor play for me to lie on the sofa and watch them. To tell you the truth, Mrs. Chaney, though Mr. Vincent is so rich and so nice, I fancy he is a little sort. You may imagine it is because the season is backward for grapes that makes me think so; but I don't believe it is altogether that: I believe he really is a little 'under,' as Nurse Styles used to say. Perhaps no more so than the only son of such a ridiculously rich man would naturally be. But, any way, there he sits and quotes poetry and pays compliments; and when he praises Marguerite's beautiful curls, Diana looks as though she would like to fly at them with a pair of shears. And when he speaks of Diana's beautiful eyes, Bessy says: 'Then you don't detect she is near-sighted?' Pauline is the only one who is not jealous; indeed; he has even spoken of my color being so good for an invalid; but he has done nothing for Pauline, only to look at her."

At this moment Miss Saben's tea-bell rang, and Clementine went away.

But her bodiless bedtime, as I sat knitting in the moonlight, Miss Amy ran in with an Indian scarf over her head, and a good deal of excitement in her manner. Miss Amy was a nervous soul, to whom the sun was always just going into eclipse; and to-night she was particularly despondent.

"I don't see what sister Louisa can be thinking of," said she, nearly ready to cry, "to let the girls get so wild about this young man. There is Bessy just as excited as she can possibly be—I can see it in her eyes; she won't sleep to night; and then she will be ill!"

To Miss Amy's mind sleeping was the safest occupation for every body, and not to "sleep" was the climax of misfortune.

"That young Mr. Vincent is turning their heads with his pretty speeches and superb diamonds. They are fairly bewitched, and I would not have such an experience come into their lives for any thing in the world," continued Miss Amy, who when people couldn't be asleep wished them to be quietly sewing or reading something not too heavy, as the next safer employment.

"And, besides, sister Louisa expects so much to be done for a great, and fashionable, and rich and gir, is ill in bed; so every thing comes upon Rachel, and she will feel it is pretty hard. I suppose sister will insist on one of the young misses to-morrow, and I don't see how Rachel can possibly get through with what she has to do and sit with them, and be in time to attend visit at the table. Every thing always happens so untimely, and this is all so unfortunate from beginning to end."

Then Miss Amy sighed as though she was trying to start a wind-mill, and went home.

All the next day I sat watching the opposite windows and in the green yard the bright, pretty figures of the Saben girls flying about like ladybirds, and wondering them in the darkness and in his light summer clothes; but evidently they were all on watch or too much engrossed with their visitor to think of them came in as usual until nightfall again.

Then, it was Miss Louisa herself, prim and proper; and warmth and hospitality and cool one could get below the ladylike formal surface.

"So ridiculous!" she began, stirred quite out of her usual dignified manner, "that a girl might have known Sophia Vincent's son would have an odd streak somewhere. Now what do you think, Mrs. Chaney, he has been doing? Some nieces had done all in their power to entertain him, he should seem still unsatisfied and disappointed; he said he was looking for the fat. I did I. Always think it is better to let every thing work itself out without any meddling, and if he always will I see plainly, and I told him so quite plainly, that I was not responsible. I have done nothing about it either way, and the family can not blame me whether they are pleased or not. But they will be satisfied, for they are people of great good sense."

Then Miss Louisa went home, and, the gas being lighted behind them, I saw Mr. Eugene Vincent and Miss Catharine Sabin sitting together at the opposite window, while through the open windows of the dining-room I saw the Misses Saben washing the tea-cups and laughing after the silly fashion of young girls over their wasted airs and graces.

INDUSTRY AND IDLENESS.

"TICK"—how that blacksmith's hammered
Stroke upon stroke for hours.
In the grass while I've been dozing
Among the April flowers?
What is the use of toiling,
Beating at iron bars?
Isn't it better lying
Watching the daisy stars?

I'm idle as twenty sultans,
Couched in the grass so green;
I wonder what those creatures
In black and orange mean,
Climbing with wonderful patience
To the top of a stalk and stem,
Once high above the meadow,
To pass walk down again?

Yet just as I'm growing drowsy
A blustering, bullying bee,
In his black and yellow velvet,
Comes with a roar at me,
Wondering why I'm idle.
When all the world's astir;
And on he's past on the hollyhock,
Or the topmost shoot of that fir.

That grasshopper's vaulted past me
Five times since I turned to look
How yonder bee wallows
Glance down the bend of the brook.
Oh, I alone am idle
In this never-resting world:
No! there, for one brief moment,
That butterfly's wings are furled;

But now again it's poising
O'er the golden sun outspread
Of a dandelion, gone
In the light that it seems to shed;
And here, in a long procession,
Come ants from a rent in the wall;
Contemptuous, they pass me—
I, a mere sleepy Tyke.

Yes! every thing is toiling,
Moving from post to class;
Even the little mushroom
Is pressing through the grass;
And I alone am idle,
Watched by the pitying sun—
I, I alone am shirking
The work that must be done.

The restless age is crying
To me to come and toil,
If I want my part of the treasure,
My share in the wine and oil.
These creatures are the busy warnings,
Their prophecies are plain;
I'll up and away to Babel
By the fast 5.40 train.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GOOD NEWS FROM THE ARCTIC REGIONS.—Hall's well.

What comes after cheese?—Mice.

DON'T SLOP OVER.

"Don't slop over," the old man said
As he piloted his son to the young man's head;
"Go it by all means, go it fast—
But while doing them this injunction bear:
Go it while hide and hair on horse
Will hold together. Or, go it, of course—
Go it as rapid as ever you can,
But don't slop over, my dear young man.

"Don't, slop over. You'll find some day
That keeping an eye to the windward will pay.
Some may run a little too long;
A preacher preach just a trifling too strong,
And a poet who pleases the world with rhymes
May write and regret it in after-times.
Keep the end in full effect in view,
And don't slop over, whatever you do.

"Don't slop over. Of course, my son,
Are bound to slop over now and then;
And yet let your worst work or best
Are the very ones who blender the least.
Those who for spilt milk never sow
Are the ones who carry the steadiest pail.
Wherever you may be and for the fat
But don't slop over—and freeze to that."

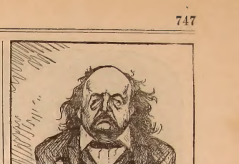
"Don't slop over, distrust yourself,
Nor always reach to the highest shelf.
The next to the highest will gen'rally do,
And never climb to reach at so you.
Climb, of course, but always stop
And take breath a little this side of the top;
And so you will reach it in wind and strong
Without overdoing. This ends my song."

A Missourian informed a traveler who inquired about his corn that each stalk had nine ears on it, and was fifteen feet high.

"That's nothing to our corn," replied the traveler. "Up in Illinois, where I come from, we always had nine ears to each stalk, and a pack of shelled corn hanging to each tassel, but we could never raise any to keep with it."

"Why?"

"Because the corn grew so fast that it always pulled the beans up."



ARGUING WITH A WOMAN.—"You must admit, Doctor," said a young lady to a celebrated doctor of divinity, with whom she was arguing the question of the equality of the sexes, "you must admit that woman was created before man?"

"Well, really, Madam," said the astonished divine, "I must ask you to prove your case."

"That can be easily done, Sir. Wasn't Eve the first maid?"

What trade is more than full?—Fuller.

TO RENDERER.—A married man should never buy his cigars on credit, for by so doing he becomes a weed-over.

BUTLER'S HIMSELF AGAIN!

YOUNG AMERICAN WONDERS.

I wonder what makes papa tell such nice stories to visitors about his finding his master's ratina when he went to school, and about his running away from the schoolmistress when she was going to whip him, and then shut me up all day in a dark room because I tried just once to be as smart as he was?

Wonder what made papa say that wicked word when Betsey upset the ink all over his papers, and then slapped my ears because I said the same thing when my kite-string broke!

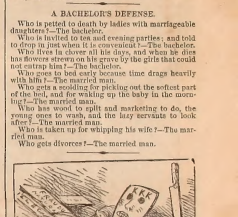
Wonder why mamma told Bridget the other day to say she was not at home when Tommy Smith's mother called, and then puts me to bed without my supper every time I tell a lie!

A BACHELOR'S DEFENSE.

Who is petted to death by ladies with marriageable daughters?—The bachelor.

Who is invited to tea and evening parties; and told to drop in just when it is convenient?—The bachelor.

Who lives in clover all his days, and when he dies has flowers strewn on his grave by the girls that could not entice him?—The bachelor.



Who goes to bed early because time drags heavily with him?—The married man.

Who gets a scolding for picking out the softest part of the bed, and for waking up the baby in the morning?—The married man.

Who has wood to split and marketing to do, the young ones to wash, and the lazy servants to look after?—The married man.

Who is taken up for whipping his wife?—The married man.

Who gets divorces?—The married man.

DEMOCRATIC NAUGHTY.

A brow-beating lawyer, in cross-examining a witness, asked him, among other questions, where he was on a particular day, to which he replied:

"In company with two friends."

"Friends!" exclaimed the lawyer; "two thieves, I suppose, you mean?"

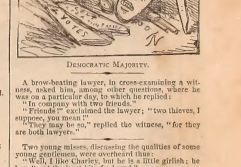
"They may be so," replied the witness, "for they are both lawyers."

Two young misses, discussing the qualities of some young gentlemen, were overheard thus:

"Well, I like Charley, but he is a little girlish; he hasn't got the least bit of a beard."

"I say Charley has got a beard, but he shaves it off."

"No he hasn't, either, any more than I have."

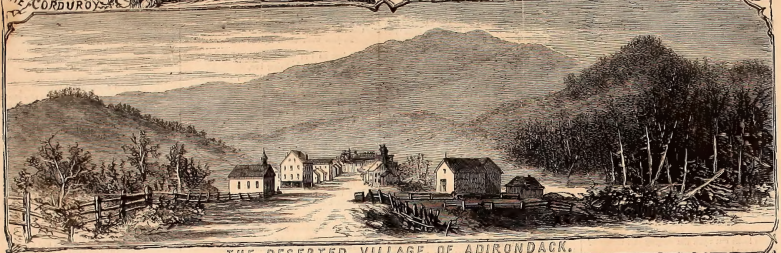


"I say he has, too, and I know it, for it pricked my cheek."

That's how she knew.

THE POWER OF FOLLY.

Would you know the reason why—
Folly often fools us?
The reason why we know so rule,
And that is why she rules us.



It is generally admitted that the Irish are not famous for making bulls, but the Germans are pictured for making pigs. For instance: I've put a pig cat, and I've put a pig dog; I've put a pig calf, and I've put a pig boy; I've put a pig baby, no pig and so tall; and I've got a pig with dat's pigger as all.

THE REVOLUTION IN SPAIN—THE ROYAL PALACE, MADRID.

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

THE late Spanish revolution promises to accomplish for Spain what the revolution of 1688 accomplished for England. It bears scarcely any resemblance to the French revolutions of 1830 and 1848. Therefore it is not surprising that French Republicans are dissatisfied with the present aspect of Spanish affairs, and distrustful as to the future. Thus, EMILE DE GIRARDIN finds fault with General PRIM for not imposing a republic upon Spain, and denounces the idea of a constitutional monarchy. But PRIM very properly replies that the majority of Spaniards favor a monarchy; that the BOURBONS were overthrown not because they were monarchs, but because they were arbitrary, and constantly violated the fundamental laws; and that the scheme of the revolution extended no farther than to the establishment of a Power, liberal, monarchical, and constitutional.

The real difficulty which offers is the choice of a sovereign. Even the selection of the King of Portugal, involving, as it must, the absorption of the latter country by Spain, may be found impracticable. But we shall soon learn the decision of the Cortes.

The Palace of Madrid, which is the subject of one of our engravings, is a vast pile, which was built in 1737 by King Philip V. It is a square of 470 feet each way and 100 feet high, situated between the Plaza del Oriente and the little River Manzanares, by which the city is skirted. It occupies the site of the Moorish Alcazar, which had been inhabited by the Kings of Spain before this building was erected. Its base is of granite; the upper parts are dressed with a glittering white stone, which looks like marble. The interior is splendidly decorated, and contains a fine collection of works of art, besides a museum of armor, said to be unequaled. The windows on one side look across the river to the woods of the Casa del Campo, and the plains beyond, as far as the Guadarrama Mountains. It is said that Queen Isabella escaped with an enormous booty, estimated at over fifteen millions of dollars. The Spaniards, however, would consider it a "good riddance" though purchased at ten times that cost.

BURNETT'S FLORIMEL, also BURNETT'S COLOGNE-WATER (three sizes).—There is a freshness in these delightful perfumes found in no others. New York Branch, 592 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel Building). For sale by druggists and fancy-goods dealers in the principal cities of the United States.

FRANCO'S AMERICAN CHRONICLE.—No praise too great and no encomium too lavish could be bestowed upon FRANCO'S last and best chronicle, "Sunlight in Winter," by MORVILLER, for it is one of those artistic productions which, for completeness of detail and brilliancy of execution, has rarely been equaled and never excelled by any similar work.—Wide World.

A FIRST-CLASS WEEKLY FOR YOUTH.—Our attention has recently been called to the "Youth's Companion," published in Boston—a delightful paper for young people—which we are surprised has heretofore escaped our notice, for it has reached an immense circulation, and is really one of the most vigorously conducted periodicals published. It was started forty-two years ago, by NATHANIEL WILLIS, father of N. P. WILLIS, and is probably the oldest paper of its kind in the world. Thousands of young people take it today, whose parents were its readers in their youth. Some of the finest writers in the country contribute to its columns, and in the breadth, comprehensiveness, and variety of its reading, it is certainly conducted with remarkable discrimination and ability.—[Com.]

CALISAYA BARK.—It is said that MESSRS. DRAKE & CO. (proprietors of the PLANTATION BITTERS) are the largest importers of Calisaya Bark in the country, and that, with the exception of an occasional sale, all they import is used in the compounding of their celebrated PLANTATION BITTERS, which they undoubtedly are indebted for their wonderful health-restoring properties. As a tonic and appetizer they are not to be excelled, and we cheerfully recomend them. All first-class druggists keep them for sale.—Independent.

From the North British Review:

MISS MULOCK'S NOVELS.

She attempts to show how the trials, perplexities, joys, sorrows, labors, and successes of life deepen or wither the character according to its inward bent.

She cares to teach, not how generosity is always plunging men into infinitely more complicated external difficulties than it would in real life, but how any continued insincerity gradually darkens and corrupts the very life-springs of the mind; not how all events conspire to crush an unreal being, who is to be the "example" of the story, but how every event, adverse or fortunate, tends to strengthen and expand a high mind, and to bring the sayings of a selfish or merely weak and self-indulgent nature.

She does not limit herself to domestic conversations, and the mere shock of character on character; she includes a large range of events—the influence of worldly successes and failures—the risks of commercial enterprise—the power of social position—in short, the various elements of a wider economy than they generally admitted into a tale.

She has a true respect for her work, and never permits herself to "make books," and yet she has evidently very great facility in making them.

There are few writers who have exhibited a more marked progress, whether in freedom of touch or in depth of purpose, than the authoress of "The Ogilvies" and "John Halifax."

VOL. XII.—No. 622.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

For some weeks the island of Cuba has been a prominent object of attention. Its affairs are in a very unsettled condition. It has caught the contagion of the Spanish revolutionary fever; but the insurrection in Cuba has a very different purpose from that which has overturned the throne of the Bourbons. The Cubans desire independence of their mother country, and it would not be a surprising event if the "gem of the Antilles" should suddenly drop out of the Spanish diadem. The provisional government does not look with favor upon the sale of this island to the United States; it has appointed a new Governor-General, and sent reinforcements to assist the Cuban authorities in suppressing the rebellion. In addition to its intestine troubles Cuba is reported to be again threatened with an invasion of "filibusters" from this country.

Cuba is the most important of the Spanish colonial possessions. The census of 1862 gives the island a population of 1,359,238, of which nearly one-half is colored. The number of slaves then amounted to 368,550. It is a curious fact that of this slave population there were eleven males to six females. The cultivated lands under sugar, coffee, tobacco, and gardens were estimated in 1858 at nearly two millions of acres. There were 1238 sugar estates, employing 138,701 persons; 1858 coffee plantations, employing 114,760 persons; and 45,549 farms, with 395,393 persons. In 1760 the produce of coffee and sugar together in Cuba amounted only to five millions of pounds; in forty years this was increased to forty millions; and in 1820 the exports exceeded one hundred millions. From 1853 to 1858 the yearly export of sugar alone amounted to over seven hundred millions of pounds. One-third of the whole commerce of Cuba is with the United States, notwithstanding the onerous duties imposed.

One-half of the revenue derived from the island is absorbed in supporting the military department of the government. Nearly the whole of the troops are soldiers from Spain, whose period of service is generally limited to three years.

The policy of the United States in regard to Cuba has been opposed to the possession of the island by France or England. In 1848 President Polk authorized the American Minister at Madrid to offer $100,000,000 for the transfer of the island to the United States, but Spain peremptorily declined to entertain the proposition. The following year LOPEZ and other Cu-hans, who in consequence of some attempted revolutionary movements had been obliged to fly the island, resorted to this country and represented the creole population as dissatisfied with Spanish rule and ready for annexation to the United States. Recruits were collected for the purpose of invading Cuba. The first attempt was thwarted by our Government, but in 1851 LOPEZ with 500 men effected a landing on the island, but made no impression, and were soon captured. Another preparation, it is said, has been secretly made on a much larger scale for a "filibustering" expedition to Cuba.

Just now there is no good reason why Americans should desire the annexation of Cuba, especially when we consider that the island is now to enjoy, under the Spain, all the benefits of a liberal Government.

One of the illustrations on our first page shows one of the methods of punishing slaves in Cuba. The other is engraved from a photograph of El Moro Castle, which is one of the six forts constructed for the defense of the city and harbor. The harbor has a narrow entrance for about half a mile before it fairly opens into the bay. The largest fort for the defense of Havana is La Cabana, which, in time of war, requires a garrison of 2000 men.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION.

THOSE who ostentatiously express a profound reverence for the Constitution as an almost "inspired" document and work of miraculous wisdom and foresight, at least, to hold themselves familiar with the circumstances of its origin, and to remember that no part of it is more to be revered than that which provides for its amendment. The duty of public fidelity at the time of the formation of the Constitution made the instrument purposely obscure upon points that experience has shown to be vital. Although the framers of the Constitution had paralyzed the Confederation, and brought the country into the most humiliating position, the Constitutional Convention met and acted in the shadow of that fear, and by leaving the relation of the States to the Union a half open question doomed the country to settle it by civil war. The Constitution sketches a noble frame of government, but it is by no means an "inspired" work, and nothing is more stupidly perilous than superstition about it. The system it proposed was wholly untried. Experience has revealed serious defects, and the duty of wise and patriotic citizens is to ease the system wherever it proves unnecessarily cruel.

In nothing did HAMILTON show himself wiser than in the perception that the peril in our system would never be the assumption of the Union but of the States; it would not be centralization but State rights. His view has been curiously confirmed by experience. While the instinct of nationality has been deepened, the interpretation of the federal relation by law, and the local State law has been hostile to a real nationality. No moment so suspicious as the present was ever chosen for doing what ought to have been done at first; namely, authorizing the nation itself to determine who shall share in its government. If there be no nation—except in a loose and formal way—if the Union be a mere league of sovereign and independent States, each State must be left to determine for itself whom it will authorize to take part for it in the public deliberations. But if we are a national nation, we ought ourselves to determine the question. This can be done without cavil by an amendment to the Constitution, which we are glad to know will be submitted to Congress, and which we hope will be ratified by the proper number of State Legislatures. Such an amendment will settle one long and angrily contested question lying at the very foundation of the national peace—and it would settle it finally and forever, in the interest of equality.

Such an amendment must be conceived in the most generous spirit; but generosity is compatible with wisdom. Nothing gained by the war ought to be lightly imperiled. It would be a very poor compliment to the sincerity or to the tenacity of the Southern leaders to suppose that GENERAL GRANT'S election as President has done beyond all question what GENERAL GRANT'S victory over LEE failed to achieve. It has this effect, of course, that it shows WADE HAMPTON and his friends the control of the party which maintain the consequences of the war by all lawful means—and it compels those gentlemen, for the present, to use no other than lawful means for their own purposes. But we must not deceive ourselves. Those gentlemen are not in the accendant. But they are Democrats; they are the men of indomitable purpose in the Democratic party; as subalterns or as chiefs they will work to restore that party to power, and should it come into power they would rise to its head and control its policy. They would not, perhaps, attempt to restore slavery. But they are not lovers of liberty. Neither by tradition nor by faith are they in sympathy with American ideas, and their power would be, as it always has been, disastrous to real national progress.

Whatever is done, therefore, must be done in a way which will not necessarily help the schemes of these persons. The Democracy, at Louisiana and Georgia. Georgia, as a reconstructed State, instantly expels from the Legislature citizens lawfully elected and unseated of crime, thereby giving the power to the men of whom we speak. Louisiana, reconstructed, falls a prey to anarchy; and in the city of New Orleans the men of whom we speak take absolute possession of the public. The fault is not in the reconstruction policy, it is in the sympathy of the Executive with the late rebels. If, when Louisiana was framing with domestic violence, Governor WARMOTH could have invoked the aid of a President who was not hostile to loyal men in that State Messrs. ROUSSEAU and STEDMAN would not have represented the National Government there, and loyal men would have voted. Thus, if the Executive of the United States is favorable to domestic violence in a State, the clause of the Constitution authorizing the United States to protect the State becomes inoperative, as we have just seen in Louisiana.

Or suppose that there had been universal enfranchisement, and Mayor MONROE had been Governor of Louisiana, what possible protection would loyal men have had in the courts? Just what they had in South Carolina in 1860, when Governor and State authorities and United States judicial officers in the State all went into rebellion. As the case now stands under the Constitution, when the authorities of a State do not invoke assistance against domestic violence, there is no remedy but in the slow and expensive of a suit in a court, which is no remedy at all; and if the authorities of the State do demand that aid of a President who refuses to give it, there is also no remedy. There is no easy necessary of such a ridiculous dead lock? Is it not clear that the constitutional provision needs revision? If we take care to increase the political power of the disaffected element, let us at least not diminish the security of loyal citizens.

A VITAL REFORM.

THE responsibility of the Republican party is in proportion to the unmeasured confidence which it has received from the country. That confidence is given because the country honestly trusts the purposes and the capacity of the party, and therefore expects from it such reforms as experience has plainly shown to be necessary, as well as that general wisdom of administration and legislation which the time demands. Now, among the measures of the truest economy is a system which will intrust the details of administration to the most competent and honest officers; a system which has been already proposed in Congress by Mr. JENCKES of Rhode Island, one of the most experienced and intelligent of the loyal men in public men. The substance of Mr. JENCKES's system is, that the public service of the country shall not be considered mere spoils for the successful party in an election, but that the real work of administration shall be placed in the best hands selected for the purpose, and unaffected by party struggles and factions.

Mr. JENCKES proposes to return, in the management of public affairs, to the principle which governs all wise conduct of private business, and which was followed by every Government until the Presidency of General JACKSON. He does not see, nor do we, why the civil service of this country should be a system of alms for unpayables. He does not perceive why the responsible man does, why an officer of the civil service should be ashamed of his position while the officer of the military service is universally proud of his. Above all, he does not see why the people of this country should be enormously taxed to pay for a slip-shod, shiftless, wasteful civil service, where there is no security for responsibility, competency, and economy. There are probably eighty or a hundred thousand subordinate offices in this service. They are filled by men who receive from fifty dollars to ten thousand dollars. Here is a sum of a hundred millions secured as spoils by a successful party. The consequence is that every national election is a contest of the most needless and perilous excitement. The party in power taxes all office-holders to the utmost. Those officeholders are the party workers. Subscriptions and their opponents are the hungry who are trying to fill their own months. The country suffers in every way, materially and morally. For the ins came in for party service, not for official competency; and the outs have precisely the same credentials, and no other. Reform by civil service upon the principles of common sense and of all business experience, and we should diminish by nine-tenths the excesses of every great election, and incidentally help party acrimony while we saved us incalculably by intelligent and capable administration.

The difficulty in the way of such a bill is the fear of party managers upon all sides that without the huge and promise of patronage the party could not be brought to its work. How put out a Republican or a Democratic administration if there were no rewards for the successful warriors? say the party chiefs: "People do not give time and money and hard work for the love of their party principles, but for the hope of party plunder." But suppose that were true of the bulk of every party, what then? The proposed reform would take the plunderers and bummers out of the leadership, the practical dictatorship in the caucus which they now enjoy, and the advantage to the country would be inconceivable. Suppose some such system as Mr. JENCKES's introduced, for instance, into the municipal service of New York, how long would the reign of the Ring, of Messrs. SWEENY, TWEED, and HOFFMAN, be what it has been? No law can make a lawyer, but there are many laws that baffle knavery. And the civil service reform would not only baffle knavery, but it would incredibly increase efficiency and fidelity.

This is a reform which can be accomplished only by the Republican party, and the opportunity was never more auspicious as now. There is an imperious demand of economy upon the new administration, and there is a disposition to cease for the present mere partisan hostility to General GRANT. He who pacifies the disordered States let his administration also have the happy renown of doing more to soothe party fury and to remove the latent perils of our system than any in our history. To secure and confirm reconstruction upon the great principle of the protection of equal rights; to reduce the public expenditure and the enormous patronage; and to stop the fearful corruption which is undermining the government; thoroughly to investigate and reform the naturalizations laws and the civil service—are duties which the Republican party is called by its principles and character, and which is will grievously fail if it does not perform.

THE PUBLIC SAFETY.

THE approach of winter reminds the public of the perils of railway travel; and we all read with satisfaction that steel rails have been laid upon the Hudson River Road as far up as Peekskill, and as far down as Poughkeepsie, and that the same rails are to be laid upon the New Haven Road—the task not to occupy more than three days, we hope not. Meanwhile, the accident at Greenbush reminds us that the steel rails have not been laid all the way down to Poughkeepsie; and if they had been, there are still the other forms of peril to be encountered. Switches will be misplaced; wheels will break; bridges will crumble; tracks will be "jumped," and cars will be burned.

The evil is so enormous, whenever we take it into the matter in hand, and DR. HALL has solidited some suggestions. He surveyed the whole subject, and found, besides the risk of collisions, either with other trains or with other obstructions, cattle, wagons, rocks, etc. As the engineer is the first person to see them, let him have invented a system of breaks that will affect the whole train. The breaking of axles is a peril for which no provision can be made, because axles attached to cars can not be tested. The danger of fire should be lessened by warming the cars by pipes, not by stoves. They should be painted, not with incombustible paint, but with fire-proof. Kerosene lamps should be rejected for candles; and timber cars should be replaced by metal or fireproof carriages. There should be also a safety rail in addition to the breaking rail, with such a system of wheels that, when one line or rail becomes broken or inoperative, the change could be instantly and safely made to the other. DR. HALL's report will be generally approved. He said that of course the railroad companies would protest against such an increased expense, but he hoped that the community would insist upon some improved method of securing the public safety.

Besides the railroad improvements thus suggested it appears that the public is to be protected from other very imminent perils. The inspector of the safety of buildings or some gentleman who discharges that function, has recently returned from Europe, where he has been very sensibly impressed with the conviction that in that country places of amusements are not mere traps from which escape is a providential mercy. He has, therefore, begun a tour of inspection through the New York theatres. The wary officer probably goes by day so as to make sure of his own escape. Whoever goes by night to any temple of the Muses in this city has no excuse for not knowing that he puts himself in imminent peril. A cry of fire, a panic, or a panic in any one of those temples, would result in a catastrophe which could not be treated in a tone of badinage. And if the inspector will make a thorough examination of the ample and faithful report, telling the public just where they are in most danger, and showing them how and why, he will have performed a most important service.

If the impression, which we certainly share, that many of our places of amusements are mere traps, is incorrect, let us know it upon an authority that we can all trust, and it will be more money in the pockets of those resorts than, according to Artemus Ward, it would have been in JEFF DAVIS's pocket had he never been born. We shall look, therefore, with great interest and hope for the report of the inspector of the safety of public buildings.

WHY THIS IS THUS.

GOLDSMITH's critic was of opinion that the picture would have been better if the painter had taken more pains: and there are a great many ingenious gentlemen who declare that if the Democrats had managed a little differently—had taken their advice, for instance—the result of the election might have been very different. They are very sure that if the party had not approved repudiation; if it had thrown off the Copperhead and rebel influence; if it had nominated an original anti-slavery leader, like Judge CHASE; if WADE HAMPTON, FORREST, TOOMBS, COBB, SEMMES, and Company had held their tongues; if FRANK BLAIR hadn't written his BROODHEAD letter—why then, things being otherwise, they would have been different. Mr. Nasby puts the whole case of those wise gentlemen in saying, "Our platform was agin us. Hed it been different in all particulers, we shood hev polled more votes, perwided, ov course, that we hed hed different men standin on it. This is clere. The Republikin platform was agin us. Hed they made a different platform, and put other men onto it—their platform and their men both seem more objectionable to the people, and our platform and our men bein less objectionable to the people—the result wood hev been far different. This is clere."

This reasoning in different language is precisely the same reasoning; and as a grave statement it is very ridiculous. Undoubtedly the silence of the Democratic platform upon the subject of national honesty, and the nomination of the President of the Freedman's Commission would have helped the party, because the issue would have been observed. But what sensible man seriously thinks the prospect of genuine peace in the country would have been so promising as it now is if Mr. CHASE had been elected by the co-operation of Tammany Hall and of the authors of the black codes in the Southern States? The real question of the election was this, what is the character, the intentions, the necessary tendencies of the two parties promise? We wanted, for instance, to keep the public faith with creditors and freedmen. The Democratic platform might not have observed for repudiation; but which party do the repudiators support? would have been the question. It might not have insisted upon a white man's government; but which party do the negrohaters sustain? We wanted intelligence and justice, and a wise heroism in dealing with public affairs. Which party, what party, by its history, the dissolute, the apologists for slavery, and the technical strict constructionists act? These would have been the questions, and the answers to them would have been only confirmed if the issues between the parties had not been as plainly drawn as, happily, they were.

There is no historic principle in political politics more stupendous than to regard the persons of candidates and the phrases of platforms more than the real and enduring conflict of which political parties are but the representatives. It is not the words of a man, it is his character, his antecedents, his habitual conduct, which a wise observer regards. Of course a party which we approve may nominate a candidate who is not and ought not to be supported by honorable men; but that will always be an exceptional case. In ordinary elections parties a man is governed by the considerations we have named, and we can not conceive a greater folly in the actual situation of the country than to have supposed that the settlement of the question of the war could have been wisely intrusted to a party composed of those who rebelled, those who morally sustained the rebellion, those who had always supported the theories upon which secession was justified and the injustice to perpetuate which it was attempted. The Democratic party could not logically accept the situation and union; but the Democratic theories and policy were all pro-slavery, and the secession Virginia and Kentucky resolutions were Democratic platforms. For a Democratic, anti-slavery Union man to have supported the Democratic party at the late election, whether it had nominated Mr. CHASE or not, would have been as senseless as for the patriots of the Revolution to have put the Tories into power at the end of the war, or for an English Liberal, at the present time, to send Mr. DISRAELI to power in the expectation that he would be as faithful to reform as JOHN BRIGHT.

As for the Laodiceans who believe that the party is as good or as bad as another: this JOHN BRIGHT is a reformer for his own purposes, and that the Republicans in this country merely prefer the negro—it certainly does very little difference how they vote. But he is a very poor philosopher who supposes that parties indicate nothing but a game between ambitious individuals, and does not see that they represent profound tendencies in human nature. GARRETT DAVIS is the type of this wisdom, who was fond of saying that if he could have hung half a dozen abolitionists upon one tree, and half a dozen fire-eaters upon another, there would have been no trouble. The difficulty with the Democratic party at the late election was not that leaders mismanaged the campaign; it was that the people understood the party.

CHEAPNESS OF LIFE IN AMERICA.

The shocking accident at the Fulton Ferry will make a few persons more careful—that is all. It will not lead to greater official care—it will not lessen the exposure and the peril—but some few persons will hereafter wait until the boat is fast or nearly so, before they press out to the extremest edge, and possibly, now and then—one passenger in a week or a month—may decline to go in a boat so packed that, in case of accident of any kind, disaster is inevitable. There has been a piteous display of the details of the sad accident, and in the lull of other excitement a great deal of skill has been devoted to the elaboration of this. But the truth is, that human life is cheap in this country. With the Ku-Klux Klan and the constant murders going on in certain States of which the report is read every morning, it is impossible that it should be otherwise. We laugh a good deal at England. Well, at least, Englishmen don't permit each other to be butchered. Suppose that every morning brought to the readers of the Times stories of such slaughter in Yorkshire, for instance, as we read of in Louisiana and elsewhere—something would be done as well as said.

The paternal governments of the Continent attend to details which we scorn. We should be very much wiser if we did not scorn them; and this is coming to be seen. Upon the best ordered railroads, for instance, those only are permitted to pass into the station who have tickets as passengers. The result is, that those who are not travelers do not occupy the best seats until the train starts, and in the rush of escape their legs are not broken under the cars. There is a ludicrous indignation upon the part of some very worthy people at the refusal to have every thing their own way in traveling. But one of the best lessons of experience is that it is not wise that they should. All baggage at the risk of the owner is an excellent maxim, but when it breaks your neighbor's shins, he wishes for some better protection than an excellent maxim. Then there is a favorite philosophy which declares that the way to avoid danger is to take risks—also an excellent maxim, but against them all we plead that there is reason in roasting eggs. It is certainly a great deal pleasanter, and in every way better, that a great crowd at a ticket-office should be forced into a queue and compelled to remain there, rather than to jam and squeeze, every man with as good a right to plant his elbows in his neighbor's ribs as his neighbor to do the same. Society has some rights as well as the individual.

The packing of people into boats and cars is something that should be remedied by the people themselves, not individually by crowding and insulting, but by law. It is very foolish for us to blame the Union Ferry Company or any other company for doing what we all daily countenance. The street railroads make great sums of money—and the street railroads do just as they choose. We have often referred to our old and familiar friend, the thirteenth man in the omnibus. The public safety and comfort depend very much upon organized public action. If companies can be persuaded by enormous damages to do what is obviously essential to the welfare of travelers—that is one way of reaching the result. It is a matter for experience to decide. When it is tolerably evident that enormous damages will not do the work, why not try the law in a more stringent form? We do not point these remarks especially at the Union Ferry Company, because it has carried passengers with great safety. We mean the boot for any foot that it will fit.

THE STRINGENCY IN WALL STREET.

During the past summer, partly from the want of the full activity in trade which attends good seasons not interfered with by a Presidential canvass, there was a large accumulation of money at the great financial centres lying idle. Tempted by this abundance, loans were put upon the market quite freely, and they were as freely taken, and stocks never before favorites met with ready sales. The demand from abroad for our bonds aided this tendency, and, as our best securities were removed from our market, the vacuum was supplied with others not of the highest reputation. The low rate of interest abroad, and the higher rate here, induced reinvestments of what was collected on account of capitalists abroad for interest moneys on the Government debt, and for the principal of floating loans; and the banks of the city took as collateral for loans an inferior class of securities. With these unfortunate aids speculation in all descriptions of property here and elsewhere became active. The advance which took place in the prices of what had become favorites with operators kept pace with the encouragement thus furnished. We forbear to present instances of the advance in particular bonds and stocks which was thus occasioned, as this might do injury to those who have become their unwilling owners. This fact is too evident to have escaped attention, now that a state of things the very opposite prevails due to the diversion of capital from these objects to the removal of the crops, and to the locking up of legal-tenders by speculators who operate for a fall of prices. Heavy losses have occurred, and such has been the tightness of the money market that enormous rates of interest have been temporarily paid on the hypothecation of Government bonds or of gold—the securities lately fashionable having gone out of sight, except to those owners of them who, on inspecting their pocket-books, discover this evidence of their folly.

The market partially recovered from its state of collapse on Saturday, the 7th of November, on the promulgation of a statement from Washington that the Secretary of the Treasury had determined to avail himself of a supposed authority, resulting from acts of Congress, to reissue part of the amount of above fifty millions of dollars which had been withdrawn from circulation by him under the Act which authorized the withdrawal of not exceeding four millions per month, which Act was repealed by Congress last winter. There was no justification for this statement except a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to one of his subordinates, claiming that he had a right to issue some portion of the legal tenders—probably the three per cents.—which had been recalled; but the emergency was not considered sufficient to require this expansion. On the contrary, he has stated that it was the true policy to get down to what he calls "hard pan" as soon as this can be done without a crash. No permanent relief can be experienced until prices become adjusted to the diminished quantity of money now in circulation.

The temptation to call upon the Government for new issues in a time of trouble is very great; but it must be borne in mind that if the currency shall be expanded to the quantity in circulation before the recall of this fifty millions or more, prices would inevitably become adjusted to the new state of things, and that an augmentation of the circulating medium would be required again and again, as new emergencies arose of the description of the one through which we have just passed. This seems to be one of the unfortunate evils which ever accompanies a paper system.

The locking up of a large amount of legal-tenders, variously estimated at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars, had a powerful effect in checking the movements of the Bull interest, and in reducing the prices of the subjects of speculation. But its influence reached also to gold, to our breadstuffs, and partially to cotton, and to all the great interests of the country. Gold was sold short, and the premium, which touched 50, fell to 32. The downward movement in gold was aided by the unexpected sale by the Treasury of between two and three millions without notice, and was continued until after the sale had been completed of $300,000 per day, in pursuance of the notice from the Treasury that such sum would be offered, under a system of proposals, for ten consecutive days. These sales were unwise. The Bear interest, aided by the stringency of the money market and by borrowing gold from Canada on a pledge of legal-tenders, hammered down the price of gold by heavy operations for a fall, from which no recovery was had until the promulgation of the supposed Treasury order already spoken of. The fear that the power of the Treasury may be exerted, stands as a partial check upon those who have been engaged in withdrawing legal-tenders from circulation, and prevented heavy failures among the Bulls.

Many in Wall Street supposed that the stringency would produce a general panic; but when it is recollected that the money in circulation is a fixed quantity in the United States, that it will seek always the best market, and that what is locked up must be restored to circulation on the maturity of the loans which enabled parties thus to tie it up, it will appear that a severe and general panic is impossible. Those banks which aided this conspiracy to corner operators by such means, no doubt feel keenly the situation which their own wickedness has produced. The whole country will share in the loss which this stringency has occasioned.

Our regrets in this matter do not arise from the success which one interest in Wall Street has achieved by depressing another—for both are gamblers on a frightful scale—but because the depression has reached our agricultural productions (this may have been one of its objects), and enabled those abroad who are intently watching our market to purchase their supplies at the reduction to which their measures have contributed. Our people must learn that they will continue to be subject to contingencies of this nature as long as we suspend our prosperity "on the wings of paper-money." When we stand on the solid ground which a stable currency produces we shall be able to command the situation, but as long as the country remains exposed to the folly of those bankers whose sole aim is to make heavy dividends without regard to general effects, we shall be at the mercy of those foreign powers which, having large accumulations of the precious metals, are enabled to obtain our productions at rates which afford no profit to our industry.

As a demand from abroad for our agricultural productions is inevitable we continue to say to our farmers that they should strengthen our markets by holding on to their grain until those who want it on the other side of the water are willing to pay for it at remunerative prices.

We regret to witness that the occasion of this stringency has been seized upon to support an issue of "bonds bearing a low rate of interest to be held by the banks at their option as part of their reserve, and reconvertible on demand into currency." The Boston Daily Advertiser, regarded as a highly conservative press, supposes that this scheme, or one of like features, may be matured on such a basis of safety as to recommend it to the acceptance of Congress, and refers to the issue of Exchequer bills in the spring of 1793 by the British Government as a precedent for this extraordinary example. These bills were authorized, to the extent of £5,000,000, to be issued to such merchants and manufacturers as should deposit goods as security for the sum advanced.

The French Convention, in February 1793, had declared war against England and Holland, and Mr. Pitt had been forced to borrow suddenly a sufficient sum to enable Great Britain to go into the struggle, which was one for supremacy. On the 27th of March Mr. Pitt reported to the House of Commons that he had borrowed £4,500,000 for the service of the year. British and French merchants had become closely connected as the result of a commercial treaty, and owing to the sudden stagnation of trade produced by the declaration of war and the alarms occasioned by the political situation, a general failure of commercial credit took place, and to such an extent that many merchants "with large quantities of goods in their possession were unable to make the smallest payment." As Mr. Pitt had taken out of the channels of trade about twenty-seven millions of dollars in gold and silver, to be expended largely upon the Continent, it was incumbent on the Government to provide against the commercial disasters which its own policy had, from dire necessity, occasioned. The issue of Exchequer bills was its first step. In 1797, from the pressure of the same circumstances, the Government went to the extremity of its power, and made the paper of the Bank of England in effect a legal-tender. The second issue of Exchequer bills, on the principles of the act of 1793, was made in 1811, but the war was then in disastrous progress.

There is nothing alike in the situation to justify us in a resort to this extraordinary remedy. The war is now over, and the emergency at an end which calls for the strain of additional issues of paper. Our troubles now are due to the want of circumspection and foresight in the summer on the part of all those in the Treasury and in banks who are charged with the duty of so regulating our finances in a time of plethora as to prevent disgraceful gambling. The transfer of money to the West and South for the removal of crops—an object which all should encourage—is seized upon by speculators to lock up capital in order to promote their cornering operations, and instead of resorting to Exchequer bills as a remedy the true resort is to bills of indictment under laws which shall punish this war by sharpers upon our most substantial interests as a misdemeanor, which shall subject them to fine and imprisonment.

ROSSINI.

Rossini is dead, the most charming, the most vivacious, the most sparkling of the modern Italian composers. His music so gay, so brilliant, so delicious is entirely unique, and has nothing in common with the Italian school with which we are now most familiar, the school of Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi. His genius, never profound, was always exuberant. His music, often merely glittering and rhetorical, has still a wonderful charm; and none of the more modern Italian composers have impressed themselves so strongly as he upon the musical mind of the age. The characteristic of the music that followed Rossini in Italy is pathetic sentimentality. It is the music of pensive lyrical poets. That of Rossini is the work of a brilliant man of the world. His life and his work seem always harmonious. When he retired from his last professional situation he settled into an otiose, self-indulgent, indolent life, and the chief stories that we have heard of him during the latter years have been of his snuffing the spicy incense of flattery, and of his exquisite salon and cuisine.

Rossini was born at Pesaro in 1792, the son of strolling musicians. The boy was full of music, and began to compose operas at seventeen or eighteen. At twenty he was famous. At thirty he had composed all of his great operas but the William Tell. Before he was forty he had retired into Sybaritic seclusion, and wrote nothing of importance again except the Stabat Mater. He lived in and near Paris, complimented and complimenting, until the tranquil lapse of time had brought his seventy-seventh year, when he quietly died.

Rossini was at first musical director of San Carlo in Naples; then, for a time, in 1824, of the Italian Opera in London, and afterward in Paris until 1830. His first famous work was Tancredi. This was followed by L'Italiani in Algieri, and some less noted operas. Then came Otello, Mose in Egitto, La Donna del Lago, and others; and in 1816, when he was twenty-four years old, the incomparable Barbiere di Seviglia. The next year he wrote La Cenerentola and La Gazza Ladra, and, after some minor works, the superb Semiramide in 1823. After this he composed the William Tell about 1830, the most elaborate and careful, but not the most charming of his operas, although it has always the most honorable mention. These dates show that this captivating music is the bright effervescence of youth; and indeed it has the quality of the finest wines, the honey richness of the first run of the grapes, pressed only by their own weight.

His active career covered the time from Napoleon's Russian campaign to the Revolution of July. His music is that of a period that wished to be cheered and amused, not to think. You fancy all the theatres in Europe ringing with his gay melodies, and people half forgetting the storms that thundered and shook outside. The heart-break of Italy is not heard in them as it is in the tender strains of Bellini, whose Il Pirata and La Straniera immediately succeeded Rossini's Semiramide. We do not know that Rossini ever had any especial sympathy with his country—or that he was other than a lotus-eating Epicurian, content to forget the past and to live in the present pleasure. But he is always kindly associated with his fresh, beautiful music, and there will always be a personal interest in so delightful a composer. He lived to see many of his younger countrymen rise into fame in his own sphere; and he may well have smiled encouragement, for he died while his own genius was still supreme.

"THE BAZAR."

Our neighbor and friend, Harper's Bazar, has justified all its fine promises, and has become to a fabulous number of families an indispensable weekly visitor. It is sure to have something interesting for the home-circle to read and to see. Next week, for instance, it has a new portrait of Vice-President-elect Colfax and of Miss Ella M. Wade, whom he has just married. The bridegroom's gift to his bride is also faithfully portrayed. It will also present to its readers one of those remarkable and beautiful colored fashion-plates, for which it is noted, and which can not yet be successfully executed in this country. It represents varieties of the present mode of carriage and visiting toilets, and is an exquisite illustration of the excellence to which this pictorial art has been brought.

LITERARY.

"Sermons by Henry Ward Beecher." The Harpers have published two handsome volumes, containing forty-six of Mr. Beecher's sermons, selected from more than five hundred, and revised by himself; and they are such, of course, as he would be judged by. The greatness and sweetness of his heart, the opulence and felicity of his fancy, his sincere piety, his blithe humor, his brave and vigorous thought, are all admirably expressed, but are never exhausted, in this collection.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The official returns of the late elections give the Democratic party in New York for President a majority of 9387, and for Governor 30,182. The Democratic majority in New Jersey was, for Seymour, 3073; for Randolph, 4373. All but six counties in Ohio give General Grant a majority of 41,596. Illinois gives him (all but four counties reckoned) 54,735. The proposition for a Constitutional Convention in that State appears to have been defeated. Alabama is conceded to Grant by about 2500 majority.

Governor Reed, of Florida, who has been lately impeached by the State Legislature, has appealed to the Supreme Judiciary of the State, protesting against the competency of the body which has arraigned him.

Colonel Tappan, Indian Peace Commissioner declares that all the Indians—70,000 in number—whose representatives the Commission have met and treated with this year are keeping faith, and have gone or are on their way to the reservations provided for them. The war at present existing is with some 6000 Indians whom the Government has disappointed in not fulfilling the treaties made last year.

The charter election at Charleston, S. C., took place on the 11th, and resulted in favor of Pillsbury, the Republican candidate for Mayor by a majority of 18 in a vote of 10,000. The defeated party has taken steps to contest the election. The Republicans, it is said, will attempt to install their Mayor by force.

On the night of November 13-14, there was a brilliant shower of meteors; 623 were counted by a single observer in the course of about three hours and a half.

The population of Chicago is now estimated at 252,054—an increase in seven months of 9671.

Ex-Governor Tod of Ohio died at his home in Youngstown on the morning of the 13th.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Gioacchino Rossini, the great Italian musical composer, died at Paris, November 14, in his seventy-seventh year. A very excellent portrait of Rossini was published in Harper's Weekly for November 9, 1867.

The Provisional Government at Mardid has declared all the Spanish colonial ports free; anchorage duties are abolished. Civil marriages are now of frequent occurrence in Spain. The formation of a Protestant Church in Madrid has been sanctioned by the authorities.

By telegram from Lisbon we learn of the receipt at that port of the mail news from Paraguay. The allied army before Angostura had been attacked by the Paraguayans, and had repulsed the assailants. It was fully confirmed that President Lopez had shot his brothers.

The United States of Colombia are in the midst of a civil war. The confederation consists of nine States, of which three are in the hands of the Conservatives, and the others, as well as the Federal Government, in the hands of the Liberals.

FRENCH COUNCIL OF MINISTERS HELD AT ST. CLOUD, PRESIDED OVER BY THE EMPEROR.—[See Page 757.]

THE FRENCH CABINET COUNCIL.

THE Emperor NAPOLEON, immediately after his return from Biarritz, called together a grand council of his Ministers, over which he presided, at St. Cloud. It is announced that measures of grave importance were discussed; but, as is usually the case, the secret has been well kept, and nothing has transpired to indicate the nature of the decisions arrived at on this occasion. The Empress EUGENIE was present at the council. Our illustration on page 756 is from a sketch made by a French artist who happened to catch a glimpse of this illustrious party. Of course this council has been the occasion of much speculation in political circles throughout Europe. Every body watches the Emperor. He is the great oracle, and every word which he utters is published and commented upon all over the world. It is supposed that, if he chooses, he could to-morrow deluge a continent in blood. He may proclaim daily that "the Empire is peace," but still it remains true that the rest of the world interprets his every speech and action to mean war.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER I.

THE TRIAL.

SOME years ago there was a trial in Dublin which, partly because the parties in the case were in a well-to-do condition of life, and partly because the case, in some measure, involved the interests of the two conflicting Churches, excited considerable sensation and much comment.

The contention was the right to the guardianship of a boy whose father and mother had ceased to live together. On their separation they had come to a sort of amicable arrangement that the child—then seven years old—should live alternate years with each; and though the mother's friends warmly urged her not to consent to a plan so full of danger to her child, and so certain to result in the worst effects on his character, the poor woman, whose rank in life was far inferior to her husband's, yielded, partly from habit of deference to his wishes, and more still because she believed, in refusing these terms, she might have found herself reduced to accept even worse ones. The marriage had been unfortunate in every way. Sir Roger Norcott had accompanied his regiment, the —th Dragoons, to Ireland, where some violent disturbances in the south had called for an increase of military force. When the riots had been suppressed, the troops, broken up into small detachments, were quartered through the counties, as opportunity and convenience served; Norcott's troop—for he was a captain—being stationed in that very miserable and poverty-stricken town called Macroom. Here the dashing soldier, who for years had been a Guardsman, mixing in all the gayeties of a London life, passed days and weeks of dreary despondency. His two subs, who happened to be sons of men in trade, he treated with a cold and distant politeness, but never entered into their projects nor accepted their companionship; and though they messed together each day, no other intimacy passed between them than the courtesies of the table.

It chanced that while thus hipped, and out of sorts, sick of the place and the service that had condemned him to it, he made acquaintance with a watchmaker when paying for some slight service, and subsequently with his daughter, a very pretty, modest-looking, gentle girl of eighteen. The utter vacuity of his life, the tiresome hours of barrack-room solitude, the want of some one to talk to him, but, still more, of some one to listen—for he liked to talk, and talked almost well—led him to pass more than half his days and all his evenings at their house. Nor was the fact that his visits had become a sort of townscandal without its charm for a man who actually joined for a sensation, even though painful; and there was, too, an impertinence that, while declining the society of the supposed upper classes of the neighborhood, he found congenial companionship with these humble people, which had a marvelous attraction for a man who had no small share of resentfulness in his nature, and was seldom so near being happy as when flouting some prejudice or outraging some popular opinion.

It had been his passion through life to be ever doing or saying something that no one could have anticipated. For the pleasure of astonishing the world no sacrifice was too costly; and whether he rode, or shot, or played, or yachted, his first thought was notoriety. An ample fortune lent considerable aid to this tendency; but every year's extravagance was now telling on his resources, and he was forced to draw on his ingenuity where before he needed but to draw on his banker.

There was nothing that his friends thought less likely than that he would marry, except that, if he should, his wife would not be a woman of family. To bowl over both of these beliefs together he married the watchmaker's daughter, and Mary Owen became a baronet's bride.

Perhaps—I'm not very sure of even that—her marriage gave her one entire day of unbroken happiness; I do not believe it gave her a week, and I know it did not a month. Whether it was that his friends were less shocked than he had hoped for, or that the shock were out sooner, he was frantic at the failure of his grand coup, and immediately set about revenging on his unhappy wife all the disappointment she had caused him. After a series of cruelties—some of which savored of madness, but which she bore without complaint or even murmur—he bethought him that her religious belief offered a ground-work for torment which he had hitherto neglected. He accordingly determined to make his profession to the Church of Rome, and to call on her to follow. This she stoutly refused; and he declared that they should separate. The menace had no longer a terror for her. She accepted whatever terms he was pleased to dictate; she only stipulated as to the child, and for him only to the extent we have already seen. The first year after the separation the boy passed with his father; the second he spent with his mother. At the end of the third year, when her turn again came round, Sir Roger refused to part with him; and when reminded of his promise, coarsely replied that his boy, above all things, must be a gentleman; and that he was now arrived at an age when association with low and vulgar people would attach a tone to his mind, and a fashion to his thoughts, that all the education in the world would not eradicate; and that rather than yield to such a desecration, he would litigate the matter to the last shilling of his estate. Such was the cause before the Barons of the Exchequer; the mother pleading that her child should be restored to her; the father opposing the demand, that the mother's habits and associates were not in accordance with the prospects of one who should inherit title and fortune; and last of all, that the boy was devotedly attached to him, and bore scarcely a trace of affection for his mother.

So painful were the disclosures that came out during the trial, so subversive of every feeling that pertains to the sanctity of the family, and so certain to work injuriously on the character of the child whose interests were at stake, that the judge made more than one attempt to arrest the proceedings and refer the case to arbitration; but Sir Roger would not agree to this. He was once more in his element, he was before the world—the newspapers were full of him, and better than all, in attack and reprobation. He had demanded to be put on the table as a witness, and they who saw it, said, never forgot the insolent defiance of public opinion that he on that day displayed; how boldly he paraded scepticism and irreligion to outrage the feelings of right and justice, and how openly he avowed his principle of education to be—to strip off from youth every illusion as to the existence of truth and honor in life, and to teach a child, from his earliest years, that trickery and falsehood were the daily weapons of mankind, and that he who would not consent to be the dupe of his fellow-men must be their despot and their tormentor. If he had the satisfaction of outraging the feelings of all in court, and insulting every sense of propriety and decorum, he paid heavily for the brief triumph. The judge delivered a most stern denunciation of his doctrines, and declared that no case had ever come before the court where so little hesitation existed as to the judgment to be pronounced. The sentence was, that up to the age of twelve the child was to be confided to its mother's charge, after which period the court would, on application, deliberate and determine on the future guardianship.

"Will you leave me, Owen?" asked the father, and his lips trembled and his cheek blanched as he uttered the words. The boy sprang into his arms and kissed him wildly and passionately; and the two clung to each other in close embrace, and their mingled sobs echoed through the court. "You see, my lord, you see—" cried the father; but the boy's struggles were choking him, and with his boy's emotions would not suffer him to continue. His sufferings were now real, and a murmur ran through the court that showed how public opinion was trending in the balance. The hustle of a new cause that was coming on soon closed the scene. The child was then handed over to an officer of the court, while the mother's friends concerted together, and all was over.

Over an account of the first act of a life-long drama; and ere the curtain rises, it only remains to say that the cause which that day decided was mine, and that he who write this, was the man "Digby Norcott."

CHAPTER II.

WITH MY MOTHER.

My mother lived in a little cottage at a place called the Green Lanes, about three miles from Dublin. The name was happily given, for on every side there were narrow roads overshadowed by leafy trees, which met above and gave only glimpses of sky and cloud through their feathery foliage. The hedgerows of which one or both lines limited the view on either side, and imparted a something of gloom to a spot whose silence was rarely broken, for it was not a man's neighborhood. They who frequented it were persons of small fortune, retired subalterns in the army, or clerks in public offices, and such like petty respectabilities who preferred to herd together and make no contrasts of their means with larger, grander incomes.

Among the sensations I shall never forget, and which while I write are as fresh as the moment I first felt them—were my feelings when the ball stopped opposite a low wicket, and Mr. M'Bride, the attorney, helped me down and said, "This is your home, Digby, your mother lives in it now." The next moment a pale but very handsome young woman came rushing down the little path and clasped me in her arms. She had dropped on her knees to bring her face to mine, and she kissed me madly and wildly, so that my cap fell off. "So, that child is all mine!" I said, as I paused as I was to such disconcerting warmth, and caring far more for my smart appearance than for demonstrations of affection. "Oh, darling, never mind it," sobbed she. "You shall have mother and a nicer. I will make it myself, for my own boy—you are mine, Digby. You are mine, dearest, ain't you?"

"I am papa's boy," said I, doggedly.

"But you will love mamma, too, Digby, won't you?—poor mamma, that has no one to love her, or care for her, if you do not—and who will so love you it; return, and do every thing for you, every thing to make you happy—happy and good, Digby."

"Then let us go back to Earls Court. It's far prettier than this, and there are great lions over the grounds, and wide steps up to the door. I don't like this. It looks so dark and dreary—it makes me cry." And to prove it, I burst out into a full-mouthed fit of weeping, at the same lung over me and sobbed too; and long after the car had driven away we sat there on the grass weeping bitterly together, though there was no one there in our sorrow nor any soul to our grief.

That whole afternoon was passed in attempts to comfort and caress me by my mother, and by the petulant demands on my part for this or that luxury I had left behind me. I wanted my nice bed with the red curtains, and my large room to raise. I wanted my little punt, my pony, my fishing-rod. I wanted the obsequious servants, who ran at my bidding, and whose respectful manner was a homage I loved to exact. Not one of these was forthcoming, and how could I believe her who soothingly told me that her love would replace them, and that her heart's affection would soon be dearer to me than all my toys and all the glittering presents that littered my room. "But I want my pony," I cried; "I want my little dog Fan, and I want to sit beside papa, and see him drive four horses, and he lets me whip them too, and you won't." And so I cried hysterically again, and in these fretful paroxysms I passed my evening.

The first week of my life there was to me—it still is to me—like a dream—a sad, monotonous dream. Repulsed in every effort, my mother still persisted in trying to amuse or interest me, and I either sat in moody silence, refusing all attention, or went off into passionate grief, sobbing as if my heart would break. "Let him cry in his fill," said Mr. M'Bride; "he'll get over cry in his fill, and it will do him good." And I could have killed her on the spot as she said it.

If Billy Lawless were around that a heavy bit of crying would have been a good alterative for me, she ought not to have expressed the opinion in my presence, for there was a sympathy in my father in me that quickly suggested resistance, and I at once resolved that no matter what it might cost me, why whom it might mean, I might and a vent for my grief, I'd cry no more. All my poor mother's caresses, all her tenderness, and all her watchful care were lost on my character with half the force or one-tenth of the rapidity that did this old hag's attempt to thwart and oppose me. Her system was, by an unusual comparison between my present life and my past, to show how much better off I was now than in my former high estate, and by a travesty of all I had been used to, to pretend that any like complaint from me would be sheer ingratitude. "Here, Digby Norcott," would I hear, "is a room to ride him," she would say, as she would lay an old walking-stick beside my door; and though the blood would rush to my head at the insult, and something very nigh choking rise to my throat, I would master my passion, and make no reply. This demeanor was not down to suitedness, and Biddy warmly entreated my mother to expunge the word "master" from my title, as it insultingly suggested, "Cut it out of me when I was young"—a counsel, I must own, she did not follow.

Too straitened in her means to keep a governess for me, and too much a woman of the school, my mother became my teacher herself; and, not having had any but the very commonest education, she was obliged to acquire in advance what she desired to impart. Many a night would she pore over the Latin Grammar that she might be on one stage before me on the morning. Over and over did she get up the bit of geography that was to test me on the next day's lesson, and in this way, while lending me an ear, she acquired, almost without being aware of it, a considerable amount of information. Her progress was rapid over the common, and her zeal could not be surpassed; so that, while I was stumbling and blundering over Sesame's Sentences, she had read Josephus's Catiline, and most of the Odes of Horace; and long before I had mastered my Geography, understood the Ptolemaic system. Nor was this all, for, if it recurred to me, it came with no more of reality than the events of a dream. One day, indeed—I shall never forget it—she put revealed itself before me with the vivid distinctness of a picture, and I shame to say, rendered me unhappy and discontented for many days after. I was returning one afternoon from a favorite haunt, where I used to spend hours—the old church and burial-ground of long-unused cemetery, with a ruined church beside it—when four plunking chestnuts came to the foot of the little rise on which the road, and the cemetery jumping down, undid the bearing-reins, to breathe the cattle up the ascent. It was my favorite view on the landscape, and I watched with the flies from his horses with his whip, gently soothing the hot mettled creatures with his voice, I bethought me of the proud time when I sat beside him, and when he talked to me of the different tempers of each horse in the team, indicating into my mind's ear the many traits of them, as thinking, sentient creatures, which gives the horse a distinct character to all who have learned him or lived with him. I remembered all he never looked at me as he passed. How should he recognize the little boy in the gray flannel blouse he was to see in the high-road with silver buttons? Perhaps I was not sorry he did not know me. Perhaps I felt it easier to fight my own battle alone. But I will not be confessed and witnessed. At all events the sight sent me home sad and depressed, no longer able to take pleasure in the scenes which were turning from my toys and books with actual aversion.

Remembering how all mention of my father used to affect my mother, and how painfully and painfully his mere name acted upon her, I forbore to speak of this incident, and buried it in my heart, to think and ponder over at least four hours.

Time went on and on till I wanted but a few months of twelve, and my lessons were all but stopped, so much had my mother progressed under the letter-writing or in interviews with her lawyer. It was on the conclusion of one of these interviews that Mr. M'Bride, who was present at the den, and seating me beside him on a bench, said, "I have something to say to you, Digby; and I don't know that I'd trouble you to tell it, if I had not seen that you are a thoughtful boy, and an affectionate son to your mother that ever lived. You are old enough, besides, to have a right to know something about yourself and your future prospects, and I'm sure I have come out to-day." And with this brief preface he told me the whole story of my father's and mother's marriage and separation; and how it came to pass that I had been taken from one to live with the other; and how the time was now drawing nigh—it wanted but two months and ten days—when I should be once more under my father's guidance, and totally removed from the influence of that mother who loved me so dearly.

"We might fight the matter in the courts, it is true," said he. "There are circumstances which might weigh with a judge whether he'd remove you from a position of safety and advantage to one of danger and difficulty; but it would be the fight of a weak purse against a strong one, not to say that it would also be the struggle of a poor mother's heart against the law of the land; and I have at last persuaded her it would be wiser and safer not to embitter the relations with your father by such a hopeless contest, and not improbably you may be permitted to see her from time to time, and, at all events, to write to her. It looks a long time for him to go through what I have so briefly set down here; for there were many pros and cons, and he omitted none of them; and while he studiously abstained from applying to my father any expression of censure or reprobation, he could not conceal from me that he regarded him as a very cold-hearted unfeeling man, from whom little kindness could be expected, and to whom entreaty or petition would be lost time. I will not dwell on the impression this revelation produced on me, nor will I linger on the time that followed on it—the very saddest of my life. Our lessons were stopped—all the occupations that once filled the day ceased—a mournful silence fell upon us, that brooded like death in the house; and there was, indeed, the death of that peaceful existence in which we had glided along for years, and we sat gloating over a time that was to return no more. My mother tried to employ herself in setting my clothes in order, getting my books decently bound, and enabling me in every way to make a respectable appearance in that new life I was about to enter on; but her grief usually overcame her in these attempts, and she would hang in tears over the little trunk that enabled every moment she was so soon to regard as the last traces of her child. Biddy, who had long, for years back, ceased to tormount or annoy me, came back to me in an access of fierceness to her mockeries and sneers. "I was going to be a lord, and I'd not know the mother that nursed me and I fed with the street! Fine clothes and fine treatment was more to me than love and affection; signs on it, I was turning my back on every one's heart that was going to live with the blackguard—she didn't mince the word—that left her to starve." These neatly turned compliments met me at every moment, and by good fortune served to arm me with a sort of indignant courage that carried me well through all my perils.

To spare my poor mother the pain of parting, Mr. M'Bride—I can not say how judiciously—contrived that I should be taken out for a drive and put on board the packet bound for Holyhead, under the charge of a courier, whom my father had sent to bring me, to Brussels, where he was then living. Of how I left Ireland, and journeyed on afterward, I know nothing; it was all confusion and misery. The frequent changes from place to place, the noise, the new people, the intense hustle that seemed to pervade all that went on, gave me a sense of anger that I had few collected thoughts at the time, and no memory of them afterward.

From certain stoppings of the courier, however, and his heartily expressed joy as Brussels came in sight, I gathered that I had been a very unhappy charge, and refractory to the very limit of actual rebellion.

A LITTLE HALLUCINATION.

The pertinacity with which mankind will adhere to delusions long after they have been detected and exposed appears to have escaped the attention of the close analyst of human weaknesses, King Solomon. The best and the worst subjects, and those who have no education at all, assist in remaining bewildered, and in clinging, against the evidence of trustworthy authorities, and almost of their own senses, to a delusion of the most completely fabulous figure. The highly immoral notion inculcated in the remarkably quoted would seem to be, that if the world chose to be fooled it had then the liars should have thorough impunity, and lying be recognized as an orthodox institution. But this easy philosophy fails to satisfy the inquiry of a considerably inquiring temperament. "Lying," says Thomas Carlyle, "is not permitted by the Eternals;" by which he means it is not permitted, that the success of a falsehood can be only temporary; and that in process of time Truth will fully vindicate herself, although to do so it may be necessary for the poor thing to strip herself stark naked. I knew two brothers once, the older of whom was decidedly addicted to saying the thing that was not, while the other was scrupulously truthful. Charley, who was somewhat of a wag, used to declare that for a moment at least four times every morning in going about contradicting the fib which Jemmy had told during the previous day. But not all the cue can span the sixth part of the day for such labors; and not all of us care about demolishing the Munchausenisms which our friends have indulged in. If you wish to get along comfortably in this world it is best to allow your brother, and your sister too—by whom I mean every body—to lie themselves black in the face. So long as they refrain from forging your name, and so getting you into any pecuniary trouble, they can do you little harm. It is impossible for any one man thoroughly to disprove nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand falsehoods. For such lies there is a number of professional who are eager to believe it, and who consequently do believe it, however strong the proof may be to the contrary. And, on the other hand, it is certain that we hear of very few persons who have ever done themselves any good by advocating the truth and stigmatizing error; whereas the catalogue of those who have fallen into the direst scrapes through telling truisms is well-nigh inexhaustible. Socrates and Galileo, Savonarola and John Huss, Solomon de Caux and Daniel Defoe, devoted the major portion of their lives to the upholding of what they deemed to be true. You remember the nature of their reward: the hemlock bowl and the Inquisition dungeon; the stake, the mad-house, and the pillory.

A LAY OF THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

A LAY! A lay! A trumpet lay!
A glad and a glorious strain!
For a nation free, and a victory
For the good old cause again!

It was a summer Midsummer,
When the vintage times come round,
And pomegranate and olive ripe
Smile o'er the Spanish ground:
A cry went up o'er all the land,
Like the roar of the surging sea,
And 'twas Up with the Bourbons! Down for aye!
With the Bourbon tyranny!

"Too long! Too long they've tortured us
Beneath their ruthless rule;
And flayed our flesh and drained our blood
Till our heart-strings nearly broke.
Now we, who've borne all this too long—
A cause of shame to men—
Shall vindicate Spain's ancient name,
And all Europe shall be again!

"We'll take our stand for that old land
Th' Hidalgo sires that bore,
The glorious land of the knightly west,
The land of the Campadore!
Whose iron infantry unchecked
Marched Europe through and through,
Taught haughty Italy to yield
And France and Holland too.

"Who won the new world of the west
In conquest stern and fleet;
And sat enthroned on the Andes' crest
With two oceans at her feet!
What though that mighty empire's gone,
On which the sun set not,
His orb shall rise once more to crown
Our new-born glories yet!"

Thus sang the Spanish nation all,
Of their hills and valleys far,
From Malaga to Santander,
From Cadiz to Navarre;
From the Douro to Gibraltar's Rock,
From Gerona to the Ocean,
All Spain rung out with song and shout—
Rang out in glad commotion!

Oh, came you by the bridge of doom
That spans the southern river?
Saw you the Bourbon's favored flight
On the banks of the shining Guadalquivir?
Or have you been at Santander,
In the stubborn north fur down,
Where the strong rock is the people's gore,
Till at last they held their own?

Saw you Madrid's gay banners wave?
Saw you her heroes enter?
Felt you the flinch, at the Puerto del Sol,
Of the nation's heart and centre?
Viva! for Prim, for the warrior grim,
And known as a honorable foe!
Viva! to the sky mounts the welcoming cry,
For the victor chief Serrano!

And when is a man, when he nears doom
Is proclaimed by all her people
Mid beating drums and ringing bells
From every tower and steeple?
Lo! where on Barcy's rock she stands,
Forlorn, above the Ocean,
Whose stormy billows mock proud hopes
Her rage and wide emotion!

Her sceptre now a broken reed,
And crushed her royal crown,
Not a champion left on Spanish ground,
Not a rood to call her own!
And he who in Spain's bleeding rights
Had vied his lands and—
Bravo in name, in nature too—
Her Libertecide is fled!

A train! A train! Down the line again!
A fast train and a fervent!
Oh, take her away to the Frenchman's land,
Or any land but Spain!
Away! Away! From the last and ray
Of the Bourbon sun now set—
A race who wisdom ne'er could learn,
And who ne'er forget!

Awakened Europe hails the star
Now risen o'er the gloom,
Th' Iberian star of Peace and Hope,
Above th' oppressor's tomb.
In its pure light the words are writ,
The noble lesson's given,
Let Heroism do her own good work,
And vengeance loose to Heaven!

A lay! A lay! A trumpet lay!
A glad and a glorious strain!
For a nation free, and a victory
For the good old cause again!

TRAPPING WILD TURKEYS.

A WILD turkey trap is a simple contrivance, only requiring a few poles, laid together like a small log-house, with plenty of wide chinks, the roof composed of logs just too heavy for the turkeys to push through. In the centre of the floor is a hole to which a passage leads from the outside. Along this corn, acorns, and nuts are strewn, to lead the turkeys on. Once in the house they never think of descending again to get out by the hole in the middle of the floor, but waste their efforts in attempts to push through the chinks left in the logs. If the proprietor visits the establishment to go through the ceremony of wringing their necks

THE EARTHQUAKE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

We give illustrations on page 765 of the earthquake at San Francisco, October 21—the severest that ever occurred in that city. The shock was sudden and terrible in its effects. It was early in the morning, just before eight o'clock, as the people of the city were about to resume their daily occupations. Probably no other event is so calculated to create a panic as an earthquake. There is first the surprise, and then the attempt at flight—a flight which is, from the nature of the case, objectless and hopeless. Reason appalls, but with it there is offered no means of possible escape; the exercise of human power or of human skill avails for nothing.

The San Francisco Morning Chronicle published the following account of the earthquake just one week after the occurrence:

At six minutes before eight o'clock on the morning of the 21st inst., over the city was visited by an earthquake, the severest by far that was ever experienced here. The shock commenced by a slight tremor, then a terrific diluting motion followed, gentle at first, increasing in violence until the earth seemed rapidly rocking back and forth, and ending with a vast upheaval strong enough to almost throw men from their feet. This motion lasted in many portions of the city for nearly a minute [the report of the Coast Survey makes it 45 seconds], and the concussion that preceded and followed it was felt in the heavy rocking of the ocean; billows could be seen coming over the land, hurling and bursting like battering rams. In due course, raising them to the crest of the rollers, and, as the wave passed on, leaving them in their former positions. A gentleman who was driving on the Ocean House road at the time was surprised at the sluggish action of his horse. The animal exerted, pricked up his ears, and was seized with a trembling fit of terror. Upon looking ahead on the road he could see a wave of 15 ins. in depth, making for the shore, forward the city, with smaller waves following in its rear. In many portions of the city the ground opened, and in other places it opened for some distance. The effect on the populace was one of terror, and they all rushed from their dwellings into the streets, some of them jumping from their beds and rushing out in their night-clothes, and in a few minutes the streets were filled with frightened people. Many ran to the public squares, others sought the water front to embark upon some sailing craft, others plunged into the water, and many gained the centre of the streets, and stood there to avoid the falling bricks from which they feared must immediately follow. On the solid ground and in the suburbs, however, the panic soon subsided in a measure, and people returned to their dwellings, but gathered together with their hats or apparel as were deemed necessary for immediate use, ready to run again upon a repetition of the shock. Soon the tidings came from the lower portion of the city that buildings had been destroyed, and in the excitement of the hour exaggerated stories were set afloat to the effect that hundreds of lives had been killed. At 10.35 A.M. a second shock occurred, but not equal in severity or duration to the first, and at 11.50 A.M. another, still lighter, while throughout the day there were frequent slight shocks that terrified some of them barely perceptible, but in the excited state of the public mind they were sufficient to prevent the fears of the people from being allayed. Then came the news from Haywards, San Leandro, and other suburban towns, all of which had experienced the earthquake to a greater or less degree, the cities suffering water and sand. On Clay Street, below Battery, the ground settled about five feet, falling down the front wall of the Railroad House and adjoining buildings, and leaving the Railroad House completely in two. On California Street, below Sansome, the ground appears to have run in some places and raised in others, smashing several buildings to atoms. The ocean at Pine Street, below Sansome, appears to have been forced up a foot, and left a crack in the pavement, while the sidewalk settled several inches. The earth is cracked all around the gas-works, corner of First and Howard streets. On the west of the bay people on shipboard describe the sensation as of a vessel striking and grinding heavily upon the bottom, while the vessel's timbers shook like reeds in the wind. At the Vulcan Iron-Works, on First Street, the ground opened, and a volume of water spouted up to a height of nearly three feet, and fissures were plainly visible six inches in width. At Oakland the shock was immediately followed by a heavy rumbling, as of distant artillery. From the accounts thus far received the earthquake appears to have commenced on the coast, about the mentioned miles northwest of San Francisco, shook and shattered the country as it moved, and then traveled southwesterly, gathering force and increasing the most of its force to ten miles, and then to have the bay for a distance of ten miles, and then to have scattered it and gradually died out.

The amount of property destroyed is variously estimated at from $300,000 to $5,000,000. Four persons were killed and a large number were wounded.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE little town of Chicopee, on the Connecticut River, has the honor of having cast the magnificent bronze doors for the east wing of the Capitol at Washington. Several years ago Congress intrusted the design of the work to the artist Crawford; but he died before the models were completed, and the business was intrusted to his pupil, Reinhart. The original models were sent to the celebrated foundry at Munich, and all details for casting were satisfactorily arranged, when, in consequence of our civil war, the Bavarian establishment, distrusting our resources, refused to fulfill the contract unless the payment money should first be deposited in gold in London. Congress promptly ordered the return of the models, and completed the execution of the work to the Messrs. Ames, of Chicopee. Reinhart's remarkable genius is manifested in many of the various panels. The doors are each three feet and three inches in width, by fourteen feet in height, and each divided into five panels, the upper one being narrower than the rest, and ornamented with a laurel-wreath encircling a star. This is an open panel, and is to serve as a ventilator. In the two doors there are one hundred and thirty pieces of bronze, requiring in their casting thirteen hundred and sixty-six screws. The door-posts and casements are plain and massive, and the soffit is open-work decorated with seven hundred and eighty-three rosettes of burnished bronze.

Letter-carriers have been directed by the Post-Office Department to wear a uniform while on duty. The coat, vest, pantaloons, and cap are to be made of what is technically called "blue-mixed cadet cloth." A reversible cape, made of the same material on one side and of gutta percha cloth on the other, is also to be worn when needful. To learn, moreover, that supplies of a new style of street letter-box are now being manufactured, and some of them will soon be put in the city. They will be arranged to receive newspapers as well as letters, and so constructed as to secure the packages from any inconvenient exposure. A dial-plate on each box is arranged to signify the hour when the next collection will be made.

FATAL mistakes by druggists are becoming altogether too frequent. The wife of a Philadelphia merchant recently died in consequence of a mistake which she had been suffering from a nervous disorder, and under the advice of a physician had sent for some bottles of soothing assafœtida pills, made according to a prescription given her by the doctor. She sent to a drug-store to have the prescription renewed. The druggist being absent, the pills were compounded by his son. The young man made the fatal mistake of substituting the inoculation of assafœtida for atropia, a narcotic poison, and this he put in the pills instead of the prescribed dose for assafœtida. The poisonous effects of this were soon shown in alarming symptoms, and before assistance could be given the patient was dead. A coroner's jury duly rendered a verdict of manslaughter against the druggist's son.

PROFESSOR BENEDICT, President of the Philharmonic Society, remarked in reference to the opening of a new musical season, that as it was slower in its progress than usual, the Philharmonic Society to develop and cultivate a taste for the highest order of music, on the system of public rehearsals, has been adopted, where the celebrated works of the greatest composers could be studied. Hence there will be, as in years past, three public rehearsals on the Friday afternoons preceding each concert. The number of concerts per season has been increased, without a corresponding increase in the price of tickets to associate members, in hopes of adding greater life to the Society. It is earnestly desired that this shall become a school of classical music, attractive to professional and amateur musicians. The orchestra consists of a hundred performers, and our best artists have promised to assist at the different concerts.

LONDON journals are cordially warm in their commendations of MISS MARIE ROZE, who made her first appearance at Covent Garden, in the popular Opera "Lo Sonnambula," on Saturday night, and received a most brilliant and flexible, sweet and penetrating. Her reception was exceedingly favorable, and the belief was expressed that she was an accretal consummate. The orchestra consists of a hundred performers, and our best artists have promised to assist at the different concerts.

Eight-fingered gentry, in all countries, understand how to turn events to their account. An exiled Hidalgo received at the table d'hote of a hotel in Paris a large red-seated silken letter purse—the Madrid post-mark. The interesting refugee opened the missive and perused it rapidly with astonishment and delight. Then he handed the letter round the table. "Dear Alonzo," it ran, "come back immediately. Our dear mother is dead of all her sons. Your estates are rendered unto you. Fraternally, Juan." The table d'hote was thrown into felicitations. But suddenly the exile's face grew sombre. "Would not a reason for this sudden recall be acceptable?" he announced that, having no means wherewith to travel to Madrid, he should be forced to wait a fortnight at Paris, when he would receive from his ancestral towers. Mine host promptly placed £20 at Don Alonzo's disposal, who joyfully departed, promising to return the money in three days, and with a basket of his own fabrication behind. The good landkeeper is still in vain anticipation of the wine and money.

MISS GEORGINA M. CRAIK—author of "Mildred," an interesting novel recently published by HARPER & Brothers—is the daughter of the late George Lillie Craik, Professor of History and Logic, and editor of his death professor in Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland. He was the author of "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," a "History of English Literature," and other works. Miss Craik has written several popular novels, and many of her tales abound with practical, worthy independence and assiduity, devotes herself to her literary work. George Lillie Craik, husband of the lady so well known as Miss Mulock, is son of the Rev. Dr. Craik of Glasgow, and cousin to Miss Georgina Craik.

FEW fictitious works of the present day exhibit more purity of conception and well-defined outlines of character, combined with plots of genuine interest, than those of Miss Mulock. Her stories teach lessons of the purest morality, as evidenced in her novelette thus "Girl of the Period," as represented in a certain "Young Lady, in a universal character." In her latest work, "The Woman's Kingdom"—which has been published in a serial in the Atlantic Monthly, and is now issued in book form—she thus speaks of "Edna:" "And there came before her a vision of her life to come—such an easy one, too—that of a woman who slips into marriage to 'better herself,' as servants say—to attain ease, and luxury, and position, and all the benefits which 'a good marriage' is supposed to confer. How would he, with his every want, every would be tested, every power put to use—which would exact unlimited patience, self-denial, courage, strength; the life, in short, of a woman who does not care to be a man's toy and ornament, but desires, rather, to be his helpmeet—supplying all he needs, as he supplies all she needs, teaching her through the necessities of every day how to fulfill the perfect law of love—self-sacrifice."

A neat practical joke was recently played upon a rich dandy of Paris, who was very stingy to his wife. One day a lady, closely veiled, and apparently very anxious not to be recognized, begged him and borrowed a large sum, leaving her diamonds as a pledge. He was chagrined to learn afterward that it was his wife.

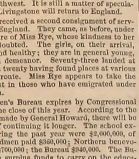
THE latest intelligence from Dr. Livingstone—which for one week ago—is to the effect that he considers that the letters were dated December, 1867—was that he had been living for three months with friendly Arabs near Lake Tanganyika, and that he intended, on the close of a native war, to explore that lake, and then return to Zanzibar on his way home. One of the great objects of the traveler's last journey into Central Africa was to ascertain whether the source of the Nile was not considerably to the south of the Albert Nyanza. The supposition was, that the great Albert Lake and Tanganyika were either one sheet of water, or connected by a large river, and it was also presumed that the sources of Tanganyika might extend indefinitely to the west or southwest. It now appears that Dr. Livingstone crossed from Lake Nyassa to the Casembe country, and that he there found a large lake already marked on some of the old maps. He says he knows nothing of the Albert Nyanza, and seems to have made a considerable stay there, and to have been very hospitably entertained. When details arrive, it will probably be found that Tanganyika is only one of a number of connected lakes, running to the southwest. It is still a matter of speculation when Dr. Livingstone will return to England.

THE Queen has received a second consignment of servant girls from England. They came, as before, under the personal care of MISS RYE, whose kindness to her proteges is well known. These girls, on their arrival, looked clean and healthy; they are in general young, and modest in demeanor. Seventy-three landed at Toronto, about twenty having found places at various points on the route. MISS RYE appears to take the deepest interest in those who have emigrated under her supervision.

THE Freedmen's Bureau expires by Congressional limitation at the close of this year. According to the annual report made by General Howard, there will be no necessity of continuing it longer. The school expenditures during the past year were $1,000,000, of which the freedmen paid $360,000; Northern benevolent societies $700,000; the Bureau $840,000. The Bureau will have surplus funds to carry on the freedmen's work without further appropriations.

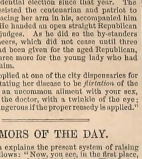
IN Davenport, Iowa, on the afternoon of November 4 a low-seated buggy was driven to the polls by a beautiful young lady. By her side was seated Benjamin Gilbert, who is proud of one hundred years old. He cast his first Presidential vote in 1788, in the State of New York, for George Washington, and has voted at every Presidential election since that year. The young lady assisted the centenarian and patriot to alight, and, placing her arm in his, accompanied him to the polls. He handed an open straight Republican ticket to the judges. As he did so the by-standers broke into cheers, which did not cease until three times three had been given for the aged Republican, followed by three more for the young lady who had accompanied him.

A woman applied at one of the city dispensaries for medical aid, stating her disease to be flirtation of the heart. "Not an uncommon ailment with your sex, ma'am," said the doctor, with a twinkle of the eye; but it is not dangerous if the proper remedy is applied."



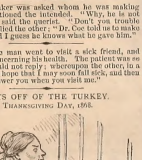
HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GERMAN explains the present system of raising revenue as follows: "Now, you see, in the first place, they get the amount of their business. That is first taxed. Then they find out how much he earns every month, and that's taxed. Then they find out all about his profits, and on that they lay their tax. Then they manage to get some tax on what he owns. Next comes what they call income, and that's taxed. Then, if any thing is left, the preacher calls around and gets it to sustain the church and convert the heathen."



A coffin-maker was asked whom he was making his last and measured the intended. "Why, he is well dead, man!" said the querist. "Don't you trouble yourself," replied the other; "Dr. Coe told us to make his coffin, and I guess he knows what he gave him."

An irritable man went to visit a sick friend, and asked him concerning his health. The patient was ex ill that he could not reply; whereupon the other, in a rage, said, "I hope that I may soon fall sick, and then I will not come to see you with my fist."



CUTS OFF OF THE TURKEY.
THANKSGIVING DAY, 1868.

"Wants Turkey too, for little darlin'."

"Any part, Sir; it doesn't make the slightest difference."

"The Pope's nose? Certainly."

Finis.

A bright little boy was asked by a lady if he studied Greek at school that day. He replied that he had himself much at it.

"Oh," said the lady, "you must study hard, or you will never be President of the United States."

"Yes, ma'am," he replied; "but I don't expect to be: I am a Democrat."

IM-PORT-ANT.

When is a poor string like good liquor? When its pure twine (pure wine).

Apropos of port wine, it is hardly the thing to drink in the month of a naval officer who is addicted to lie use as a port-hole.

The great naval port—Portland.

Port liked by the young ladies—Sup-port.

Prime ministers' port-folios—Im-ports.

The Sublime Port of Turkey is not a port-able (good table) port, any more than the new designs for Dupont monume is cash for port wine.

The port of the newspaper—Re-port.

Port of the West Indies—Port-O'Rico.

The dietary says port wine is like good manners when it's de-port-ment by gentlemen.

The following affecting lines may be found upon a tombstone in Connecticut:

Here lies, cut down like unripe fruit,
The wife of Deacon Amos Shute;
She died of drinking too much coffee,
Input, Decoctory aliment hot.

"Have you any good tooth-picks, Mr. Mortspot—something good and also cheap?"

"Yes, Sir; from the tooth-ache, only been used once, not a bit damaged at the other end. Put you up a box, Sir?"

THE GRECIAN BEND.

Not the bow of deep affection,
Nor the bend for knowledge sought,
Grecian gracé in the I view,
Angle of the ancient well-versed,
As the bucket downward plunged deep,
See thyself at one do.

Hateful stoop of affectation,
Grading no one in creation,
Who of thee did originate?
Or who see this strange position,
Wishing such ungainly physician
Would the sufferer relieve?

Of these many words are spoken,
By the many in this nation:
Only one thing more I'll do,
Grecian Bend, thou child of fashion,
Wanting not on thee my passion,
I will kick thee in the rear.

"Wife, wife, what has become of the grapes?"

"I suppose, my dear, the hens picked them off," was the mournful reply.

Hens—hens!—some two-legged hens, I guess," said her husband, with more impetuosity: to which she calmly replied,

"My dear, did you ever see any other kind?"

"How do you like the character of St. Paul?" asked a parson of his landlady one day, during a conversation about the old saints and the Apostles. "Ah! he was a good, clever old soul, I know, for he once said, you know, that we must eat what is set before us, and ask no questions for conscience sake. I always thought I should like him for a boarder."

What is the difference between a honey-comb and a honey-moon?—A honey-comb consists of a number of small "cells," and a honey-moon consists of one great "sell."

PREPARING FOR THANKSGIVING.—SKETCHED BY J. W. EHNINGER.—[SEE PAGE 762.]

THANKSGIVING.

THERE are not many dies fasti with us Americans. How nations and times differ in this regard! The ancients, owing to their love of outward show, had frequent festivals; and the same is true of the more barbarous races of the present time. Thus among the Abyssinians two-thirds of the days of the year are festival days. The progress of civilization has a tendency toward the elimination of these days from the calendar. This is to be accounted for partly by the fact that life, as regulated by civilization, is forever growing busier and more intense; as men depart from their primitive modes of living they have less leisure, they live more and more "by their wits," and find that the necessities of such a life occupy nearly all of their time. Besides, the cultivated intellect looks rather to the inherent significance of life, and therefore devotes less attention to outward show; it rejects feast-days and processions; and thus it is that the earnestness of modern thought has discarded most of those external manifestations without which the life of the barbarian would be insufferably dull and tedious. Not that modern life is less of a drama; on the contrary, it is a subtler and intenser drama, more significant and more profound.

Civilization develops home life, and reserves for that the greatest and best of its powers. Our two great festivals—Thanksgiving and Christmas—are home-festivals. The former is national, it is true, and the latter is religious; but while they are thus connected in our thoughts with our common country and our common faith, while they are bonds of social union and harmony, still they are celebrated by families, and find their natural centre in our hearth-stones.

Hence the memorable feature of Thanksgiving Day is not the sermon but the dinner. This festival is preserved not for its outdoor show but for its private sacredness. If our artists had prepared for our readers a sketch representing a congregation listening to a Thanksgiving sermon instead of the characteristic pictures on pages 760 and 761, nobody would take the trouble to look at it. But who will not be touched by our illustration representing a family at the market purchasing their Thanksgiving dinner? We almost go through the whole scene in our imaginations. We hear the market-man praising his nice fat turkeys as if they were his pets; we see the serious face of the good-wife, who is counting the cost and calculating how far the contents of her purse will go, and we congratulate the wisely silent husband, who regards his wife with a deferential look that seems to say: "Every thing depends upon you, my love." Truly has Mr. EHNINGER portrayed this interesting group; and not less characteristic is Mr. JEWETT's illustration on the opposite page. It is "The first Thanksgiving Dinner" of a poor little girl who has been called in from the cold street to feel the delicious warmth of a home such as she never has had, and to taste dishes and dainties never tasted before. Those who called her in do not fully appreciate the situation; it is with them a common affair—but to the little wanderer it seems like a bit of heaven!

Oh, if we only knew what charity really means—what really is the pith of our Christianity—then indeed there would be happier hearts all the world over, and not only Thanksgiving Day but all the days of the year would be crowned with the love of Christ.

UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH.

IT was three o'clock on a fine warm afternoon in the latter end of April. The garden at the rear of the comfortable, whitewashed, thickly-thatched cabin was abundantly stocked with early cabbage and potatoes; every thing bore the look of humble prosperity; from the blue smoke curling up from the freshly-made fire on the kitchen hearth to the green meadows where the cows were lying peacefully ruminating. A broad river, glistening in the sun's rays, rolled smoothly beside the boundary-wall of their pasture.

Yet Kate Moran stood at her father's door looking sadly across the river to the mass of shipping, houses, and spires which rose on the other side.

"Mother, honey, I can't keep me eyes aff that dhreadful place!" said she, turning as she spoke to an elderly woman who sat knitting on a bench near the fire.

"Musha, acushla, what good 'll that do ye?" said she, rising and going over to the door also. "Come in now," putting her hand on her daughter's shoulder caressingly.

"Oh, mother! To think o' the poor fellow bein'—" Here she fairly broke down, and burst into a wail of distress.

"Whisht now!" cried her mother. "Here's your faither comin', and don't let him see ye cryin'."

Kate ran hastily into a bedroom as her father entered the kitchen.

"There's no chance for the poor craythur, Pat?" asked his wife, as a broad-faced, good-humored looking man came forward and sat down on the settle.

"Chance?" said he, roughly, while his face clouded. "Sorrow chance! He'll be hung, as sure as I've this pipe in me hand."

"Lord have mercy on his sowl, the craythur!" moaned his wife.

"Oh, musha! amin!" said her husband, sighing. "I'm goin' in wud the cowlt to the fair to-morra, an' to see the last of him. It's niver I thought to see poor Mick Welsh's son on a gallus!"

The sun was setting over the opposite hill, where the tall many-storied houses rose in terraces and steep lanes, and was shedding the last beams of his radiance on the large dark stone building which crowned the height. The red light seemed to be concentrated on one part of the building, where there was an iron gateway, spiked and double-locked. Far above in the dark massive wall was a small black door. And beneath this door and around this gateway men were busy putting up strong timber railings; while a crowd, talking and gesticulating, constantly pressed in upon the workmen, and were driven back by officials in uniform and a few soldiers.

Inside the massive walls other workmen were busy, but their work was commonplace enough. Something was wrong with the great main sewer of the jail. Masons and bricklayers had been laboring for some hours; and now, when the city clocks and bells were striking six, they were taking up their tools, putting on their coats, and leaving their work till next day.

There were no rough jests among them. One man laughed as a companion slipped down into the slimy ditch whence they had emerged; but his merriment was checked by an involuntary look from the others toward the far side of the yard, where a man in a felon's dress and with manacled hands was walking slowly up and down.

"Lord have mercy on his sowl!" muttered an old mason, compassionately. "Poor Tim Welsh! As honest a boy afore he got into bad company as iver a father rared."

Whether the prisoner had caught the sound of his name or not, he raised his head and looked sadly toward them.

"Lord help him!" said two or three of the men; "for makin' away with one poor sheep—what a rich man had plenty of!"

An official came across the yard to look at their day's work, and after asking some questions, walked away, saying, "Come along now, the gate is open."

So, casting a backward glance at the manacled prisoner, the men passed through an arch into an inner court, whence the great doors opened to let them out into the street.

The manacled man gazed after their retreating figures with a sigh—almost a groan—as he thought of their return to their homes, free and happy, from their honest labor, while he—the "rap, rap, rap, tap, tap" of carpenters' hammers outside beat at the thought he could not dwell upon.

There was no one with him, no one near him, but a turnkey pacing up and down an angle of the building; for in those days there was far less vigilance than now. He was not confined to his cell on this, the last day of his life, but was permitted to walk about the quadrangles of the prison; apart from the other criminals, however, and securely handcuffed.

Bitter and despairing were his thoughts. He thought of his gray-haired widowed mother, of his stalwart young brothers, of the lads he had played ball with, of Katie Moran, whom he had danced with at the fair only two months ago. Mechanically he walked across the square to the place where the bricklayers and masons had been busy: thinking as he did so, half unconsciously, how large the opening was, how long the great sewer was, and where it emptied itself. Suddenly a thought occurred to him, making his pale thin face flush, and his fettered hands tremble with excitement. He turned sharply away lest he should excite suspicion, and loitered with his former heavy weary step toward the doorway of the inner court-yard.

"Goin' in, are you?" said the turnkey.

"Yes," replied the prisoner.

The official stalked on before him into the adjoining square, then opening a door, passed through a long stone corridor, and stopping before a cell-door, unlocked it. "If you want any thing, you can call," he said, graciously, through the trap in the door as he relocked it.

"Thank ye," answered the condemned man. If the official had been better skilled in reading faces, he might have looked to the fastening of the cell-door a little more carefully.

Tim Welsh had noticed that the bolt of the lock was very shaky, and he knew that a shaky bolt can be forced back.

It would not be dusk for a long while yet, but he could not wait; the one chance—desperate, hopeless, as it seemed—must be tried quickly. While the turnkey's steps re-echoed in his hearing, he, still fettered, unscrewed the iron leg of his bedstead, and, stealing forward, waited until he heard the great doors at the end of the corridor clash; then, putting the leg of the bedstead between the bolt and the wall, he strove with all his strength to force it back. But it resisted, and he dared not make a noise.

In despair he replaced the leg, and sat down to recover breath. Soon he heard another turnkey coming. He went to the cell-door and called.

"What is it? What d'ye want?"

"A dhrink of wather, plase; I'm very thirsty."

When the turnkey had brought in the water, and retired, Welsh, who had been watching the lock, saw that, though gone to its place, it was not half as far home as before. He drank the water to cool his burning mouth and parched throat, and, seizing the iron leg again, listened as before until the doors clashed, when, placing the instrument in the old place, he—first gently shaking the bolt—gave it a vigorous blow, the sound of which was lost in the noisy echoes from the shutting doors. The bolt shot back, he pulled the door open, and peered around; returning to his bed, he replaced the leg, and made up a bundle under the clothes, as well as he could, with the aid of the bolster; then closing the cell-door softly after him, he ran lightly down the gallery to the door that opened into the yard. The key was in it, he turned the key, and, glancing around for the second time, shut it after him and darted across to the arched doorway, where a sentry paced.

How to get past this soldier was the question, while he trembled in mingled horror at the sound of the "rap-rap" "rap, tap-tap" coming freshly to his ears, and the thought of probable freedom, and more probable recapture. At this moment the sentry turned back on his beat, and the prisoner, crouching in the doorway, stole swiftly along by the wall to the opposite side of the yard, and slunk in beside a buttress. The open sewer was on the same side but further down. Trembling in every limb, he lay huddled up, not daring to move, lest he should attract attention, until the sentry turned for the third time. Then he fled along by the wall, and dropping into the sewer crept into the darkness there.

"Safe for a while, any how, glory be to God!" he gasped.

But as the poor creature pushed his way onward, through the foul air, in a stooping position, with his fettered hands pushed out before him to feel his way, a deadly sickness came over him. Still the faintly glimmering prospect of escape kept him up.

Fortunately there were but few rats. Five or six times he felt them biting at his feet, from which his coarse stockings had long been cut to pieces, and heard them squeaking as they scrambled up the dripping walls. "Will I iver smell a fresh breeze again, Lord help me!" he groaned. As he crawled along under the principal streets he could hear the carriages rolling over his head, and at one grating to which he came he heard the words of a song, chorused by some men near a public house. At length, after he had been more than eight hours on his way, he heard the rolling of the river, saw a faint gleam through the pitchy darkness, felt a faint fresh breeze from the flowing tide. A few more steps—falling in his eagerness—and the glimmer grew clearer, the breeze grew fresher, and he reached the river bank.

It was just four o'clock, and the clear solemn light of the dawn was shed over the sleeping city; the gardens were fresh in early fruit and flowers; the noble river rippling serenely on, and the cottages, trees, and meadows lay far on the other side. Very far off they looked, and the river—cold, broad, and deep, lay between; yet the undaunted fugitive, fettered, aching, sick, exhausted, muttered another prayer, and plunged in.

The cold water gave him a temporary strength; keeping his eyes fixed on the goal of his hopes, he swam on, almost entirely by the movement of his legs and feet, as his hands were nearly useless to him.

But the bracing effect of the cold shock was soon followed by a distressing numbness. His utmost efforts barely sufficed to keep his head above water and propel him slowly onward. Slower and fainter became each stroke, and a wave of the rising tide rushed over his head, when with a gurgling moan he made a last effort and his feet touched the bottom. He now stood upright, and slowly waded to the low muddy shore, where he sank down on the sedge and sea-pinks, and swooned away.

"I must be stirrin' meself," said Pat Moran to his wife, about half past four o'clock that morning. "I've a power to do. I've to take the cowlt to the fair, an' the turnip-field to plow afore I go."

Just as the first beams of golden sunlight were resting on the cabin chimneys, and on the high buildings of the city hills opposite, he led his two horses from their stable to the field by the river, where the plow lay, and having yoked them he began turning up the furrows afresh.

"It's a fine mornin', glory be to God!" he soliloquized, "on'y fer the poor sowl that's to see the last of it. Musha! What's that? Woa, thin," he cried, suddenly catching sight of something which looked like a heap of muddy clothes. "Lord save us!" And without losing a moment, he ran down to where the unconscious man was lying, face downward, on the sedge.

Pat Moran's first impulse was to run for help; his next to raise the body gently and drag it further up. The motion aroused the poor half-dead creature.

"Who, in Heaven's name, are ye, an' what brought ye here?" inquired the farmer, looking in terror at the handcuffs.

"I'm—aren't you Pat Moran?"

"Yes."

"Pat, ye knew me poor father. I'm Tim Welsh, the poor fellow that's to be hanged to-day. Won't ye thry an' save me, for the love of God? I've come through the sewer. I'm all night creepin' through it, an' I swam the river, an' I'm 'most gone! Won't ye thry an' save me, Pat Moran, and the Lord 'll remimber it to you an' your childher forirer."

"Tim Welsh! Lord be good to me. What am I to do wud ye? I'm done for, if you're found wud me, an' how can I save ye? What am I to do? Sure 'tisn't in the regard of sayin' that I wouldn't do a good turn for ye, Tim; but the counthry'll be roused afther ye, an' where'll I hide ye, or what 'll I do at all?" Thus groaned the farmer as he opened the little gate and led him into the kitchen, where Kate was baking a griddle-cake for breakfast.

"Father, honey! O lor! What's that?" she cried, as the tottering figure in the soaked, discolored garments came into the cheerful light of the turf-fire.

"Whisht, acushla! It's Tim Welsh," he whispered. Kate sprang up from her knees, and her face grew white.

"Kate, honey, what are we to do wud him?" said her father, trembling, as he recounted the manner of Tim's escape.

"Hide him, father!" she cried, with all a woman's impulsive generosity. "The Lord pity you!" she added, bursting into tears at sight of the wretched object before her.

"I'll do what I can, Tim. Give him a bit to ate, Katie. I'll spake to some one I can thrust."

"Pat, me life is in your hands," broke in the fugitive.

"Never fear, avick. I'll do me best for ye." He hurried away a few hundred yards to the house of his landlord, a Protestant minister; he knocked furiously at his front-door, and was admitted by a sleepy maid-servant.

"Somethin' I want to spake to the masther about—I'm goin' to the fair this mornin'—tell him I'm in a great hurry, af ye plase."

After a minute's delay the gentleman appeared.

"Somethin' very particular, Sir," said the farmer, in a low voice. "About that cow you were spakin' to me, Sir," he added, for the maid-servant's benefit.

"Come into my study here, Moran," said his landlord.

"Be your lave, Sir, I'll shut the door," said Moran. Then walking over to the table, he put his clasped hands on it.

"Misther Raymond, I can thrust you. I'm in a great hobble, Sir, an' I dunno what to do at all. Misther Raymond, you was always a kind friend, and a good friend, and you'll not betray me? It's another man's saycret, an' you must give me your word, Sir, else I'd be afeard to let mortal man hear me."

"Moran, if you think I can promise as a man and a Christian, I will. You may trust me, whatever it is," said Mr. Raymond.

Thus assured, the farmer unfolded his story, and begged his landlord's counsel.

"I hardly know how to advise you, Moran," said he, as soon as he could speak coherently in his astonishment. "The poor fellow will be found out, I'm afraid, in spite of all you can do, and you'll get into great trouble. Have his handcuffs filed off at all events," he went on in a low tone. "Martin Leary will do it, and you can trust him, and maybe the best you can do is to give the fugitive some of your clothes, and some food, and this." He took a guinea from a drawer. "Bury his prison-clothes carefully in the manure-pit, and start him on the road to Wexford. That is all you can do safely; but be quick!"

The farmer left the house and ran on to the blacksmith's forge, where the smith and his son were getting to work.

"Martin, I'm in a great hurry, goin' to the fair, an' I want ye to run over wud somethin' to cut a chain for me; 'twon't take you five minutes. Martin, you niver did a bether day's work in your life if you'll come as fast as your legs 'll carry ye!" He said this in an under-tone while the son's back was turned, "and whisht for all sakes!" he added, clenching his hand and shaking it at the unconscious young Vulcan; then he rushed out, leaving the father grasping a bar of iron and staring after him.

The smith, with the freemasonry that exists among the Irish peasantry, perceived that there was secrecy and trouble in the way, and that his good faith was relied on. He picked up some tools, muttered an excuse to his son, and followed, hastily.

When Pat Moran reached home he was met at the door by Kate.

"Is he safe?"

"Yes, father, he's in the room atin' a bit."

Her father went in, and going up to his strange guest, said, "I'm goin' to do what I can for you, Tim." Then they all began discussing eagerly the best way for the fugitive to take.

"But, Lord! The whole counthry'll be roused afther him!" broke in the farmer, dejectedly, as they suggested various lonely hill-paths and cross-cuts. "Lord! they'll root up the ground after him! I must thry though, I must thry. Heaven mend me! Aff I didn't lave the horses all this time, an' niver—" he ejaculated, catching sight of his forgotten team, who had dragged the plow after them to the adjoining meadow, and were grazing there.

A sudden thought struck him, and he hastily returned to the house with his face flushed. As he entered the kitchen he ran against the smith, Martin Leary, who was staring about him.

"Martin, you're thrue an' honest, I know, an' you'd do a good turn as soon as any man I know," said Pat Moran, abruptly.

"There's me hand on it," returned the smith, bringing down his black fist on the other's shoulder. In a few words he was told what was required of him, and also of the bright thought that had just occurred to Pat Moran.

"Here! Let me at it," cried the smith, enthusiastically grasping his chisel and hammer. Thereupon the farmer led him into the little room, where Kate was administering hot tea and smoking griddle-cake to the poor fellow, who ate and drank almost mechanically, with his eyes fixed on the pretty face and busy hands that ministered to him.

"Here, Tim, is some one to do you a good turn. Hould out your hands, me boy! Peggy," turning to his wife, who was devoutly groaning and telling her beads in a corner, "go an' get me ould clothes, an' Kitty, run for that yellow clay in the kitchen-garden! Run!" She did as she was bid, and when she returned with the clay, was desired to keep out of the room for a few minutes.

"Mother honey, what are they doing?" she inquired.

"Sorra bit o' me knows, acushla. On'y your father has some plan in his head. Oh! Kitty, agra, I'm thrimblin' to think of the throuble he may be gittin' into. Och, Pat, honey, what are ye goin' to do at all?" she cried, addressing her husband, who came out of the bedroom, dressed in his best blue swallow-tailed coat, corduroys, and new gray stockings.

"I'm goin' to show this new sarvint boy where he's to plow, afore I go to the fair;" said the farmer, with a wink to the two women, who stared open-eyed at the change of the condemned man with the fatal prison garb dripping with mud and sand, and fettered wrists, into a careless, easy-going looking young laborer, in a suit of well-worn and patched frieze and corduroy, dirty and clayey, with lumps of clay sticking on his brogues, a rakish "caubeen" slouched over his eyes, and a black "dhudeen" between his lips.

"Now come on! 'Tis time you were at your work. His name's Maurice Slattery, Kate; an' he's wud us this month back!"

"Oh, father,"honey!" "Oh, Pat, acushla!" cried the wife and daughter, with admiration.

The young man, taking the pipe from his mouth, said, solemnly, "May God foriver bless you, Pat Moran, an' you, Mrs. Moran, an' you, Kate, an' you, Martin Leary!" and he grasped their hands all round.

"Come, 'tis six o'clock," said the farmer. "You know where the plow is, Maurice Slattery. You've a new piece of iron to melt, Martin. An', Kate, you've to bury them clothes. Come an' I'll show you where."

Half an hour afterward he was riding slowly to the fair on his young horse which was to be sold, exulting glances backward at the new field by the river, where he could see his horses plowing, and his new servant boy toiling quietly after them.

Such confusion and excitement had not been known for years in the old cathedral town. Police there were none in those days; but the whole garrison had turned out in search of the escaped felon. Troops of red-coats perambulated the streets, the roads leading to the country, and even the lanes and meadows. Hundreds of countryfolk, who had come in to see the execution, also crowded the town. The throng on the prison-hill was so dense that the farmer could scarcely proceed a step. They were all talking vociferously in Irish or English, every one giving his or her version of the wonderful story. Some declared that the prisoner had not escaped, and that it was a device of the authorities to conceal some fact or other. But Pat Moran had elbowed his way with great difficulty almost to the prison gates, he looked eagerly for the objects of his search, some of the town people, whom he discovered sitting and standing together in an excited group.

"Pat Moran, d'ye believe this?" said one of the men, hoarsely, clutching the farmer's coat. "D'ye believe that poor Tim has got out of their cursed thrap?"

"John Welsh, Tim did get out!"

"Whisht! Lord save us!" they all broke in with one voice.

"'Tisn't safe to say more. I'm thrimblin' that some o' them fellows wid the brass buttons will hear me," glancing toward the turnkey, dimly visible behind the iron grating; "but, you, John Welsh, an' you, Mick Power, come wud a car to-night to the ould house beyant the ferry, at twelve o'clock, an' there'll be a friend to say Whisht, for your sowls!"

The prison gates were not long in disconcerting by what means the captive had effected his escape; and from the opening the search was carried almost instantly to the mouth of the river where it emptied itself into the river. A venturesome spirit even crept up a few dozen yards of the little channel, but speedily returned, reporting that nothing could live half an hour in it. Nevertheless, they sought for footmarks on the river bank; but the friendly tide had left not a trace there. Still, on the supposition that he might have lived to reach the river and swim across, a party of prison officials and soldiers was ferried over, and marched in a body to Farmer Moran's house.

Kate was feeding chickens, and her mother peeling potatoes, when they both caught sight of the gleam of scarlet and white cross-belts, and heard the loud tones and footsteps.

"Lord, be good and merciful to us evermore, amin! Protect and save us!" muttered Peggy Moran, dropping the potato she was peeling, and turning with a face of terror to her daughter, who whispered, without turning her head,

"Mother, mine, don't purtend any thing, for all sakes, Chucky, chucky! Chuck, chuck, chuck!" she went on, raising her voice gayly, as she scattered the food.

"Servant, Sir," she said, wiping her hands and courtesying to a tall stout officer, who strode up to the door, watching the chickens by the chinking of his spurs and sword.

"Is this Farmer Moran's, my good girl?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Are you his daughter?"

"Yes, Sir, and this is my mother."

"Where's your husband, Mrs. Moran?" said the officer, turning to the poor woman, who was endeavoring to look calm.

"At the fair, Sir—oh sure, 'tisn't got into any harm Pat has, Sir!"

"What harm should he get into—about this runaway prisoner, you mean?" said the officer, trying to startle her into some admission.

"What man, Sir?" cried Kate. "Arrah, mother, honey! That's what that boy was telling us!"

"What boy?" said the officer, now off his guard.

"A boy, Sir—oh! a ra'al little chap—a gossoon—run in here a while ago an' said the man that's in the prison got out an' away—an' sure we didn't believe him!" said Kate, with such an air of self-possession and innocent inquisitiveness that the officer was completely deceived. "The boy had come in as she had said, and told the wonderful story, so she spoke the truth in that part of her assertion.

"Well, Mrs. Moran," said the officer, "you've no objection to have your premises searched, I suppose? It is suspected that the prisoner is hidden somewhere about here."

"Musha, what put that into vere heads?' said Peggy Moran, angrily. "Faith! it's somethin' else we'd be thinkin' of, an' not meddlin' wud the law; but you're welcome to search away, Sir, as long as ye like, on'y its a quare thing to have an honest man's house sarched like a rogue's!"

"I must do my duty," said the officer.

"Sure the gintleman won't do us any hurt, mother," said Kate. "Please don't let 'em thrample the potatoes, Sir," she called out as the men turned into the little garden.

Pat Moran's words were almost fulfilled, that the pursuers would rock the ground in search of the fugitive. Not a bush or a hollow about the ground, not a loft or cranny in the house or out-building but was thoroughly investigated. At last, with a sickening feeling of apprehension, Kate saw the officers approach them over the fields, and three soldiers run across the plowed field to question the man who was watching.

Welsh's blood ran cold as he saw them coming; but recollecting that they did not know his face, he planted his spade shoulder, and shouted in a feigned voice to the horses.

The soldiers were young and careless. They merely asked two or three questions in an irrelevant way, staring up at the sky and down at the clay, as if they expected to discover the prisoner transformed into a bird or earth or air. Then they ran off again; and Welsh breathed freely until he spied six other soldiers advancing toward him, with the officer in charge, and two others in dark frock-coats with shining buttons and red collars.

"God help me! Sure I can only die!" he murmured.

"How long have you been plowing?" said the officer.

"Since daybreak, Sir. Won! An' hard work I have had, every one rumnin' to me since breakfast, lazin' me all the day long, an' me wud the ploughin' to do, an' the plow-boy, with an incredulous grin, "sure he might had down farther, it's ye'a'dant harper, my boy! I see nothin', Conshume ye, straight!" he growled at the horses, and, bending double over the plow, furrowed on. The officer called his men hurriedly back to the country road.

The long day drew to a close, and no man Kate came to call the plow-boy to supper, whispering that there was no one in but her father and mother, he felt as if he had lived a lifetime in the past twelve hours.

The farmer laughed heartily in telling some of the stories which were rife about the prisoner for a disappearance. "Faith! he'll have picked up four miles down the river, his clothes hat been found by a turnkey under a bush, and his handcuffs have been picked up by a boy in a field—in a bog ten miles away.

"Faith! he'll be tuestied laughin'," said Pat Moran, "when I knew that Martin Leary had 'em weldied into linch-pins, an' that Katy had the clothes buried in her garden a month before!"

So they chatted pleasantly and securely, while the rescued man sat silent from thankfulness and amazement, only casting side looks at Kate and sighing heavily.

"Musha, man, don't be sighin'!" cried the farmer, good-humoredly; "I'll give you two heels at your weddin' in Ameriky this time twelve-month, plase God!"

"No, Master Moran, I'll never marry any one in Ameriky," answered Welsh.

Kate got up to put on fresh fuel immediately.

"Och, sure you're a fool," replied the farmer, with good-natured obtuseness.

"Musha, Mather Moran, 'tisn't every man 'ud give his daughter to one like me," said Welsh, in a low tone.

"Arrah, Tim, agra, who'd think the worse o' you for bein' in throuble an' got out again?" pursued the farmer.

"Ah, 'tisn't every one is like you," said Welsh, sighing.

"Oh, sure no one will know any thing in Ameriky, Tim; that's where you're goin', I suppose?" said the farmer, "an' I'll give you two heels at your weddin' in Ameriky this time twelve-month."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Welsh. "I hope so."

The good woman was far more acute than her husband, and disliking the turn the conversation was taking, began to introduce other topics; but their little stock was soon exhausted, for Welsh, and stupid, Kate sat quite silent, and Welsh was sad. Thus they sat until twelve had struck, and the farmer had fallen asleep, his chair on to the cross-roads, where the car was to be in readiness with his relatives as convoy and body-guard.

Welsh shook Mrs. Moran's hand and kissed it in the fullness of his emotion, uttering broken words of gratitude and blessing. Then he turned to Kate, who was looking almost as she strove to speak, but words failed him, and he grasped her hand passionately and turned away.

"I'll just come after ye," said Kate, following them out into the darkness. So she did, and Welsh delayed a moment, helped her to lift the loop and staple, probably though he strove to put a few hasty words together, which had no reference to the gate.

"Keep me in your heart, Kate, agra," he whispered; "I'll send ye a letther whin I get safe over, plase God!"

Welsh sailed for England in a small coasting vessel, and from there from Liverpool, where he remained concealed for some weeks until the arder of the pursuit after him had abated, he embarked on board a fast-sailing vessel—for there were no steamers in those days—for America. When he landed he sought the home of a relative who had been settled in the new country for some years, and, by industry and strict honesty —for the dreadful lesson taught him was not wasted—he very soon became independent of his cousin, and had his own snug house and thriving farm.

He wrote regularly to the Morans; to the father first, then to the mother, and, lastly, to the daughter. When he had amassed a little money he wrote again to the former, telling the astonished man his hopes and wishes concerning Kate. Peggy Moran angrily declared her husband to have been blind along—at least she is no doubt he was—but she positively refused to listen for a moment to any such advice or notion. However, "time works wonders." Her violent opposition died away gradually, and Kate waited patiently. At the end of five years, her father being then dead, she and her mother departed for the land beyond the sea.

A SONG.

Pll sing you a song, my love,
I'll sing you a song,
And it's about the sun and summer times,
When the days were long.
It's all about the old sunny times,
When the flowers grew,
When we walked underneath the linden trees,
I and you.

And I'll sing it so sweet, my love,
I'll sing it so sweet,
That you'll think of the pleasant scented hour
When we used to meet.
You'll think of the lofty linden bank,
Where the blossoms blew,
When we talked underneath the linden trees,
I and you.

And I'll sing it so sad, my love,
I'll sing it so sad,
That you'll think my poor heart's full of pain,
And you'll think that it's full of foolish pain
When it's only true
To the days when we walked by the linden-trees,
I and you.

JOHNNY'S OPINION OF HIMSELF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

MY name is Johnny—at least that is my domestic and pet name, which I generally go by. My other, if I gave it, might break in too much upon the sanctity of my private life—a proceeding obnoxious to both dogs and men.

I conclude I am both a good dog and a pretty dog, or the world would not have taken so much pains to draw my likeness. There it is—hung on the wall—and a very good likeness, I can assure you. Also in plaster, and more charming person, for whom I have the utmost respect; but no to kissing her—there me! I should never think of such a thing. For her sake she has been ever since I can remember, my sanpister morvor (which is enuine Latin I know, but never mind), the stern guardian of my morals, the awful arbitress of my destiny? Were it not for her—But no more of Perhaps, like most young animals, I think learn to appreciate her better as I grow older.

I must have been very young when I came to this house. Indeed, I have but the faintest recollection of any other. Sometimes I think my first real glimpse of existence must have been when I was sitting in a solitary confinement in a thing called a hamper—too small for me to do more than just stretch myself, too dark to see any thing; and all the while, I had been nearly deafened by hours of constant noise—rumbling, rolling, and jerking, intermingled with sharp shrieks, which seemed frightened me to death. I afterward understood this to have been a railway journey. Out of its terrors I was saved, taken out of my hamper, and warmed, and, then spirit-ed off again half asleep. I remember nothing else till I found myself being put out of the window of a small box, which, however, was very carefully slung a solitary green road until we met my mistress. "Oh, what a beauty we dog!" said she, and immediately received me into her arms. She carried me home herself. Her words were so kind, her arms so strong and comfortable, that I had little fear of her, and began biting her sleeve with great content. Alas! since then—But let us pass over such things.

As I have said, my name is Johnny. I am, as you may observe, a Skye terrier; of noble birth I presume, since, whenever I hear my origin talked about, there are sure to be references to the "duke's game-keeper." Whether I belonged to the duke or the game-keeper I cannot discover; in the absence of proof, let us conclude it was the duke.

My personal appearance speaks for itself, and as I am always mentioned as being "thoroughbred," I trust my manners are quite unexceptionable, as well as my principles. I know my mistress has her own crotchets on the subject of what constitutes a gentleman, so let us hope that a dog of the highest caste could not be otherwise than a dog of the highest character.

She (to save trouble I will always write her down as She, with a capital S) must have considered me to become such, for She commenced my education very early. The first thing She did, after feeding me, was attempting to make me clean.

Now I don't like to be washed: dogs never do—nor children neither; and I was so very young —a mere baby, indeed. She treated me like a baby. She put on a big apron, had a tub of warm water ready, into which She sousod me, soaping and rubbing me with her own hands, till all my pretty curls were wetted through. I shrank into the size of a rat, and came out, struggling no more, but shaking all over. She laid me on her lap, rubbed me dry, combed and patted me, then put me into a little round basket lined with flannel, where I could just curl myself round, and which She called my "cradle." But afterward, finding I shivered still, though more with fright than cold, She coaxed me out of it, and taught me to run backward and forward in the warm sunshine after her feet. This was so amusing that I soon recovered myself, and showed my pleasure by biting her stockings and tearing a piece off the bottom of her gown.

After that I was washed every week—as I am. No doubt it is all for my good; but it is very unpleasant, and I don't like unpleasant things.

Gradually I became accustomed to the house, and preferred it to the garden, which was sometimes soppy, sometimes snowy, and, it being winter, always cold. But the house was very comfortable. There were carpets and rugs in every room—delightful to sleep upon, and to tear to pieces when one was alone and wanted a little amusement. At least I thought so at first, but time has taught me differently.

I shall never forget my first lesson on this matter. One day, after sleeping on a worked sofacushion, I found it consisted of the head of a dog like myself—only much bigger and uglier—a portrait, though I then thought it reality. Of course I attacked it at once, and, finding it did not resist, would have torn it to pieces, but it was tough —and besides, I was half afraid of it. It might have come alive, then what would have become of me? So I contented myself with disporting it about the floor, and gnawing one of its tassels to bits. I had just satisfactorily accomplished this, when it came over my master and mistress.

Now my master has the tenderest heart in the world. He would let me do any thing, wrong or right. If he thinks he gives me a bone, he would be immediately takes and cuddles me up, and calls me the best of doggies, and says that I may do any thing I choose—and I do choose a deal. Nay, one day, when I had been amusing myself in the garden by biting off certain obnoxious plants newly set in the borders—and there had been accordingly punished—I heard him whisper to himself: "Never mind, my wee doggie! you've more to me than all the geraniums in the garden!" I am sure he is now he would never have said a word if I had eaten up all the four tassels instead of only one. But he looked at my mistress, who looked very grave.

"This can't go on," said She.

"Now don't, mammy meant no harm—he doesn't know right from wrong."

"He'll be a bad dog, then, if he does, unless we teach him! It is our fault, not the doggie's. But if we don't make him understand he will grow up a nuisance to every body in the house. He must be punished."

"I suppose so," said my master; and turned away.

Then my mistress took me up in her arms—showed me the tassel—called me "Naughty dog!" many times over, in a grave, severe, sorrowful tone, and then—She—actually—did—not do so to hurt me much, but still enough to show how angry she was with me—and She being a person who is not often angry made it more alarming still. I shrank into the smallest possible compass in the floor, then slunk away into a corner with my tail between my legs, and the tears running down from my eyes—and I never guessed the cushion again.

This was my first grievous sin that I remember—but, no doubt, I committed a great many more. Indeed, I was always doing wrong things. The servants—who I must say have always been uncommonly kind to me—were forever complaining to the mistress of the dirt I made and destroyed. I even got into her bedroom and bit a hole in her newest and nastiest pair of boots. I heard her say the mice had done that. And She must get a cat immediately, but I knew in my secret heart that it was not the mice—it was I.

Then as spring came on, the garden (which you must know is the delight and pride of my mistress) became my favorite play-place, and of course every day something uncomfortable was happening. One morning the gardener came in her ear with a serious countenance. I should observe She had given strict orders that no one should punish me but herself.

"Ma'am," said he, "that dog will be the ruin of us. He has jumped among my cuttings, scratched up my seeds, bitten the tops off my young lettuces, and as for number of flowerpots he has broken, it is endless! Oh, what a nuisance is a dog in a garden!"

"Still, we can't keep him out of it," said She, sighing; "we can only teach him to behave himself in it. He is such a dear, good creature he'll mend. I'll take him in hand myself."

From that time, every plant I destroyed—and I do confess I like to eat the flowers—every one up to it, showed it to me, and then scolded and whipped me soundly. Gradually I began to understand that the mischief was not to be locked at, not bitten, and beds were to be ran round, not to be scampered over. And as there are plenty of grass-walks, gravel-walks and a beautiful lawn—where I may play about without vexing any body—I keep to the regulations, and have been a good dog ever since.

Nevertheless, I stand in great awe of my mistress. I look upon her as the administrator of justice; and though, as I said, I respect her extremely, I can't say I love her so well as I do my kind master, or the cook who gives me my meals, or the gentle little parlor-maid who carries me off to bed every night—out of the drawing-room into the kitchen—and who, whenever it is her duty to report my misdeeds, or bring me up for punishment, looks as sorry as if she were going to be whipped herself.

"A VERY GOOD LIKENESS, I CAN ASSURE YOU."

But my life is not all composed of whippings, I assure you. I have a very jolly time of it, both in house and garden. In the former I derive great amusement from the incessant pursuit of rats and mice. Not that I ever see them, but I have a conviction they are there. I have often lain for half an hour at a time, quite still, with my nose in a corner of the room, smelling for them—and if they only would come out to me! But they never will. And sometimes I hear my master and mistress laughing because I persist in searching for them in all sorts of places where rats are not commonly found—under sofa-cushions, for instance, and between books in the book-case. And this reminds me of a case in which I was really conscience-stricken.

My master loves his books as much as my mistress her garden. He has a great collection of them, beautifully bound, and is forever pottering after them; and as I am always pottering after him, and can't bear to be out of his sight, of course I know them quite as well as he does himself. They are very pretty books, and they do taste so nice. I gnawed a bit of one of them accidentally, and was so pleased with it that I ate the whole back. It was one of ever so many—big ones, too, I believe called "Waverley Novels"—so of course it could not be missed, and I was thinking whether I should not try another when She came in.

"Oh, Johnny! what have you been doing?" And I think She nearly cried. "Johnny, your master will be so grieved at this. You must be whipped."

And whipped I was; and I own, for the first time in my life, I did dread the coming home of my master.

But, instead of looking angry, he only looked sorry, and told my mistress not to vex herself—put the book back in its place—said, "Poor Johnny! he wouldn't have done it had he known," and spent the evening in removing the other books out of my reach. That was all. Now, what do you think of my master? Is he not a—a Brick?

And it sometimes occurs to me that, after all, my mistress is not quite so bad as She seems: that She does not really hate me, and only wants to make me a good little dog, and a pleasure instead of a nuisance to myself and other people. She now and then looks very kindly at me, even when I pay her no attention at all, and says I am the prettiest dog in the parish (or the kingdom, I forget which, but it's all one), and that She should be so fond of me if I were only good. Perhaps I may be good some day—I don't know. It's a great deal of trouble.

Still, people do alter very much sometimes: take, for instance, me and my first enemy—the first rival introduced into the house—whom I hated with a violence which now seems quite ridiculous.

It was only a kitten—a very small, gentle, frightened little thing—which I don't suppose meant me any harm in the world. Still, I had never seen a kitten before; and this one was so very black—not a white hair upon it—and when you looked at it in the dark you saw nothing—absolutely nothing—except two green, fiery eyes glaring out at you, and by themselves, enough to make any respectable dog angry.

Then it was such a silly shape of an animal, not a bit like me: with short ears and the most ridiculous, long, thin tail. For all that, it could jump about any where, even on the table, where I would have given any thing to get to and couldn't. And it could climb trees—run up them as quick as lightning—while I had to stay barking at the bottom. Then the servants made such a fuss over it, and my mistress walked about with it sitting on her shoulder; and even my master condescended to look at it sometimes; and call it "a nice little thing." No wonder I felt furious; and for days—nay, weeks—I can truly say I did my best to make that kitten's life thoroughly miserable.

Yet she never ill-used me. She was such a gentle little kitten, poor dear—I may say that for her now—she never scratched me until I almost worried her to death; she was so patient, unobtrusive—she would never have got in my way at all if I had not so persistently attacked her. And even then her worst revenge used to consist of running up this tree I have spoken of—a big apple-tree on the lawn—from the height of which she would glower down at me, quite safe and independent, with her back up and her tail thrice as big as its natural size—as fierce as if she would have liked to eat me up—which, however, she didn't.

Of course this was all pretense, as doubtless she was admiring me all the time, and wanting to play with me; indeed, she told me so afterward, when I had condescended to make friends and to play with her. You see, I liked play, and I was so very hard up for companions that even a cat was better than nothing. And, as I said, she was such a gentle little cat—so sensible, too, in her way. When we got to conversation, instead of fighting, she used to explain to me all the amusing things about the garden—a lazy toad that lived in the strawberry-bed, a family of frogs who were very happy in the little pond, and, above all, the birds, which were endless fun.

Our garden is full of birds. They know they are never shot at, nor have their nests taken, so they come and build here year after year—robins, chaffinches, blackbirds, thrushes—and the nightingales, though they do not build there, sit and sing, and make an awful clutter all night long. During May and June they quite annoy me, and I bark at them incessantly, but they will not stop singing, which is very provoking.

Well, I and the kitten fraternized, especially on the subject of birds. I used to bark at them and make them fly off, and she run up trees after them; sometimes she caught one, and then she always gave me a bit, or I took it from her and ate it myself. She could easily catch another, you know. And even when we caught nothing the pursuit was entertaining. There was one young water-wagtail—deserted by its parents—which used to hop about by itself on the lawn, where she and I fed it a pretty life. We should have killed it over and over again, I am sure, if my mistress had not driven us away, scolding us severely. She loved that little water-wagtail; why, I never could find out.

So, on the whole, we spent a happy summer—the kitten and I—and settled into downright friendship; every morning, sometimes—all friends do—but still making the best of one another. I remember even now how, when I had tossed her till I was quite tired out—biting her ears and her tail, and even taking her bodily into my mouth and carrying her, she was so small—she would come and sleep beside me on the kitchen hearth, with her two paws affectionately round my nose. I believe she thought me the very nicest of dogs; and I am sure I was very kind to her.

We might have lived in harmony for many years but for something which happened. I suspect it was poison; for we have a farm close by, and I overheard our gardener saying they lay it for the rats. But one Sunday morning my kitten wouldn't play with me as usual. She told me she couldn't—that she felt very ill; but I refused to believe her, and thought it all sham, till she crept away and laid herself down on the lawn, writhing and moaning, where she remained hour after hour, no better, rather worse.

I don't like to think of it. It was such a sunshiny Sunday, the birds singing and hopping about, the bees so merry in the flower-beds. I could not much enjoy any thing, and I could not bear to come near my poor little kitten and see her suffering; so I went away to the other end of the garden, thinking what a nice little kitten she was, what good friends we had grown to be, and how often I had vexed her, and how, if only she had got better, I would never vex her any more.

Yet there she lay, making no fuss, and troubling nobody—only so very, very ill. The servants came often to look at her, seeming very sorry; and when I ran to meet my master and mistress coming in from church I overheard the parlor maid, half crying, tell them all about her —and my mistress went straight to see after her, and staid beside her for ever so long. The poor little thing seemed to know her voice, or the touch of her hand as She stroked her—for she painfully dragged herself a few inches or so and laid her head upon my mistress's feet. Then my mistress began to cry too.

But I won't write any more of this, for it makes me melancholy, and I am a little dog that likes to be merry. And besides, she had a happy life while she was here—my poor kitten—and every body was very fond of her.

They did all they could for her, but it was of no use. I doubt if any of the household ate much dinner that Sunday—I know nobody thought of giving me mine—but I should not have cared for it, I was too sorry. The last sight I saw was every body standing round the little cat—my master, mistress, and the servants —and some of them with exceedingly red eyes. I ran away to the far end of the garden, and when I came back my kitten was gone.

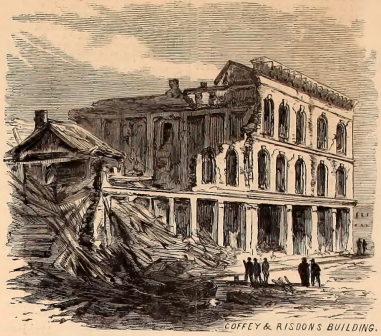
I have never seen her since. I hope she is content and comfortable somewhere, though I have not the slightest idea where; but the house seemed long empty without her, and I used to go looking about for her from room to room, wondering what had become of her, and thinking if only I could have her back to play with me for just ten minutes how very kind I would be to her, and how exceedingly nice it would be! And though I have had two kitten-friends since then—each pleasant enough in her way—and we have all gone through the same course of having one another cordially at first, and gradually making it up till we live in perfect amity—still no kitten will ever be to me quite like the first one. She was the first one—and she loved me so.

But I got over every thing in time, and now I do believe I am the happiest dog in the world. Besides, I do not think I am quite as naughty as I used to be; I have ceased to see the fun of gnawing things to pieces, and hanging on to the tail of people's gowns, and trying to destroy every thing I can get at; and I am learning to do my duty as well as to amuse myself. When beggars come to the door I bark at them furiously; and the other day when I saw two great horses walk into our garden of their own accord, and begin eating the grass on the lawn, I flew at them as if I would have torn them in pieces, and frightened them so much that they immediately scampered away. At which my mistress praised and patted me so much that I thought I would try barking at the heels of our own pony next time it was brought down to the hall-door—which startled it so much that, if it had not been the best pony in the world, it would have run away and overturned the carriage. This time I got no praise, but was scolded for my pains, and told never to do the like again, which I do not at all understand, and think very hard.

But it is time to cease talking so much about myself, as I suppose there are other dogs in the world besides me; older dogs, too, who have seen a great deal of life, and had a great many adventures. All mine are to come; and I am sometimes very anxious that they should come, for I get a little tired of my quiet life; of my master and mistress—who are rather humdrum people after all, always stopping at home, and never taking me about with them, as I understand other dogs often are taken—and of the servants—who look so comfortable, and never quarrel—so that the only "rows" that ever happen in the house are between the cats and me.

All this is very uninteresting, and I wish I had something more remarkable to relate than my opinion of myself and of the people I live among —of whom the only person who has my entire and earnest approbation is my master. I am sure if you asked him he would say the same of me.

As to my mistress— But there She is! I am silent.



* * * * * *

P.S. (Being his mistress's opinion of Johnny.) He is a pretty dog, and a clever dog, and a loving dog. As to his being a good dog—well, "he might be better and he might be worse." And for him—as for all young dogs and young things of every sort—"It's never too late to mend."

"I WAS HALF AFRAID OF IT."

"I WAS SO PLEASED WITH IT THAT I ATE THE WHOLE BACK."

"I USED TO BARK AT THEM, AND MAKE THEM FLY OFF."

THE FULTON FERRY-BOAT COLLISION, NOVEMBER 14, 1868.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 766.]

THE FULTON FERRY-BOAT COLLISION.

At all times the East River is thronged with steamboats of every description — ferry-boats, river boats, and the Sound steamers. Every morning and every evening this crowd of boats reaches its thickest; and when we consider the frailty of machinery it is somewhat remarkable that accidental collisions are not of more frequent occurrence. No amount of vigilance can prevent occasional mishaps. But the disaster of November 14, of which we give an illustration on page 765, can not be looked upon as simply a mischance. When the utmost precaution can not prevent an accident, then negligence and mismanagement become all the more criminal.

On the morning of the 14th, at half past seven o'clock, the ferry-boat Hamilton, with six hundred passengers on board, was entering her slip on the New York side, when she was run into by her eldest son, the Union. The latter boat was on the point of starting out for Brooklyn as the Hamilton came up. The pilot of the latter was at breakfast, and it is evident that the man who was temporarily in charge of the wheel did not understand the nature of his duties, and managed to bring the boat into such a position that a collision became inevitable. A panic among the passengers on the Hamilton caused the portion of the boat nearest the Union to be overcrowded and depressed so that it passed under the larboard guards of the latter. A boy sitting upon the railing—John B. Brewer—was instantly crushed and killed. The contact was on the side of the lander, and seventeen persons were severely injured. The number of injuries was, however, greater than would have been the case if the passengers had preserved their presence of mind, and allowed space for those forward to escape. The scene of confusion which ensued upon the collision is not easily described by women shrieked and fainted, and the men displayed even more terror than the women. Under these circumstances, and considering the rapid transit motion of the boats, it is wonderful that so few persons were injured. We hope that this matter will not end with the coroner's inquest. Let there be a rigid investigation, and a fearless exposure of all the facts. Those who were guilty of mismanagement should incur the severest penalties of the law.

ABBOTT THE HISTORIAN.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS.,)
June 1, 1868.

Messrs. Hall & Rucket:

I consider it to be my duty to speak in the highest terms of ALFRED'S GALLERIA, which we have obtained through you for our little boy. It has been very largely his meat and drink for some four months, and now, at the age of six months, he is wonderfully strong and well. No child could be healthier than he has been while using it. As a substitute for, or a supplement to breast-milk, it is truly invaluable, and every mother of young children ought to know of it, and where to get it.

Yours, truly, EDWARD ABBOTT.

A DISTINGUISHED Methodist minister and prominent temperance lecturer once remarked that go where he would, from one end of the country to the other, he hardly ever failed to find PLANTATION BITTERS, and while he condemned the practice of using those Bitters too freely, he could not conscientiously say that he would discard them from the side-board, for he had himself experienced beneficial results from their use; and that, from a long and close observation, he was convinced that when used moderately, and as a medicine exclusively, they were all that is recommended. At the same time, he warned his hearers not to pull the cork too often, for they were far too pleasant a tonic to trifle with.—Zion's Herald and Wesleyan Journal.

Unsurpassed for Interest and Value.

THE CULTIVATOR & COUNTRY GENTLEMAN contains from one-sixteen to twenty-large quarto pages in each weekly number, and is designed to include, not in name, but in fact, EVERY DEPARTMENT of Agriculture, Stock Raising, Horticulture, and Domestic Economy. The Editors and Proprietors, in addition to their own personal labors, have been assisted

DURING THE YEAR 1868 BY GUARD OF

Twenty-five Regular Correspondents

And Regular Contributors — SUCH whom were included many of the Leading Agriculturists of the country, East and West,

AND BY

OVER FIVE HUNDRED

VOLUNTARY and OCCASIONAL WRITERS from the ranks of the Best Farmers and Horticulturists of every State in the Union. With the co-operation of so large a corps of correspondents, the COUNTRY GENTLEMAN is intended to possess an

EXCEPTIONAL FACILITY FOR THE CHOSEN
MEDIUM OF INTERCOMMUNICATION

among all classes interested in the Products and Fertility of the Land—those who Cultivate and those who Consume. The Producer and Shipper, as well as the Grid Owner of the Crop—Breeders of Improved Animals and their Customers—Manufacturers of Implements, Machinery, and those who purchase and employ it—Nurserymen and Seed Growers—and especially the amply fuller and better data as to the progress, prospects, and results of each succeeding season, and having light upon one of the most important of all questions—

WHEN to BUY and WHEN to SELL?

As to the success with which these purposes have been met in the Past, and the probability of their further accomplishment in the Future, the Publishers prefer quoting the following extracts from well-informed sources, rather than to speak for themselves.

The Maine Farmer speaks of THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN as "Standing at the Head of the Agricultural Press of the Country."

The Scottish Farmer says THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN "The Best of All the American Newspapers Devoted to Matters of Rural Economy."

The Gardeners' Monthly says that THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN is "Conducted with a Degree of Talent equalled by any European Journal, and superior to most of them."

The Canada Farmers' Advocate says: "We are in receipt of Agricultural Publications from every part of the world, but for truthful accounts, well-written practical articles, and general management of the paper, we have seen NONE AT ALL to COMPARE WITH THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN published in the United States."

The Bucks County Intelligencer, published in the heart of a farming district unexcelled in Pennsylvania, or probably in any State, says: "cordially recommends it: "We do this not as matter of form or business, but because we KNOW whereof we speak." COUNTRY GENTLEMAN TO AS THE BEST FARMER'S NEWSPAPER in the United States. We receive many Agricultural Publications, and it is, in our judgment, the MOST VALUABLE of them. With us it is a text-book—an indispensable weekly visitor. For reliable and useful information, it is read in our household from one end to the other, and always with pleasure and satisfaction."

COLLINS METAL

(Improved Oroide).

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold as ours, we would caution the public that Collins, Chicago, and other counterfeits are no Watches, are barely worth the metal they are made of, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for those bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, have named it the "COLLINS METAL," and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Pull-Sended Patent Levers; those for Ladies on improved Escapement; better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in neatness, style of finish, time, and durability, to Watches costing $100. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6. Also, Jewelry of the Collins Metal in every style.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no Agents; orders must therefore be sent directly to us. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is Nature's Great Ally.

It took the world nearly two thousand years to discover and remedy one of the most fatal errors that mankind had committed in. From the time of Galen to a comparatively very recent date it was supposed that in order to cure a disease it was necessary to weaken the already enfeebled patient by artificial means. Bleeding, blistering, violent purgation, and salivation were the main reliance of the faculty not more than fifty years ago. Remedies were also administered as supplementary agents, after the lancet, cauthorides, jalap, and calomel had done their depleting work. Modern science has introduced a safer system in medical treatment. In place of the nauseous doses once administered in cases of indigestion, biliousness, constipation, sick-headache, nervousness, intermittent fever, &c., are now given with the utmost confidence and the happiest results. The reason why this admirable botanical preparation has superseded the debilitating poisons of the old materia medica are these: It combines the properties of a powerful tonic with those of a gentle cathartic, an anti-bilious agent, a nervine and a blood deponent. Thus, while it keeps the bowels free, regulates the liver, and purifies the current of life, it sustains the physical strength of the invalid, and by this means the expulsion of disease and the restoration of constitutional vigor go on together.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

At this season, when intermittent and remittent fevers, with other complaints arising from a damp, unhealthy atmosphere, are prevalent, a course of the BITTERS is the best means of protecting the system from an attack.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 623.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

BARON JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD.

THE late head of the House of Rothschild has fallen. The original founder of the house was MEYER ANSELM ROTHSCHILD, who was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine in 1743, and who died there in 1821. He was a money-changer and exchange broker in easy circumstances. In the first campaign of the French Revolution General CLUSTINE, at the head of the Republican Army, took Frankfort, and the Senate, in order to save the town from pillage, agreed to pay a heavy ransom. To meet the emergency MEYER ANSELM ROTHSCHILD obtained a loan from his friend the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. This was the beginning of a series of transactions which was continued through the war; and in this connection the house of Rothschild acquired its first standing in the financial affairs of Europe. This landgrave, WILLIAM IX., was one of those German despots who sold troops to England during the American Revolution and afterward during the wars of the French Revolution. He accumulated immense sums of money, but his tricky politics excited the indignation of NAPOLEON. After the battle of Jena NAPOLEON decreed the forfeiture of the States of Brunswick and Hesse-Cassel, and the French army was put in march to enforce the decree. The landgrave was forced to fly; but he had in his vaults twelve millions of florins (about a million pounds sterling) in silver. To save this vast amount of money from the French was a difficult matter, as it could not be carried away and the landgrave had no confidence in his subjects. He sent for M. A. ROTHSCHILD and entrusted him to take charge of the treasure, giving him the use of the money without interest. By the assistance of some friends, Jewish bankers at Cassel, the money was carefully stowed away; those who desire to give a touch of romance to the story say that it was hidden in ROTHSCHILD'S garden. But, however it may have been secreted, it was the stepping-stone to the immense fortunes of the house of Rothschild. MEYER ANSELM at this time had five sons, three of whom—ANSELM, NATHAN, and SOLOMON—were of age: ANSELM was sent to Frankfort, while NATHAN was established in England, first in Manchester and subsequently in London, and SOLOMON became the traveling agent of the house, visiting the various courts and princes of Germany who needed loans. By enterprise and industry the original capital of this financial establishment rapidly increased and multiplied. Thus in 1813 the ROTHSCHILDS were appointed agents for the payment by England of twelve millions sterling to Russia, Austria, and Prussia—an operation by which they profited to a large amount. After the victory of Leipsic, in the same year, when the allied sovereigns were pursuing NAPOLEON, and had reached the banks of the Rhine at Frankfort, it was found that the treasury of Austria was empty, and as it was impossible to obtain a loan from the merchant princes of Frankfort, the Prince of Metternich was obliged to stoop to the disagreeable necessity of borrowing from ROTHSCHILD, a Jew. The promptness and the grace with which the request was granted was not forgotten. M. A. ROTHSCHILD was created a baron of the Austrian empire; his son NATHAN was appointed Austrian Consul-General in Great Britain, and the whole weight of Austrian influence was devoted to extend and secure the financial operations of the house of Rothschild.

The Hessian landgrave's money was retained at the paltry interest of two per cent. until his death in 1825. M. A. ROTHSCHILD died in 1821, at which time his five sons were at the head of five immense establishments, at Frankfort, London, Paris, Vienna, and Naples. Between the brothers there was a copartnership and the most perfect unanimity. The foresight and enterprise of the house, together with this cooperation, made it almost despotic in the financial affairs of Europe. Such was its influence that it frequently decided the issues of peace and war. In 1830 ANSELM ROTHSCHILD, at Frankfort, was bold enough to declare: "The house of Austria desires war, but the house of Rothschild reserves peace." Again, in 1840, when war was on the point of breaking out between the Porte and MEHEMET ALI, the ROTHSCHILDS preserved the peace of Europe by arguments more potent than could be urged by the most eminent statesmen.

JAMES ROTHSCHILD, the subject of our sketch, was the last surviving brother of the original house, and now that he is dead the third generation of ROTHSCHILDS conduct the business. JAMES opened a banking-house in Paris in 1815. He had no taste for political life; to be the central figure of the most powerful commercial house that ever existed satisfied his ambition. He loved to dispense a munificent hospitality at his sumptuous hotel in the Rue Lafitte. It was here that, in 1859, GUSTAVE, his youngest son, was united in marriage with the daughter of JOEL ANSPACH, a judge of the

THE LATE BARON JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD.

Cour Impériale—the only Jew on the Paris bench. On the day of the marriage JAMES presented his daughter-in-law with a small pocket-book covered with crimson velvet and containing rente scrip to the amount of 50,000 francs—that was the bridegroom's money. The banquet which followed the wedding was thus described by one of the "Jonkinses" of that day:

A letter from Paris states that at the banquet given after the late ROTHSCHILD marriage the magnificence was beyond description, and that it would put the splendors vying with those recounted in the "Arabian Nights" entirely into the shade. Upon an entertainment to which nobody but the family, some sixty or seventy Rothschildren, was admitted. The service changed at the more than threescore guests were made in silver and silver gilt; plates, dishes, every thing, was of the precious metals, as at royal tables; only at dessert was porcelain of the most exquisite old Sevres, which figured the Paris potentates, and whereof each plate represents something about a king's ransom. Of the viands on the table, they came from every country and every clime—the very choicest never failing. The service is the talk of everyone price in Russia, of the size of a napkin, and of fat, orange-colored silk. From Russia, reed birds and canvas-backs from America, bustards from Spain, pheasants from Bohemia, pâtés of peacocks' brains, fillets of buffalo-hump, and one of my lady friends swears she ate—think of Brother Jonathan!—livery eat of fresh water bad yielded up its fish, every morsel, and most in its finest; every bird-bred, heated by fire or the sun, its fruit; and every grape that ever hung on any vine, by wine. As to the liberality with which the table and the dining-room were ornamented, it is enough to say that they were filled with some 4,000 English. All the windows were covered with trellis-work, over which were framed the choicest creeping plants of the tropics, shedding their luscious perfume around. It is estimated that the lady guests out were upon their persons between 30,000,000 and 40,000,000 francs worth of jewels; and in the way of doing honor to the banquet, those who partook of it sat at table from 5 P. M. to midnight.

BARON JAMES ROTHSCHILD died on the 15th of November, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. According to the ancient custom of the family—that of intermarriage among its members—he married the daughter of his brother SOLOMON, and his son EDMUND inherits his father's immense fortune.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1868.

THE DICTATOR LOPEZ.

THE recent conduct of LOPEZ in Paraguay will probably undeceive those who have had some degree of sympathy with him in the war with Brazil. He has now begun to be stated the facts upon the best authority. The "republic" of Paraguay is the most ferocious despotism. Every man entering the country from his father, as he in turn from DR. FRANCIA, as his property to manage at his pleasure. The people are wholly submitted to his will. He has sought the friendship of foreigners, and has peremptorily monopolized all the trade of the state. There is no Turkish pacha so absolute in his secluded province as Lopez in Paraguay. Freedom of every kind is absolutely suppressed, and it was not a misfortune for civilization when his aggressions upon Brazil and the consequent means of his destruction by the united neighbors of Paraguay occasioned the war which, it is to be hoped, will end only with the overthrow of the system which has so long prevailed.

The United States have already had occasion to call LOPEZ to account, and his recent conduct will probably lead to a stricter settlement. The story related by MR. WASHBURN, our late Minister in Paraguay, is extraordinary. When the movements of the Allies compelled LOPEZ to transport his ammunition, his capital, a crowd of foreigners flocked to the American Legation to be protected from the mob, from the Allies, and from the spies and agents of the tyrant. MR. WASHBURN'S Legation was United States territory. The Portuguese Consul invoked its protection with the rest. LOPEZ demanded that the Consul of every body who did not belong to the Legation. MR. WASHBURN informed the refugees of the demand, and told them he could not deliver up any who were accused of specific crime. But the refugees seem to have thought that, if they were to be surrendered to a mere accusation of crime, they might as well die at once. They did so, and the English laborers disappeared within a week, while the Portuguese Consul was arrested upon reaching Brazil, and is understood to have been soon afterward shot. The fate of the others can only be imagined. But the mercies of tyrants are always the same.

When MR. WASHBURN left the Legation had been thus violated Mr. WASHBURN thought that he also might as well leave. But before he was quite prepared to do so another decree was made by LOPEZ, that he should surrender two members of the Legation. "At this point I made a stand," says MR. WASHBURN, with an admirable dignity and firmness. And he issues from his Legation, with the two gentlemen whom LOPEZ had demanded, to embark upon the United States war-steamer Wasp, and upon the way they are taken from his side by the agents of LOPEZ, and MR. WASHBURN sails away to tell the tale.

Probably no recent incident has so astonished the people of this country. Why did not MR. WASHBURN reply to the first demand of LOPEZ that his Legation was American territory, and that it would be invaded at the peril of the aggressor? Then, if LOPEZ had not hesitated to seize his victims, why did not the United States Minister remain until he had communicated with his Government, or until his successor had arrived? Against the force of LOPEZ he alone could of course do little; but he had but his protecting presence was necessary until his Government could act; and he must have known how prompt and vigorous its action would be. He says that he left because he was powerless and could be of service to no one. But he should remember, as his country will not forget, that he voluntarily withdrew from his post when two of his countrymen had been seized and were lying in the dungeons of LOPEZ. His continued presence might not have released them; but it would have been an assurance to them and to the tyrant that they were not forgotten, and would doubtless have eased their condition. We have no doubt that Minister of the United States who has ever had a more serious account to settle with his countrymen than MR. WASHBURN.

The matter is misunderstood, and we trust correctly, that General M'MAHON, the successor of MR. WASHBURN, will receive very distinct instructions from the Government, and that he will proceed to Paraguay with the fleet of Rear-Admiral DAVIS. The most absolute satisfaction will be demanded, and unless LOPEZ has some explanation to give which has not yet been suggested, we suppose, of course, that the United States will not hesitate to remove him from a power which he has so long and wantonly abused, and that he has assailed the rights of American citizens.

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON UPON SLAVERY.

THE Freedmen's Aid Union in Great Britain was a society for the purpose which its name indicates. It was non-sectarian, and sent many thousand pounds in money, and twenty thousand pounds in clothing and other articles, to the relief of the freedmen. One of the operations of the Society are about ending, a deputation called upon the new Minister of the United States and presented an address, to which MR. JOHNSON replied in a formal speech which has then made a speech. It suggests a great deal of reflection—it is very open to criticism as plain talk when plain talk is very safe; but it is, nevertheless, a frank and striking statement of the case.

MR. JOHNSON began by a vigorous declaration of the unconstitutional character of the war. It has no foundation in morals: it has no foundation in Christianity. It robs men of that for which alone it is excellent and worthy to live." But it became, by reason of the Slavery, the chief source of the prosperity of the planters. Fearing its gradual ultimate extinction when Mr. LINCOLN was elected, they made organized war against the authority of the Government for the purpose of perpetuating the institution of slavery." The determination to perpetuate slavery was plain, he said, although, in a government based upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence, it was sure to disappear. MR. JOHNSON proceeded to extol WILBERFORCE. Then he referred to his own experience among the colored race, and said that they were just as capable of education as white people. He laughed at the idea that they were to be educated to be any important sense. "As well might we say that a black horse or a black sheep do not belong to the same class of horses or of sheep as the bright bay or any other." Then he praised General HOWARD most warmly. Great as his services in the war were, in which he lost an arm, they were trifling compared with those he has rendered as the head of the Freedmen's Bureau; and his praise is upon "the lips of every intelligent, disinterested, and liberty-loving man in the whole length and breadth of America." Then looking forward, the Minister said that the product of slave labor, compared with that of free labor, will be as a mole-hill to a mountain: the freedman will be the expected of him, and that it is his duty not to disappoint that expectation.

It is humiliating that such a speech, so obvious, so true, and so merely elementary true, spoken by the Minister of the United States in England, should be a sign of the vast progress which this country has made. The fact only shows how absolutely this country was ruled by the slave system and its great lords, the planters.

At length, and for the first time in our history, an American Minister can refer without uncing to the Declaration of Independence. As for MR. JOHNSON himself it is impossible not to remember that he was originally elected to public life under the shadow of slavery; and that if he then thought, as of course he did, that it was a crime and a blunder, his open expression of such an opinion would have been of incalculable service to liberty. The time for a statesman to help a reform is when he sees the enormity of the abuse. Then he should denounce it, and remove, and he denounces slavery. If he were a proselyte, if he had just come to the perception of the crime, it would not be fair to recall his silence and passivity. But the evil grew to its overwhelming power, and could be removed only by such terrible sacrifice, because men like MR. JOHNSON and other leading public men persisted in opposing the agitation which might have led to a less costly remedy. As MR. BRIGHT said in his late Edinburgh speech, the agreement upon the Corn-Law question in England came too late; "and the misfortunes which had been, pretty fiercely, foretold, or which were inevitable, happened, and it was only after the fact that we were able to agree as to what ought to have been done." Let us hope that the public men of the day at least will learn something from the tremendous experience of the country, and not consider it the height of wisdom to suffer every evil to grow into a power strong enough to challenge the whole force of the Government.

MR. JOHNSON carefully avoids speaking of the suffrage of the freedmen. But that has spoken, and will still speak, of itself. The Minister has heard of the election of General GRANT, and he accepts the decision without commenting upon it. He perceives at last that the heart of his countrymen is set upon equal rights as the stable foundation of a prosperous and peaceful commonwealth.

ABROAD AND AT HOME.

THE elections in England, like those in this country, have been carried by the Liberals. In MR. BRIGHT'S expressive phrase, "the nation is now in power;" and the aristocracy having abstained by the passage of the Reform bill, the responsibility of progress rests now with the people. The election in England was even more that of a ruler than in the United States. In the success that brings the Liberal party into power carries its leader, MR. GLADSTONE, to the head of the Government, with the initiation of its policy. That policy will no longer be the traditional policy of the Whig party. It is no longer a mere game of place among patricians; it is a necessity of the relief of those who suffer. The great measure, therefore, for instance, will now support and vote for itself. The law of primogeniture will be revised. The whole subject of disestablishment will be considered. There is no resting-place in political progress; and the impatience that denounces fresh agitation is mere folly. It would have been as reasonable to stop just before the last step as just before the next. Every point well-reached is only a point of fresh departure; and the real leader of men is he who prepares the way onward when the present situation, as the forest-path, pushes into the thicket and underbrush to find the path while the rest lie comfortably around the campfire.

A party, however liberal, coming into power is proverbially Conservative. MR. GLADSTONE, Prime Minister that shall be, is a man of so distinctly conservative temper that he seems often timorous or reluctant. Of the most sensitive temperament, of great capacity, of ample and various accomplishment, of long and active experience, he is a man in whom much conscience that he sees and allows the weight of the opposing argument while his nervous irritability sometimes betrays him into rash words and acts. But he is evidently a statesman who has learned the chief lesson of a statesman, to be guided by experience. He does not insist upon applying to his own system theory, but he also is willing to be convinced. So the High Church Tory of thirty years ago is to-day the chief Liberal leader, demanding the disfranchisement of the Irish Church, and preaching a gospel of the suffrage more radical than had been known in England. This great change in MR. GLADSTONE'S character proves the least suspicion upon his character. Nobody supposes that he has become a Liberal for the sake of office. His change of opinion is honored as much as that of Sir ROBERT PEEL from protection to free trade, and, as in Sir ROBERT'S case, it is the kind of change that commends him more deeply to public confidence.

But if upon assuming office there should be any supposed disposition to falter or forget, there will be enough who will pointedly recall the new Minister to duty. It is apparent that MR. GLADSTONE'S promotion will bring MR. BRIGHT also into office. But, as if to show that he means not to pause, but to throw his javelin still further forward, MR. BRIGHT, in his speech at Edinburgh just before the election, spoke of the country as standing upon the threshold of a new era, and mentioned three or four reforms which seemed to him now properly in order.

What is true in England is no less so here. The election of General GRANT settles, in general, the policy of reconstruction. The next step is to correct it in detail where it has failed to accomplish its purpose, and to proceed to such other changes as experience has shown to be essential. The cry to return to the old state of things is as comical as a wish to go back to the arts of the Middle Ages and subsist. It was the old state of things that plunged us into the war. What we need is a new picture of things; a large and liberal interpretation of the Constitution; a reasonable view of State rights; emancipation from the fear of dangers which, in our situation, are necessarily imaginary; a profound faith that morality is essential to great public policy, and proved intelligence to skilful and economical public service; and a careful independence of party-spirit, which will enable us to see that, while in a free government we must work with parties, yet even our own party may make mistakes, and honor those who are not truly honorable.

REMEDY FOR THE STRINGENCY IN MONEY MARKET.

WHENEVER the "let up" which occurred some days after the promulgation of a statement that the Secretary of the Treasury had promised relief, was due in part to any actual interference of the Secretary or of the Assistant Treasurer, or chiefly to the voluntary action of the parties to the "lock up," after their objects had been accomplished, is not precisely known; but it is certain that the stringency is now over.

On the 17th of November the Bank of the Commonwealth distributed ten millions five hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars to the other banks, on checks held by the latter, which was accepted as proof that the speculators for a fall of Erie and other stocks, who had backed up upon those banks, had adopted a liquid policy. This sum was probably required in payment for Erie stock—repurchased after it had been used to depress the market—as 200,000 shares at 54 would amount to $10,800,000. The extraordinary order authorizing the Receiver of Funds of the Company to purchase 200,000 shares, was issued by the Supreme Court on the 18th of November, on an affidavit made by an officer of the Company that its then market value was 54. From the price it advanced on the 20th to 62, when the order by which—the corner having culminated and a conspicuous short having settled—it fell to 43. The gain from this settlement alone is stated at from one to two millions of dollars. Others were in the same dilemma.

The amount involved in the lock up, obtaining largely from the proceeds of new Erie stock, is estimated at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars—a sum sufficiently large to accomplish the object when it is borne in mind that it was withdrawn simultaneously with the annual transfer from the East to the West of large sums intended to facilitate the transportation of cotton and grain to the sea-board. On examining the list of debits and credits from the 19th of October to the 17th November inclusive, issued by the Clearing-House, it will readily appear what banks in this city were selected as depositaries in these efforts to corner the ordinary derangement which accompanies the annual movement of crops into one of extreme distress for the whole Union.

We trust that one of the first steps of the ensuing Congress will be the appointment of a committee to investigate in New York this extraordinary proceeding, with a view to the full disclosure of the transaction and the punishment of any such conspiracy now or hereafter. It appears that no relief can be obtained here. Indeed, it is much more likely that equity will be considered a crime by the "unjust judges" who have secured exemption from punishment for the disability in which the result of the election in this State, accomplished by means which commend fraud to shelter and adoption.

Although the stringency is over it is expedient to consider what features there are in the structure of the New York and Erie Railroad which permit the frequent repetition of immense and disgraceful operations. The General Railroad Act, passed after the Erie had been incorporated, provided in subdivision 9 of Section 28 that the companies organized under it, the Erie not being one, might exercise any holder of any bond issued for money borrowed and necessary for completing and finishing or operating their railroad," the right to convert the principal due or owing thereon into stock of said Company at any time not exceeding ten years from the date of the bond under such regulations as the Company may see fit to adopt." By Section 49 of that Act all the then existing Railroad Corporations within this State were declared to be entitled to all the powers and privileges contained in that subdivision of Section 28 "not inconsistent with the provisions of their charter."

In considering whether or not this power might be exercised by those railroad corporations established in advance of the passage of the General Act, it has always been supposed, when the amount of capital stock had declared in any act of incorporation, that it was inconsistent with it to enlarge the amount, but the Erie Railroad, which for many years regarded its capital as fixed by positive legislation, and as being incapable of enlargement without direct legislative authority, has been accustomed to issue new instruments which have conducted with a view to speculation to use the legislative franchise of authorizing the creation of new stock at its pleasure without publication or requiring a public sale.

It is well known that this incorporation is stronger at Albany than the Legislature, and, therefore, that no legislative measure has been adopted to prevent the sacrifice of this great interest to private cupidity. The wrong of authorizing new and frequent issues of such stock is aggravated by the fact that each issue has been accustomed to have been secretly made to aid in cornering operations, having in view, in the first place, the depression of its market value. By reason of the last issues and the lock up the stock fell from above 80 to 35 per cent. On a change of operations it increased to 62, and the object accomplished it fell instantly to 43. You shall know, said one of the judges appointed prior to the constitution of 1846, addressing a criminal then before him, that if justice is slow in her steps she has at least a firm grasp. If the Bench were thus constituted, or if legislation in this State were pure, these glaring offenses which astonish every civilized community would meet with certain and sufficient punishment.

It can not be doubted that Mr. GRISWOLD owes his district, in the late election for Governor, to his determination that the government of the State should be restored to its rightful hands. The numerous frauds that are to be uncovered and corrected whenever the State shall be in proper hands will secure the defeat of such a candidate until the people shall be fully informed of the immense danger of allowing the most important servants of the public to owe their whole power to the worst influences.

The country now looks with hope and confidence to the great statesman who has been elected President to aid in giving the requisite protection and safety. What we most need is the certainty that every honest citizen who goes to the polls in any, even the worst district, whether it be to vote or to oppose improper votes, shall be esteemed a public sentinel behind whose bayonets the whole public force is to protect him in this duty. Until this is thoroughly accomplished and known government will be used for violating the fundamental principles for which it was organized.

If the Congressional inquiry we have suggested shall be set on foot—the Committee to meet in the city with power to send for persons and papers—it will be made to appear whether and in what manner, the banking organizations of the Union are wielded to depress the value of private securities, and at the same time embarrass the Treasury. It will embrace examination into the recent gigantic and startling operations of this road, so far as they have a bearing on the late fall, and enable the great interests whose industry has been seriously affected by means of it—the farming, manufacturing, and commercial interests, for all have been equally and seriously affected—to apply the proper remedy. It is to have honest servants in every important position.

THE STREET AND THE BENCH.

THE recent, and indeed the constant transactions in Wall Street, have more than a touch of economical aspect. It is a consideration which affects the public character and welfare that the typical spot of immorality in the city of New York is no longer the Five Points, but is coming to be Wall Street; and that the most noted people in the city, and by many the most envied and admired, are not indeed the gentlemen in velvet hats, and very bright neckscarfs, and very large diamonds, who loiter at certain street corners, but men of the same profession who pursue their gambling not in "hells," more or less gaudily furnished, but in offices down town. The daily transactions of persons who are socially recognized by respectable and humane men are openly carried to a length described as swindling—and nobody even stares at the word. It is perfectly well known that many scenes of the offenses for which criminals are daily sent to the Tombs and to Sing Sing are not comparable in moral guilt to the operations of "great financiers," but apparently nobody is troubled; the story is a very bit of gossip; it is diamond cut diamond and the Kilkenny cats.

If this were indeed, all it would be very foolish to lose time in attending to the matter. But meanwhile the courts of law join the jolly round. The Bench, which is the last official resource of modern civilized society, has a hand in the pool. Judges are retained by criminals. Decisions are sold at auction. Then the Bar gives a dinner to one of its leaders—one of proved ability and unblemished character—and when he says that the memory of the unjust judge is cursed, there is such tremendous applause that the delighted orator instantly looks through the list of guests to see who the company is composed of; and some names, taken with the applause, will remind the reader of what Carlyle tells us of a Jupiter who was found that it was seriously hurt when it was accused of being hypocritical. But it is time to ask seriously whether it is right that a man notorious morally sits in the ermine and assumes to discharge the functions of a magistrate? Does the reflected sunshine see any thing essentially different between JUSTICE upon the bench doing will of the at ruthless king and court at Whitehall and another judge doing the will of a great operator and his clique in Wall Street? Is any man safe when the courts are bought for private purposes? Was there ever a city in Christendom in which courts were so corrupt as some in the city of New York?

We may say that if the Wall Street gambling were merely diamond cut diamond no one need lose time in thinking of it. But can deliberate swindling be recognized as reputable business and society remain secure? If any body denies that it is recognized as reputable, we reply that the notorious stock-gamblers are not sent to Coventry. They are not treated as swindlers. When exposed, honorable men do not refuse to have further dealings with them. They gain or lose reputation for shrewdness, but their dishonesty is merely laughed at. Why isn't the dishonesty of a forger laughed at? Why is an embezzler sent to Sing Sing? Why doesn't Wall Street give its hand to a pickpocket? And will it pretend that there is any moral difference between a pickpocket and men whom it daily receives? We insist, therefore, that these persons whom the public journals openly denounce as swindlers, without protest or contradiction, are recognized as reputable when they are not treated as other swindlers are.

Does any body seriously suppose that dishonesty can be honored, and the community not suffer? Are all the moral sentiments chimeras, and the moral safeguards of society absurd? Is it a sham willing to educate his children for a contest with sharpers? Can any rational man read such an article as that upon the Judiciary of the City of New York in the North American Review for July, 1867, or that in the American Review of a month or two since upon the "Erie Row," or the pamphlet, published by PUTNAM, upon the Wall Street Ring, and feel that there is an immense public peril in this state of things; and that the worst sign of the condition of any community is the apathy with which it regards such dishonesty and judicial corruption as are revealed in the late Erie operations in Wall Street?

THE ELECTION FRAUDS.

THE you're-another argument only convicts those who use it. It is no reply to the charge of frauds in the elections to say that somebody else cheated. The question is not of personal retaliation papers, of repeating, of false registry, is made, and somebody who feels accused shouts that Mr. BRECKINRIDGE had better ascertain how much money was illegally spent in the election. But it is not a party question, and whoever tries to make it so confesses judgment. It is simply stupid in any body to deny that there were monstrous frauds, because they are universally known. The business of all good citizens is to expose them, and to bring the offenders to the judgment of the bar and of public opinion. One paper ludicrously asserts that the journals which have charged fraud at the polls in New York have "villainously belied the city in which they live, and which is now trying to earn their own bread and butter?" To speak of the Brooklyn Ferry disaster is also to discredit the city, probably, and to hint that the city of New York is not trying to earn bread, is to foul your own nest. Those who do not see that the inevitable tendency of such frauds is to destroy all respect for the law-box have yet to learn the simplest conditions of a popular government.

LOUISIANA.

THE State Republican Committee of Louisiana for the campaign of 1868 published an address plainly stating the facts of the late election. It was evident from the April election that the Democratic Republicans were not the body of the new voters were upon that side. The Democratic party, therefore, resolved to carry the State by any means, under the encouragement of JOHNSON and the instructions of WADE HAMPTON and the other Southern leaders. It had large means, and a semimilitary organization counting eighteen thousand armed and drilled men in the city of New Orleans alone; and it had also the countenance and sympathy of Generals ROUSSEAU and BOUTWELL. Before election-day it was evident that the aggressive portion of the Democratic party had resolved that if the colored men would not vote for SEYMOUR and BLAIR they should not vote at all. Accordingly, on election day, while the whole Republican vote would end in rioting and massacre. The Republicans, therefore, fearful of such a result, would remain at home, and to abstain where the effort would end in violence and murder.

The result was that in the peaceful parishes, where employers generally controlled the votes of colored men, the full Republican vote was thrown. In Concordia parish, where there were 1,600 registered voters, there were 1,600 Republicans voted; in St. James's parish of 2389 registered Republicans, 2161 voted; in Iberville parish, where 2150 Republicans registered, 2046 voted. In the city of New Orleans, on the other hand, where there were 18,000 colored citizens registered, only about 100 voted, and although besides these were about 3000 registered white Republicans, the whole Republican vote of the city was but 276. In the parish of St. Landry, where more than two hundred negroes were killed in October, and a Republican registration of more than 2000 not one Republican vote was cast. In three other parishes, with a similar registration in each, there was one Republican vote.

This intimidation at the polls was the work of the party which has sacked Republican churches, schools-houses, printing offices, and residences; which has dispersed Republican meetings, exiled and murdered prominent Republicans, and established a reign of terror which has paralyzed the State, and brought it to the verge of anarchy. We trust that the Governor of Louisiana will make such representations to Congress that the electoral vote of the State will not be counted until after the most careful and thorough investigation, and that Congress will take care that hereafter, in the States where similar violence may freely be expected at elections without assistance from the authorities, such provision be made that the poorest and most friendless citizen may be as secure in voting as the richest and most influential.

HAPPIER AND HAPPIER.

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON, of whose speech to the Freedmen's Aid Union we elsewhere speak as an illustration of belated wisdom, has written a note to some steamship agents in England, denying the statements of the New York correspondent of the London Daily News in regard to the state of society in Texas. Mr. JOHNSON says that it was his business as a Senator to know the truth, and the truth is, that there is no more violence in Texas than in any other State of the Union—Vermont, for instance, or Iowa.

Why will Mr. JOHNSON persist in these performances? The condition of Texas might be inferred from the fact that it was a border slave State, always somewhat lawless, and recently involved in a long and sanguinary civil war which emancipated the slaves. That of itself would lead any one familiar to expect a very disorganized and perilous state of society. Mr. JOHNSON would do no violence to ordinary experience if he suggested that abnormal disturbance in Texas was highly probable. But it is not a subject which is left to inferences and speculations. The statistical accounts from Texas, the public private reports, reveal the exact situation, and it amply justifies all that the correspondent of the News has stated.

MR. JOHNSON writes this letter from a vigorous conviction that every thing in his country shall appear as serene as the mind of Mr. TILDEN in contemplating the chances of Mr. SEYMOUR'S election. "Trouble in my happy land," says the United States Minister, "disorder upon the Mexican frontier among the most desperate of the chivalry! Why, nothing is so delightful as that word to the ear of my country. It is, in fact, the Happy Valley described in the charming romance of 'Rasselas,' written by that great Englishman who was of opinion that taxation without representation is not tyranny, and who both wrote and spoke in a truly remarkable manner that language of SHAKESPEARE, and of MILTON, and of the inspired translation of the Holy Scriptures, which bind the Englishman to the American, my dear friend MR. LAIRD and my dear friend MR. SUMNER, in the most indissoluble bonds of social friendship."

A week after he had commended Texas to all inquiring immigrants as the most tranquil and inviting of the United lands, the accurate MR. JOHNSON, heroically belt upon pleasing and being pleased, received the deputation of the Freedmen's friends, and made them a speech to be bland and kind as his letter to the Texas agents. At the close of his remarks MR. JOHNSON said with warmth, and doubtless with the beaming fervor of eye, "I can assure you that during my residence among you I have been happy from the first; I am getting yet happier every day, and was never more happy than now." Who doubts it? The good man is all milk and sweetness. But while at innumerable banquets he alludes to our immortal language, and assures MESSRS. LAIRD and WHARNCLIFFE and GARRICK, that Anglo-Saxon is the very apple of the American eye—how about the Alabama?

THE PERIL OF THE HOUR.

THE enormous frauds at the election must not be forgotten now that the election is passed, and with such a triumphant result for the policy of parties and men. That is very gratifying, but the frauds are the worst peril that could threaten us. If the State of New York is to be governed by such means, the whole country will be governed by the same, and the safety, and the whole system of popular government will be overthrown. It is not, therefore, the question of the success of an election, nor of a city, but of the highest welfare of the whole country and of all citizens.

Indeed the feeling is so profound, and the sense of outrage in this State so serious, that Congress can not avoid entering upon the whole subject, and revising the naturalization laws throughout the country. Legislation and prosecution there are guards which experience has suggested, and which may be constantly improved; but the cheats of naturalization are more cheaply, and require still stricter scrutiny. The power should be taken from suspected courts at least, and there are courts in New York which are suspected. It should be taken from the State courts altogether, and it should not be possible for a man to vote immediately upon completing his term. Knavery, of course, will elude any law, but the true interests and rules. But something can be done to correct this and all other evils.

We say that some of the courts of New York are suspected. If there be any judge more tainted with suspicion, or who is notoriously and flagrantly active in these schemes of polluting the ballot-box, let him be impeached by the Legislature of the State. The Republican party remains in power in the State, as well as in the country. Its responsibility is great, but so is its power, and so should be its purpose. The danger that threatens us is no longer rebellion—it is corruption of every kind, and at every point. It is not a peril which appeals to the heroic sentiments, but it is a thousand-fold more deadly than open rebellion is ever likely to be. It does not batter the walls; it crumbles the foundations. Every man who winks at fraud, encourages the assassin who would slay us. If we are indifferent or negligent, if we suffer the crimes of this character committed this year to pass with a little cry of indignation, they will return every year with seven devils worse than themselves.

LITERARY.

"THE LIFE of George Stephenson, and of his son Robert Stephenson," by SAMUEL SMILES, just issued in a handsome volume by the HARPERS, is not only a very interesting biography of the two noted engineers, but is also a brief history of the railway system, its rise and development. There are few books lately published which convey so much substantial information in so attractive a form.

"About Woman, Love, and Marriage," by F. SAUNDERS, author of "Salad for the Solitary," etc., published by E. W. CLEKETON & Co., is a collection of the sweet and graceful things that have been said upon the delightful subjects named, connected by a vein of clarity and pleasant suggestion, in which humorous anecdote and happy incident are skillfully woven. It is a bouquet of the flowers of wisdom and wit, and will be sure to charm a host of genial and tender hearts.

"The Woman's Kingdom" is MISS MULOCK'S (or MRS. CRAIK'S) last novel, just published by the HARPERS. It will undoubtedly dispute the palm with "John Halifax" as her best work. It is a love tale of absorbing interest.

"Passages from the American Note Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne" (FIELDS, OSGOOD, & CO.) is a book of extraordinary interest. No man was in a better position to see us, and the most intimate confidence upon paper, as between friend and friend. No diary certainly was ever so free from selfish egotism. It is a book to be read slowly, and whose emotion and impression that it is Homeric. Its merits are remarkable in many ways; and its simply literary charm and significance is very great. Yet no book required such careful editing, and in one or two instances we fear it may occasion unnecessary pain, from the reflection of which HAWTHORNE would have recoiled.

"Sol. Smith's Theatrical Mangement." The HARPERS publish this autobiography of "a retired actor" whose name is very familiar, especially in the West and South. It is a series of characteristic anecdotes and sketches of life for the last thirty years in those parts of the country as seen by a man whose chief interest was the theatre. There are interesting and characteristic details of MACREADY, the KEANS, FANNY ELSLER, and other celebrities that have at times during that period. The whole is made interesting by the tone of simplicity which so often distinguishes gentlemen of the profession, and which wins a kindly regard even from those who do not frequent the theatre.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEW YORK State pays more attention to her public schools than any other New England State. The percentage of children in these schools is over 61, while in Maine it is 18, in Vermont 20, in Connecticut 47, and in Rhode Island 48.

A land-office fire broke out near Westbrook, Maine, November 22, covering about forty acres of land. It consumed the office and contents, and 11 Presumpscot River.

The Lunatic Asylum at Columbus was destroyed by fire on the 24th. All of the patients were saved.

On the evening of November 17 a complimentary dinner was given by the bar of New York to Messrs. Evarts, the Attorney-General, at the Astor House. Some three hundred guests were present. President Grant, General Grant, Admiral Farragut, and many distinguished statesmen and politicians.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE elections in England have resulted in a grand triumph for the Liberal party. The majority of this party in the House of Commons is about the same as when Peace to be left. The election was a very exciting one, and was followed by a series of riots in Ireland and England.

The Sultan solemnly consents to the arrangement stipulating that the Alabama claims commission shall sit in Washington.

The Chinese embassy was courteously received by Queen Victoria at Windsor.

The English statisticians tell us that during last year there were 933 steamers wrecked on the British coast, and that 1856 lives were lost with the vessels. In one November gale there were four wrecks. Out of the total number of vessels lost last year, 1021 were engaged in the coasting trade. It is stated by the same authority that upward of five hundred vessels were known to have been lost from absolute and inexcusable mess. The National Life-boat Institution was the means of saving 1066 lives during the year.

The eruption of Vesuvius is increasing in violence, and threatens the town of San Giorgio.

Captain-General Lersundi has an army of about 13,000 disciplined men, and against this force, properly managed, it seems impossible that the Cuban insurrection can long hold out. Senor CANOVAS, President of the Madrid Government, proclaiming liberal reforms in the colonies will do much to restore quiet in the island.

Dominico F. Sarmiento was inaugurated as President of the Argentine Confederation on the 12th of October.

HOUDON'S WASHINGTON.

PERHAPS on the termination of a general election for President of the United States nothing could be offered to inspire the patriotism of our readers so much as a likeness of WASHINGTON. It appears on this page, and comes from a photograph of the statue of WASHINGTON in the Capitol at Richmond, Virginia. This statue has been justly spoken of as the most precious work of art to Americans that exists in the world. It is undoubtedly a true representation of the noble features and form of the "Father of his Country."

The Legislature of Virginia in 1784 unanimously passed a resolution "requiring his image to be made in the purest marble by the most eminent sculptor in Europe." The duty of selecting an artist was committed to JEFFERSON and FRANKLIN, who offered the work to HOUDON, then the most celebrated sculptor in Paris. Although the sum appropriated was inadequate, HOUDON answered: "It would be the glory of his life to be enabled to place his name humbly upon the plinth of a statue representing that good man."

It was supposed that whatever artist might be engaged would perform his work in Paris from such material as he could obtain; and for this purpose a copy of PEALE'S full-length portrait of WASHINGTON was sent to France; but HOUDON rejected all such aids, and determined to proceed to America to obtain the requisite materials. JEFFERSON informed WASHINGTON that the artist "had a difficulty to withdraw himself from an order of the Empress of Russia," who expressed her surprise that HOUDON should leave the rewards offered at her court "to make the statue of a Colonial Rebel."

JEFFERSON described the artist to WASHINGTON as "without rivalship, and as disinterested, generous, candid, and punting after glory." "He comes now for the purpose of lending the aid of his art to transmit you to posterity." FRANKLIN accompanied HOUDON across the ocean and announced their arrival in Philadelphia. To this WASHINGTON, then at Mount Vernon, replied on the 26th September, 1785. On the same day he sent a characteristic letter to HOUDON, which is as follows: "Sir,—By letter, which I have lately had the honor to receive from Doctor FRANKLIN at Philadelphia, I am informed of your arrival at that place. Many letters from very respectable characters in France, as well as the Doctor's, inform me of the occasion; for which, though the cause is not of my own seeking, I feel the most agreeable and grateful sensations. I wish the object of your mission had been more worthy of the masterly genius of the first statuary in Europe, for then you are represented to me.

"It will give me pleasure, Sir, to welcome you to this seat of my retirement; and whatsoever I have or can procure that is necessary to your purpose or convenient to your wishes you must freely command, as inclination to oblige you will be among the last things in which I shall be found deficient, either on your arrival or during your stay."

HOUDON immediately proceeded to Mount Vernon, and was cordially received. Although the artist had been led to anticipate the highest pleasure from beholding WASHINGTON, yet he afterward stated to JEFFERSON that he "had no idea of the grandeur of his form, features, and presence." WASHINGTON at first refused HOUDON'S request to allow plaster casts to be taken of his face and whole person, but such was the confidence which the artist inspired that WASHINGTON submitted, saying, "Do with me as you please. I can refuse you nothing;" and thus it was that his whole precious form has been transmitted to our time.

HOUDON remained at Mount Vernon a fortnight engaged in taking casts, which he sent to Paris. The moulds of the head were retained under his special charge, he observing: "If they are lost in the ocean I am determined to perish with them." He descended so far into the minutiæ as to make casts of WASHINGTON'S watch-seals, spurs, and walking-stick, which appear in the statuary.

HOUDON determined, immediately on looking at WASHINGTON, to take him in the costume of the time, which accorded with WASHINGTON'S wishes, and with the judgment of the best authorities abroad. This garb was finally adopted, and hence WASHINGTON appears in his ordinary dress. The attitude in which he stands was common on important occasions. He had resigned his authority as Commander-in-Chief. The cane of the civilian which he holds in his right hand is intended to express that he had become a private citizen. His sword and military mantle resting on the rods or fasces—the military emblem of the Confederacy—the Constitution of the United States had not then been adopted—presents the same idea. The original statue, chiseled in Paris, now stands in the Capitol at Richmond. It represents WASHINGTON at the age of fifty-three, then in the prime of life. The tranquility and dignity of the expression can not be surpassed. His noble frame stands there in full majesty.

We have often regretted that this work of art, so precious to those now on the stage and to generations to follow, should still stand in a building not only not fire-proof, but easily destroyed. It should be placed beyond the possibility of destruction in a fire-proof edifice on the Capitol grounds. This, we hope, may be done, and we beg leave to suggest it to the present authorities of that State.

We have, however, the gratification to know that three bronze copies of it were taken under the consent of an act of the Legislature of Virginia, and that one of them is at Raleigh, an-

REV. RICHMOND FISK, D.D., PRESIDENT OF ST. LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY.

Its friends hope that within a few years this picture will have become obsolete. A special feature of this institution is that students of both sexes are received, on due examination, to pursue on an equal footing either course of study they may select. The President of the Faculty, whose portrait we give, is Dr. RICHMOND FISK, born at Bennington, Vermont, in 1836. He graduated at Union College in 1858. After graduating he studied law for a year; but the bent of his mind was toward the ministry of the denomination to which he belonged. He thereupon accepted the position of pastor of a church at Auburn, which, after three years, he resigned to accept his present position.

A "University" comprises, as its name imports, a Faculty for teaching each of the great departments of science. Among these is that of Theology. The Principal of the Theological School, whose portrait we also give, is Dr. EBENEZER FISHER. He was born in Maine in 1815. His early training was that of most New England boys, in the common schools, reading, meanwhile, every book that came in his way. His early training was in the faith of Christianity as expounded by CALVIN. As he grew up he abandoned this for the tenets held by the Universalist denomination, and of these, at the age of twenty-two, he resolved to become a preacher. Meanwhile he was elected to the Legislature of his State. His year of legislative service having expired, he began other in the grounds of the college at Lexington, Virginia, presided over by General LEE, and the third is temporarily deposited in the City Hall at New York. The latter is offered for sale at $10,000, on behalf of the widow and heirs of HUBARD, the artist who made these bronze copies.

We have high authority in the pamphlet from which we have gathered these facts for stating that the copy is exact, and trust that it may be obtained for erection in Central Park. We hope this will be done, so that whatever may be the fate of the original our people here can have the opportunity, as they gaze upon the noble features and form of WASHINGTON, to recollect his example, and to resolve to follow him as the purest and truest of the great men who have adorned the world.

THE ST. LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY.

AT Canton, the county seat of St. Lawrence County, in Northern New York, is located the St. Lawrence University, under the control of the Universalist denomination, which its friends hope will soon receive such endowments as will enable it to take rank with the other great educational institutions of the land. We give on this page a view of the University building as it now stands.

THE NATIONAL CHRISTIAN CONVENTION.

THIS Convention, which met a few days ago in the Reformed Protestant Church on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street in this city, was composed of ministers and lay members of evangelical churches in various parts of the United States. The object of the Convention is expressed in the words of the call: "The increasing influence of material interests in our land, so rapidly growing in population, wealth, and commercial activity; the ignorance of the multitudes and their indifference to the claims of the Gospel; the extensive introduction of irreligious and anti-religious styles of thought and life from abroad; the organized forms of attack upon the authority of God's word; the fascinations of a shrewd system of supersition, allied to open worldliness, and the inroads of an infidel philosophy, reared upon the foundation of universal skepticism, alike demand peculiar vigithe work of preaching, officiating at several places in Maine and Massachusetts. In 1858 he was induced to take charge of the Theological School at Canton, out of which has grown the St. Lawrence University.

lance on the part of the disciples of the Son of God, lest the high vantage-ground God has so graciously given His people in this country be stolen from them. Extraordinary efforts must be put forth to meet the crisis, and to fight the spiritual battle to which Providence summons us. Co-operation among evangelical churches, and the hearty union of all sincere Christians in sympathy, conference, prayer, and activity, are imperatively required by the times. All differences should be sunk in the harmony of one faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, our atoning Saviour; and His pure Gospel must be proclaimed by the united voices of His redeemed people. All avenues for the propagation of His truth must be sought and diligently used, and every Christian heart be awakened to its responsibility; in other words, it is the Church's work in its broadest meaning that must be done; that by the Church (true to her Head) the manifold wisdom of God may be made known to the principalities and powers who, beyond the sphere of sense, are interested either in her glory or her shame."

The topics discussed in the Convention regarded the means for a more perfect working organization among the members of each church; an investigation of the causes of the failure on the part of so many churches to reach the poor; the relation between churches and voluntary Christian associations; the efficiency of week-day meetings; woman's work in the Church; the enlargement of Christian home influence; the improvement of the homes of the poor; lay-preaching; open air services; city missions; the better observance of the Sabbath; the conduct of Sabbath-schools; and other subjects of a practical nature.

All of these subjects are of the utmost importance, and it is hoped that, in the general re-awakening of the Church, which is one of the characteristic events of the day, they will receive the attention which they demand.

THE BREWER FOUNTAIN ON BOSTON COMMON.

The following description of the bronze fountain on Boston Common, recently presented to that city by Mr. Gadner Brewer, and illustrated on page 772, is taken from a Boston paper:

The height of the fountain is 24 feet, and the diameter of the basin 28 feet, which is two feet more than in the original. It is erected here under the supervision of Messrs. Emerson and Fehmer, architects, and Messrs. I. & H. M. Harmon, builders, of this city. The design is by the celebrated Liénard, Knight of the Legion of Honor, whose productions maintain a high rank as works of art wherever they are known. Its appropriateness, representing as it does marine subjects—dolphins, shells, etc.—and the fidelity with which the general idea is carried out in every part, even in the more minute details of ornamentation, can hardly fail to strike the most careless observer. The statuary is from the chisel of Mathurin Moreau, who received the grand prize of Rome, four medals, and the cross of the Legion of Honor. The four large figures at the base represent mythological subjects, viz., Neptune, Amphitrite, Acis, and Galatea. The children at the top are merely ornamental, and have no special signification. Neptune, god of the ocean, and brother of Great Jove, needs no biographical sketch to acquaint our readers with him, and his wife Amphitrite, beside him, asserts her dignity as goddess of the ocean so grandly that none need be told her story.

The figures of Acis and Galatea (shepherd and nymph), recall the story of their love and the jealousy of Polyphemus; how the giant, finding them together, became enraged and threw the fatal rock at Acis as he fled; and how Galatea, emerging from the water into which she had plunged in affright, ran to him and endowed him with the honors of his father the river god; how his purple blood flowed from under the rock which crushed him, but by degrees grew like turbid water, and in time became pellucid; and then the rock opened and the water gushed from the chasm with a pleasing murmur. Thus Acis was changed into a river of Galatea's own element and called by that name.

The original of this fountain was executed for the World's Fair, held at Paris in 1855, where it attracted much attention, and was awarded a gold medal. Since then copies of it, in iron, have been made for the cities of Lyons and Bordeaux; also one in bronze, like that on the Common, for Said Pacha, late Viceroy of Egypt. The one for Boston was cast in the foundry of Messrs. Fourment, Houille, & Co., in the Val d'Osne, and was finished in Paris under the direct supervision of the well-known American banking house of Messrs. Bowles, Drevet, & Co., who, from the commencement, have manifested the warmest interest in it, and have carefully watched every stage of its construction.

SHERIDAN ON THE MOVE.

The 15th of November was the day fixed upon by General Sheridan for his departure to the front, i. e., from Fort Hayes in Kansas to the south of the Arkansas, to take command in person of the operations of the winter campaign against the hostile savages. Company C of the Tenth United States Cavalry had been sent ahead, with the baggage train, etc., thus having one day's start of the Commanding General. The Indians who accompanied this column are a party of the Kansas or Kaw nation, who have always been friendly, and will be used as scouts and guides, as their familiarity with the physical features of the comparatively unexplored country which the troops will traverse eminently adapts them to that purpose. The names of these Indians are: Sam Sambo, an Indian speaking English, who will act as interpreter; Frank Johnson, Utes-ar-gah-be, Tah-e-ah, O-utes-ar-jah, Tah-se-ah, John Moon, B-ar-se-bah-se, Wy-o-nosh-in, and John De Lash.

The winter has been chosen as the best season for hostile operations, because it is a season when the savages are in the most embarrassing situation as regards supplies of every sort, and when they are most reluctant to undertake battle. The campaign is in good hands, and the same energy which distinguished General Sheridan at Fisher's Hill, Winchester, and Five Forks will, it is hoped, soon restore quiet to our Indian frontier in the Southwest.

The entire force in the field for this important campaign consists of Governor Crawford's Kansas cavalry, 1500 strong; seven companies of the Fifth Cavalry; eleven companies of the Seventh; four companies of the Tenth; one company of the Thirtieth Infantry (colored); and one of the Third Infantry (Forsyth's scouts)—amounting in all to about 3000 men. The plan is to attack the Indians in their winter-quarters, destroy their lodges and every thing they have, take away their arms, and force all those that escape slaughter to live on reservations below the Arkansas. The destination of the expedition will probably be Sand Plains, south of the Arkansas, making that point a base of supplies.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER III.

WITH MY FATHER.

At the time I speak of my father dwelt in a villa near Brussels, which had been built by or for Mdme. Malibran. It was a strange, somewhat incongruous edifice, and rather resembled a public building than a private gentleman's residence. It stood in a vast garden, or rather park, where fruit and forest trees abounded, and patches of flowers came suddenly into view in most unexpected places. There were carriage-drives, too, so ingeniously managed that the visitor could be led to believe the space ten times greater than it was in reality. The whole inside and out savored strongly of the theatre, and every device of good or bad taste—the latter largely predominating—had its inspiration in the stage.

As we drove under the arched entrance gate, over which a crowned leopard—the Norcott crest—was proudly rampant, I felt a strange throb at my heart that proved the old leaven was still alive within me, and that the feeling of being the son of a man of rank and fortune had a strong root in my heart.

From the deep reverence of the gorgeous porter, who wore an embroidered leather belt over his shoulder, to the trim propriety and order of the noiseless avenue, all bespoke an amount of state and grandeur that appealed very powerfully to me, and I can still recall how the bronze lamps that served to light the approach struck me as something wonderfully fine, as the morning's sun glanced on their crested tops.

The carriage drew up at the foot of a large flight of marble steps, which led to a terrace covered by a long veranda. Under the shade of this two gentlemen sat at breakfast, both unknown to me. "Whom have we here?" cried the elder, a fat, middle-aged man of coarse features and stern expression; "whom have we here?" The younger—conspicuous by a dressing-gown and cap that glittered with gold embroidery—looked lazily over the top of his newspaper, and said, "That boy of Norcott's, I take it; he was to arrive to-day."

This was the first time I heard an expression that my ears were soon to be well familiar to, and I can not tell how bitterly the words insulted me. "Who were they," I asked myself, "who, under my father's roof, could dare so to call me? and why was I not styled Sir Roger Norcott's son, and not thus disparagingly 'that boy of Norcott's?'"

I walked slowly up the steps among these men as defiantly as though there was a declared enmity between us, and was proceeding straight toward the door, when the elder called out "Holloa, youngster, come here and report yourself! You've just come, haven't you?"

"I have just come," said I, slowly, "but when I report myself it shall be to my father, Sir Roger Norcott."

"You got that, Hotham, and I must say you deserved it too," said the younger in a low tone, which my quick hearing, however, caught.

"Will you have some breakfast with us?" said the elder, with a faint laugh, as though he enjoyed the encounter.

"No, I thank you, Sir," said I, stiffly, and passed on into the house.

"Master Digby," said a smart little man in black, who for a moment or two puzzled me whether he was a guest or a servant, "may I show you to your room, Sir? Sir Roger is not up: he seldom rings for his bath before one o'clock; but he said he would have it to-day earlier."

"And what is your name, pray?"

"Nixon, Sir. Mr. Nixon, Sir Roger is pleased to call me for distinction sake—the lower servants require it."

"Tell me, then, Mr. Nixon, who are the two gentlemen I saw at breakfast outside?"

"The stoutish gentleman, Sir, is Captain Hotham, of the Royal Navy; the other, with the Turkish pipe, is Mr. Cleremont, Secretary to the Legation here. Great friends of Sir Roger's, Sir. Dine here three or four times a week, and have their rooms always kept for them."

The appearance of my room, into which Nixon now ushered me, went far to restore me to a condition of satisfaction. It was the most perfect little bedroom it is possible to imagine, and Nixon never wearied in doing the honors of displaying it.

"Here's your library, Sir. You've only to slide this mirror into the wall; and here are all your books. This press is your armory. Sir Roger gave the order himself for that breech-loader at Liége. This small closet has your bath—always ready, as you see, Sir—hot and cold; and that knob yonder commands the shower-bath. It smells fresh of paint here just now, Sir, for it was only finished on Saturday; and the men are coming to-day to fix a small iron staircase from your balcony down to the garden. Sir Roger said he was sure you would like it."

I was silent for a moment, a moment of exquisite reverie, and then I asked if there were always people visitors at the Villa?

"I may say, Sir, indeed, next to always. We haven't dined alone since March last."

"How many usually come to dinner?"

"Five or seven, Sir; always an odd number. Seldom more than seven, and never above eleven, except a state dinner to some great swell going through."

"No ladies, of course?"

"Pardon me, Sir. The Countess Vander Neeve dined here yesterday; Madame Van Straatan, and Mrs. Cleremont—excuse me, Sir, there's Sir Roger's bell. I must go and tell him you've arrived."

When Nixon left me I sat for full twenty minutes like one waking out of a trance, and asking myself how much was real, and how much fiction of all around me?

My eyes wandered over the room, and from the beautiful little Gothic clock on the mantlepiece to the gilded pine-apple from which my bed-curtains descended—every thing seemed of matchless beauty to me. Could I ever weary of admiring them? would they seem to me every morning as I awoke as tasteful and as elegant as now they appeared to me? Oh, if dear mamma could but see them! If she but knew with what honor I was received, would not the thought go far to assuage the grief our separation cost her? And, last of all, came the thought, if she herself were here to live with me, to read with me, to be my companion, as she used to be—could life offer any thing to compare with such happiness? And why should not this be? If papa really should love me, why might I not lead him to see to whom I owed all that made me worthy of his love?

"Breakfast is served, Sir, in the small breakfast-room," said a servant, respectfully.

"You must show me where that is," said I, rising to follow him.

And now we walked along a spacious corridor, and descended a splendid stair of white marble, with gilded balusters, and across an octagon hall, with a pyramid of flowering plants in the centre, and into a large gallery with armor on the walls, that I wished greatly to linger over and examine, and then into a billiard-room, and at last into the small breakfast-parlor, where a little table was laid out, and another servant stood in readiness to serve me.

"Mr. Eccles, Sir, will be down in a moment, if you'll be pleased to wait for him," said the man.

"And who is Mr. Eccles?" asked I.

"The gentleman as is to be your tutor, Sir, I believe," replied he, timidly; "and he said, perhaps you'd make the tea, Sir."

"All right," said I, opening the caddy, and proceeding to make myself at home at once. "What is here?"

"Deviled kidneys, Sir; and this is fried mackerel. Mr. Eccles takes oysters; but he won't have them opened till he's down. Here he is, Sir."

The door was now flung open, and a good-looking young man, with a glass stuck in one eye, entered, and with a cheery, but somewhat affected voice, called out—

"Glad to see you, Digby my boy; hope I have not starved you out waiting for me?"

"I'm very hungry, Sir, but not quite starved out," said I, half amazed at the style of man selected to be my guide, and whose age at most could not be above three or four and twenty.

"You haven't seen your father yet, of course, nor won't these two hours. Yes, Gilbert, let us have the oysters. I always begin with oysters and a glass of sauterne; and let me tell you, your father's sauterne is excellent. Not that I counsel you, however, to start with wine at breakfast. I haven't told you that I'm to be your tutor," said he, filling his glass; "and here's to our future fellowship."

I smiled and sipped my tea to acknowledge the toast, and he went on:

"You mustn't be afraid that I'll lean too heavily on you, Digby—at least at first. My system is, never make education a punishment. There's nothing that a gentleman—mind, I say a gentleman—ought to know that he can not acquire as easily and as pleasantly as he does field-sports. If a man has to live by his wits, he must drudge; there's no help for it. And—but here come the oysters. Ain't they magnificent? Let me give you one piece of instruction while the occasion serves: let no one ever persuade you that Colchester oysters equal the Ostend. They have neither the plumpness nor the juiciness, and still less have they that fresh odor of the sea that gives such zest to appetite. One of these days I shall ask you what Horace says of oysters, and where. You never heard of Horace—eh?"

"Yes, Sir; I was reading the Odes when I came away."

"And with whom, pray?"

"With mamma, Sir."

"And do you mean to say mamma knew Latin?"

"Yes, Sir; she learned it to teach me. She worked far harder than I did, and I could never come up with her."

"Ah, yes, I see; but all that sort of learning—that irregular study—is a thing to be grubbed up. If I were to be frank with you, Digby, I'd say I'd rather have you in total ignorance than with that smattering of knowledge a mamma's teaching is sure to imply. What had you read before Horace?"

"Cæsar's Commentaries, Sir, an Æneid of Virgil, two plays of Terence—"

"Any Greek?—any thing of Euripides or Aristophanes, eh?" asked he, mockingly.

"No, Sir; we were to begin the New Testament after the holidays; for I had just gone over the grammar twice."

"With mamma, of course?"

"Yes, Sir."

He helped himself to a cutlet, and as he poured the Harvey sauce over it it was plain to see that he was not thinking of what was before him, but employed in another and different direction. After a considerable pause he turned his eyes full upon me, and with a tone of far more serious import than he had yet used, said, "We're not very long acquainted, Digby, but I have a trick of reading people through their faces, and I feel I can trust you." He waited for some remark from me, but I made none, and he went on, "With an ordinary boy of your age—indeed, I might go farther and say with any other boy—I'd not venture on the confidence I am now about to make; but a certain instinct tells me I run no danger in trusting you."

"Is it a secret, Sir?"

"Well, in one sense it is a secret; but why do you ask?"

"Because mamma told me to avoid secrets; to have none of my own, and know as little as I could of other people's."

"An excellent rule in general, but there are cases where it will not apply: this is one of them, for here the secret touches your own family. You are aware that papa and mamma do not live together? Don't flush up, Digby; I'm not going to say one word that could hurt you. It is for your benefit—I might say for your absolute safety—that I speak now. Your father has one of the noblest natures a man ever possessed; he is a prince in generosity, and the very soul of honor, and, except pride, I don't believe he has a fault. This same pride, however, leads him to fancy he can never do wrong; indeed, he does not admit that he ever made a mistake in his life, and, consequently, he does not readily forgive those to whom he imputes any disasters that befall him. Your mother's family are included in this condemned list—I can't exactly say why; and for the same reason, or no reason, your mother herself. You must therefore take especial care that you never speak of one of these people."

"And mamma?"

"Her name least of all. There may come a time—indeed, it is sure to come—when this difficulty can be got over; but any imprudence now—the smallest mistake—would destroy this chance. Of course it's very hard on you, my poor fellow, to be debarred from the very theme you'd like best to dwell on; but when you know the danger—not merely danger, but the positive certainty of mischief—a chance word might bring about, I read you very ill, or you'll profit by my warning."

I bent my head to mean assent, but I could not speak.

"Papa will question you whether you have been to school, and what books you are reading, and your answer will be 'Never at school; had all my lessons at home.' Not a word more, mind that, Digby. Say it now after me, that I may see if you can be exact to a syllable."

I repeated the words correctly, and he patted me affectionately on the shoulder, and said—

"You and I are sure to get on well together. When I meet with a boy, who, besides being intelligent, is a born gentleman, I never hesitate about treating him as my equal, save in that knowledge of life I'm quite ready to share with him. I don't want to be a Pope with my pupil, and say, 'You are not to do this, or think that,' and give no reason why. You'll always find me ready to discuss with you, and talk over, any thing that puzzles you. I was not treated in that fashion myself, and I know well what the repressive system has cost me. You follow me, don't you, in what I say?"

"Yes, Sir; I think I understand it all."

Whether I looked as if my words had more meaning than they expressed, or that some sort of misgiving was working within him that he had been hasty in his confidence, I know not; but he arose suddenly, and said, "I must go and get a cigarette." And with that he left me.

CHAPTER IV.

THE VILLA MALIBRAN.

For some hours I wandered over the house, admiring the pictures, and the bronzes, and the statuettes, and the hundreds of odd nick-nacks of taste or curiosity that filled the salons. The treasures of art were all new to me, and I thought I could never weary of gazing on some grand landscape by Both, or one of those little interiors of Dutch life by Ostade or Mieris. It seemed to me the very summit of luxury, that all these glorious objects should be there, awaiting, as it were, the eye of him who owned them, patient slaves of his pleasure, to be rewarded by, perhaps, a hurried glance as he passed. The tempered light, the noiseless footsteps, as one trod the triple-piled carpet, the odor of rich flowers every where, imparted a dreaminess to the sense of enjoyment, that, after long, long years, I can recall and almost revive by an effort of memory.

I met no one as I loitered through the rooms, for I was in a part of the house only opened on great occasions, or for large receptions; and so I strayed on, lost in wonderment at the extent and splendor of a scene which, to my untutored senses, seemed of an actually royal magnificence. Having reached what I believed to be the limit of the suite of rooms, I was about to retrace my steps, when I saw that a small octagon tower opened from an angle of the room, though no apparent doorway led into it. This puzzle interested me at once, and I set about to resolve it, if I might. I opened one of the windows to inspect the tower on the outside, and saw that no stairs led up to it, nor any apparent communication existed with the rest of the house. I bethought me of the sliding mirror which in my own room concealed the book-case, and set to work to see if some similar contrivance had not been employed here; but I searched in vain. Defeated and disappointed, I was turning away, when, passing my hand along the margin of a massive picture-frame, I touched a small button; and as I did so, with a faint sound like a wail, the picture moved slowly, like an opening door, and disclosed the interior of the tower. I entered at once, my curiosity now raised to a point of intensity to know what had been so carefully and cunningly guarded from public view. What a blank disappointment was mine! The little room, about nine or ten feet in diameter, contained but a few straw-bottomed chairs, and a painted table on which a tea-service of common blue-ware stood. A Dutch clock was on a bracket at one side of the window, and a stuffed bird —a grouse, I believe—occupied another. A straight-backed old sofa, covered with a vulgar chintz, stood against the wall; a worn book, with a broken fan in the leaves, to mark the place, lay on the sofa. The book was Paul and Virginia. A common sheet almanac was nailed against the wall, but over the printed columns of the months a piece of white paper was pasted, on which, in large letters, was written, "June 11, 18—. Dies infausta." I started. I had read that date once before in my mother's prayer-book, and had learned it was her marriage-day. As a ray of sunlight displays in an instant every object within its beam, it at once saw the meaning of every detail around me. These were the humble accessories of that modest home from which my dear mother was taken: these were the grim reminders of a time my father could not to perpetuate as an undying sorrow. I trembled to think what a nature I should soon be confronted with, and how terrible must be the temper of a man whose resentments asked for such ailment to maintain them! I stole away abashed at my own thoughtlessness, and feeling that I was rightfully punished by the misery that overwhelmed me. How differently now did all the splendor appear to me as I traced my steps! how dastardly I seized on that magnificence which seemed to insult the poverty I had just quitted!

What a contrast to the nurtured spitefulness of his conduct was my poor mother's careful preservation of a picture representing the father in his uniform. A badly painted thing it was, but with enough of likeness to recall him. And as such, a picture of neglect, all its usage, and insult, she preserved it—a memorial, not of happier days, but of a time when she dreamed of happiness to come. While I was thus thinking, seeking in my mind comparisons between them, which certainly redounded but little to his credit, Nixon came up to me, and said, "Oh, Master Digby, we've been looking for you in every direction. Sir Roger has asked over and over why you have not been to see him, and I'm afraid you'll find him displeased at your delay."

"I'm ready now," said I, dryly, and followed him.

My father was in his study, lying on a sofa, and reading the leaves of a new book as I entered; and he did not interrupt the operation to offer me his hand.

"So, Sir," said he, calmly, and coldly, "you have taken your time to present yourself to me? Apparently you preferred making acquaintance with the house and the grounds."

"I am very sorry, Sir," I began; "but I did not know you had risen. Nixon told me about one or two—"

"Indeed! I was not aware that you and Mr. Nixon had been discussing my habits. Come nearer; near stiff. What sort of dress is that? Is it a smock-frock you have on?"

"No, Sir. It's a blouse to keep my jacket clean. I have got but one."

"And these shoes; are they your own making?"

"No, Sir. I couldn't make even as good as these."

"You are a very poor-looking object, I must say. What was Antoine about that he didn't at least make you look like a gentleman, eh? Can you answer me that?"

"No, Sir, I can not."

"Nor I either," said he, sighing. "Have you been equally neglected inside as out? Have you learned to read?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And to write?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Write my name, then, there, on that piece of paper, and let me see it."

I drew nigh, and wrote in a full, bold hand, Roger Norcott.

"Why not Sir Roger Norcott, boy? Why not give me my name and title too?"

"You said your name, Sir, and I thought—"

"No matter what you thought. This Lilliputian comes of home-breeding," muttered he to himself: "they are made truthful at the price of being vulgar. What do you know besides reading and writing?"

"A little Latin, Sir, and some French, and some German, and three books of Euclid, and the Greek grammar—"

"There, there, that's more than enough. It will tax your tutor's ingenuity to rub up all this rubbish, and prepare the soil for real acquirement. I was hoping I should see you a savage; a fresh, strong-natured, impulsive savage! What I'm to do with you, with your little peddling knowledge of a score of things, I can't imagine. I'd swear you can neither ride, row, nor direct never handled a cricket-ball or a single-stick?"

"Quite true, Sir; but I'd like to do every one of them."

"Of course you have been taught music?"

"Yes, Sir: the piano and a little singing."

"That completes it," cried he, flinging his book from him. "They've been preparing you for a traveling circus, while I wanted to make you a gentleman. Mind me now, Sir, and don't expect that I ever repeat my orders to any one. What I say once I mean to be observed. Let your past life be entirely forgotten by you—a thing that had no reality; begin from this day —from this very room—a new existence, which is to have neither link nor tie to what has gone before it. The persons you will see here, their ways, their manners, their tone, will be examples for your imitation; copy them, servilely, nor indiscriminately, but as you will find how their traits will blend with your own nature. Never tell an untruth, never accept an insult without redress, be slow about forming friendships, and be very sure you have thoroughly. That's enough for the present. Ask Mr. Eccles to have the kindness to take you to his tailor and order some clothes. You must dine alone till you are sensibly dressed. After that you shall come to my table. One thing more and you may go: don't approach me with tales or complaints of any one; right yourself where you can, and where you can not, bear your grievance silently. You can change nothing, utter nothing here; you are a guest, but a guest over whom I exercise full control. If you understand me it will be well for you; if not, you understand me still and can little to tell you so. Go, Go now." He motioned me to the door, and I left it, straight to my room I went, and sat down at once to write it all to mother. My heart swelled with indignation at the way I had been received, and a hundred times over did I say to myself, that then was no poverty, no hardship I would not face rather than live in the midst of splendor on such ignominious terms. Oh, if I could but get back again to the little home I had quitted, how I would bless the fate that restored me to liberty and self-respect! As I wrote my indignation warmed with every line. I found that my passion was actually mastering me, and I desisted to know that such a source of interest lay so near to me.

"Isn't he one of your Mexicans, George?" asked Captain Hotham.

"No, Sir, he's a Hungarian-bred'un. Master calls him a Jucker, whatever that is."

"Flower of action, eh, Eccles?"

"A little too much, Sir; that's his fault. He's a-comin' now, and it's all they can do to hold him. Steady, you devil! Steady! Take this one back," said he to the groom, who was ringing a heavy-shouldered, ungainly colt in the ring.

"You'll not gain much credit by that animal, George," said Cleremont, as he lighted a cigar.

"He ain't a beauty, Sir; he's low before, and he's cow-hocked behind; but Sir Roger says he's the best blood in Norfolk. Take that, take that, take care, Sir! the skittish devil never knows where he'll next fling his hind-legs. Steady, Tom, don't check him: why, he's sweating as if he had been round the two-mile course."

The animosity for this criticism was a dark chestnut, but so bathed in sweat as to appear almost black. He was one of those crosses—Arab and the Arab and the western blood, that gain all the beauty of head and crest and straightly-formed croup, and yet have length of body and power of limb peculiar to the pure Arab. To my thinking he was the most perfect creature I had ever seen, and as he bounded and plunged, there was a suppleness and pliancy about him indescribably beautiful.

George now unloosened the long reins which were attached to the bridoon surcingle, and after walking the animal two or three times round the circle, suffered him to go free. As if astonished at his liberty, the young creature stood still for a minute or two, and sniffed the air, and then, gave one wild bound and headlong plunge, as though he were going straight into the earth; after which he looked timidly about him, and then walked slowly along in the track worn by the others.

"He's far quieter than the last time I saw him," said Hotham.

"He's gettin' more sense every day, Sir," replied George; "he don't scratch his head with his hind-leg now, Sir, and he don't throw himself any neither."

"He hasn't given up biting, I see," said Cleremont.

"No, Sir; and they tell me them breed never does: but it's only play, Sir."

"I'll give you six months before you can call him fit to ride, George."

"My name ain't Spunner, Sir, if the young gent as come to-day don't back him in six weeks' time."

"And is it for the boy Norcott intends him?" asked Cleremont of Hotham.

"So he told me yesterday; and though I warned him that he hadn't another boy if that fellow should come to grief, he only said, 'If he got my blood in him, he'll keep his saddle; and if he hasn't, he had better make room for another.'"

"And he a-going beautiful now?" cried George, as the animal swung slowly along at a gentle trot, every step of which was as measured as a clock-work.

"You'll have to teach the youngster also, George," said Hotham. "I'm sure he never backed a horse in his life."

"Nay, Sir, he rode very pretty indeed when he was six years old. I didn't put him on a steady, or one of the hard-mouthed 'uns, but a nice little lively French mare, that reared up the moment he bore hand on her bit; so that he learned to sit on her mouth without holdin' on by the bridle."

"He's a loutish boy," said Cleremont to the captain. "I'll wager what you like they'll not make a horseman of him."

"Eccles says he's a confounded pedant," said the other; "that he wanted to cap Horace with him at breakfast."

"Poor Bob! that wasn't exactly his line; but he'd had his own in Balzac or Eroi Soulié."

"Oh, now I see what Norcott was driving at, when he said, 'I wanted the stuff to make a gentleman, and they've sent me the germ of a school-usher.' I said, 'Send him to sea with me. I shall be afloat in March, and I'll take him.'"

"Well, what answer did he make you?"

"It wasn't a civil one," said the other, gruffly.

"He said, 'You misapprehend me, Hotham. A sea-captain is only a boatswain in epaulets. I mean the boy to be a gentleman.'"

"And you bore that?"

"Yes. Just as well as you bore his telling you at dinner on Sunday last that a Legation secretary was a cross between an old lady and a clerk in the Customs."

"A man who scatters impertinences broadcast is only known for the merits of his cook or his cellar."

"Both of which are excellent."

"Shall I send him in, Sir?" asked George, as he patted the young horse and caressed him.

"Well, Sir," cried Hotham, as the tutor lounged lazily up, "what do you say to the mount they're going to put your pupil on?"

"I will say they'd wait a bit. I shall not be ready for orders till next spring, and I'd rather they'd not break his neck before February or March."

"Has Norcott promised you the presentation, Bob?"

"No. He can't make up his mind whether he'll give it to me or to a Plymouth brother, or to that fellow that was taken up at Salford for blasphemy, and who happens to be in full orders."

"With all his enmity to the Established Church, I think he might be satisfied with you," said Cleremont.

"Very neat, and very polite, too," said Eccles; "but then this is the Palace of Truth I might feel nettled."

"Is it, by Jove?" cried Hotham. "Then it must be in the summer months, when the house is shut up. Who has got a strong cigar? these Cubans of Norcott's have no flavor. It must be close to Lucifer-matches."

"I can't join you, for I've to go into town, and get my young bear trimmed, and his nails cut. 'Make him presentable,' Norcott said, and I've had easier tasks to do."

So saying, Eccles moved off in one direction, while Hotham and Cleremont strolled away in another; and I was left to my own reflections, which were not few.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SHARP-PRACTICE—Shaving.

A CITY EPIGRAM.

Said Tom to Dick, "I'm strange to see How few new companies there be!"
Said Dick to Tom, "You might have known
All bubble companies are blown."

An Irishman, who lives with a Grahamite, writes to a friend that, if he wants to know what "illiquid living" is, he must come to his house, where the breakfast consists of nothing, and the supper of what was left at breakfast.

NOT THE BIRD FOR A SAILOR.—A right-in-gale.

A "TITANIC" SITUATION.—A seat on the bench.

A small child being asked by a Sunday-school teacher, "What did the Israelites do after they had crossed the Red Sea?" answered, "I don't know, ma'am, but I guess they dried themselves."

THE LATEST THING OUT.—The gas, when it is turned off, and every body has gone to bed.

THE "LATEST" SONG OUT.—"We won't go home till morning."

A DISCHARGE WITHOUT A REPORT.—A servant dismissed without a character.

A man from the country was accosted by a juvenile Chicago polisher of begrimed understandings with the usual question:

"Black your boots, Sir?"

"No."

"Black 'em for five cents?"

"No."

"I'll do 'em for nothing?"

"All right."

The young hopeful set about his work with great relish, and soon had one boot in high, shining condition. Then, turning up his face to the stranger, he observed:

"Now, you'll have to give me a quarter to do the other."

That boy will yet be somebody.

A LESSON ON PHYSICS.

You see her in the merry dance—
She seems to fly,
But you don't see that rapid glance
From one bright eye
Flash through the long and crowded room
That only sees that glance to whom
It brings extreme felicity:
That's electricity!

They dance together, full of grace,
She clings so close;
And on his shoulder rests her face—
A blushing rose!
Life in that home seems doubly sweet,
They say, through a rosy prism:
Their bonds are bright, and none need meet:
That's potentism!

The night has come to him, but still
No sleep has brought:
To her, though quite against his will,
Flies every thought!
In vain a struggle with fate:
In vain is all each heroism:
Too powerfully she attracts;
That's magnetism!

TAILORS DEFENDED.

A tailor possesses the qualities of nine men combined in one, as will be seen by the following observations:

1. As an economist, he eats his cost according to his cloth.

2. As a gardener, he is careful of his cabbage.

3. As a sailor, he shears off wherever it is proper.

4. As a playwright, he often breathes a fine bodkin.

5. As a lawyer, he attends many suits.

6. As an executioner, he provides suspenders or gallowses for many patients.

7. As a cook, he is generally furnished with a warm goose.

8. As a sheriff's officer, he does much at spunging.

9. As a rational and scriptural divine, he great aim is to form good habits, for the benefit of himself and others.

An old bachelor, possessed of a fortune of $50,000, meeting a friend one day, began to harangue him very learnedly upon the detestable sin of avarice, and gave the following instance of it: "About three years ago," said he, "by a very odd accident I fell into a well, and was absolutely within a very few minutes of perishing before I could prevail upon a heedless and grasping dog of a laborer, who happened to be within hearing of my cries, to help me out for a shilling. The fellow was so rapacious as to insist upon having twenty-five cents, for about a quarter of an hour, and I verily believe he would not have abated me a single farthing if he had not seen me at the last grasp, and I determined rather to die than to submit to his extortion."

EQUAL TO THE OCCASION.

FIRST CITIZEN. "Hullo! General, why what on Airth are you a-doin' of in that there Flour-Bar?"

SECOND CITIZEN. "Wa'al, some darned Skunk has been and Stole my Clothes when I was Bathing; but I guess I'll get home very comfortable in this!"

JUDGMENT WANTED.

By ANNIE THOMAS.

I was antipathetic to her at first, in spite of the beauty of her face and form, which no man could deny, and in spite of a deft gibbness with her tongue which some men would have appreciated. I was decidedly antipathetic to her, for I thought my aged friend Mr. Wallerond might have done many more efficacious things, when he was bent on bargaining for happiness for the few last years of his life, than marrying this pretty young woman, who had neither connections nor money to bring to the strengthening of the firm of Wallerond, Driver, Coxe, & Co., of which my old friend was the head.

I was going to call him my "esteemed old friend;" but having resolved upon being very circumspect in all respects save the suppression of real names in this history, I find myself compelled to leave out the word "esteemed" in describing my own sentiments and feelings toward Mr. Wallerond. I did not esteem him, though I liked staying at his splendid house, and enjoyed drinking his splendid wines, and was in fact thoroughly alive to all the advantages to be derived from having the freedom of his menage. Still I did not esteem him. He had been what I—who had once hoped he would leave me a large slice of his fortune—deemed culpably weak in marrying Catherine Hawes, the present Mrs. Wallerond. He was not culpably weak in looking out the brilliant prospects which he did hold out to the two young men his partners, Messrs. Driver and Coxe. Undignified and unlike people who have been deceived into thinking these promises of good provision for them in the future the outpourings of an overflowing generosity, were better, and attributed them to that same weakness which had made him marry Catherine Hawes because she was poor and pretty, and there was no one to look after her.

Mr. Wallerond had himself built the house in which the lived, near the big commercial town of which he was a merchant-prince; and after his marriage his wife had named it Wallerond Court. It was a very fine place, and was a more pretentiousness about the name than there was about the place itself. There were finely-proportioned reception-rooms, with conservatories, grape-houses, and orangeries, magnificent walled gardens, and unexceptionable stables. And the promoted Catherine Hawes—who had fallen from Heaven knows where, Heaven knows how —presided over all these things well.

She was just the type of woman who requires a certain amount of pomp and glory in her surroundings to set off and show her properly—a young, handsome, florid, bright-complexioned brunette, with a pair of the largest, softest, darkest eyes I ever saw in any woman's head. She always looked strong, and full of that kind of vigor; but she also looked unscrupulous at times, and that, I thought, at others, and—well, on the whole I did not like her as the mistress of a reputable English mansion.

Whether she had come from, or whatever she had been, Wallerond Court, and the society round about Wallerond Court, was not enough for her ambition. She was always urging her husband to sell out of the business, and go and live in or near London. But he liked the business, and clung to it; and his beautiful Cleopatra-like wife could not mould her Antony to her wishes in this respect. In spite of my want of sympathy with her generally, and my dislike of my not liking her so well as her constant kindness to me ought to have made me like her, I did side with her desire to get me away from her when I saw the best people she had been able to collect for a dinner-party on the occasion of my last visit to Wallerond Court.

I have said that she was always very kind and attentive to me, and as she was a clever woman, one who had been in good society, and a beautiful object to look at into the bargain, I was not sorry when fate condemned me to spend several hours with her, on one day, in the late fall of October, fine weather, bright and sunny out of doors, and still just cool enough to make a wood-fire in the drawing-room very pleasant company.

I was sitting by this fire about eleven o'clock in the morning, when Mrs. Wallerond came in with her writing-desk across on, and said that by no. Very well indeed she looked in her walking-dress, a pretty gray dress and jacket trimmed with ermine, an ermine hood had just been put on the top of her rich brown hair, and an ermine muff lay on her knee.

"I pity you for being kept from shooting today by that," she said, glancing at my right hand, which had been a good deal hurt the day before in a rencontre with a bull; "I am going out to walk to warm myself. Will you come, Mr. Bigwood?"

I rose up gladly to accompany her, saying, "But is it possible you feel cold this bright morning?"

"Yes, I do; quite chilled. See, I have taken up my furs; I had no sleep last night; worry and restlessness stop my pulses, and make me cold."

I regretted both the cause and the effect.

"I am worried," she said, walking on very fast as soon as we got outside the house. "I am heartburned nearly out of such mind as I was originally endowed with. If you hear of my sudden death, attribute it to Driver and Coxe."

"How they been doing any thing to annoy you?" I asked.

"They annoy me by existing—by existing within my orbit, that is. They annoy me by their exemplary attention to business, by their social spotlessness, and by all their other good qualities which endear them to my husband; they annoy me particularly to-day by coming here to dinner," she stopped, and the cause acted to her utterance, but she hastily brushed them away and went on. "Life has been made up to me lately of Driver and Coxe dining here, and they never dine here but Mr. Wallerond tells them how well the wine will final be has taken care of them when he is called from the stage of life. That is his expression; he doesn't regard, or at any rate he doesn't *suffer*ently regard, what is to become of me when he is called from the stage of life, after having used me to all this."

It was very awkward. I hardly knew what to say to her, because really, from her point of view, there was great justice in what she said. I felt this, though at the same time I knew that Mr. Wallerond had been in the habit of promising a good provision to his young partners from the time of his having seen them, boys, into his office. Feeling this, I said:

"But there is no doubt, there can be no reasonable doubt, that Mr. Wallerond will be found to have provided amply for you."

The remark roused her impatience; she did not betray that it had done so as long as we are to do in fiction by stamping her foot, but she showed it in the genuine way in which people do show it in real life. She looked as if she thought me a fool.

"Provided amply for me! I shall feel every thing that is curtailed doubly when I know that I am deprived in order that Messrs. Driver and Coxe may be enriched. You haven't seen those men out of the business yet, Mr. Bigwood; you see them at my table to-night, and sitting about on chairs in their own vulgar way in my drawing-room after dinner, and you don't think you are surprised at my despising and detesting Driver beyond any one else in the world, and disliking Coxe still more."

"It must be very annoying to you," I said, deprecatingly.

"Annoying to me! It is that. My own people (I have people of my own, though for many reasons they never appear on the surface) thought it no sacrifice when I gave up a splendid life in prospect of happiness and married for splendor. And had the splendor for three years, and I shall feel myself grossly defrauded when I lose any of it."

"Mr. Wallerond has told me and to amuse such wealth," I said, in a consolatory way.

"He has, indeed, poor dear old man!" she said, heartily, "and with all my heart and strength I trust he will live long to enjoy it. His life is a valuable one to me."

We walked along over the rustling autumn leaves in silence for some time after she had said this, then she resumed, abruptly:

"I tolerated those abominations (my husband's own expression) for a long time, because I had a plan which I have never been permitted to mature—of marrying two of my most stupid girls to them."

"Have you two sisters?" I asked.

"Two! I have nine!" she answered, scornfully. "Fancy starting a family in order to having nine sisters and being poor produces. When I married I made a vow that I would never be so utter my husband's relations as I am me heartless; but I know I am sensible. I had enough of them at home; still, if I could have married off two of them I should have felt easier in it. However, that plan broke down. Driver and Coxe are both going to marry two fat-faced girls, and it's to keep them and their progeny in luxury and comfort that I am to be shorn."

Mrs. Wallerond turned round as she said this, and we walked home without a word more being said about the obnoxious topic. Need it be said after this that I expected a cold home very much more than I had enjoyed the visit to? Mrs. Wallerond recovered her temper, and spoke with delicious frankness of her friends and foibles and follies of her neighbors; and as her neighbors were no friends of mine it would have been hypocritical, as well as hypocritical, had I professed to be offended at her openness.

"They are all dull people here," she said. "The men—as commercial men, no doubt—keep up in politics (home politics principally) very well indeed; and they are clear and sharp-sighted about commercial events, and about each other's them. But the women: it baffles me to tell you how mindless and tongueless they are before their lords and masters. Mr. Bigwood, do you may go to many houses here where the table appointments and the dinners and the wines are faultless, and where the conversation is, to save her life, answer a question that did not concern her nursery or her cook. You doubt me now, but ere you have been long in this house and don't forget to pity me when I retire with the squaws."

When we reached the house she just took her hat off in the drawing-room, and sat singing to me until luncheon was announced. She had a striking voice, and she sang striking songs; none of Claribel's sweet, tender prettinesses, but pulses thrilling ballads called "Clear and Cool," and "The Lord's Last Night Out," and I sat down and ed to and looked at her, I did not at all regret the accident which had caused me to give up my day's shooting. For once in my life I completely understood for having missed a capital preserve an a perfect piece of pointers.

"Better be here each golden ent!

On the brow of that fair Hibernian girl," she sang, repeating two lines of the last-named song as she turned from the piano. "Ay de me, the Irish King wouldn't have cut his Rose of the Isles short in order to enrich a Driver and a Coxe, after telling her at the altar that 'with all his worldly goods he her endowed,' would he, Mr. Dysart?"

I replied that I really couldn't undertake to say how the monarch in question would have conducted himself under the circumstances. And then Mrs. Wallerond staggered me by asking,

"But, judging by yourself, how would you act?"

"I should do whatever you wished me," I said, hurriedly and unguardedly, and I have had

Mrs. Wallerond was making the natural and feminine mistake of attributing my transient admiration to a deeper feeling. She blushed brightly through her pomegranate-head, charmingly-rounded cheeks, and then changed the conversation abruptly.

"Do mark those men at dinner," she said, laughingly. "See how the bagman crops up in all the talk do and say; they jerk their thumbs in the direction of their wives' want, and ask the butler in his endeavors to give them the wine they like best to be winking appreciative at him; and Coxe drops his h's rather; I am inclined to believe an h never came near him to be dropped."

So she went on, in a humorous vein, dismissing speaking fiercely on the subject of their influence over her husband, sometimes contenting herself with ejaculating that Driver's sharp wives and her woman's tongue, which her woman's wit well whetted on this occasion.

The dinner was very good, Mr. Wallerond, am free to confess, in spite of all that has happened since to make the confession a painful one, that I have never been pleasantly for such a long time one of a very different order to the "tongueless, mindless" women whom she had described as constituting her present social feminine circle. She had read a good deal, and thought a good deal, and mixed with various people. I began to feel like a conversation-bore because she didn't glowing, sparkling beauty which she did undoubtedly possess—even without this she would have been a very handsome woman. Perhaps my appreciation of her was heightened by her appreciation of me. Perhaps it was pleasant to my self-love to be singled out as an important one, because of thought on such things, as this lovely woman did recognize me when she was laughing at the inferiority of others to herself. Whatever it was, it caused me to have a delightful day alone with Mrs. Wallerond.

My hour came home about six, and grew earnest with his butler about his wine directly. Whatever the occasion of this dinner, he evidently desired to make it important one. He spoke to Mrs. Wallerond, still lounging by the fire in her walking-dress. "My dear Kate," he said, "are you aware that Driver is slippery sort?"

"We dine at eight—I don't take two hours to dress," she said, curtly. However, she got up and left the room, and I saw her no more till I went into the drawing-room just as dinner was announced.

Mrs. Wallerond really looked magnificent enough to be justified in any number of great expectations which she might have formed, however unreasonable they might appear to people who are not won by beauty. She carried out the "one-colored" artistic idea charmingly in her toilet. Crimson velvet about her neck and arms—royal-looking pearls they were too—and a double string of them hooked up some lace which was arranged over and round her head, over her inimitable shoulders and train. All the color and relief that was given to the silver shade of her complexion and by her flashing eyes and rich dark brown hair, and the clear, glorious crimson that kept mantling up into her face. Old Mr. Wallerond was very proud of his superb wife that night—proud of her beauty, and of the way he enabled her to set off that beauty. And I will be ungallant enough to say that she paid all the women, and made them look the pale, uninteresting creatures they were, even in the eyes of their own husbands, when no one glance at her entered, and then her gaze went like lightning round the room, as if she was bidding me observe that fact, and she had to confess that in the present, and these were the men for whom she was to be shorn in the future. I read her thoughts, and I believe it, my own lighted on Mr. Driver and Mr. Coxe.

The former was a plump, liquid-eyed, amiable-looking man, with a full face and a small nose and fat hands. He wore a great deal of waistcoat and embroidered shirt-front, and seemed to feel great personal positiveness. The other was a little thin-faced fellow, with straggling hair and whiskers of the same gingery hue. The young ladies to whom they were respectively to be allied were seated near them, giggling a good deal whenever they looked at each other, and entirely engrossed in themselves and each other. I found in their inexpressive looks toward their future husbands. There were additionally four or five more young ladies and women at table, and alike that nothing of them need be traced here, and a small army of young men who had strengthened themselves for the part of the ordeal by coming primed with the latest theatricals.

By and by we rejoined the ladies, and she was inclined her head toward me and murmured:

"Mr. Dysart, you are to take me in," and though I regretted this as my right only, I being of a higher order than these men of money, still there was something in her cool way of putting me, they appointed to be the fore, that made me flush. Could it be that I was falling in love with my beautiful antipathy, and she with me? I trembled as I felt guilty.

We went into dinner, and good as it was I need not dwell upon it long here. The viands were admirably cooked, perfect, the wine worth speaking about (and a great deal was spoken on about it), and the women were speechless. Mrs. Wallerond did not put her impressibility-of-itself out in the endeavor to entertain them. She kept on leading me to look at the many solecisms which were perpetrated by Mr. Driver and Mr. Coxe. This she did intentionally; what she did unintentionally was to lead me to look at the anxiety she could not conceal when the wine went round freely, and Mr. Wallerond drank freely of it. I remembered what she had said about his life being valuable to her, and I gathered from her anxiety that wine was not good for him.

By and by it transpired, I don't know how exactly, that this was a celebration dinner. It was in honor of the recently-ratified engagements and the speedily-approaching marriage, of Mr. Coxe with one of the undesirable young ladies at the table. Mr. Wallerond spoke of the event with emotion. The gist of his observations was to the effect that he should make it his care that his young friends should not be in their own house days have to struggle to make two ends meet. He spoke exhaustingly in which the first Mr. Wallerond and himself had been compelled to struggle. This was the marrow and fatness of a vast amount of effusive and enthusiastic talk. Mr. Coxe tried to look as if he only expected a small legacy; and only succeeded in making every ginger-colored hair on his head and face express his firm belief in having a large fortune. And Mr. Driver tried not to look sulky at these allusions to the public demonstration in his honor the day, and failed in his attempt as strongly as his junior partner.

Then in time Wallerond swept the ladies away before her. In time the sitting over the wine, and the even dreamier time in the drawing-room, when I was left to myself. I went to bed tired with the dinner and the guests, and with the wine in my head, which was beginning to develop signs of inflammation in my left hand, and prevent my going out shooting the following day. Mrs. Wallerond, or some one else, had arranged a cozy old bachelor's room for me in the wing of the house. Here I lost the thread utterly, and must have fallen asleep.

For how long I do not know. I was roused up by an ejaculation of terror, and by the burning open of my door. My lamp was burning dimly; still the light I made out a tall white figure of the intruder, and recognized Mrs. Wallerond.

"Get up at once!" she shouted; "my husband is dying. I've roused the house. Come quickly!"

I followed her without delay as she turned and fled through the corridor and the second suite of frightened servants who had been roused as I went in. Mr. Wallerond, supported by the old butler, was sitting up.

"Send for doctors," I said, as I walked up and put my hand on his heart. Then I knew that the doctors could be of no avail, let them come when they would. Mr. Wallerond was dead.

Her grief was supreme. It was not only the loss of a husband who had been generous and kind to her that she mourned, but the loss of all of the wealth and luxury she loved which needs attracted her to him. Wallerond had died in a fit suddenly—a fit that had been brought on by overexcitement, they said; but one of the medical men told me privately that "it was the port-wine did it."

I saw her the next day, and perceived that she was burned up with fever and anxiety.

"He made a will yesterday," she began; "and his own lawyer saw that it was properly witnessed. He would draw it up himself. How has he left things, do you know?" Oh, I knew! Oh, I wish I had routed those wretches, those wives, those wretches, from their place in his liking while the time was in my power.

She was not a woman to be consoled by confidences or by æsthetic talk. Knowing this, I did not attempt either. She only needed her to large herself tired, which she shortly did. I left her sobbing bitterly among the sofa-cushions, declaring that "I'll never forgive myself having if he had done as he often said he would, a pot pie temptation in a woman's path by leaving too much wealth in the way."

I did not see her again for a few days. When we met, I was enchanted to find how much better and calmer she appeared. "I have spent several hours daily in the room by my husband's dead body, Mr. Dysart," she said, solemnly; "and I believe I've got a notion of a happier woman for having done so." But even as she avowed herself to be a better and a happier woman, she shuddered and trembled, and I thought it possible the brilliant-faced Mrs. Wallerond could ever look.

I gathered from other sources that "she and her fancies, poor bereft creature," about the coffin, had insisted upon there being a large, luminous cross let into the top of it; and she had declared that it should not be fastened down until a few minutes before it was taken out of the house. "They all think me mad about it, I believe," she said to me when the day came and the funeral guests. "But I mean to be left one alone for a little time, Mr. Dysart, and then I shall stay there while they fasten him out of my sight forever. I have made them put a pair of new and white flowers, which she had executed herself. "After all, she did love him." I thought, as she disappeared within the chamber of death.

I went into the room where those who were to attend the funeral were assembled. Mr. Driver and Mr. Coxe were trying to look both handsome and unhappy, and failing wholly. "We are a little behind time," Mr. Coxe said to me as I approached them, "a little behind time already."

he repeated, impatiently; and I subbed him by my manner as I answered:

"The widow must not be disturbed; she is mistress here, you must remember."

Presently the undertaker's men were summoned, and they went in, and put on and fastened down the coffin lid, and then put it into an outer and stronger coffin, and soldered that down securely, she standing by and seeing it all done; "this, Evans cried, "is the correct" nervous thing. Then she came out, and I met her and conducted her to her own sitting-room. The color had come back to her face, and the light was living in her eyes again.

"Oh, Mr. Bryant," she said, as she sat down, "it was hard to do it, but I am so glad that I conquered my feelings and staid there with him to the last. I feel strong enough to bear whatever there may be now to hear when the will is read. If I am left a pauper, I am resigned."

When the funeral was over we all came back to hear the will read; and as soon as we were assembled, Mr. Clay, the lawyer, who evidently thought he had an unpleasant task before him, asked if some one would summon the widow. I went and fetched her. She came in leaning on my arm, and I was glad to see, in proof of her spirit being enhanced, that she did not give in Messrs. Driver and Coxe. She sat down while Mr. Clay explained "that after the sudden death —the awful sudden death of his friend and client, he, Mr. Clay, had searched for the will unsuccessfully for three days. At the end of that time he had found it in a drawer in the deceased's bedroom, and had recognized it as the same one he had seen executed (not drawn up) some short time since. As there was a codicil required in exterior aspect. Of its contents he was as ignorant as every one else present." Here Mr. Driver and Mr. Coxe looked very much like mad and mischief than ever; but I was delighted to see that she had sufficient self-command and self-respect not to notice them. Amidst the most profound silence Mr. Clay opened the will. Amidst the rustle of a faint movement and faint muttering among us, he dropped it, and picked it up again, and tried to read it. Only Mrs. Wallrond watched him with steely eyes.

"Tell him not to be afraid to hear the worst," she said to me; and then Mr. Clay stammered out in concise but perfectly legal phraseology, the fact that Mr. Wallrond had left every single thing he possessed in the world to his beloved wife Catherine unconditionally. It was very differently worded from that which Driver and Mr. Clay. The disappointed men gazed at the attesting signatures, and could not dispute the validity of the will. I was hardly sorry when at length the house was cleared of them all, and I was left alone with the lady.

She was a widow, but she was free! "I could not so," as she phrased it; "it was a reward," she said, "for the way she had devoted herself to her husband, and for her wish and desire to be conscious of such devotion." And I believed her; and condemned myself for ever having a faith in her. And I made me distrust the wisdom of the step my old friend had taken in marrying her.

I soon did more than believe her and condemn myself. I loved her; and vainly tried absence, change of scene and society, and other certainties which short-sighted mortals who hadn't been her suggested to me. Finally, about seven months after the events recorded, I went back to Wallrond Court, determined to win my widow without delay. I saw at once that she knew what had brought me—the clever creature—and that she was glad I had made me distrust the wisdom of the step my old friend had taken in marrying her.

"And do you know what they say, and what we all believe is the cause?" Clara, my wife, said, one day I intended taking the plunge. "We can't prove it, of course—for both the coffins were opened on new year's day, especially as the will proved bears what we can't swear aren't genuine signatures—"

"Get on, man," I hastily interrupted; "what do 'they say' and you hint?"

"Why, that she wasn't in that room so many hours for nothing, and that the real will lies buried in our old friend's coffin, unless she took the more obvious course and burned it," he said, straightening himself up, and looking at me.

I did not marry her, for I could not help recalling sundry ghastly evidences of guilt. She was not worthy of me; then I bade her farewell after Coxe's conversation; and we parted and shall never meet again. But judgment was reserved to cause this mystery to be cleared are sorely needed.

THE LAND OF EARTHQUAKES.

The Spaniards in South America were not without early intimation of the insecurity of the soil. Lima founded in 1535, under the high-sounding title of Ciudad de los Reyes, or City of the Kings, since altered to its present name, in 1685 Lima had its first recorded visitation of earthquake. The centre of the shock, however, was lower down along the coast, in the neighborhood of Arequipa, founded by Pizarro some twelve months after the establishment of Lima. Arequipa was laid in ruins then as now; but Lima escaped with a warning. Lima's turn, however, was not long in coming. Four years afterward it was laid prostrate; and so great was the catastrophe, even in that land of catastrophes, that the anniversary of that destruction is solemnly commemorated to the present time, on the day of the Visitation of Elizabeth. Lima had its third attack in 1609. In November, 1630, there was another earthquake; but so many there was another earthquake; but so many of the citizens contrived to escape that they, then and there, instituted the Festival of Nuestra Señora del Milagro, which is celebrated annually to this day.

Thenceforth, earthquake and city may be truly said to have entered into contest for possession of the soil. Earthquake returned to the charge in 1655 with such violence that for the first time, the citizens camped for several days in the country districts around. When they returned they found a new source of consternation in the cathedra the city rose again. After this there was no earthquake for some twenty years. Again, ten years later, in 1687, at half-past 4 in the morning, houses and public edifices came tumbling down without the least previous intimation: the inhabitants, as usually, rushing into the squares and open spaces. The miserable consolation, however, of looking on in safety was this time denied them. As six in the morning the earthquake repeated its attack with renewed vigor, and the sea, retiring and rising in a wall of inky waters—as it did in the great earthquake of this year—dashed back with overwhelming force over the land. Callao, which had arisen on the port of Lima, a few miles from it, was entirely destroyed, and most of the inhabitants were carried away by the receding waters. The local records, preserved by the Franciscan Padre de Ulloa, captain of his most Christian majesty's navy, mention this as the most disastrous visitation to that date. December 13th, January 1657, July, 1699, February, 1716, January, 1725, December, 1732, were all earthquake months at Lima. In 1746 there was one of the worst earthquakes. On the 28th of October, 1746, at half past ten at night, the first shock was felt. In another minute, and within the space of three minutes all the buildings in the city, great and small, public and private, were heaps of ruins, burying with them those inhabitants who had not been quick enough in escaping to the squares. Then succeeded a moment's pause, which in the terror of the moment was opened the battle, and the lighter, but more numerous, musketry prepared to follow. Soon the artillery of the fortress of Callao, homeless inhabitants counted two hundred distinct shocks within the following twenty-four hours. These shocks communicated to the Peruvian Andes. Of the following year, and were computed at four hundred and fifty in all. On this occasion the port of Callao was not alone laid level with the level of the sea. Nothing was left standing save a piece of wall belonging to the fort of Santa Cruz, which twenty-two years after contrived to save themselves. Of the twenty-three ships then in port, nineteen were wholly sunk, and the remaining four driven to an unbelievable distance inland. Of the four thousand inhabitants, which the port of Callao then numbered, only two hundred escaped. Of the fifteen hundred dead bodies were excavated from the ruins, exclusive of great numbers of mained, who afterwards died in the hospitals. Commander Wilkes, of the United States exploring expedition of 1840, was able in that year to define the site of the old port of Callao beneath the sea.

So much for Lima. Let us next take the case of Caracas, chief city of the Republic of Venezuela.

Ascension Day, 1812, rose fair and bright in that city. The air was calm—the sky unclouded. It is an error to suppose that earthquakes are usually accompanied or preceded by any threatening appearance of the elements. Large numbers of the people were at mass in church. In attendance on the services of the day. Suddenly the bells rolled without touch of mortal hand. Into was the work of a moment. The earthquake, which almost simultaneously was upon the unhappy people. The movement of the earth—as in the line of the south-west and north-east—was from north to south, with transverse jerks from east to west. These cross agitations of the surface, accompanied with subterranean noises, penetrated every thing animate and inanimate. The inhabitants were unable to crawl to the churchdoors, and the walls of the churches, characteristic of all South American cities, from the largest to the smallest, descended in ruins around them. Ten thousand persons are said to have been killed in the churches alone. The churches of La Trinidad and Alta Gracia, more than one hundred and fifty feet in height, were literally reported by pillars of twelve and fifteen feet in diameter, were reduced to masses of rock little more than a mile in height. The barracks a regiment of soldiers had just been drawn up under arms, ready to form part of a procession which was to celebrate the solemn service. Scarcely a man of them was left. And all this was the work of a single minute. Two thirds of the town, to whom there was no shelter, no medicine, no food, scarcely a drop of water. There were not even implements to enable the survivors to dig out from under which lay upon them. The survivors dug out with their fingers two thousand of their crushed fellow-creatures, and still more lie remaining in them. The shock had broken the pipes conveying water; the falling in of the earth and choked up the springs which had fed the city. there were no utensils in which to carry water from the river. The wounded and sick were carried to the river's bank, and there left under such protection as the foliage afforded. The night, we are told, rose calm and serene; the round, full moon shone on the sad faces of the survivors. Mothers still carried their dead children about, refusing to believe that life had entirely fled. Troops of relatives and friends sought for missing ones up and down streets now to be traced only by long lines of ruins. A stermer duty yet remained. Twelve thousand dead bodies lay wounded, and decomposing within the tropics may be said to begin at the moment of death. There were no means of digging graves; the bodies must be burned, and that at once. Bands of citizens were set apart for this duty. Vast piles of timber from the ruins of their homes were raised at frequent intervals; bodies of fathers, husbands, wives, children were laid on them; and soon the whole sky was lighted with these awful flames. This lasted for several days, during which the survivors strictly devoted themselves to religious exercises. Some sang hymns; others confessed crimes of which they had never been suspected. Some murders made what compensation was in their power.

Narratives as sad could be taken from Santiago (1730), Concepcion (1751), near Quito (1797) Concepcion (1835); New Granada (1837). Caracas soon rose from its ruins, and is now a handsome city of thirty-five thousand inhabitants. As far as accounts inform us it has escaped the catastrophe of 1868.

Up to the present time scientific witnesses assure us that little faith is to be reposed in those appearances which superstition commonly connects with earthquakes. One scientific person indeed—for as such we must account a professor of mathematics in the University of Lima, and the most famous seat of learning on the whole of the American continent—published in 1727 a book entitled "L'Horloge Astronomique des Tremblemens de Terre, ou Astronomical Dial of the Earthquakes, in which he marked out the fatal hours in which they might be apprehended. But, as we have already shown, it did not help forward the saving of his fellow-citizens during the frequent attacks to which Lima has been subjected. In fact earthquakes occur indifferently at all hours of the twenty-four, and at all periods of the year. The circumstances and surroundings which accompany them on some occasions are absolutely wanting in others. The subterranean sounds (bramidos) which at ordinary earthquakes accompany earthquakes, can not be said to be essentially connected with them. There may be earthquakes without the peculiar rumblings, and the peculiar rumblings without earthquake. Thus the earthquake of the 4th of February, 1797, which destroyed Riobamba, and which Humboldt called "one of the most fearful phenomena recorded in the physical history of our planet, was accompanied by any unusual roar. Again, in the elevated, noble land of Guanaxuato, subterranean thunder has frequently been heard, as in the 9th January, 1784, and continued without intermission for the space of a whole month, without any disturbing motion of the earth. One of the city lies among one of the richest silver mines in the world, and huge quantities of silver, in bars, were stored within it. Several thousand dollars in specie forsook all, expecting the earthquake to be over every day moment. But, within the city, there was no earthquake. Below the bottom of the deepest mines, one thousand six hundred feet under ground, no shock was felt.

The case of earthquake appears to vary considerably. It has been already mentioned as occurring from north to south, with quick transverse jerks from east to west. But this is by no means always the case. The movement is sometimes upward, sometimes rotary. In the earthquake now under consideration, we are told, many bodies of inhabitants were thrown into the air: some being found on the hill of Cauca, several hundred feet in height, on the opposite side of the river. A sailor in mid-ocean was violently flung into the rigging from the deck, as if a mine had exploded under his feet. In other instances balls are observed to be twisted, and not thrown down; and rows of trees will be turned round in the direction of the earthquake. Stranger still is the facility with which objects on the surface of the earth have been found to shift from one place to another. The furniture of one house has been found on the ruins of a neighbor's; and, at Quito, the council of justice had, in many cases, to decide upon the ownership of property, even including fields and growing crops, which had thus shifted their positions without sustaining much apparent injury.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Americans are not naturally a polite people. They enjoy many excellent qualities, and many valuable characteristics; but they seem to feel that it is not their duty to be polite to each other or to the public. An American gentleman travelling in Europe contrasts the business manners of the Russians with those of the Yankees, giving an instance in his own experience. On going to his bankers' in St. Petersburg he was asked to wait, as his letter of credit was taken by a clerk to one of the firm, who immediately returned with a friendly interview. On going to a banking-house in New York, he presented his letter of credit, and was then took them without looking at them, being engaged in a rattling conversation with a companion, and merely glancing at them, he insisted with his pen to another desk, saying, "Across the way." Then, another, who had called to get his name a bill, went to the other side of the room, and after standing ten or fifteen minutes, obtained attention from one of the clerks, and concluded the business. "There was not a word said," he remarked, "which might be called disrespectful, but there was a total want of 'manners.' In Brecker's Hand-book for travellers in Paris, is the significant remark: "To insure civility from servants, officials, and others the traveller in France is counselled not to be in a hurry to get his affair," when making a request, or even when ordering refreshments at a cafe or restaurant." We have all noticed this civility, and marvel at the apparent rudeness of foreigners.

A year ago last August the now famous Howland Will case was brought before the United States Circuit Court in Boston. The details were then fully laid before the public, which, of course, was deeply interested in the result of a cause involving so much property, especially as the plaintiff was herself a millionaire. The Court, after having taken something like fourteen months to make up its opinion, has now decided that there was no competent evidence that such an agreement was ever made between Miss Sylvia Ann Howland and Miss Hetty Robinson (now Mrs. Green) as would annul the last will of the former lady. So the question of forgery, upon which much of the legal interest of the trial depended, has fallen to the ground. It is said an appeal will be made to the United States Supreme Court, but it is not probable the result can be changed.

The Herald a few days ago publi-hed the following list of public offices said to be held by Irish Roman Catholics in New York city:

Sheriff,
Register,
Recorder,
City Chamberlain,
Corporation Counsel,
Police Commissioner,
Members of the Tax Board,
Acting Mayor and President of the Board of Aldermen,
President of the Board of Councilmen,
Clerk of the Common Council,
Clerk of the Board of Councilmen,
President of the Board of Supervisors,
Five Justices of the Courts of Record,
All but one of the Judges,
All but two of the Police Justices,
All the police city clerks,
Three out of four Coroners,
Two Members of Congress,
Three out of five State Senators,
Eighteen out of twenty-one Members of Assembly,
Fourteen-nineteenths of the Common Council, and Eight-tenths of the Supervisors.

This vast political power is believed to be used in the interests of the Papal Church, securing for its institutions from the private of valuable real estate in the city as well as large sums of money. The church thus in the public controls the taxation of city property, and then the appropriation of the millions of revenue derived from taxation. It avoids the entire legislative power of the city, also elevates of the city's representation in the State Assembly, and threatens of its increase in the Senate. It controls all our civil courts, all but two of our police courts, and three-fourths of our Councilmen; and under its all power in finance are our Acting Mayor, our Sheriff, our Register, our Recorder, our City Chamberlain, the President and fourteen-nineteenths of our Board of Councilmen, and the President and eight-tenths of our Board of Supervisors. The Roman Catholics are able to control and manage the Democratic party.

Mr. Gladstone continues to interest the public, and occasionally the exhibition of one's swift motion on Broadway or in the Central Park attracts all eyes. Bombastic people recommend such displays on the ground that the cost of keeping a horse a year would pay twelve policemen, or a family of twelve family, we suppose. Many inventive minds have been, and still are, busy in producing models of their various vehicles, which shall combine the greatest possible safety and comfort. A marine velocipede has been constructed, but it is not found to ride over the waves to be a charming manner. The slightest movement of the rider's body in the direction of the bow, the whole machine is managed in a very simple manner. Evidently the marine velocipede will soon be at a discount.

Why is coal so enormously high? There is plenty of it in the world. It is estimated that within four miles eighteen square of coal of nine feet thick are discovered in Russia.

It is a singular coincidence that Gioacchino Rossini and Baron Lionel Rothschild—two men whose careers have been so noted, though in different ways—were born in the same year. Rossini was the senior of both other, and that Rothschild died two days after Rossini. The late Baron Rothschild was the fourth son of Meyer Anselm Rothschild, a German banker who died in Frankfort in 1812, and was born in 1808, the same year in which his father died; his four brothers resided in other cities, but they all constituted one firm, in which they all had an equal interest, and what was conducted under five branches. This great banking-house has always been furbished loans to many of the European states as they have required. Their wonderful success and wealth are to be ascribed, in part due to the fact that the Rothschilds have followed the advice of their father, who, with his dying breath, exhorted on them to remain united in an individual union. The title of Baron was received from Austria, in acknowledgment of the prompt and courteous with which the Rothschilds responded to an application for a loan in 1815. The title of Baron James becomes heir to his immense wealth.

Frederic William Dickens, latest surviving brother of Charles Dickens, died on a few weeks ago Darlington, England. He was a genial, good-humored gentleman, with a lively fund of anecdote, and was a general favorite in society.

Some of the residents of New Jersey believe they have discovered the famous Kidd treasure. Since there has been, as yet, no general shake in this vicinity. If there is, however, it will serve to confirm the theory of Professor S. M. Thorpe of Nebraska College, which he has recently stated he expounded before the Legislature, on the first announcement of an eruption of Vesuvius. His theory was that a vast mass of the crust of the earth, near the West Indies, having, for some reason, become detached, had fallen into the burning molten lake, and that the cause of the subterranean disturbances in St. Thomas and vicinity; that the shock had sent a wave eastward at a tremendous rate, the sluggish ocean of lava, scaking a vent; that the eruption of Vesuvius was the first demonstration, and that the various other eruptions would follow in the line of march, would in regular succession of time give similar tokens of the subterranean disturbances here. Moreover, Professor Thorpe says that he warned the Emperor Napoleon III. of the approaching danger, since the effects of this rolling wave of fire; and he also anticipated the Atlantic cable. New York, forward, would feel some slight effects from the same wave.

An excellent physician of a certain city in Vermont, while driving into town on election morning, was hailed by a farmer, who inquired the news. "Sir," said the doctor, "but I have been out all night after a voter. I got him too."

"Where will he vote?"

"Oh, about twenty-one years from now."

"Ah—I see," said the boy. "Well, look after him, Doctor, and see that he votes right."

"No fear. But I'm not going with the name he's down. His father's a Democrat, but when I told him he had got a boy, and asked him what he would name him, he said, 'Call him Abraham Lincoln, by —, if you do.'"

An Eastern paper describes a house recently built in Brownsville, Maine, which is not only shingled, but clapboarded with slate. The slates are put on in the boarding of the walls with only paper between. They are in the form of segments of a circle overlapping each other, and have a very ornamental effect. The natural color of the slate is pleasing to the eye, and no paint is needed. The whole establishment, elegant in appearance, and so,ws what can be done with native materials. The front steps are of beautiful slabs of slate; the sinks, mantles, shelves, are of slate; the wood-work is of brown ash, a native wood, which makes a handsome finish.

THE SERRA VIADUCT, ST. PAUL'S RAILROAD, BRAZIL.

RICHMOND CHAIN-GANG.

OFFENSIVE as it is to the eye, one is quite tempted by the condition of our New York streets to wish that the Southern custom which our artist illustrates was almost universal. In various Southern cities the municipal authorities are authorized to employ all petty thieves under conviction in the cleaning of the streets; and, chained in gangs and watched by a detail of policemen, they serve in place of our street-scavengers.

ST. PAUL'S RAILROAD, BRAZIL.

THE St. Paul's Railway in Brazil is one of the wonders of modern engineering. Starting from the port of Santos, 250 miles south of Rio de Janeiro, it makes its way across the marshes intervening between the sea and the foot of the Serra, for a distance of twelve miles, to the broad opening of a deep gorge, where it essays its ascent to the summit of this natural obstacle by a series of four planes on a grade of one in ten. Four large Cornish engines, by means of a steel wire rope running over revolving bearings, draw the cars through deep cuttings, over high embankments and gigantic viaducts thrown across gaping ravines, and around curves, to the top of the Serra, upward of 2500 feet above the level of the sea. Here the locomotive takes the train through alternate plain and runs over the elevated plateau to St. Paul's, a city with 40,000 inhabitants, fifty miles from Santos; thence through a more rugged region, by bridge, embankment, cutting, and tunnel, to the town of

CHAIN-GANG AT RICHMOND.—[SKETCHED BY W. S. SHEPPARD.]

Jundiahy, forty miles from St. Paul's, where it stops for the present until an extension is built to the city of Campinos, twenty-five miles further, and just in the basin which is the best coffee-ground in Brazil.

This road, as far as Jundiahy, was built by an English company, to which the Brazilian Government guarantees 7 per cent. on the investment, which amounts to nearly two millions sterling. The two chief engineers were Mr. JAMES BRUNLEES, resident in England, and Mr. DANIEL FOX, resident in Brazil. The new Empire is indebted to the science and skill of these gentlemen for the completion of this most important work. Much of the actual work was intrusted to the skill of experienced American contractors. Messrs. D. H. SAMPSON, SAMUEL DRIESBACK, O. C. JAMES, and Dr. REINHART are among those of our countrymen who have been connected with it.

The iron viaduct in the Serra, represented in our engraving, crosses a ravine more than 1000 feet wide and 350 feet deep.

THE HOOSAC TUNNEL.

THE object sought for in the construction of the Hoosac Tunnel and Troy and Boston Railroad was a more direct route from Boston to the West via Troy and the New York Central Railroad than is now afforded by the Western Railroad.

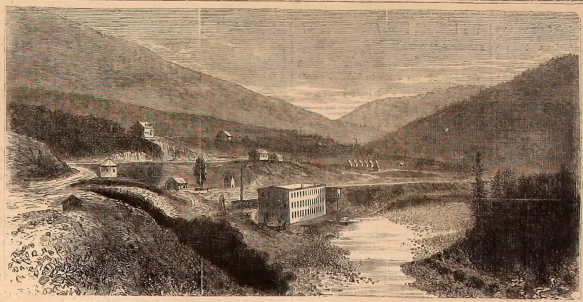
The distance from Boston to Schenectady, via the Tunnel and Troy, is 210 miles—via Western Railroad and Albany 218 miles, a saving by the former route of eight miles; but the grades of the tunnel line being much less than those of the Western road, give the former an average load of 102 tons to 87 tons for the latter.

The length of the tunnel will be 25,031 feet, or about 4¾ miles.

The altitude of the Hoosac Mountain, immediately over the tunnel, is 2510 feet above tide-water at Troy, the height of the mountain above the tunnel at the same point is 1718 feet.

On the 28th of October connection was made between the west end and the west shaft, so that on that side there is now excavated 4000 feet of Tunnel and Heading; while on the east side there is completed 5283 feet, making a total of 9283 feet of lineal excavation, 15,748 feet being yet unbroken.

There are two principal shafts—the west shaft 318 feet in depth, and the central of 1637 feet. This latter is not finished, a depth of about 600 feet only having been attained.

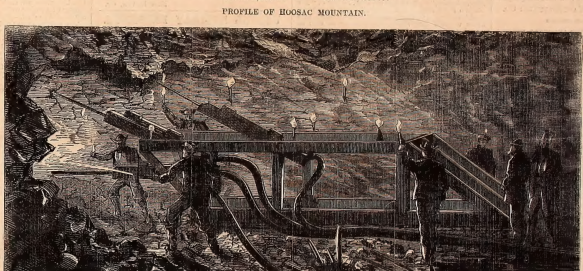


The drilling of the rock at the east end and west shaft is accomplished by means of the Burleigh air-drill, the motor being compressed air.

The most difficult part of the work has been at the west end in arching through the "demoralized" rock—one of the most laborious feats of engineering ever accomplished in this country, and at one time pronounced impossible by many engineers. Mr. FARREN commenced this part of the work in June, 1865, and has built 800 feet of arched tunnel, most of it through the "demoralized" rock, as it is called, which is disintegrated mica and talcose slate permeated with water, and of the consistency of molasses. Tunneling through such material was only accomplished by a thorough system of drainage outside the tunnel and at great expense.

The arching has now reached permanent rock; but the tunnel will have to be lined with brick perhaps 1200 feet further into the mountain.

With money and management the tunnel could be readily completed in six years.



The profile gives an idea of the amount of work done and to be done, together with the height of mountain, etc.

HOLIDAY IN THE WOODS.

IF the picture by Mr. SMYTHE, of which, on page 777, we give an engraving from the original painting, retains a tithe of its charm in the medium of black and white, we should but fetter the reader's fancy were we to attempt with the pen to illustrate its graceful vivacity and natural truthfulness. Not unworthily may it be named with those somewhat similar idyllic subjects drawn by Mr. MASON from the sweet budding time of girlhood which are so deservedly admired. For, though Mr. SMYTHE does not, as is usually the case in the works of the artist we have named, here exhibit an evening effect, with all its beautiful harmonies of subdued yet rich color and all its tender and pensive associations, he is not less faithful to another lovely phase of natural effect. Summer afternoon sunlight, barring with burning gold the cool shade of a country lane, trickling in transient rills through its overarching foliage, and as they traverse the checkered way, in playful peeps, with radiant pencil, tipping the slenderest relief a group of pretty little village maids in attitudes of wayward fancy, has seldom been so felicitously expressed. Drawing, color, effect, touch, are alike admirable; and the dangling yet tempered brilliancy of summer sunlight is in perfect keeping with the sparkling mirth and the lovelier dreamlight shed by youth on earth and sky.

HOOSAC TUNNEL—ENTRANCE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.]

A CHALLENGE FROM A LADY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20, 1868.

Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson, 625 Broadway:

GENTLEMEN,—Referring to the challenge of Mr. PRATT, whose WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine has been in use ten years without repairing, I beg to state that I have used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine, in family sewing, fourteen years, without one cent for trifling repairs, and it is now in so good condition that I would not exchange it for your latest number (now upward of 350,000). One needle served me more than a year for fine sewing.

Can any one beat this?

Yours, Mrs. ANNE WARNER.

Any one who can give a better report than this will be entitled to one of our new tucking gauges.

WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING CO.

FROM A LONG-ESTABLISHED AND WELL-KNOWN HOUSE.—"I believe sold BORDEN'S EXTRACT (for cooking purposes) for several years, and believe them equal to any we have had hitherto, and find them gradually growing in the public favor." ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, Grocers. NEW YORK, September 8, 1868.

JOSIAH TUCKETT & CO., Sole Proprietors, 302 Broadway, New York; 27 Central Street, Boston.

These EXTRACTS are for sale every where.

FIT TO ADORN THE WHITE HOUSE.

MRS. GENERAL GRANT'S OPINION.—"It affords me great pleasure to bear witness to the excellence of the ELIPTIC & BAKER FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. I have had one in my family for some two years, and from what I know of its workings, and from the testimony of many of my friends who use the same, I can safely say how any thing could be more complete or give better satisfaction. The machine I have is one of the most elegant I have ever seen."—Letter from Mrs. General Grant.

A most suitable holiday present to a smoker is undoubtedly a Genuine Meerschaum, which Messrs. POLAK & SON sell at manufacturers' prices, at their stores, 493 Broadway, near Broome St., and 27 and 29 Bleecker st (block), N.Y. Also repairing, boiling, and amber work done. Send for circular to Letter-Box 5846.

Remember: No sugar nor corner stores.

PEANO'S AMERICAN CHRONOMO.—We have been made the recipient of a tasteful chromo, illustrative of WHITTIER'S lines of the "Barefoot Boy," which is no less a success of the artist than the poem upon which it is founded is of the author.—Philadelphia Press.

A BUST man is a locomotive, and life a track. Every night he drives into "the house," and stops. Every morning he is fired up anew and away he goes, starting off in one direction, and then in another. In this routine of business he forgets that the physical organization is of the most distinct order. If a hard day's locomotive needs constant care, and to be well oiled up and rubbed off every day, how much more necessary is it that all active and well women should use PLANTATION BITTERS, which are the no-plus-ultra of every thing which is necessary to keep the system in a perfect tone of health.—Post.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

CASES
COLLINS METAL
(Improved Oroide).

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, have patented the "COLLINS METAL," and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its Gold color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting its intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are fitted with Stanford Patent Levers; those for Ladies an Improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by superior certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in neatness of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $300. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6. Also, Jewelry of the Collins Metal in every style.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no Agents; orders must therefore be sent directly to us. Customers in the city will remember we visit our office

Revolt in the Interior.

When the stomach is rebellious, the liver contumacious, the bowels disordered, the brain confused, and the nerves in a tumult, call in the aid of

HOSTETTER'S
STOMACH BITTERS

If you would restore quiet, regularity, and harmony to the action of these important organs. A large proportion of the complaints to which the human family are subject originate in indigestion. For this distressing malady, and parent of innumerable ailments as distressing as fearful, the BITTERS are the only antidote yet discovered which is at once universal and unfailing remedy. But although 'it was as a remedy for dyspepsia and biliousness that they first obtained popular favor many years ago, it is now well understood, both by the public and the medical profession, that their curative properties take a far wider range. In nervous complaints, spasmodic affections, fever and ague, and every variety of general and local debility, their effect is most salutary; and as a means of preparing the system to resist rapid, cold, poisonous elements in the wintry air, plus air, privation, exposure, &c., no medicinal agent at present known can be justly compared with this powerful yet harmless tonic. The feeble and sensitive, who can ill withstand the inclemency of the winter season, will find the BITTERS exactly the article they need to fortify and sustain them.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1868.

OUR BRITISH CLAIMS.

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON'S speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet is one thing; the "authentic version" is another. The report published the next morning augments greatly pro the speech as delivered; the, "authentic version" may give what was meant to be delivered. That MR. JOHNSON said more than he ought to have said is evident, and when MR. DISRAELI remarked that the speech of the American Minister "has prevented the necessity of my imparting to you any Cabinet secrets," there was a sneer which must have sharply stung MR. JOHNSON, if he understood it. In any case that gentleman is preparing for himself peculiar discomfort if the utmost expectations of both nations are not satisfied with the results of the diplomacy which MR. JOHNSON so loudly celebrates; and he will probably find that it is very much easier to excite the applause of lively gentlemen by a speech after dinner than to satisfy two nations that seriously differ upon points of interest and glory.

The case of the Alabama is not a complicated case. It has been curiously mismanaged, and wholly irrelevant issues have been thrust into it. The point which was understood to be strongly pressed by MR. SEWARD, that Great Britain must begin by apologizing for recognizing the belligerency of the rebel States, should not have been made a part of the negotiation. The recognition was an unfriendly act, but it was an act of sovereign power, for which there is no remedy but war or an adjustment of the general ag.cement called international law. Every nation interprets that law or custom at its own pleasure, and, of course, at its own risk. For an unfriendly act we might have peremptorily called Great Britain to account, or have invited a Congress, but we can not expect her to apologize for her interpretation of the law. Moreover, her action recalls terribly upon herself. Her conduct proclaimed the principle that maritime rights are not guaranteed to a belligerent without a port. That is merely a certificate of piracy, as it proved in our case; and whenever England goes to war the principle of her conduct will be used to kill annihilate her commerce. She sees this as well as we, and therefore, when the British Government agrees to treat upon the subject of the claims, it virtually confesses the iniquity of its conduct. The Government is more interested than we to renounce its own precedent, and the matter may be left without fear to the people to involve in any degree the question of our claims for losses by the Alabama and other privateers, and merely raises a point of national dignity and honor that no government would surrender upon demand.

Our claims have a very simple and conclusive justification. The Queen's proclamation of neutrality forbade all British subjects to aid either belligerent. MR. LAIRD, in contempt of the Queen's order, built a vessel for the rebels, for which MR. ROBERT MURRAY CONRAD and MR. MOZLEY called the attention of the British Government. The Ministers were very reluctantly convinced that they ought to interfere, and after most unfriendly delay they sent a vessel in order for the ship to go to sea. The order arrived two hours late, and the ship was gone. After leaving Liverpool entirely provisioned and manned by the British territory. She put out to sea and ravaged American commerce. Having no port to enter she burned her prizes, and after the British Government formally declared her to go to sea had acknowledged that it was its duty to arrest her, the Alabama was received at British ports, and there refitted and supplied. Thus she was built and equipped upon British territory, and was enabled to continue her destruction of our commerce by British assistance. There could be no plainer case; and if, during the demand that the "impropriety of acknowledging belligerent rights should be corrected, our Government had presented its authenticated demand of damages upon a record which the British Government could not deny, the settlement of the question would already have been much further advanced than it is now likely to be for many years.

It seems to be understood that the basis of the arrangement is to be a mixed commission sitting in Washington and, perhaps, alternately in London to hear claims and settle them. If counter claims are also to be heard, the sessions of the Commission will be endless. The Alabama captured twenty-eight ships, twenty-two barks, five brigs, six schooners, the steamer Ariel, and the United States gun-boat Hatteras. The Shenandoah captured thirty-eight vessels, mostly ships and barks. The Florida took thirty-six; the Sumter twenty-seven. There were probably three hundred craft of various kinds captured by the rebel privateers, and the consequent work of the Commission may be imagined. Of course, under the present circumstances, no better plan of adjustment is to be expected. But Great Britain and every great power will have learned a useful lesson from the consequences of the foolish and unfriendly precipitancy of a Government which committed itself against us before the Minister of the United States known to be in England had arrived in London.

THE VOTING IN GEORGIA.

LAST week we stated the facts of the election in Louisiana, showing how complete was the terrorism over loyal voters in that State. The majority for MR. SEYMOUR was obtained by preventing the opposition vote. This was the plan of JAMES M. MASON when the vote upon secession was to be taken in Virginia. "Take care," said that worthy Democrat and rebel chief, "that any body votes against secession at his peril." The same Democratic method was followed in Louisiana. GENERAL SIBLEY, who is a staff-officer of General ROUSSEAU, recently arrived in Washington and stated that the Republicans did not generally vote because they were afraid for their bodies not to attempt to do so for fear of a massacre; and the Colonel frankly confesses that General ROUSSEAU concurred in this view, and was conscious that he had not force enough to preserve the peace at the polls. By whom was that peace threatened? By those who, out of a registration of more than twenty thousand in the city of New Orleans, cast less than three hundred votes, or by those who cast nearly thirty thousand? The party of violence and disorder and ruin in this country is not the party that has elected General GRANT President.

This week we have the report from Georgia. There are 200,918 registered voters in the State. Last April there were 159,883 votes cast for Governor, of which the Republican candidate, BULLOCH, received 7171 majority. The number of white voters disqualified in April from voted in November is estimated at from 10,000 to 20,000. In November there were 159,414 votes cast, and Seymour's majority was 46,242. The great bulk of the vote for GRANT was in the sections where there was military protection. A careful analysis of the vote shows that a section of eleven counties, containing 7823 registered votes, with a white majority of only 705, polled 4891 votes for Governor in April, and 4116 for Governor in November. The majority for the Democratic Governor was 919; that for President 4116, the whole of the vote polled in November. It is not remarkable that in these counties, where the majority was small with a vote only 775 less than in April, not one man, white or colored, voted for General GRANT? Is it more likely that all who voted for the Republican Governor in April changed their minds, or that their votes were changed after they were cast?

In another section of eleven counties, which contains 10,727 registered voters and 853 colored majority, there were 8118 votes polled in April, and in November 5584, being 2534 less than in April, and of these only 1 voted for and 87 for GRANT. One of these counties gave BULLOCK, the Republican Governor, 1222 votes in April and GRANT'S vote in November. In the twenty-two counties of lower and middle Georgia gave BULLOCK nearly 3000 votes GRANT received 87. A similar investigation shows that in forty-four counties, including the most populous and wealthy, the whole registration was 43,105, and the colored majority 1615. In April there were 30,750 votes polled, and in November only 23,506. The Democratic majority in April was only 2196 in April, and in November, with 7244 less votes, SEYMOUR'S majority is 20,188, while the colored vote in the forty-four counties only 1659 votes. This is the region of the Camilla riots. But when we reach the sections where there were more white Republicans we find that they voted themselves and persuaded or terrified to the colored Republicans. The survey shows conclusively that the colored vote was largely changed in the boxes or coerced; and we trust that Georgia's electoral vote of course, as that of Louisiana will be received without the most searching investigation. General ROUSSEAU'S statement, by his staff-officer, of his intimacy with the force at his command to keep the peace at the polls, and his acknowledgment that he approved the action of the Republican party in throwing down its arms rather than to terror and declining to vote, should be conclusive testimony that the reported vote of Louisiana is not the vote of the lawful voters.

In the presence of such facts it is to be hoped the quieter and well-disposed citizens of the Southern States understand why there is such doubt in the feeling of the loyal States as to the condition at the South. It is not because it is supposed there are no peaceful and orderly persons there who deprecate the constant confusion which prevails, but because a region can not be judged by those who control it, and the controlling public sentiment of the Southern States is represented by such persons as WADE HAMPTON, who recommends coercing political opponents by starvation, and whose political friends are able to establish such terrorism as has been seen in Louisiana, or to nullify votes as seen in Georgia.

It would be extremely foolish to be blind to such a situation, or unwisely to assume that every thing will be serene because there are good people who wish that serenity should prevail. If it be evident that order and fair play in the Southern States will not be secured if the national supervision is wholly removed, the duty of the Government is plain. It is very unfortunate that the States will not protect the rights of all their citizens, and that they can not wisely be left to the remedy of the courts and the local authorities. But it would be more than unfortunate—it would be criminal for the Government of the United States to abandon its citizens in a region where such is the situation. What is called peace might have been had at any time by allowing the WADE HAMPTONS to have the exclusive control of affairs. But the spirit which raged at Warsaw is not the pease which this country intends to have.

HATRED AND CONCILIATION.

THE London Pall Mall Gazette speaks of the "fanatical hostility toward the South" which is shown by some prominent politicians in this country. MR. GEORGE H. PENDLETON and other gentlemen who were in favor of allowing the rebellion to destroy the Union were also very loud during the late canvass in demanding a fraternal feeling for "the South;" and we find in the St. Louis Times a vehement charge of criminality directed against this paper and its respectable, and, we believe, loyal "corps" "in a terrestrial hell," and "ministering to the worst passions of ignorance." This is very foolish talk for sensible persons. We have waged constant and bitter warfare upon the political and social principles which have plunged this country into the extremest suffering and peril. We have never compromised their dangerous and inflexible purpose, nor have we ever doubted the ingenuity and the persistence of the chief representatives of those principles. By every means and upon every ground we have sought to expose the real situation, and to incite an opposition as profound and steady as the determination of those who seem to us hostile to the highest welfare of the country.

We have had very little respect for what is called a policy of "conciliation," because we have been accustomed to see it cherished as a seductive feeling, and that "conciliation" is merely a mask of surrender. The Philadelphia Convention was a movement of "conciliation," and we did not doubt for a day that it would be what it proved to be, an attempt to confuse the public mind as to the actual situation, so that the controlling public interest of the real cause of the war. The whole JOHNSON policy was "conciliation," and it meant precisely the same thing. The demand of the Democratic Convention that the vote-less, for peace and good will, was the same attempt renewed. "Conciliation" is a word which means politically at this time declining to insist upon what was fairly won in the war. We are opposed to any such policy. The great cause of the war, as MR. REVERDY JOHNSON confessed in London, was slavery. That cause there was slavery lost, and we are for holding them to their loss. Now the loss of Slavery is not merely the technical emancipation of slaves, it is the readjustment, upon the Republican principle of the States in which Slavery existed. It is the removal of every thing based upon Slavery, except the social feeling which is law, which only time and reason can remove. "Conciliation" which consists in leaving to the mercy of the masters the slaves whom the defeat of the masters freed is inconsistent and absurd. Yet this is what is meant by "fraternity," and the other smooth words used by the conservatism that palliated rebellion, and opposition to so stupid and suicidal a policy is "fanatical hostility" toward the South.

The St. Louis Times undertakes to assert the mildness of the conduct of the war. In order to it merely inimates the folly of General LEE in saying that there is no ill feeling between the late slaves and the late masters. The black code of the Louisiana reign and the treatment of the colored voters during the late campaign, the massacres of New Orleans, of Memphis, of Camilla, and elsewhere, are the answer to that statement, even if history were destitute of instruction upon the point. But what we declare is, that the establishment of peace upon conciliation at the South is due to no policy of mere common-sense, and that those who support it are wholly free from any kind of hostile feeling and from any wish to subject whites to black or to any subservience or as a disgrace. There is not a Southern man who does not know that he and all his neighbors have been treated with a forbearance hardly unprecedented in history—a forbearance which, had the result been reversed, he and his friends would have disdained. The feeling of JEFFERSON DAVIS, for instance, toward the Union and its loyal citizens expressed in his Atlanta and other Georgia speeches at the close of the rebellion; the ferocity of men like TOOMBS and the other Democratic leaders at the South during the late canvass, has no counterpart whatever among loyal men any where. Indeed, it is was very slowly and almost reluctantly that they saw the necessity of securing the legitimate results of the war without the least help from the defeated party, notwithstanding its loud protestation of acquiescence. And there is no fear that "hatred" will inspire any other policy that they may adopt. Yet we trust that our friends are prepared, as we are, to hear every measure that may be necessary to secure justice and equal rights in the disturbed States denounced as intended "to convert the South into a terrestrial hell."

INDEPENDENT JOURNALISM.

THE New York Times promptly denies the story that MR. RAYMOND and MR. WEED were to buy the Washington Intelligencer and make it the "organ" of President GRANT. That during and absurd violation of every probability in such a statement was truly admirable. That General GRANT would have an "organ" was a laughable conceit; and that MR. THURLOW WEED would be its resident editor in Washington, and MR. RAYMOND its corresponding editor in New York, was a suggestion of pure comedy. Indeed, as the Chicago Tribune, in a late admirable article, very truly asserts, "organs" are played out. Independent journalism is becoming a power which it never was before; for, hitherto, independent journals have been without principle or purpose except of the most selfish kind, or they have been merely local chronicleries. The consideration of great public questions upon grounds of the highest expediency, and with experience, sagacity, and ample information, has certainly not been universal among our newspapers hitherto; while the treatment of General GRANT by the World, during the late canvass, shows the pitiable means by which a merely partisan journal, however able, will resort.

But in a country of political action and discussion, whether in a newspaper or elsewhere, does not imply indifference to parties. Political results in a free country will be attained only by great parties, and the voter of every intelligent man will be given to that party which seems to him to promise most for the public progress and welfare. Yet parties need criticism and restraint as much as leadership, and every honorable party-man will gladly welcome both. This has always seemed to us the excellence of The Nation—a paper of which we have spoken more than once. Certain circumstances at its beginning added to the peculiar independence of its management have, however, exposed it to the double hostility of those political Radicals who can not forgive its satire upon what it considers radical unreason and extravagance. This hostility has lately led to a correspondence which has excited a good deal of attention, as the editor was charged with accepting an increase of capital with the understanding that the paper was to be in some sense an organ, and then refusing to be understood and said. General BUTLER went so far as to assert that the Nation opposed his election because he opposed the increase of capital from the same quarter.

We regret the misunderstanding of the facts, because it occasions bitter feeling between those who are really working to the same end. But the editor of the Nation, as we know of the time, assumed control of the paper upon the express condition that it was not to be an organ of any kind; and those of its proprietors who had earnestly desired that it should be, after some discussion, acquiesced. When the paper was issued it was announced that it would not be "the organ of any party, sect, or class," and it has faithfully observed that promise, while it has been so powerful an auxiliary of the liberal cause that the World has called it the ablest Republican journal. Of course if it had been started as an organ, it would be perfectly fair to expose its failure to do its prescribed duty. But, as we think, very fortunately it was not. Indeed no accomplished and able man, who proposes to devote himself to journalism, will bind himself to grind an organ if he can make an honorable livelihood otherwise; and what, as we said, parties must do the political work of the country, if they would do it wisely, they must produce and encourage their own critics.

THE "SCUM" OF THE CITY.

A DEMAGOGUE is a man who deliberately panders to the passion and ignorance of a crowd for a political purpose. MR. HOFFMAN, the Governor-elect, in a late speech at Tammany Hall, alludes to something which had been said in the Tribune about "the scum of the city." Those words have a very palpable meaning. There is no intelligent man, we suppose, who does not understand them. But this is the interpretation put upon them by MR. HOFFMAN: "Go to the work-shops where the people work from early morn to late in the day, and when the sun is setting wash in cold water from their hands and faces the honorable stains of labor, and then repair to their homes, and very many of them to evening schools to fit themselves better for the duties of citizens and men. Go with me there, and you will find the scum of New York, as they are called."

This is rather pitiful for the new Governor. MR. HOFFMAN knows just as well as we do that these are not the persons who were called the scum of New York. He knows that the class described by that term are such persons as LARKIN and CAMPBELL and O'BALDWIN and their associates: men who do not wash their hands of the stains of honest labor and go to evening-schools, but who stagger in a frenzy of drink into saloons and grog-shops; who collonize and repeat and bully at the polls; who are midnight brawlers and July rioters; and who murder or are murdered in drunken rows. No man knows better than Mr. HOFFMAN, for he has been Recorder, that there is a criminal class in the city, a worthless and dangerous class, and that they are intended by the words "scum of the city." When, therefore, he declares that the words are applied to orderly and industrious and intelligent citizens, he says what every body else knows to be untrue, and what every body feels that he says merely to excite passion and prejudice. A gentleman who is to be Governor of the State of New York should remember that his words publicly uttered attract attention; and he should therefore refrain from saying what he knows will merely move the contempt of honest men, or be shouted by the newspapers not to report his speeches.

THE RECENT SPECULATIONS.

THE reason which some one wittily gave for not purchasing Erie, that the Company printed it faster than he could purchase it, illustrates one of the devices by which speculators are supposed; but there is, in the mode of the operation, a still more important warning. In each late instance of the issue of this stock it has been preceded by large sales of it by those who were let into the secret, the purchasers having no knowledge of the intention, and supposing that the stock would be supplied to them from the quantity in existence at the time of the sale. After accepting large quantities the latter begin to suspect that stock has been created for the purpose, and when their pockets are sufficiently depleted the fact of a new issue is made known, to their utter dismay. It is not difficult to decide what is to be founded on this secret knowledge, and not communicated, is a clear violation of honor which the Stock Exchange should annul. The transaction not only could not be maintained if the facts were generally known, but it would have redress if the old and established maxims of law have not passed out of the memory of an active Judiciary. It will be that the Stock Exchange is now the safer place to have a corrective applied. If the hope is entertained that the Board can have any standing with the public, they will not longer let parties to a mode of dealing which will necessarily drive out of the market such outsiders as decline to put their fortunes at hazard when the dealer is allowed to fix the cards. We hear from all quarters that few orders to purchase stocks are given. This dullness is due to the danger which current transactions have developed.

We are not entitled to give advice to hardened speculators, and indulge in these observations not so much with a view of correcting disgraceful habits as to point out to those who are engaged in other pursuits the immense danger that results from dealing in stocks. A code of laws has been adopted in Wall Street which places the money at disadvantage, and the fear is wide-spread that the bench itself is not wholly free from these influences. In the quiet of every good home this danger is perceived which fixes upon those who engage in such dealings, and still more decisively upon those who are not swift to afford an adequate remedy, the just rebuke which these great violations of honor and law require.

It has been too much the habit for solid men in every part of the Union, when their capital is lying upon their hands, to invest it temporarily in some speculative stock, in the hope that it may speedily advance. Large fortunes have been lost in this manner either by reason of a purchase thus carelessly made, or by new operations to recover the first loss. The original step is justly regarded as the "serpent of the principle of interest involving the threat of its repetition." In nothing is this rule so constantly proved as in operations of this nature, and particularly when slight profits at first accrue.

To those who are cursed with a taste for gambling it will be difficult to present any reasonings which will be weight. It is merely possible that the discovery of the pernicious code of honor which prevails, and the uncertainty, if it is no worse, in obtaining redress against a fraudulent sale, may induce caution if not repentance where ruin is the certain result.

An examination into the motives of those who speculate in stocks will disclose a tendency which is inconsistent with true happiness or with delightful intercourse among men. It is founded on a desire to procure wealth, not as the fruit of honorable toil, but from the sweat and toil of others. All the wealth which has been created is the result of the aggregate industry of the world, and where it is procured we obtain what labor has produced. To arrive at independence by giving a fair equivalent in the shape of industry the most skilful, or by mental efforts of a high order in the practice of pursuits beneficial to the world, confers honor and happiness, and is consistent with those laws which must govern each individual if he expects to receive the approval which is valuable above all other. In the long-run it is true policy to adhere earnestly to whatever good business one may have chosen. The large fortune of a great merchant whose career is a matter of astonishment to the thousands who have witnessed its rise from the smallest beginnings, and its rapid progress, is due in great part to the firmest resistance throughout his entire career to go outside of his regular business on suggestions that fortunes could thus be grouped.

But what justification can the thousands have to enter into speculation who occupy positions of trust or employment which they may wield to the injury of their principals? In the light of the example afforded in the management of the Erie Railroad those will be considered exceedingly crass who suppose that a director of a company, or an officer of a bank, or a clerk in a merchant's counting-room should know that these valuable employments are inconsistent with habits of speculation. The stockholders or employers, the real parties in interest, make their appointments to secure an honest attention to duty, and would instantly displace every servant united with this habit. It is therefore a fraud upon the trust either to use, or permit the use by friends, of corporate funds in this manner. A person standing in these relations to others can have little difficulty or violating confidence use even his own funds in this manner. His time, his judgment, his sagacity, his foresight, these belong to trust. The stockholders or employers. They are diverted to other objects when speculation in Wall Street is pursued.

The great cases in men throughout the United States are engaged in some form of substantial industry. They constitute the solid portion of the country, and maintain unchanged the old habits and opinions which professions of honest people have transmitted to our time. They look with horror upon these recent revelations, which throw such a stain upon our land. The honest yeomanry of the country, in tones not to be misunderstood, boldly stood up for the right in the recent election, and although overpowered for the time by the ballot, they were successful throughout the Union, and will effectually place their lasting condemnation upon those who are known to have violated important duties.

Great works are in progress, some of them stretching across the Continent, and it is not to be concealed that a painful solicitude is felt as to what the future may disclose. The gains which may temporarily arise from mismanagement are as nothing compared with the censure that will be pronounced upon those who fail in these places to protect the great interests committed to their charge. They will find that there is a power in public opinion, and that the vice which prevails, however extensively it may seem to prevail.

THE SITUATION IN SPAIN.

SPAIN presents an extraordinary spectacle. One of the worst monarchies in Europe has been peacefully overthrown. The country of the Queen, apparently without a single regret, has been exiled: for many weeks an impromptu government has kept the peace: and now a plebiscite has submitted the question of the future form of government to the people, and immense popular meetings are held in the great cities, some declaring a republic and others a monarchy. What secret intrigues are meanwhile going on we do not, of course, know; but the spectacle is unprecedented in history. VICTOR HUGO and MAZZINI, the most eminent of the Democratic chiefs of Europe, have each issued an address to the people of Spain, telling them what they should consider liberty, and what it mean their own ardent hearts. GARIBALDI, who descends to more detail than his brethren, suggests a Dictator for two years and then a republic. VICTOR EMMANUEL MAZZINI on this, at least, wiser than GARIBALDI, that they demand a republic at once. And why postpone it for two years? Deputy Sagasta will not be elected Dictator. Spaniards will not be educated into a republic by two years of dictatorship more than by centuries of monarchy; and to decree the republic two years hence is practically to overthrow it.

There seems as yet to be no man who plainly controls the situation even as LAMARTINE did in France for a few weeks in 1848. George did in France for a few weeks in 1848. George Sand, who is the chief figure of the revolution, has declared for a monarchy, and is supposed not to be unwilling to wear the crown herself; but there seems to be no lack of numerous republican party opposed to him. Indeed, nothing would show the unfitness of PRIM as a leader more than his reported willingness to be king. He ought to know that there has been but one royal family founded in modern times, and that was the result of marvelous power and a dazzling career. Royalty at this time, when thrones are every where tottering, and, like ISABELLA'S, quietly tumbling down, demands a more bewildering prestige than any living man can give it. If Spain is to have a king it must be from an old royal stock, not from a new family. EVEN CROMWELL felt that he could not be king.

The election of the Assembly, which will be virtually a decision of the question, takes place before the holidays; and an election of more peculiar interest has never taken place.

THE GEORGIA QUESTION.

THE Georgia question is interesting, and will require instant attention from Congress. The Fourteenth Amendment was adopted in that State by a Legislature, many of whose members were disqualified from sitting in the Legislature by the amendment itself. The disqualified members then expelled thirty of those who had voted for the amendment upon the ground that they were disqualified by the negro laws of Georgia. If therefore Congress recognize, by their action, the amendment has never been legally adopted, even in the rebel view; and if it adheres to the terms of the amendment, it will reject the votes of those whom the amendment disqualifies.

The intention of the Reconstruction laws was plain. It was to secure to Georgia and the other rebel States a Republican form of Government, as the Constitution requires. If therefore the new Constitution of Georgia arbitrarily disqualifies any innocent class of voters from holding office, or discriminates against their equality of right in any way, it is void as not being republican. If any State law excludes them, it is unconstitutional and void. Congress, of course, does not propose that its purpose shall be defeated. It is not playing a game of wits with lawyers. It has therefore Senators BUCKALEW and HILL present their credentials, it will be the duty of Congress to look into the whole subject; and we have very little doubt that its investigation will be the strongest securement of a uniform rule of suffrage throughout the country. It is preposterous that a citizen of the United States in Vermont should be stigmatized as rebel in a citizen of the United States in Georgia or in New York.

The whole subject of the suffrage is very ill understood in the country, and we have seen no more admirable and conclusive treatment of it than a little pamphlet upon Our Democratic Republic by HOWARD M. JENKINS, of Delaware County, Pennsylvania. The folly of the present system is most poignantly felt. The theory that the States only can control the suffrage is a theory which violates the most vital provisions of the Constitution; and the astonishing assertion of Senator TRUMBULL that "a Republican government does not depend upon the number of people who have a right in the primary election or representatives" is a direct denial of the American principle that governments justly exist only by the consent of the governed.

FOURTH OF JULY.

THE Rev. DANIEL WATKINS appeals to the sympathy of the public in behalf of the Manual Labor School of the colored citizens of Tennessee. It has been chartered by the State, and $15,000 have been subscribed by the citizens of the State of every political and religious party. The Board of Trustees have purchased a tract of land, containing 400 acres, in Rutherford County, 27 miles south from Nashville, and 3 miles north from Murfreesborough, a portion of which is cleared, and 25 acres are put under cultivation this year, yielding, in corn, 3200 bushels; cotton, 7½ bales; sorghum, 1000 gallons; estimated value, $2800. There are over one hundred pupils already on the ground, but there are not sufficient buildings nor farming implements, to say nothing of what is needed for the school-rooms, manufacturing and mechanical branches; so the Board has thought it best to send an agent North to make known the facts, and ask such assistance as friends may be willing and able to give. Mr. WATKINS has the most unqualified recommendation from General GRANT, H. THOMAS, Governor BROWNLOW, and other State officers and citizens of Tennessee, and from the very well-known gentlemen in Philadelphia and New York. We add our hearty commendation of his appeal.

LITERARY

"Tablets," by A. BRONSON ALCOTT (ROBERTS BROTHERS). This is a beautiful book in type, paper, printing, and binding, and it is the work of a serene and beautiful nature. It is a series of essays upon topics ranging from sweet herbs to embryos and immortality, revealing a wide acquaintance with the best literature, a mystic and optimistic view of man and nature, and remarkable literary skill. Mr. ALCOTT'S chief admirer is Mr. EMERSON; but no one can escape the influence of the moral sweetness and purity and repose that breathe from these pages. The book has no points, defends no theories, but commends itself by its wisdom and insight, and will become a permanent part of our literature.

There will be no more superb and intrinsically valuable book of the holiday season than "The Little Passion of Albert Durer," reproduced in fac-simile and edited by W. C. PRIME. (J. W. BOUTON, New York.) Upon the editor's part it is a labor of knowledge and of love, and a more satisfactory work is not often seen. The book consists of a brief and sensible introductory essay upon wood-engraving, and of ALBERT DURER'S work in that way, followed by the thirty-seven cuts representing incidents in the life of CHRIST, designed by DURER, executed by him or under his immediate supervision, and now reproduced "from the original impressions" by photographic process and printing, by the New York Lithographing, Engraving, and Printing Company. Those who are especially interested in art and its history know the peculiar value of this work, and the genius of the master, and can appreciate the very great service which Mr. PRIME has done to the good cause of æsthetic culture. But the series will equally commend itself to every man who can perceive force and beauty and profound passion in engraving. The sublimity of the story is never lost in the quaintness of the aspect under which it is presented; and as "the time draws near the birth of Christ," there is no one who will not highly prize this virorous and famous, yet practically new, version of the great story. Apart from its essential interest, we hope that our readers will not fail to see so tasteful and beautiful a book.

WOMAN'S MODERN ASPIRATIONS

I TELL thee what we want, a clearer space.
More breathing room, some stirring work to do!
"To climb life's hill"—how well you state the case!
Those climb the hill who would enjoy the view.
If true strength is the reward of labor,
Then idiots are all mighty men, I guess.

Soft compliments, indeed, and well expressed!
Love, music, flowers, and other useless matters
Are our rich sisters. Tell me, are the rest—
The thousand poor ones—still in feathers in tatters?
'Tis masculine to doctor, lecture, quibble;
Must women be content to teach or scribble?

"Man hath his tilting tasks"—I grant you so!
And those tasks bring him good substantial payment;
While woman treads the same dull world of woe,
But society gains enough for food and raiment
She, working hard, is buried among graves;
He leaves a fortune to his sons and daughters.

"Our heritage of light" sounds really charming!
But yet it brings no money year by year.
Men were it so with physic, preaching, farming,
You masculines would soon feel rather queer.
Perchance we beat you in our pious notions;
Still, women can't exist on their devotions.

To rule the heart of man 's not our ambition,
We can not, will not keep our own in pupilage;
Thus, you would place us in an odd position—
Failing at home, can we bamboozle him?
Some small intrigue may give a moment's fun.
But, when the prize is gained, what have we won?

Thank God! you can't bring back the Middle Ages,
Or make us quite forget our A B C.
Prate as you may, some women have been sages,
And so in future times they shall be!
Not resting, minus soul, beside the mountain—
The sweetest flowers grow high by wisdom's fountain.

At best all life contains its share of trial—
Mouth feedom's sunlight men can brave the gloom!
Our pain, perhaps, is storm and cloud and dull—
Can we gaze patiently upon our doom?
To serve, to nurse, to tutor, and for all this
To get sometimes a patronizing kiss.

Then let us still be pure, good, and trusting—
Let us be wives as long as men will marry!
A woman not a woman is disgusting,
But independence don't make me despise her.
So, when she leaves homes, friendless, and a savage,
Great work, with gold, or life will be but dreary.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE Alabama Legislature is discussing bills for the abolition of Ku-Klux violence. The bills make it indictable for any person to appear in a mask, and if any person shoots one who is unmasked after dark it is to be considered no crime. The time of imprisonment for being disguised is fixed at from one to ten years.

Attorney-General Evarts has given it as his opinion that the Pacific Railroad Companies have the price to be paid for a day's labor, which must depend entirely on the value of the labor in each case.

General Grant has submitted to the Secretary of War his report on transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and has added a further recommendation of the army at present is not advisable.

FOREIGN NEWS.

LATER returns from the English elections indicate a diminution of the Liberal majority. In the meantime the Conservatives are the anti-papery excitement was violent, and an attempt was made to assassinate Lord Stanley. The victory of this violence will doubtless lead to the agitation of the question of disestablishing the Irish Church, and introducing the ballot.

Another mine explosion has taken place in Wigan, by which fifty-seven persons lost their lives.

H. RIVES POLLARD.

THE assassination of H. RIVES POLLARD, Esq., at Richmond, on the 24th of November, has awakened throughout the country a sensation of aversion for the murderer mingled with detestation for the victim. In Richmond, however, the latter sentiment is uppermost, and the assassin, upon his arrest, was cheered in the streets as if he were a hero.

H. RIVES POLLARD was a native of Virginia, having been born at Alta Vista, in Nelson County, about 30 miles from Lynchburg. He was the son of Major RICHARD POLLARD, an officer in the United States army. He completed his education at the Virginia Military Institute, and held a clerkship for some time in the Post-Office Department in Washington. He was connected with a newspaper in Leavenworth, Kansas, during the troubles in that Territory, and with the Baltimore Sun as news editor when the war commenced. He first became known to the public as the editor of the Richmond Examiner, the newspaper of the late J. M. DANIELS. His writings, sharp and trenchant, were often bitter and personal. After the suppression of the rebellion Mr. POLLARD revived the Examiner, which was subsequently allied with the Times, and after a brief and unsuccessful career was wholly suspended. While the proprietor of this paper he had a personal rencontre in the lobby of the Virginia State House with Messrs. TYLER and COLEMAN, of the Richmond Enquirer, during which several pistol shots were fired. It is somewhat over a year ago that the deceased started the Southern Opinion, a paper representing the extreme political sentiments of the South. Having received a threatening letter from two officers of the United States army, who had or were about to fight a duel, and who had no desire that the particulars should be published, Mr. POLLARD informed General SCHOFIELD and had the parties arrested. This was the last time that he was brought prominently before the public previous to his death. Mr. POLLARD was about 35 years of age. He was about five feet ten inches high, had black eyes and dark complexion, and wore a heavy black beard, which had not been trimmed for years. His manner was cordial to all friends, haughty to foes, and reserved to those with whom he was slightly acquainted.

Mr. POLLARD was the brother of EDWARD A. POLLARD, author of "The Lost Cause." He was, as we have above stated, the editor of the Southern Opinion. On the Saturday previous to his death an article was printed in that paper reflecting upon the character of a daughter of WILLIAM H. GRANT, a wealthy tobacconist in Richmond. The article was purposely insolent; and it is certain that Mr. POLLARD would have shot at sight the editor of any journal which had thus shamefully insulted his own sister. JAMES GRANT, the brother of the girl, moved by a similar feeling, shot Mr. POLLARD on the morning of the 24th as the latter was entering his office at about 10 o'clock. The shot was fired from a third-story window opposite, from a double-barreled gun loaded with buckshot. Mr. POLLARD fell upon his face and immediately expired. It is said that POLLARD'S paper has recently assailed a number of people in Richmond in a very coarse manner, and this fact accounts for the spirit manifested by the citizens toward the assassin.

Mr. EDWARD A. POLLARD, who left New York for Richmond as soon as he received intelligence of the murder, published a card on the 26th, claiming justice for his brother. He asserts truly that the murder was committed in the most cowardly manner, and that the article in question was not written by his brother.

INTERIOR OF AN ALASKA HUT.

THE Indians of the country lately called Russian America, the peninsula opposite Kamtschatka, on the east side of Behring Strait, which has now become a Territory of the United States Government, almost universally adopt underground houses for winter use. Our illustration on page 789 represents the interior of one. They are simply square holes, sometimes lined with logs or boards, the roof alone raised above the level of the soil. The entrance is often a rude shanty on the surface. Passing into this you find a hole in the ground into which dropping you reach a subterranean passage 2½ feet in height, through which you crawl into the chamber. The fire is made on the floor of the room, and when the cooking arrangements are over the embers are thrown out of the "smoke-hole" in the roof, which is then covered tightly with a skin. The entrance-hole is covered in the same way, which, of course, effectually shuts in all warmth, with a good deal of smoke and carbonic acid gas. In fact, so hot are these dwellings in the coldest weather that the Indians are found living inside in a semi-nude condition. The dirt and odor of these houses are often intolerable, and would not suit a squeamish person; but the explorers of the late telegraph expedition were often glad of their shelter in the wintry gales and blinding snowstorms common to this country.

These Indians, though much resembling the Esquimaux in manners and customs, are a finer and larger race of people, the men frequently attaining a higher standard than ourselves; the women almost invariably stout, greasy, and good-humored. These people were much employed by the late Western Union Telegraph expedition.

MY WIFE'S PROMISE.

By MISS M. E. BRADDON.

It was my fate at an early period of my life to abandon myself to the perilous delights of a career which of all others exercises the most potent fascination over the mind of him who pursues it. As a boy I joined a band of brave adventurers in an Arctic expedition, and from the hour in which I first saw the deep cold blue of the northern sea, and felt the subtle influence of the rarefied polar air, I was for all common purposes and objects of life a lost man. The expedition was unfortunate, though its leader was a wise and scientific navigator—his subordinates picked men. The result was bitter disappointment and more bitter loss—loss of valuable lives as well as of considerable funds. I came back from my cruise in the Westhervian, to the western world, rejoiced beyond measure at the idea of being once more at home, and determined never again to face the horrors of that perilous region which had lost me so many dear companions. I, Richard Dunrayne, was the elder son of a wealthy house, my father a man of some influence in the political world, and there were few positions which need have been impossible for me had I aspired to the ordinary career affected by British youth. I had been indulged in my early passion for the sea, in my later rage for Arctic exploration; and it was hoped that, having satisfied these boyish fancies, I should now settle down to a pursuit more consonant with the views and wishes of my people. My mother wept over her restored treasure, and confessed how terrible had been her fears during my absence; my father congratulated me upon having ridden my hobby, and slighted therefrom without a broken neck; and my family anxiously awaited my choice of a profession.

Such a choice I found impossible. If I had bartered myself body and soul, by most explicit formula, to some demon of the icebergs, or incarnate spirit of the frozen sea, I could not have been more completely bound than I was. From the Christmas hearth round which dear friends were gathered, from my low seat at my mother's knee, from worldly wealth and worldly pleasure, the genius of the polar ocean beckoned me away, and all the blessings of my life, all the natural affections of my heart were too weak to hold me. In my dreams, again and again, with maddening repetition, I trod the old paths, and saw, ghastly white against the intense purple of that northern sky, the walls of ice that had blocked our passage. It seemed to me that if I could but find myself again in that dread solitude, success would be a certainty. It seemed to me as if we had held the magic clew to that awful labyrinth between our fingers, and had, in very folly, suffered it to escape us. "A new expedition, aided by the knowledge of the past, must succeed," I said to myself; and when I could no longer fight against the prepossession that held me I consulted the survivors of our unfortunate voyage, and found in their opinions the actual echo of my own convictions.

We met many times, and our meetings resulted in the organization of a new journey. Money was poured into our little treasury like water, so poor a dross did it seem to us compared with the jewel we went to seek. Our preparations had begun before I dared tell those who loved me that I had pledged myself to a second expedition. But at last, one bright spring evening, I went home and announced my decision. I look back now and wonder at my own heartlessness, and yet I was not indifferent to their grief. The cry that my mother gave when she knew the truth rings in my ears as I write this. No; I was not indifferent. I was possessed.

My second voyage resulted in little actual success, but was to me one prolonged scene of enjoyment. I was a skilled seaman and navigator, no indifferent sportsman, and having acquired some slight reputation during the previous voyage, now ranked high among the junior officers on board the Ptarmigan. We wintered at Repulse Bay, with a short stock of fuel, and a shorter supply of provisions; but we managed with a minimum of the former luxury, and supplied all deficiency of the latter by the aid of our guns. Never was a merrier banquet eaten than our Christmas dinner of reindeer steaks and currant dumplings, though the thermometer had sunk 79° below freezing-point, and our jerseys and trowsers sparkled with hoar-frost.

The brief summer of that northern latitude brought us some small triumphs. We spent a second winter in snow-houses, which resembled gigantic bee-hives, and were the snuggest possible habitations, and in the second summer turned our course homeward, in excellent health and spirits. I returned to England to find my mother's grave bright with familiar autumnal flowers in a suburban cemetery, and to know that the tender arms which had clung about me in the hour of parting would never encircle me again. The blow was a severe one, and for some time to come I thought with aversion of that strange northern world which had cost me, and which was yet to cost me, so much.

Time passed, and I remained in England, at five-and-twenty years of age, a broken man. With the men I met I had no point of sympathy. Their pursuits bored me, their paltry ambitions disgusted me. The pleasures of a city life had not the faintest charm for me. A polar bear would have been as much at home as I was in a West End ball-room, and would have been as interested in the conversation of a genteel dinner-table. Away from my old comrades of the Westhervian and the Ptarmigan, I had not a friend for whom I really cared; and as the civilized world grew day by day more distasteful to me, the old longing revived — the old dreams haunted my sleep. In my father's handsome drawing-rooms I yearned for the rough stone cabin of Repulse Bay, or the snow-hives of Cape Crozier. Another expedition was afloat, and letters from my old mountain announced anticipated triumphs, and warned me of the remorse which I should suffer when the hardy victors returned to reproach the idler who preferred to live at home at ease while old friends were drifting among the ice-floes, and bearding the grizzly tyrant of the North.

I let them go without me, at what sacrifice was only known to myself. My father's health had been declining for years, and the horror of that death, and a fear determined not to leave him. This duty at least I would not abnegate. This last sad privilege of attending a father's deathbed I would not barter to the all-exacting demon of the frozen seas. For three empty, patient years I remained at home; my hands folded and closed the eyes that had never looked on me but with affection, and I alone watched the last quiet sleep. This sleep, too, I was free once more and the old infatuation held me close as ever. My father's death left me wealthy, and to my mind wealth had but one use. All the old yearnings were intensified by tenfold for the saddest reason. The Pterwinkle had never been heard of since the hour she left Baffin's Bay, and the fate of those familiar comrades with whom I had lived in the closest companionship for long years was a dark enigma, only to be solved by patient labor. The expedition had not been of sufficient importance to attract much attention from the scientific world; there had been too much of a volunteer and amateur character in the business. But the fact of Sir Pterwinkle's disappearance became known a meeting of the Royal Society gave all due consideration to the case, and promised help to a party of investigation.

My ample fortune enabled me to contribute largely to the sum raised for the new voyage, to volunteers and voluntary contributions poured in from every quarter. I had difficulty in selecting officers and men from a large number of hardy adventurers; but I was prudent enough to engage the crew of a battered old whaler for the staple of my men. All these were men in the years, wintering sometimes in South America—once in New York, and getting our supplies at last we started. We made some discoveries which the Royal Society received with civil approval; but of those we went to seek we found no trace; and I began to think that the fate of my old friends was a mystery never to be solved below the stars.

I came back to England at thirty-four years of age, a hardy wanderer, with a long brown beard that seemed lightly powdered with the northern snow, and with the strength of a lion. For the best years of my life I had lived in snow-huts and snow-caboose, or slept at night amidst the white wilderness of ice to a bear-skin stalwart shoulders had helped to carry during the day. Heaven! what a rough unlicked cub, what a gaping savage I must have been; and what Isabel Lawson loved me! Yes, I came back to England to find a fairer enchantress than the spirit of the frozen seas, and to barter my liberty to a new mistress. One of my sisters had married during my absence, and I was at her house on my first visit to the old abode. The young sister of her husband, Captain Lawson, was here on a visit, and thus I met Isabel.

I will not attempt to describe her; the innocent face, so lovely to my eyes, was perhaps less perfect than I thought it; but the perfection was simply of a shape, it is one that bears no charm for me. Isabel was my junior by sixteen years, and for a considerable period of my companionship she was to me a newly acquired elder brother, whose age gave something of a paternal character to the relationship. For a long time I looked upon her as a beautiful picture, an incarnate presentiment of all that is tender and divine in womanhood, and at her every look and word a new truth to me. I pointed out to her in our summer evening rambles by the sea-shore near our country home.

How I gave to her love! will not ask myself. She was a creature whom to know was to love. How she grew to love me is a mystery I have often tried to solve, and when I have spoken with fear and wondering, why I was so blessed, she told me it was because I was brave and frank and true, and worthy of a woman's love. God help my darling, the glamour of the frozen North was upon me, and the mere story of the wonderous world I knew and magic enough to win me the heart of this angel. She was never tired of hearing me describe that wild region I loved so well. Again and again I let her the thrilling story of my several voyages, and the record seemed always to have a new charm for her.

"I think of every channel in Davis's Strait and Baffin's Bay," she said to me a day or two before our wedding, "and the ice-bound coast, from Repulse Bay to Cape Crozier, and the ice-packs over which you carried your boats, and the shoals of seals and clouds of ducks, and the colony of white whales, and the dear little snowhouses in which you lived so snugly. Don't you think we ought to spend our honey-moon at Cape Crozier, Richard?

"My precious one, God forbid that I should ever see you in such a cold place."

"Be sure, Richard, if you went there, I should follow you."

And she kept her word.

Dream-like, and oh, how mournful! seems the bright current of my wedded day, as I recall it to-night beside a lonely hearth in the house of a stranger. My Isabel looked like a spirit in her airy robe and veil; and I, to whom the memories of the North were ever present, could well-nigh have fancied she was clad in a snow-cloud. I asked her if she were content to have given her young beauty to a battered veteran like me; and she told me yes, a thousand times more than content—inexpressibly happy.

"But you will never leave me, Richard?" she said, looking up at me with divine love in her deep blue eyes; and I promised again, as I had promised many times before, that the North should never drive me away from my beloved.

"You shall be my pole-star, dearest, and I will forget that earth has any wilder region than the woods and hills around our happy home."

My darling loved the country, and I loved all that was dear to her; so I bought a small estate in North Devon—a grange and a few farms in the midst of which we can only be found in that western shire. I was rich, and it was my pride and delight to make our home as beautiful as money and care could make it. The restoration of the house, which was as old as the Tudors, and had undergone many changes, employed me for more than a year—a happy year of home joys with as sweet a wife as Heaven ever gave to man since Adam saw Eve smiling on him among the flowers of Paradise—and during the whole of that time I scarcely thought of the North. With the beginning of our second year of happiness, I had even less inclination to think of my old life: for God had blessed us with a son, pure and blooming and beautiful as the region in which he was born.

Upon this period of my life I dare not linger. For those months of bliss are all my treasure; and if any thing could have drawn us nearer to each other than our love had made us long ago, it was the presence of our new-born child. For him He was taken from us. "The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away: blessed be the name of the Lord." There is no prayer for the agonies of resignation; but it was not resignation—it was despair that subdued the violence of our grief. Our boy, who was born in the bright midsummer sky, while one bird was singing high up in the heaven where I tried to picture him, among the flowers of Paradise—our boy, I knew that his life could never again be to me what it had been. People told me I should perhaps have other children as dear as this.

"If God would give this one back to me He could not blot from my memory his suffering and his death," I answered, impiously.

For some time my sorrow was a kind of stupor—a dull, dead heaviness of the soul, in which nothing could rise above it. Isabel's grief was no less intense, no less bitter; but it was more natural and more sensible. It was the sorrow of a woman of mind, and retreated me to try change of scene.

"Let us go to London, Richard," she said; "I shall be glad to leave this place, beautiful and dear as it is."

Her pale face warned me that she had sad need of change; and for her sake, rather than my own, I took her to London, where we hired a furnished house in a western square.

Being in town, and in the main, with no London tastes and no friends, it is scarcely strange that I should attend the meetings of the Royal Society. The fate of Franklin was yet unknown, and the debates upon this subject were at fever-heat. A new expedition was being fitted out, and by the Government, and there could be no better opportunity for a volunteer band, which might follow in the track of the government ships.

In the rooms of the Society I encountered an old comrade who had sailed with me on my last voyage on board the Weatherwise, and he exerted his utmost powers of persuasion to induce me to join himself and others in a private yacht cruise to search for Franklin and for our lost companions of the Pterwinkle. I was known to be an old hand at the business, and the names of war, adventurous and patient, hardened by many a polar winter; and my friend and his party wanted me for their leader. The proposal flattered me more than I can describe, and caused me the first thrill of pleasure I had known since my poor children left the Pterwinkle to search for me.

"No, Martyn," I answered; "the thing is impossible. I am a married man, and have given my word to my wife never to leave Christendom that I will never go out yonder again."

"But you will keep your promise, Richard?" she asked, when I told her this.

"Until the end of life, my darling, unless you should release me from it."

"Oh, Richard, that is not likely; I am not capable of such a sacrifice."

I went again and again to the Royal Society; and I dined at a club with my friend Martyn, who made me known to his friends, those eager volunteers who panted for the icy winds of the Arctic zone, and lingered for years in the frozen labyrinth of polar seas. I listened to them, I talked with them, and the demon sat close by me, resumed his hold upon me. My wife saw that some new influence was at work, that my home life was no longer all in all to me.

One day, after much anxious questioning, she beguiled me of my secret. The old yearning was upon me. I told her my scheme, and prayer by prayer—every longing of my heart—urged me to join the new enterprise; and how, for her dear sake, I was determined to forego all my passion of pleasure, and the chances of distinction. She thanked me with a sigh.

"You are my duty, and the purpose of your life, Richard," she said; "how selfish I must seem to you!"

"No, darling, only tender and womanly."

Upon my persistent refusal to command the expedition, my friend Martyn was unanimously elected captain. A wealthy brewer of an adventurous turn provided the larger part of the funds, to which I gladly contributed my quota.

"I know Dunraven will go with us," said Frank Martyn. "He'll turn up at the last moment and be sure to join.—But remember, old Dick," he added, turning to me, "if it is the last moment you'll be welcome, and I shall be proud to resign the command to a fellow who knows the Arctic zone as well as a cockney knows Whitechapel."

The preparations for the voyage lasted longer than had been anticipated. Months went by, and I still lingered in town, though I knew that Isabel was longing to return to Devonshire. I could not tear myself away while the Forlorn Hope, the vessel chartered by the brewer, was still in dock. I saw the adventurers almost daily, assisted in their preparations, peved over the chart with them, and traveled over every inch of the old ground with a pencil for their edification.

It was within a week of the departure, and the fever and excitement of preparation was stronger upon me than on any one of the intending voyagers, when I came home to me suddenly one morning, and threw herself, sobbing, into my arms.

"My dear Isabel, what is this?" I asked, in alarm.

"Oh, Richard, you must go," she sobbed; "I can not hold you from your destiny. My selfish fears are telling you. I can see it in your face. You must go to that wild awful world, where Heaven only knows if you in safety before, and will guard and guide you again. Yes, darling, I release you from your promise. In God's name I command you to go yonder than leave me. He made that world of eternal ice and snow, and where He is there is safety. No, Richard; I will not despair. I will pray for courage, and fame. I heard you talking in your sleep last night, as you have talked many nights, of those distant regions, and I know that your heart is there. Shall I keep my husband prisoner when his heart has fled from me? No, Richard, you shall go."

She kissed me and fell fainting at my feet. I was blinded by my own selfish folly, and did not perceive how much fortitude was the courage of despair. I thought only of her generosity and my release. It was not too late for me to accept the command of the Forlorn Hope. I thanked my wife with a hundred kisses as her sweet eyes opened upon me once more.

"My darling, I shall never forget this," I cried; "and it shall be the last journey, the very last. I swear it, by all that is most sacred to me. There is no mercy; believe me, none, for a man who has learned prudence as I have done—in the school of hardship."

There was no need of this love-taking.

"I can bear it better so," said my wife; "such a blow can not be too sudden."

"But, my darling, it is no more than any other absence; and, remember, it is to be the last time."

"No, Richard, do not tell me that. I think I know you better than you know yourself. A man can not serve two masters. Your master is Love. He is a jealous master, Richard."

"But for the last time, Isabel."

"Well, yes," she answered, with a profound sigh, "for the last time, then, and I say good-by next week we shall part for the last time."

The sadness of her tone seemed natural to the occasion; but I remark the melancholy significance of her words.

"I will make you a flag, Richard," she said to me next day. "If you should discover any new spot of land out yonder you will like to have the British standard there, and I should like to think that my hands had assisted with your triumph."

She was at work upon the fabrication of a Union Jack. I remembered a melancholy incident in the life of Sir John Franklin, and I hardly cared to see her thus employed; but I could not sadden her with the story, and she worked on with a happier air than I could have believed possible to her. Alas! in her new ideal of my progress was but an heroic assumption sustained to save me pain.

My darling insisted upon examining my charts, and must see how her every step of our projected journey—the point where we hoped to winter—and the route we intended to explore on sledges—the spots where we should erect cairns to mark our progress. She dwelt on every detail of the journey with an interest intense as my own.

"I think I know that distant world as well as you, Richard, for I have been on the best day of all.

"In my dreams I shall follow you—yes, I know that I shall dream of you every night, and that my spirit will be with you. There must be some magnetic chain between two beings so closely united as we are, and I am sure that sleep will bring me to me as you are—safe or in danger, triumphant or despondent. And in my waking dreams, too, dear, I shall be on your track. My fancy will picture to me the dull commonplace existence at home, where my body must needs be, and the mystic life yonder, where my soul will follow you. And, dear husband," she continued, clinging to me and looking up with a new light in her eyes, "if I should die before you return—"

"Isabel!"

"Of course that is not likely, you know; but if I should be taken away during, you will know it directly. Yes, dear, at the death-hour my spirit will fly to you for the last fond parting look upon earth, as surely as I hope it will await you in heaven!"

I tried to chide her for her weird Scottish superstition; but this speech of hers, and the looks that accompanied it, shook me more than I cared to confess to myself; and if it had been possible to recede with honor, I think I should have resigned the command of the Forlorn Hope, and stayed with my wife. O God, that I had done so at any cost of honor, at any sacrifice of friendship!

But my fate drew me northward, and I went. We started in July, and reached the point that we had chosen for our winter harbor at the end of August. Here we walled our vessel round with snow, and roofed her over; and in this grim solitude prepared to await the opening seas of summer. To me the winter seemed unutterably long and dreary. I was no longer the careless bachelor who found amusement in the rough sports of the sailors, and delight in an occasional raid upon the reindeer of the ice-bound coast. I had indeed tried to save two masters; and the memory of the life I had left behind were ever with me, a reproachful shadow. If, now, I could have recalled the past, and found myself once more by that hearth beside which I had languished for the old life of adventure, how gladly would I have made the exchange!

The long darkness of winter that was so dreary to me seemed pleasant enough to my companions. We had plenty of stores, and all were hopeful as to the explorations of the coming season. We should find the crew of the Ptarmigan, perhaps, hardy dwellers in some inaccessible region, patiently awaiting rescue and release. With such hopeful dreams my comrades beguiled the wasted days; but I had lost my old power of dreaming, and a sense of misery alone sustained my spirits. My friend Frank told me that I was a changed man—cold and stern as the veriest martinet.

"But all the better man for your school," he added. "The sailors love you as much as they fear you, for they feel that they would find you as steadfast as a rock in the hour of peril."

The summer came, the massive ice-packs were loosened with sounds as of thunder, and drifted away before a northern breeze. The sweet freedom brought us nothing save disappointment—no traces of our friends of the Ptarmigan gladdened our eyes, no discovery rewarded our patience. Scurvy had cost us four of our best men, and the crew was already thinned. Before September was ended we had more deaths; and when the next winter began Martyn and I faced it drearily, with the prospect of scanty stores and scanty fuel, and with a sickly and disheartened crew. We had reason to thank God that the poor fellows were enabled to bear their conditions hopelessly.

Before the coldest season set in we left our vessel in tolerably safe harbor, and started on a final expedition. We left bent on every search in spite of the missing Ptarmigan. We had a couple of sledges and a pack of Esquimaux dogs, faithful hardy creatures, who thrived on the roughest fare, and were invaluable to us in this toilsome journey. No words can paint the desolation of this wild region—no mind can imagine that horror of perpetual snow, illimitable as eternal.

Martyn and I worked hard to keep up the flagging spirits of our men. One poor fellow had lost his foot from a frost-bite, and but for our surgeon's clever amputation of the disabled member must have surely perished in this cruise of Esquimaux, but saw none after those from whom we left our dogs.

So we dragged, appalled by the grim change in each other's forms and faces, as short rations and fatigue did their work. The dead winter had made us reduced in number. We built ourselves a roomy snow-house, with a cabin for the dogs; and here my friend Frank Martyn lay down to die, a victim to scurvy invaded through our hopeless Christmas. My own health held out wonderfully. My spirits rose with the extremity of my fate. I found the darkness favorable, finally, beguiling myself with dream-pictures of my return home, and my wife's glad face when she looked up from her lowly cabin and saw me standing on the threshold of the door.

It was Christmas-day. We had dined on pemmican—a particular kind of meat—and hard-biscuit, and ice. Spirit we had none, save a little carefully stored in case of urgent need. After the meal I visited the able men who were all in a body in search of sport for their guns, but with little hope of finding any thing. The invalids were left in charge by the fire of a lamp which served to light our hut, with the aid of a glimmering of cold dull daylight that came to us through a window of transparent ice in the roof.

I was thinking of England and my wife—what else did I ever think of now?—when one of the men rushed hastily into the hut, and fell on the snow-bank that served for a bench. He was white to the lips, and shivering as no man who rises from cold alive.

"Good God, Hanley, what is the matter?" I cried, alarmed by the man's terror.

"I have seen a spirit, Captain," he began, in rapid, gasping accents, "thinking I saw the traces of a bear upon the snow; and I had parted from them about half an hour when I saw—"

His voice died away suddenly, and he sat before me, with lips that moved but made no sound.

"What? For pity's sake speak out, man."

"A woman!"

"Yes; and of an Esquimaux tribe, no doubt. Why didn't you hail, and bring her back to us?

"Why, my dear master, my dear master, I saw the snow; you could scarce call it walking, 'twas such a smooth gliding motion. She was dressed in white—no common dress—but one that turns the heart cold only to think of. While I stood, too scared to move hand or foot, she turned and beckoned to me, and I saw her face as plain as I see yours this moment, a sweet face, with blue eyes, and long fair hair falling loosely round it."

I was on my feet in a moment, and rushing toward the door.

"Great God of heaven!" I cried, "my wife!"

The conviction that possessed me was supreme. From the moment in which the sailor described the figure he had seen, there was no shadow of doubt in my mind. It was Isabel, and she only. The wife who had promised that her spirit should follow me step by step upon my desolate journey was near me now. For one moment only I considered the possibility or impossibility of her presence, and pondered whether some northern-bound vessel might have brought her to an Esquimaux station near at hand that we knew not of; for one instant only, and then I was hurrying across the snow in the direction to which the sailor pointed as he stood at the door of our hut.

The brief winter day was closing in, and there was only a long line of faint yellow light in the west. Eastward the moon was rising, pale and cold like that region of eternal snow. I had left our hut some two hundred yards behind me, when I saw a white-robed figure moving toward the low western light; a figure at once so dear, so familiar, and yet in that place so awful, that an icy shiver shook me from head to heel as I looked upon it.

The figure turned and beckoned. The sweet face looked at me, awfully distinct in that clear cold light. I followed, and it drew me on, far across a patch of snowy waste that I had left unexplored, or had no memory of traversing until now. I tried to overtake the familiar form, but though its strange gliding movement seemed slow, it eluded my pursuit, follow swiftly as I might. In this manner we crossed the wide bleak waste, and as the last glimmer of the western light died out, and the moon shone brighter on the frozen plain, we came to a spot where the snow lay in mounds—seven separate mounds ranged in the form of a cross beneath that wild northern sky.

A glance told me that civilized hands had done this work. The Christian emblem told me more. But though I saw the snow-mounds at my feet, my eyes seemed never to leave the face of my wife—O God, how pale in the moonlight!

She pointed with extended finger to one of the mounds, and I saw that it was headed by a rough wooden board, almost buried in snow. To snatch a knife from my belt, throw myself on my knees, and begin to scrape the coating of mingled ice and snow from this board, was the work of a moment. When I looked up I was alone beneath the wintry sky. My wife was gone. I knew then what I had felt from the first—that it was her shadow I had followed over that wintry waste, and that on earth she and I would never look upon each other again.

She had kept her promise as truly as I had broken mine. The gentle spirit had pursued me to that desolate world in the very moment it was liberated from its earthly prison.

It was late that night when Hanley and his messmates found me lying senseless on the snow-mound, with the open knife beside my stiffening hand.

They brought me back to life somehow, and by the light of the lanterns they carried we examined the board at the head of the mound. An inscription roughly cut upon it told us we had found the lost crew of the Ptarmigan:

"Here lies the body of Morris Haynes, commander of the Ptarmigan, who died in this unknown region January 30, 1829, aged 35."

The other mounds also had head-boards bearing inscriptions, which we dug out from the snow on the following day, and carefully transcribed. After this we found a cairn containing empty provision-tins, in one of which was a book that had evidently been used for a journal; but rust and snow had done their work, and of this journal nothing was decipherable but the name of the writer, Morris Haynes.

These investigations were not made by me. The new year found me laid low with rheumatic fever, and Frank Martyn had to take his turn as sick-nurse beside the snow-bank where I lay. Our provisions held out better than we had expected, thanks to the game our men shot, and the patience with which they endured privation. The spring came, and with it release. We contrived to make our way to Baffin's Bay—a consummation I had scarcely thought possible in my dreary reveries of mid-winter—and a Greenland whaler brought us safely home.

I went straight to the town-house of my brother-in-law. He was at home, and came without delay to the library where I had been ushered, and where I sat awaiting him with a gloomy face.

Yes; as I expected: he was in mourning: and behind him came my sister, with a pale face, on which there was no smile of greeting.

Lawson held out both his hands to me.

"Richard," he began, in a faltering voice, "God knows I never thought it possible I could be otherwise than glad of your coming home—but—"

"That will do," I said; "you need tell me no more. My wife is dead."

He bent his head solemnly.

"She died on the twenty-fifth of last December, at four o'clock in the afternoon."

"You have been told, then," cried my sister; "you have seen some one?"

"Yes," I answered, "I have seen her!"

THE WHIPPING-POST AND PILLORY IN DELAWARE.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin on the 21st of November wrote a graphic description of the whipping-post and pillory at New Castle, Delaware, and the barbarities that day inflicted upon the victims of these instruments of punishment—the relics of a former and less enlightened age.

It is not to be wondered at that a State which has no free schools should be behind others in civilization. But we should scarcely expect to find, even under these circumstances, the perpetuation of a penal code which was a disgrace to the eighteenth century, and which was long ago abolished by all the civilized nations of the world.

In Delaware men are hung not only for murder, but also for rape, arson, and burglary; and up to the time of the passage of the Civil Rights Bill by Congress the law made a gross and partial distinction between white and black offenders. "A white man was imprisoned and flogged for an offense for which a negro was hung. A crime which brought a white man to the whipping-post placed a free negro upon the block, where he was auctioneered to the highest bidder, and sold into a wickeder slavery than any that ever existed in the rice swamps of Georgia."

In 1791 even English bigotry and conservatism consented to stop flogging females; but in Delaware, "thirteen years ago, white and black women were publicly whipped in this Christian town of New Castle. Dragged from prison into the jail-yard, the sheriff stripped them naked to the waist in the presence of a multitude of shameless men, and then, tying them to the whipping-post, gashed their backs with a whip until the blood spurted from them. Not content with this infamy, but a few years since the law often required that the sheriffs should seize his shears and crop the ears of his fair victims, very much as those of a dog are cut, bringing them to sharp points. Sheriffs in those days had not only to be simple brutes, but to have skill in the brutal fine arts as well. It was not every man who could slice a female ear with precision and tastefulness."

The whipping of women was abolished by the legislators of Delaware in 1855, but they still flog little children.

"There were," says the correspondent from whom we have quoted, "seven persons whipped here to-day [New Castle, November 21], and the ancient instrument of torture trembled again, as it has done for half a century, in the terrible embrace of its victims. It is a curious old relic of a semi-civilization that is forgotten every where else but here. It consists of a sturdy post a foot square. Three feet from the ground it pierces a small platform; and five feet above this there is a cross-piece, which contains, in each of its arms, a hole for the neck and two holes for the wrists of the miserable wretch who is to suffer its torture. The upper half of the arm lifts to admit the victim, and then closes sufficiently tight upon him to impede the circulation of the blood. It is fastened down with a wooden wedge-shaped key, shot into the centre post.

"The whole machine looks like a gigantic cross, with a platform half-way down its length. It is black with age, covered with patches of green mould and moss, and shrunken and split until the grain of the wood protrudes in ridges. It is as worm-eaten and decayed as the villainous code which sustains it; its unsightly, disgusting presence is a worthy type of the conservatism which makes these people laggard in the march of humanity and progress.

"There are three of these pillories in the State—in New Castle, Georgetown, and Dover. They stretch along down the peninsula like tide-posts, marking the shoal waters of barbarism amidst the weltering, fathomless sea of surrounding civilization. The New Castle pillory stands in the jail-yard. A few years ago it boldly faced the world upon the public common. It is a happy omen of its final destruction that its devotees were so much ashamed of it that they hid it in this inclosure. Across the street stands a church, and behind the jail there is another. To-day their walls echoed the screams of St. Pillory's victims as they writhed beneath the lash; to-morrow they will resound with praises and supplications to a God who is merciful as well as just."

Who are the criminals and what the crimes which demand this barbarous penalty? Here is the case of a boy twelve years old:

"Matthew Perry picked up a piece of pig-iron, said—improbably—to be worth seventy-five cents. Chief-Justice Gilpin and Judge Houston, two venerable magistrates backed by society against one small child, declared that he should 'pay seventy-five cents restitution money, the costs of his prosecution, be whipped with twenty lashes on his bare back, be imprisoned for six months, and be compelled to wear a convict's dress in public for six months after his discharge.'"

At 10 o'clock, when the gates of the jail-yard swung open, and the orgies in honor of St. Pillory were about to commence, "by actual count there were 125 little girls and boys present, some of them not more than four or five years of age.

"The entertainment began by the introduction of William Jones to the audience. Mr. Jones had stolen store goods worth thirty-eight dollars, and he was sentenced to return that amount of money, stand in the pillory for one hour, be whipped with twenty lashes, be imprisoned for six months, and wear a convict's dress for six months after his release.

"The first thing in order was the pillory. William ascended the long ladder rather sadly, and the jailer, having placed his neck and hands in the holes, fastened the top bar upon them, and came down to the ground. The criminal was taller than the stock, and he was compelled to bend down just enough to make his position intensely painful. A keen, piercing northeast wind swept in from the broad expanse of the river, and compelled the spectators to blow warmth upon their fingers. Mr. Jones had his circulation stopped, but he could not blow upon his hands.

"The jagged, splintered edge of the wooden collar rasped his neck until it tore the skin, and whenever he attempted to move his head to make his position more easy, the bar would catch the upper part of his jaw-bone, and give him exquisite torture.

"'Jailer, isn't that pretty severe?'

"'Well, yes, it's a very uncomfortable position; and then his fingers and face get numb, you see.'

"A few years ago the crowd used to hoot at the pillory-hugged man, and pelt him with mud and filth. When the fathers of these children were boys they saved up all the cats that died and the eggs which were spoiled in the town for the purpose of 'vindicating the outraged majesty of the law' upon criminals who stood in this very pillory; and the poor wretches were often disfigured for life in one hour. It is a triumph for decency that this infamous custom has been abolished. The boys now only dispute the question of the discomfort or comfort of the sufferer."

When Mr. Jones has been reduced to a state of exhaustion he is taken back to his cell; but he has a lashing to bear yet.

"The Sheriff came out with the 'cat' in his hand. This venerable weapon consists of a stout handle about two feet long, with nine lashes of somewhat greater length. The thongs are made of thick leather, twisted together, and as hard as wire. They have been soaked with blood before this, and it has dried upon them until their edges are as sharp as knives."

The first candidate for the lash was the boy alluded to above, who stole seventy cents' worth of pig-iron. He receives his twenty lashes; then a boy of 14 receives as many more; then Mr. Mulloney, who has stolen a pair of drawers, submits to a like number.

"Then there was a piteous sight. An old man of 70 years, decrepit, feeble, and very lame, hobbled out, his gray hairs streaming in the wind. He wanted a shirt, Heaven knows, badly enough this bitter winter weather, and he had very wickedly stolen it. He had none on now. The jailer fastened him to the post, and snatched the blanket from his back. His skin was yellow and wrinkled, and it had scars upon it. The lashes fell, and the old man's whole frame was convulsed with agony. He writhed under each blow as if it was unendurable, and at last he put his head down and cried like a child. Most of the spectators were affected. I would like to have had the unjust judges and the Delaware law-makers look that poor, broken-down old wretch in the face then."

But we will not continue the story of these punishments through its revolting details to the end. The examples which we have given are sufficient. Even while we are writing (November 28) another public flogging like that above described is going on in Delaware.

WESTERN MEN.

The Western character develops freedom and takes in large calculations. This is more true of the man of Western cities than of the farmer and the frontier man, but still the character applies to all. A Western man thinks nothing of going one thousand or one thousand five hundred miles, and has no traditional feud with any class of Jew or Gentile. The elements of various nationalities flowing together Westward form a strong and tolerant community. If a man out West has his horse stolen, he mounts another and traces the thief; shoots him if he can. The extending prairies, immense lakes, grand rivers, seem to enlarge the whole conception of things. The big farm yields thousands of bushels of grain. The Western man may have twenty horses, a hundred mules, and a thousand head of cattle grazing in his pastures, and five hundred pigs fattening in his fields. He reads the prices-current; knows all that is going on; forms his own opinions, and is loud and bold in the expression of them. He is a man of patient courage, who will lose thousands of dollars by the fall of the market, and make less account of it than he would of the laming of a favorite horse or the loss of a faithful dog. If he doesn't turn his loss off with a laugh, and is pushed to speak of it, you may see the gleam of stern grit flashing from his eyes, as he tells you he will do better next time. He is full of reckless and mercurial daring. As impulsive as the Southerner, and yet practical in all things, he sees and takes always the short cut to his end. Feeling about the sacred character of ancestral acres never disturbs the mind of a man whose possessions were reclaimed from the wilds but yesterday, and may be left to-morrow. Whatever he has he will sell; and whatever you own he is willing to buy, providing he can make some "boot" on it. With him all things were made to buy and sell. A frontier man once described to me, without the least idea of the strange character of the transaction, how he had "traded off a Bible for a plaguy good fiddle." If any thing you have on you or about you strike his fancy, he will at once offer to buy it, and has no notion that certain pieces of property mayn't be for sale.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An "Attractive Science"—Magnetism.

"Dead as Chelsea" is a common phrase, and a good many complain of that city as somewhat slow. An old lady, possibly a friend of Mrs. Partington, declares she likes it, "because it's such a local place."

A professor of natural history, who is sometimes quite absent-minded, while hearing a class in zoology, put the question: "Did you ever see a porpoise?" "No, Sir." Professor, very forcibly, as was his wont: "The next. Did you ever see a porpoise?" "No, Sir." "The next. Did you ever see a porpoise?" "No, Sir." At this point, forgetting that his question was entirely extraneous, he closed the book with a bang, and an indignant "Take this lesson again," amidst the laughter of the class.

"Pa, will you get me a new pair of skates if I'll prove to you that a dog has ten tails?" "Yes, my son." "Well, to begin, one dog has one more tail than no dog, hasn't he?" "Yes." "Well, no dog has nine tails; and if one dog has one more tail than no dog, then one dog must have ten tails." The father gave the boy his skates.

THOUGHTS WHILE SEWING.

BY AN OLD MAID.

Men sow wild oats, and women buttons.

The shortest way to a man's heart is down his throat.

Man's love is like the moon: if it does not grow larger, it is certain to grow smaller.

A man may "do good by stealth," but as for his blushing "to find it fame," that's all nonsense.

Man shrinks from cold meat. Does this arise from man's innate presumption of always ruling the roast?

Man takes a woman with a dowry in the same way that he accepts the hamper that brings him a handsome present of game.

Men have two ways of extinguishing the flame of love—they either let it burn out quietly, or else they snuff it out by one blow.

In a dilemma, during the time a man has been standing like a fool, fumbling for an excuse, a woman will have invented ten thousand.

Wives are often foolish enough to sit up for their husbands, but you hear of few husbands who have the patience to sit up for their wives.

Biddy came back from whortleberrying, and was asked if she found the berries plenty. "Sure, yes," said she; "but the dry weather has made them so small that it takes the whole of a peck to make a quart."

BLUE PILLS VERSUS EXERCISE.

"Blue pill, Madam? Stuff and nonsense, Madam. You can't want more pills; take exercise, Madam, not blue pill," cried an honest doctor to a sluggish patient. "Take exercise; it's only lazy folks who want so much blue pill." The celebrated Dr. Abernethy, who, after listening to a long list of ailments, detailed by the anxious mother of a languid daughter, growled out, as he put on his hat, and returned a shilling of his fee, "Buy her a skipping-rope."

L—— is a rising young Boston lawyer. As was said of another, he speaks several languages fluently, especially the profane. In trying a case before a referee, the opposing counsel had occasion to comment upon L——'s treatment of a witness on cross-examination.

"You brow-beated Mr. Davis shamefully" (emphatically).

"As incorrect in fact, your Honor, as ungrammatical in tense" (good-naturedly).

"I made it imperfect."

"Yes, d—d imperfect," said L——, sotto voce.

THE STATE OF THE MARKETS.

Breadstuffs—Rising every day.
Gunpowder—Goes off easily.
Bitter Beer—This article has a downward tendency.
Indigo—The trade is dyeing.
Pickled Pork—Dead and very inactive.
Brandy—Very spirited.
Vermilion—Finds a reddy sale.
Nutmegs—In grater demand.
Soda Water—Brisk and lively.
Lead—Very heavy.

Two French ladies were looking for the little daughter of one of them in a group of baby-carriages. "Do you see him?" asked the friend of the mother. "Him? I am looking for her nurse." "Her nurse?" "Yes. All children look alike. I know the nurse, and I can find the child best in that way." "As for myself, I think all bonnes look alike." "How do you find yours then?" "Oh, I know the soldier who is her beau."

ADVOCATES OF WOMAN'S RIGHTS NOT REPRESENTED AT THE LATE CONVENTION.

The lady who thinks she has a right to the best seat.

The ladies who think they have a right to sweep the sidewalk with their dresses, and monopolize it for their own exclusive use.

The lady who thinks she has a right to wear a wafer for a bonnet, and dress her child in thin clothes, in winter.

The lady, next door, who thinks she has a right to drive the whole neighborhood to the borders of distraction by practicing her high notes till eleven P.M.

The lady who claims to have a right to visit her own kitchen, at her own pleasure, and the cook no right to oppose her.

The house-maid who thinks it her right to put the papers in your library to rights.

The mother-in-law who thinks she has a right to visit her dear daughter twice a month, and regulate all matters in the household—without consulting the husband.

A wee bit of a boy having been slightly chastised by his mother, sat very quietly in his chair for some minutes afterward, no doubt thinking very profoundly. At last he spoke out thus: "Muzzer, I wish dad would get anuzzer housekeeper—I've got tired o' seein' you round."

SNUFF-TAKING.

What a moment, what a doubt!
All my nose is inside out—
All my thrilling, tickling caustic,
Pyramid rhinocerostic.
Wants to sneeze, and can not do it!
How it yearns me, thrills me, stings me!
How that rapturous torment fills me!
Now says, "Sneeze, you goose, get through it."
Shee—shee—oh, 'tis most del-ishi!
Ishi—ishi—most delishi!
(Hang it, I shall sneeze till spring!)
Snuff's a most delicious thing.

A North Carolina rebel was relating how "the Yanks" fired upon his company while marching through a thick wood. They gladly obeyed an order to lie down, but there was nothing to shield them from the terrible volleys of the enemy. "Why didn't you get behind a tree?" asked a listener. "Tree," replied reb, "there wasn't trees enough for the officers."

NEW RECIPES.

To Remove Stains in Silk.—Place the part which is soiled on any warm, hard substance—a red-hot stove, for instance—and, having prepared the stuff by slightly rubbing it briskly with a rough brick, gradually smear it with the following mixture: To two parts gum goober add one part vulcanized chicory—any part will do—dissolve in three parts codlivroleum till it becomes of the consistency of cold whalebone. Having worked the ingredients till they form a separate mass, take a knife and fork—one with three tines if procurable—and skillfully cut out the damaged part with any sharp instrument such as a rolling-pin—then rub the hole for a few months with lemon-peel and sealing-wax, and expose to the sun in a dark chamber for several nights.

Cheap and Delicious Tea Cakes.—Take 7½ pounds superfine fourth-proof flour—it should be taken when no one is in the store or it will be difficult to keep—cut the flour in small slices according to the size and spread it on a board, which should set perfectly level on one corner. Having filled a large tub with equal parts of saltpetre and onion-peelings—the blue Berkshire three-square onions are best—drain off the extra shortening that will form in a crust; and, having simmered the remaining ingredients in a close vessel—a colander will answer—mix up the whole and beat together for two or three days; then bake immediately in a leaden stew-pan. Some cooks use a green canvas bag; but we can not caution our readers enough against the deleterious effects produced by the vermifuge which forms the concrete of this article.

N.B.—These cakes should not all be eaten the first day unless required, and care should be taken in boiling them not to let them get warm. They may be eaten with vinegar, or served up with petroleum sauce.

"THE LAST RELIC."—[DRAWN BY CHARLES A. BARRY.]

SANTIAGO DE CUBA.—[SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN P. JACKSON.]

SANTIAGO DE CUBA.

THE most contradictory reports have reached us during the past months in regard to the movements of the Cuban revolutionists. Those which come from official sources speak of the uprising as if it were nothing more than a disturbance caused by desperadoes for the purpose of plunder, and predict the speedy restoration of order. On the other hand, the agents of the revolutionists would have us believe that the movement is as important, as profound in its motives, and as likely to succeed as the revolution which has lately taken place in the mother country.

It would seem that the establishment of a liberal government at Madrid would have furnished the most inopportune season for rebellion against Spanish authority; but, in our opinion, the sole cause of the revolution is a desire to secure the independence of Cuba, and the present time was chosen because it was a period of disorder in Spanish affairs, and without any reference to the ultimate issue—whether success or failure—of the Provisional Government at Madrid.

The chief of the rebels is General CESPEDES, who, on the 4th of November, had his headquarters at Bayamo, the seat of the so-called Provisional Government in Cuba. The rebels were then within four miles of Santiago de Cuba, and this town has been invested by the insurgents. Over one hundred of the principal families have embarked for Jamaica. A proclamation has been issued by the rebels in reply to that lately promulgated by Count BALMASEDA (the Captain-General's lieutenant), and which gave the revolutionists eight days to surrender. This rebel manifesto orders all native-born Spaniards to leave the territory occupied by the "patriots" within twenty-four hours, and all Cubans between 18 and 45 are called upon to take up arms for the independence of Cuba. About the first of the month CESPEDES's army numbered 9700 men.

We give on this page a view of Santiago de Cuba, now invested by the rebels. The seat of government in Cuba was first established at Baracoa, and transferred thence to Santiago de Cuba, where it remained until its removal to HAVANA. Santiago is situated on the south side of the island and crowns an eminence; at a few leagues distance rises a chain of mountains, of an average height of 8000 feet, overlooking the town and its splendid bay—the same range which intersects the island longitudinally and diffuses itself by spurs over nearly the entire surface. This chain consists principally of granite, mingled with gneiss and sienite, overlaid by secondary and tertiary formations more or less calcareous and abounding in fossils. The "Cobre," at one time one of the richest copper mines in the world, is situated in one of these mountains a few miles inland and northwest of the town. Over one of these mines is erected the far-famed chapel to the Virgin of the Catholic population. A curious legal question arose a few years ago as to how deep the earth was consecrated! Working at the mines was recently stopped because of the oppressive royalty imposed by the now exiled Queen Isabella.

A large military hospital has been erected east of the town, which would compare favorably with any similar institution in the world. The barracks have recently been commenced. A chain of forts is destined to encircle the eminence upon which the town stands, but the money devoted to this purpose has thus far barely paid the engineers for drawing out the plans.

Santiago has a more antique appearance than any of the other large towns on the island, and is picturesque and imposing when viewed from a little distance. The houses are painted blue, red, yellow, and green. The streets in some parts are very precipitous, following the steep declivity of the hills, but are built at right angles, except where from necessity they wind around the hills. Being narrow, and the houses being provided with iron gratings, these streets would afford abundant protection to the insurgents. The prison, which is always protected by a guard of soldiers, is a strong building for defenses.

The town is ornamented by a Plaza, laid out with taste, and studded with beautiful trees. The Cathedral occupies one entire side of the square, and is opposite the Governor's mansion. There is a free public library containing 40,000 volumes, and the nucleus of a museum. The population of the town is about 25,000.

THE REVOLUTION IN SPAIN.

Our illustration on page 793 represents the unwonted condition of Madrid in these days of popular excitement, and the strange proceedings in which large numbers of the laboring-class inhabitants are now engaged since they have been thrown out of employment by the general interruption of trade. Some thousands are now paid and fed by the Provisional Government, as was done at Paris for some months after the French Revolution of February, 1848, and, as their services are not required for any really useful or urgent work, it has been thought fit to set them to the task of demolishing the old city walls. They seem to take this job very easily, as might, indeed, be expected, knowing that they will get their daily rations and wages so long as the Provisional Government has any money in hand, unless the secure establishment of a powerful and effective administration should allow them to be dismissed without endangering the peace of the city. Our sketch represents the emancipated populace destroying a very obnoxious institution—the executioner's scaffold—in an open space outside the city. The mode of inflicting capital punishment in Spain is rather peculiar, being neither by the gallows nor by the guillotine, but strangulation by the garrote, which is a small wire hoop, passed round the culprit's neck as he sits with his back to an upright post; so that when the executioner, standing behind the post, draws the wire forcibly back, the throat of the doomed man is at once compressed, and death is instantly caused. The Provisional Government has already decreed the abolition of capital punishment; but this will, of course, be a question for future legislation.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER V

A FIRST DINNER-PARTY.

I was made "presentable" in due time, and on the fifth day after my arrival made my appearance at the dinner-table. "Sit there, Sir," said my father, "opposite me." And I was not sorry to perceive that an enormous vase with flowers effectually screened me from his sight. The post of honor thus accorded me was a sufficient intimation to my father's guests how he intended me to be treated by them; and as they were without an exception all hangers-on and dependents—men who dined badly or not at all when uninvited to his table—they were marvelously quick in understanding that I was to be accepted as his heir, and, after himself, the person of most consideration there.

Besides the three individuals I have already mentioned, our party included two foreigners—Baron Steinmetz, an aid-de-camp of the King, and an Italian duke, San Giovanni. The duke sat on my father's right, the baron on mine. The conversation during dinner was in French, which I followed imperfectly, and was considerably relieved on discovering that the German spoke French with difficulty, and blundered over his genders as hopelessly as I should have done had I attempted to talk. "Ach Gott," muttered he to himself in German, "when people were seeking for a common language, why didn't they take one that all humanity could pronounce?"

"So mein ich auch, Herr Baron," cried I; "I quite agree with you."

He turned toward me with a look of positive affection, on seeing I knew German, and we both began to talk together at once with freedom.

"What's the boy saying?" cried my father, as he caught the sounds of some glib speech of mine. "Don't let him bore you with his bad French, Steinmetz."

"He is charming me with his admirable German," said the baron. "I can't tell when I have met a more agreeable companion."

This was of course a double flattery, for my German was very bad, and my knowledge on any subject no better; but the fact did not diminish the delight the praise afforded me.

"Do you know German, Digby?" asked my father.

"A little—a very little, Sir."

"The fellow would say he knew Sanscrit, if you asked him," whispered Hotham to Eccles; but my sharp ears overheard him.

"Come, that's better than I looked for," said my father. "What do you say, Eccles? Is there stuff there?"

"Plenty, Sir Roger; enough and to spare. I count on Digby to do me great credit yet."

"What career do you mean your son to follow?" asked the Italian, while he nodded to me over his wine-glass in most civil recognition.

"I'll not make a sailor of him, like that sea-wolf yonder; not a diplomatist, like my silent friend in the corner. Neither shall he be a soldier, till British armies begin to do something better than hunt out illicit stills and protect process-servers."

"A politician, perhaps?"

"Certainly not, Sir. There's no credit in belonging to a Parliament brought down to the meridian of soap-boilers and bankrupt bill-brokers."

"There's the Church, Sir Roger," chimed in Eccles.

"There's the Pope's Church, with some good prizes in the wheel; but your branch, Master Bob, is a small concern, and it is trembling besides. No. I'll make him none of these. It is in our vulgar passion for money-getting we throw our boys into this or that career in life, and we narrow to the stupid formula of some profession abilities that were meant for mankind. I mean Digby to deal with the world; and to fit him for the task he shall learn as much of human nature as I can afford to teach him."

"Ah, there's great truth in that, very great truth; very wise and very original too," were the comments that ran round the board.

Excited by his theme, and elated by his success, my father went on:

"If you want a boy to ride, you don't limit him to the quiet hackney that neither pulls nor shies, neither bolts nor plunges; and so, if you wish your son to know his fellow-man, you don't keep him in a charmed circle of deans and archdeacons, but you throw him fearlessly into contact with old debauchees like Hotham, or abandoned scamps of the style of Cleremont"—and here he had to wait till the laughter subsided to add, "and, last of all, you take care to provide him with a finishing tutor like Eccles."

"I knew your turn was coming, Bob," whispered Hotham; but still all laughed heartily, well satisfied to stand ridicule themselves if others were only pilloried with them.

When dinner was over, we sat about a quarter of an hour, not more, and then adjourned to coffee in a small room that seemed half boudoir, half conservatory. As I loitered about, having no one to speak to, I found myself at last in a little shrubbery, through which a sort of labyrinth meandered. It was a taste of the day revived from olden times, and amazed me much by its novelty. While I was puzzling myself to find out the path that led out of the entanglement I heard a voice I knew at once to be Hotham's saying:

"Look at that boy of Norcott's; he's not satisfied with the imbroglio within doors, but he must go out to mystify himself with another."

"I don't much fancy that young gentleman," said Cleremont.

"And I only half. Bob Eccles says we have all made a precious mistake in advising Norcott to bring him back."

"Yet it was our only chance to prevent it. Had we opposed the plan, he was sure to have determined on it. There's nothing for it but your notion, Hotham; let him send the brat to sea with you."

"Yes, I think that would do it." And now they had walked out of ear-shot, and I heard no more.

If I was not much reassured by these droppings I was far more moved by the way in which I came to hear them. Over and over had my dear mother cautioned me against listening to what was not meant for me; and here, simply because I found myself the topic, I could not resist the temptation to learn how men would speak of me. I remembered well the illustration by which my mother warned me as to the utter uselessness of the sort of knowledge thus gained. She told me of a theft some visitor had made at Abbotsford—the object stolen being a signet-ring Lord Byron had given to Sir Walter. The man who stole this could never display the treasure without avowing himself a thief. He had therefore taken what from the very moment of the fraud became valueless. He might gaze on it in secret with such pleasure as his self-accusings would permit. He might hug himself with the thought of possession; but how could that give pleasure or how drown the everlasting shame the mere sight of the object must revive? So would it be, my mother said, with him who unlawfully possessed himself of certain intelligence which he could not employ without being convicted of the way he gained it. The lesson thus illustrated had not ceased to be remembered by me; and though I tried all my casuistry to prove that I listened without intention, almost without being aware of it, I was shocked and grieved to find how soon I was forgetting the precepts she had labored so hard to impress upon me.

She had also said, "By the same rule which would compel you to restore to its owner what you had become possessed of wrongfully, you are bound to let him you have accidentally overheard know to what extent you are aware of his thoughts."

"This much at least I can do," said I; "I can tell these gentlemen that I heard a part of their conversation."

I walked about for nigh an hour revolving these things in my head, and at last returned to the house. As I entered the drawing-room I was struck by the silence. My father, Cleremont, and the two foreigners were playing whist at one end of the room, Hotham and Eccles were seated at chess at another. Not a word was uttered save some brief demand of the game, or a murmured "check" by the chess-players. Taking my place noiselessly beside these latter, I watched the board eagerly to try and acquire the moves.

"Do you understand the game?" whispered Hotham.

"No, Sir," said I, in the same cautious tone.

"I'll show you the moves, when this party is over." And I muttered my thanks for the courtesy.

"This is intolerable," cried out my father. "That confounded whispering is far more distracting than any noise. I have lost all count of my game. I say, Eccles, why is not that boy in bed?"

"I thought you said he might sup, Sir Roger."

"If I did it was because I thought he knew how to conduct himself. Take him away at once."

And Eccles rose, and with more kindness than I had expected from him, said, "Come, Digby, I'll go too, for we have both to be early risers to-morrow."

Thus ended my first day in public, and I have no need to say what a strange conflict filled my head that night as I dropped off to sleep.

CHAPTER VI.

HOW THE DAYS WENT OVER.

If I give one day of my life, I give, with very nearly exactness, the unbroken course of my existence. I rose very early—hours ere the rest of the household was stirring—to work at my lessons, which Mr. Eccles apportioned for me with a liberality that showed he had the highest opinion of my abilities, or—as I discovered later on to be the truth—a profound indifference about them. Thus a hundred lines of Virgil, thirty of Xenophon, three propositions of Euclid, with a sufficient amount of history, geography, and logic, would be an ordinary day's work. It is fair I should own that when the time of examination came I found him usually imbibing seltzer and curaçoa, with a wet towel round his head; or, in his robuster moments, practicing the dumb-bells to develop his muscles. So that the interrogatories were generally in this wise:

"How goes it, Digby? What of the Homer—eh?"

"It's Xenophon, Sir."

"To be sure it is. I was forgetting, as a man might who had my headache. And, by-the-way, Digby, why will your father give Burgundy at supper instead of Bordeaux? Some one must surely have told him accidentally it was a deadly poison, for he adheres to it with desperate fidelity."

"I believe I know my Greek, Sir," would I say, modestly, to recall him to the theme.

"Of course you do; you'd cut a sorry figure here this morning if you did not know it. No, Sir; I'm not the man to enjoy your father's confidence and take his money, and betray my trust. His words to me were, 'Make him a gentleman, Eccles. I could find scores of fellows to cram him with Greek particles and double equations, but I want the man who can turn out the perfect article—the gentleman.' Come now, what relations subsisted between Cyrus and Xenophon?"

"Xenophon coached him, Sir."

"So he did. Just strike a light for me. My head is splitting for want of a cigar. You may have a cigarette, too. I don't object. Virgil we'll keep till to-morrow. Virgil was a muff, after all. Virgil was a decentish sort of Martin Tupper, Digby. He had no wit, no repartee, no smartness; he prosed about plows and shepherds, like a maudlin old squire; or he told a very shady sort of anecdote about Dido, which I always doubted should be put into the hands of youth. Horace is free too, a thought too free; but he couldn't help it. Horace lived the same kind of life we do here, a sort of roast-partridge and pretty woman sort of life; but then he was the gentleman always. If old Flaccus had lived now, he'd have been pretty much like Bob Eccles, and putting in his divinity lectures perhaps. By-the-way, I hope your father won't go and give away that small rectory in Kent. 'We who live to preach, must preach to live.' That isn't exactly the line, but it will do. Pulvis et umbra sumus, Digby; and, take what care we may of ourselves, we must all go back, as the judges say, to the place from whence we came. There now, you've had classical criticism, sound morality, worldly wisdom, and the rest of it; and, with your permission, we'll pack up the books, and stand prorogued till—let me see—Saturday next."

Of course I moved no amendment, and went my way rejoicing.

From that hour I was free to follow my own inclinations, which usually took a horsey turn, and as the stable offered several mounts, I very often rode six hours a day. Hotham was always to be found in the pistol-gallery about four of an afternoon, and I usually joined him there, and speedily became more than his match.

"Well, youngster," he would say, when beaten and irritable, "I can beat your head off at billiards, any how."

But I was not long in robbing him of even this boast, and in less than three months I could defy the best player in the house. The fact was, I had in a remarkable degree that small talent for games of every kind which is a specialty with certain persons. I could not only learn a game quickly, but almost always attain considerable skill in it.

"So, Sir," said my father to me one day at dinner—and nothing was more rare than for him to address a word to me, and I was startled as he did so—"so, Sir, you are going to turn out an Admirable Crichton on my hands, it seems. I hear of nothing but your billiard-playing, your horsemanship, and your cricketing, while Mr. Eccles tells me that your progress with him is equally remarkable." He stopped, and seemed to expect me to make some rejoinder; but I could not utter a word, and felt overwhelmed at the observation and notice his speech had drawn upon me.

"It's better I should tell you at once," resumed my father, "that I dislike prodigies. I dislike because I distrust them. The fellow who knows at fourteen what he might reasonably have known at thirty is not unlikely to stop short at fifteen, and grow no more. I don't want to be personal, but I have heard it said Cleremont was a very clever boy."

The impertinence of this speech, and the laughter it at once excited, served to turn attention away from me; but, through the buzz and murmur around, I overheard Cleremont say to Hotham, "I shall pull him up short one of these days, and you'll see an end of all this."

"Now," continued my father, "if Eccles had told me that the boy was a skillful hand at sherry-cobbler, or a rare judge of a Cuban cigar, I'd have reposed more faith in the assurance than when he spoke of his classics."

"He ain't bad at a gin-sling with bitters, that I must say," said Eccles, whose self-control, or good-humor, mayhap some less worthy trait, always carried him successfully over a difficulty.

"So, Sir," said my father, turning again on me, "the range of your accomplishments is complete. You might be a tapster or a jockey. When the nobility of France came to ruin in the Revolution the best blood of the kingdom became barbers and dancing-masters: so that when some fine morning that gay gentleman yonder will discover that he is a beggar, he'll have no difficulty in finding a calling to suit his tastes, and square with his abilities. What's Hotham grumbling about? Will any one interpret him for me?"

"Hotham is saying that this claret is corked," said the sea-captain, with a hoarse loud voice.

"Bottled at home!" said my father, "and, like your own education, Hotham, spoiled for a beggarly economy."

"I'm glad you've got it," muttered Cleremont, whose eyes glistened with malignant spite. "I have had enough of this; I'm for coffee," and he arose as he spoke.

"Has Cleremont left us?" asked my father.

"Yes; that last bottle has finished him. I told you before, Nixon knows nothing about wine. I saw that hogshead lying bung up for eight weeks before it was drawn off for bottling."

"Why didn't you speak to him about it, then?"

"And be told that I'm not his master, eh? You don't seem to know, Norcott, that you've got a houseful of the most insolent servants in Christendom. Cleremont's wife wanted the chestnuts yesterday in the phaeton, and George refused her; she might take the cobs, or nothing."

"Quite true," chimed in Eccles; "and the fellow said, 'I'm a-taking the young horses out in the break, and if the missis wants to see the chestnuts, she'd better come with me.'"

"And as to a late breakfast now, it's quite impossible; they delay and delay till they run you into luncheon," growled Hotham.

"They serve me my chocolate pretty regularly," said my father, negligently, and he arose and strolled out of the room. As he went he slipped his arm within mine, and said, in a half-whisper, "I suppose it will come to this—I shall have to change my friends or my household. Which would you advise?"

"I'd say the friends, Sir."

"So should I, but that they would not easily find another place. There, go and see is the billiard-room lighted. I want to see you play a game with Cleremont."

Cleremont was evidently sulking under the sarcasm passed on him, and took up his cue to play with a bad grace.

"Who will have five francs on the party?" said my father. "I'm going to back the boy."

"Make it pounds, Norcott," said Hotham.

"I'll give you six to five, in tens," said Cleremont to my father. "Will you take it?"

I was growing white and red by turns all this time. I was terrified at the thought that money was to be staked on my play, and frighened by the mere presence of my father at the table.

"The youngster is too nervous to play. Don't let him, Norcott," said Hotham, with a kindness I had not given him credit for.

"Give me the cue, Digby; I'll take your place," said my father, and Cleremont and Hotham both drew nigh, and talked to him in a low tone.

"Eight and the stroke then be it," said my father, "and the bet in fifties." The others nodded, and Cleremont began the game

I could not have believed I could have suffered the amount of intense anxiety that game cost me. Had my life been on the issue I do not think I could have gone through greater alternations of hope and fear than now succeeded in my heart. Cleremont started with eight points odds, and made thirty-two off the balls before my father began to play. He now took his place, and by the first stroke displayed a perfect mastery of the game. There was a sort of languid grace, an indolent elegance about all he did, that when the stroke required vigor or power made me tremble for the result, but somehow he imparted the exact amount of force needed, and the balls moved about here and there as though obedient to some subtle instinct of which the cue gave a mere sign. He scored forty-two points in a few minutes, and then drawing himself up, said: "There's an eight-stroke now on the table. I'll give any one three hundred Naps to two that I do it."

None spoke. "Or, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll take fifty from each of you and draw the game!" Another as complete silence ensued. "Or, here's a third proposition, Give me fifty between you, and I'll hand over the cue to the boy; he shall finish the game."

"Oh no, Sir! I beg you—I entreat—" I began; but already, "Done!" had been loudly uttered by both together, and the bet was ratified.

"Don't be nervous, boy," said my father, handing me his cue. "You see what's on the balls. You carom and hold the white, and land the red in the middle pocket. If you can't do the brilliant thing, and finish the game with an eight-stroke, do the safe one—the carom on the hazard. But, above all, don't lose your stroke, Sir. Mind that, for I've a pot of money on the game."

"I don't think you ought to counsel him, Norcott," said Cleremont. "If he's a player, he's fit to devise his own game."

"Oh, hang it, no," broke in Hotham; "Norcott has a perfect right to tell him what's on the table."

"If you object seriously, Sir," said my father, proudly, "the party is at an end."

"I put it to yourself," began Cleremont.

"You shall not appeal to me against myself, Sir. You either withdraw your objection, or you maintain it."

"Of course he withdraws it," said Hotham, whose eyes never wandered from my father's face.

Cleremont nodded a half-unwilling assent.

"You will do me the courtesy to speak, perhaps," said my father; and every word came from him with a tremulous roll.

"Yes, yes, I agree. There was really nothing in my remark," said Cleremont, whose self-control seemed taxed to its last limit.

"There, go on, boy, and finish this stupid affair," said my father; and he turned to the chimney to light his cigar.

I leaned over the table, and a mist seemed to rise before me. I saw volumes of cloud rolling swiftly across, and meteors, or billiard-balls, I knew not which, shooting through them. I played and missed; I did not even strike a ball. A wild roar of laughter, a cry of joy, and a confused blending of several voices in various tones followed, and I stood there like one stunned into immobility. Meanwhile Cleremont finished the game, and, clapping me gayly on the shoulder, cried, "I'm more grateful to you than your father is, my lad. That shaking hand of yours has made a difference of two hundred Naps to me." I turned toward the fire; my father had left the room.

TEMPER.

We generally pity a man or woman who has an obviously bad temper; but to have a bad temper and ample opportunities for gratifying it must be a great pleasure. The dull complacency of good-humor offers no such keen delights as the little revenges which a bad-tempered woman loves to wreak upon her social enemies. A bad temper is a sort of sixth sense, which has its own sorrows and its own satisfaction; and, like the other senses, in favorable circumstances the satisfaction predominates. It is a great mistake to consider that even the worst form of bad temper—the sulky attitude—necessarily involves the wretchedness of the sulker. Not at all. The man or woman who sulks looks upon himself or herself as a martyr, and enjoys the sweet solace of martyrdom. Then the discomfort they inflict upon the people against whom they sulk is another keen enjoyment. In fact, if sulking were not pleasant, people wouldn't sulk. It gives a man pleasure to gratify his bad temper; and it gives him pleasure to sulk. Among women these enjoyments are heightened by a greater sensitiveness, both on the part of the performers and that of their victims. When a man gets into the sulky attitude, and thinks he will annoy his friends by refusing their invitations to dinner, we simply say to him, "Very well. Sulk as long as you please. If you will be unhappy, be. We have too much on our hands to trouble ourselves about whether you choose to be uncomfortable or the reverse. If you won't come to our dinner-parties, let us hope that others will; and we have no reason to anticipate that the soup and the fish will be any the worse for your absence." But women, gentle souls! do not look upon a seceding friend in this philosophic light. They are distressed to think that Jane, or Aunt Thompson, or Lady Morland's maiden sister, should think that they have been unkind to her. It is with deep depression that they hear how very miserable their former bosom-friend now is; and they perplex themselves, and their husbands too, about the best method of reconciliation.

The wreaking of bad temper is one of the pleasantest occupations of humanity; but it leaves bad physical effects behind it. We must guard ourselves, however, against the popular delusion that thin people are naturally prone to bad temper, and that stout people are almost invariably good-natured. The writer's experience, at least, tends to precisely the opposite conclusion. Fat men are not energetically angry—they do not cuff boys, thrash their horses, and so on; but they are far more impatient of hindrances, and apt to be ruffled by little annoyances. Put a fat man and a thin man to whip a trout-stream when the fish are not rising; who will first begin to growl muttered curses, and crack the flies off his line with bad temper, and then throw the rod away and fling himself on the grass in disgust? Suppose both of them to be "hung up;" which will exhibit the most patience and good-humor in getting the line off the tree? Bad temper is a keen weapon, but it is frequently found in a very soft and capacious sheath. The evil physical effects of bad temper, however, tell equally on the stout and the thin, and they are more serious than many people imagine. The effect which a fit of choler has upon the system, when general weakness predisposes to a catastrophe, shows what the effect must also be when greater strength of the system prevents its being immediately visible. When a man drops down and dies through a fit of anger there must be some other ailment assisting; but that anger should, in any case, have the power to accelerate the catastrophe is sufficiently significant. Persons with disease of the heart, or any affliction likely to suffer from a shock to the nerves, are warned by the doctors to abstain from irritating disputes, and generally to avoid those men or things likely to provoke their anger. It is an advice which is applicable to all; because there are few of us so situated that our bad temper, if we have one, may be gratified with impunity. Better to cultivate the even tenor of a sublime indifferentism than to reap the uncertain satisfaction of expending little fire-crackers of wrath.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Pocket-picking has become an art; and the very height of the season for practicing it is rapidly approaching. It flourishes most when lectures, and concerts, musical soirées, operas, and theatrical performances are most enthusiastically patronized; when the rush of down-town business leads to the constant interchange of the largest quantity of greenbacks; when the purchase of holiday gifts seems to demand that pockets should contain the "wherewithal." Between five and seven o'clock in the evening the cars going up town are crowded to their utmost capacity. The inside passengers are packed together in every cross-grained way, and the outsiders hang on as they can. Whatever energies remain to the business-man after a day of exhausting labor are expended in the simple effort to sustain existence during a wearisome ride of perhaps an hour. He can not be expected to keep his thoughts all the time upon his pockets; and as all of his neighbors are, of necessity, sticking their elbows into him, he must suspect every body, if any body. But unfortunately the pickpocket considers the overcrowded car as his Wall Street, where, ever keeping his eyes open for a chance, by a skillful turn of his hand, he may realize something handsome. There seems to be no other way, when in a crowd, but for the owners of pocket-books, watches, and diamond pins, to regard all their neighbors with a prudent suspicion.

According to one of our daily papers the pocket of the pantaloons is the most dangerous place in which a man can keep his money. However that may be it is well for all to understand the modus operandi frequently adopted for abstracting the pocket-book. Several pickpockets band together for the purpose of doing business. Their plans are laid carefully, and they frequent cars, railway stations, public meetings, or any place where there is a crowd. They select a victim quietly and surround him, as if by accident, and communicate with each other by unobserved signs. The one who operates does not place his hand in the pocket, that is a fatal error; but with the first two fingers he gently draws up the lining of the pocket to the opening, and with it the wallet, which is immediately passed to a confederate. Disputes and disturbances of various kinds are often started in a car with no other purpose than to attract the attention of passengers, and give the opportunity to investigate pockets. Ladies have quite as much need to be on their guard as gentlemen. As a general thing, however, every one believes that he is careful enough until he has had a severe personal experience. The safest rule is to carry very little money in one's pocket.

Life is short, and books are often long, and always multitudinous. Some books are merely to be tasted of, others to be wholly rejected, while only a moderate number are to be thoroughly read and carefully digested.

An exchange says that the following prescription will cure the most obstinate case of hoarseness in a short time. Colds are unusually prevalent just now, and this remedy is so simple that it can do no harm, certainly, to try it: Take the white of two eggs and beat them with two spoonfuls of white sugar; grate in a little nutmeg, then add a pint of lukewarm water. Repeat the prescription if necessary.

A smart little four-year-old boy, living in Ashland, New Hampshire, performed quite a feat the other day. He was playing in the yard with his younger sister and a pet bantam chicken, when a large Arctic hawk suddenly swooped down and attempted to carry off the chicken. He succeeded in getting it in his talons, when the little boy grasped a small hatchet lying near by and smartly pounded the hawk until he released his prey and flew away wounded and with the loss of some of his plumage. The lad's mother saw the occurrence, but was unable to reach the spot before the predatory bird had taken its flight.

From the Buffalo Courier we learn that there are now on exhibition at the rooms of the Society of Natural Science in that city two very remarkable geological specimens. One is the fossil imprint of the foot of a man, or rather the cast of such an imprint. It was discovered by a workman in a colliery in western Pennsylvania. The spot where it was found was nearly a mile from the pit's month, and some three hundred feet from the surface. The rock in which it was imbedded belongs to the paleozoic age, and the imprint, if such it be, must have been made millions of years before the present geological era commenced. It is the cast of the left foot of a man of ordinary size, and is perfectly defined. The second specimen is a large slab of sandstone, on which, stamped in the solid rock, can be seen the imprint of horses' hoofs, perfectly preserved, and varying in size from the track of a full-grown horse to that of a young colt. They point in different directions, as though the animals had been leisurely walking about, cropping the luxuriant grasses on that tropical period. These specimens were presented by reliable gentlemen, and it is surmised that the present system of geology will be more than ever complicated by their discovery.

The famous pedestrian Weston has undertaken another feat—namely, to walk within one hundred days, commencing on December 1, from Bangor, Maine, to St. Paul, Minnesota, and thence to this city, by such routes as he may select to the extent of five thousand miles. He is to rest during the whole of each Sunday. This trial trip is undertaken at the severest season of the year, when drifting storms may be expected. That such extraordinary tests of endurance are unwise there is no question; yet some good may result to the public by inspiring young men, and women also, to take more vigorous outdoor exercise in the way of brisk walking. It is an interesting fact, as stated by Mr. Weston himself, that he does not depend at all upon the stimulus of alcoholic drinks for success in his walking trips. He says that he regards the use of intoxicating liquors on the occasion of the performance of any task requiring strength and nerve not only unnecessary, but wholly injurious. The moment a man partakes of such stimulants at such a time he ceases to work upon his own strength of manhood, and is simply using a false power built upon a medicine. It may help him for the moment, but the effect is of short duration, and then he is worse than before. It not only weakens his body but his nerve, and takes away his will; and that is not all—it will take away his appetite for food.

The English journals give a singular account of a convict who escaped from his cell by means of a wooden spoon, some bits of wire, and a needle and thread. The door of his cell was iron, and the lock on the outside. He made a key from the spoon, and passed a thread over and under the door with the needle; bits of wire were pushed through the inspection hole, and fastened to this long thread extending outside from top to bottom. The key was also pushed through, and, being fastened to the thread, was brought opposite the keyhole by dextrous manipulation of the slender line, worked gently in, then turned by means of the wire, and the door was opened. The man who possessed the ingenuity and patience to accomplish such a deed ought never to have been inside of prison walls. He might have made fame and fortune elsewhere.

It is believed that two-thirds of the thirty thousand patients confined in French lunatic asylums are perfectly sane. When a person becomes too much in the way of his friends (!) or others, it is not uncommon to apply for a certificate of insanity, which is usually obtained with little difficulty. And when once confined in the asylum, a person is, as it were, dead; there is little hope of relief.

According to some sagacious writer, marriage does not depend so much upon love as upon the price of corn. Hence when breadstuffs decrease in value marriages should increase.

The Geographical Society are discussing the propriety of another Arctic expedition under the command of the celebrated explorer, Dr. Hayes.

The Board of Health state that, during the week ending November 14, there was less mortality in New York city than has been known for several years. The total number of deaths was 334.

A very interesting description of the solar eclipse of last August comes from India from the pen of an observer on the banks of the Bhima. We quote one or two brief passages from the lengthy account:

"Two or three minutes before the total obscuration the thermometer began to fall rapidly, the wind grew perceptibly colder, and the clouds thickened and darkened, and quite obscured the sun. It was a moment of intense interest; crows flew low, and kites fluttered as if distressed to find darkness upon them before they could reach their accustomed perches. At Solapur the poultry went to roost; and some cattle not far from us seemed to be proceeding home of their own accord. The only instance of perfect stoicism I heard of was that of a man plowing quite near where I was, and whom I heard turning his bullocks in the midst of the darkness of totality. The darkness of totality has also been often affirmed to give rise to strong feelings of horror. To me the rapidity of the motion of the tremendous pall, and the suddenness and completeness of the final pulse of darkness, were inexpressibly grand and never to be forgotten; and it so absorbed the senses that the wind seemed to cease, and only after a few seconds of darkness I heard the distant cries from the village below. The darkness continued about three minutes—though they seemed very short ones—and the mercury went down to 76 degrees, while the dew fell very rapidly, and was driven by the wind like a thin drizzle of rain, and I felt it getting very chilly. At length the low arch of light to the north began to enlarge round by the west, and the great curtain to be withdrawn with the same majestic sweep with which it had been cast over us, and soon its edge was seen passing over the zenith and vanishing in a lessening arch to the southeast. And, as the light had disappeared, so for a few seconds it appeared to return, not by regular accessions as day opens from the gray dawn, but at first by rapid pulses and then gradually."

The United States Consul at Zurich has sent to the Secretary of State a painfully interesting account of the recent inundations in Switzerland, and the sufferings of the people in consequence. The loss of property, though great, bears no ratio to the amount of suffering involved, because it has fallen not upon wealthy individuals or corporations, but upon the poor. The Swiss mountaineer barely exists. He lives in narrow gorges between mountains crowned with eternal snows. His winters are eight months, his summers four months long; he has no spring and no autumn. He lives in a small rude structure, half house, half stable, close to the torrent that rushes down his valley. He owns a few goats, a few sheep, and two or three cows. For the winter food of those he employs half of his summer in bringing on his back, from almost inaccessible grass-plots above him, a supply of hay—so short and fine does it grow that one might almost call it moss! The other half of his summer is consumed in gathering fuel for the winter. His wife and children, meanwhile, cultivate the potatoes and other scanty vegetables, and tend the flocks. When a flood comes, the value in money of what he has lost may not be more than one or two hundred dollars, but he is left a helpless beggar. It is stated that perhaps ten thousand dwellings which still stand have been flooded, and that at this season of the year they can not be dried; and that therefore to live in them is to invite fevers, rheumatisms, and other similar diseases. Already sickness is reported as having broken out in the stricken districts to an extent that almost amounts to an epidemic.

An American merchant visiting England went into a fashionable London church one Sunday soon after service had commenced, and stood in the aisle. The pew-opener passed him several times and took no notice of him. "They show more respect to a stranger in American churches," said he to himself, and determined to give them a lesson. Seeing that there was plenty of room in several pews but the pew-opener passed him again and again without offering a seat, he quietly spread open his coat-tails and squatted down on the neatly matted aisle. The clergyman noticed him, and looked at the pew-opener, who at once went to him and offered him a seat. "No, thank you," whispered the merchant, "I am quite comfortable, and shall sit here all the service."

Not long ago a New Haven gentleman ordered a wedding suit, including, of course, a satin vest. On the bridal evening, the ceremony having been performed, just as the clergyman was departing, the gentleman took from the pocket of his vest, and slipped into the parson's hand, what he supposed was a greenback of some value, which he had put there for the purpose. Some weeks afterward, while wearing the same vest, he put his fingers into his pocket, and pulled out, to his great horror, the identical bank-note which he supposed had long before gladdened the heart of the worthy clergyman. Great was his consternation. What could he have given the parson? He ascertained the next day that he had given him a strip of satin two or three inches long, which the tailor had left in the pocket of his vest. Explanations and a hearty laugh followed.

The Gota Canal in Sweden is said to have cost the government $9,000,000. It connects the chain of lakes that lie between the Baltic and the Cattegat. The sail through this canal is said to be novel and interesting. It traverses a beautiful and fertile country, and on every side are neat Swedish towns and well-cultivated fields. The canal in many places is scarcely broader than the ships which traverse it.

IN PAWN.

Blank and bare was the humble room
  In a crowded tenement, narrow and high,
Where the sewing-girl sat in the gathering gloom
With little left her of health's bright bloom;
  And close to the window shone the sky.

At her poor work-table she sat alone;
And skeleton-like her hands had grown
With labor by day and often at night;
Long and slender and ivory white
The nimble fingers, idle now,
For a wonder, as they clasped her brow;
  Idle, because but an hour before,
Lifting her hood and her coarse gray shawl
Each from its nail in the chamber wall,
  And never a moment thinking to stop
  Only to fasten the chamber door—
An hour before on that very day
From her attic room she had hurried away,
  Bearing her sewing off to the shop.

"Sewing was scarce," they had told her there,
And little if any there would be
For maybe a week or more, and she Must wait until Saturday's set of sun
To be paid for the work already done:
  And home she had come with a burden of care
  Bearing down with its iron weight
The heart in her breast, for her next week's rent
Would be due before then, and her every cent
  She had spent that morn for the bread she ate.

So she sat her down in her attic room,
Silent and sad 'mid the gathering gloom,
With her skeleton fingers, idle now,
Rigidly clasping her aching brow,
Thinking, pondering what she would say
To the landlord when he should come that way,
While the swift-winged moments lightly flew,
How many had gone she hardly knew
When she raised her eyes to the opposite wall,
Where her hood hung and her cast-off shawl,
And the Sunday dress she had made with care
That had known so little as yet of wear,
Fashioned and fitted, back and waist,
Skirt and sleeves with the nicest taste,
Gored and frilled, with a small rosette
Here and there in the trimming set,
With buttons of steel that glimmered white
Like silver beads in the failing light;
And all of that delicate shade and hue
That suited her best as the poor girl knew.

Then she lifted down from their place on the wall
Again her hood and her coarse gray shawl
And the dress that was hanging beside them there,
And folding it with the tenderest care
Wrapped it in paper, while from each lid,
Like a scintillant diamond, a bright tear slid;
And passing out through the narrow door
And down six flights to the street once more,
With hasty step through the surging crowd,
The sound of whose murmur gathered loud,
Like a moving shadow she flitted past,
Nor lingered a moment until at last,
Backward behind her the glazed door swung
Where the gilded sign of the Pawnbroker hung.

  Men and women and children there,
Standing all of them in a line,
  Some with faces furrowed with care,
Others where vice had left its sign,
And even some in whose eyes' strange glare
Hunger lurked with a famished stare;
While the broker's clerks, with their pens in hand,
Wrote the tickets, or closely scanned
Each separate package, and last her own,
Talking and haggling over the loan;
  Then out from the dingy shop she passed,
Leaving behind on the brown shelves there
The Sunday dress she had made with care,
  As backward in thought a glance she cast
  At that pleasant Sabbath a month ago,
When leaving the sweltering city's heat,
Through green lanes bordered with fields of wheat
  She felt cool airs on her wan cheek blow
And heard the church bells sweet and low.
And ever anon the cat-bird's song
And the thrush's voice as she wound along,
Smothered half in the leafy trees,
And scented the rose in each wandering breeze.

And she sighed to think while her tears would flow
How many Sabbaths might come and go,
When, clad once more in that Sunday dress,
Those pleasant by-ways her feet would press;
How autumn might burn the pastures brown,
And the autumn rain come drizzling down;
And the wind, so balmy, gathering cold,
Scatter the woodland's wealth of gold,
Ere her hands should labor enough to repay
The meagre loan she had got that day.

And on she passed as the night came down
With its dusky mantle upon the town,
And one by one each glimmering light
In the dazzled street-lamps gathered bright,
And the twinkling stars in the azure sky
Looked calmly down from their homes on high,
As once again in her attic room
She sat alone in the twilight gloom.

  Oh, mothers whose hearts are warm with love;
Oh, sweet young wife with cheeks like the rose;
  Oh, maiden, you with the eyes of a dove,
Thank God for the comforts His hand bestows;
For on rich and poor though his rain may fall,
Such blessings as yours are not given to all!

FOOT-RACE ON THE FASHION COURSE.

Considerable interest, both in this country and in Canada, has centred about the notable foot-race which came off on the Fashion Course, Long Island, on the 23d of November, between the "Flying Boy of Kingston," E. D. Davis, of New York, and J. Wesley Cozad, the "California Plow-boy," for a purse of $4500.

In the pools Cozad stood 20 to Davis's 18; Cozad's friends were ready to offer odds. At 1.30 P.M. Davis was ready for the race, and shortly after, Cozad came on. Then judges were chosen for each, and the time-keeper and starter appointed. At 1.50 the men were formed in line, each man having a set track. The race was to be run by a "scratch start," each man to start 15 feet from the starting-point of the 125 yards, and not to run the race until both had come over the line, which is a great advantage. After four false starts Cozad got over the line, thinking Davis would follow him, which, by accident, Davis did, he really not meaning to go at the time. He was called back by some of his friends, but it was too late, and both men were off. Cozad had two feet start. Davis got to running right away, and gradually came up with him. The men seemed to run side by side for about 50 yards, when Cozad put on all steam and gradually left Davis, and when 100 yards had been completed Davis was fully six feet behind. The latter, nevertheless, tried his best, but he did not seem to have sufficient energy to close the gap, and Cozad gradually gained and outran Davis, and won by 8 feet. The time occupied was about 12 seconds. Davis had been very confident, and had wagered his diamonds, two watches, and a ring on the race.

NEGRO NEWS-BOYS IN RICHMOND DIVIDING THEIR PROFITS.—[Sketched by W. L. Sheppard.]

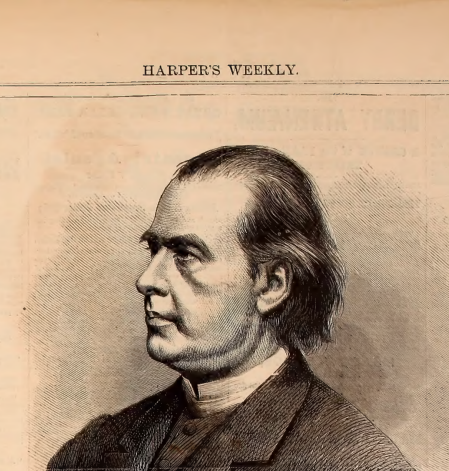
THE PHILADELPHIA TRAGEDY.

The recent murder of Mrs. Mary E. Hill in Philadelphia by her son-in-law (as is supposed) has excited greater interest than any similar tragedy since the Burdell murder in New York city over ten years ago. The present instance, however, differs very materially from the former one in all the grand elements which go to make up a "sensation." The Burdell murder was surrounded by a mystery which has never been fully solved even yet. This Philadelphia murder, on the other hand, is memorable not on account of any insoluble and perplexing problem demanding a solution, but by reason of its sheer brutality—a brutality not relieved by the the slightest circumstance which could make the tragedy interesting on intellectual grounds, except, perhaps, the wealth and aristocratic associations of the family.

The Philadelphia Inquirer on November 23—the day after the murder—published the following account:

"A horrible murder was committed last night at the large, aristocratic residence situated at the northeast corner of Tenth and Pine streets, and the victim was an elderly lady named Mrs. Mary E. Hill, who owns and occupies the property, and whose name appears on the door of the house on a silver plate. The murder was one of the most brutal and revolting ones that has occurred in this city for years, and the following particulars were obtained by our reporter at a late hour last night: About 9.30 o'clock last night, as Policeman Howard was patroling his beat on Pine Street above Tenth, he was hailed by a citizen who resides on Pine Street below Tenth, directly opposite the garden of the house where the murder was committed, who informed him that something must be wrong at Mrs. Hill's residence, and asked him to make an investigation. Howard rang the bell, and it was answered by a man named George S. Twitchell, a son-in-law of the murdered woman, and who, in company with his wife (Mrs. Hill's daughter) resided with the deceased, the three being the only occupants of the large and very handsomely furnished house. The officer asked Twitchell what was the matter in the house, when Twitchell replied that a woman had fallen out of the window and killed herself. The officer then entered and was conducted by Twitchell to the dining-room on the lower floor, where, stretched out on a settee, was the murdered body of Mrs. Hill, covered with blood and bearing the evident marks of violence about her head, as though she had been struck two or three times with some iron missile. Twitchell and his wife were then secured and assistance called in, when an examination of the premises was made, and but little room was left for doubt that Mrs. Hill had been foully dealt with, her body thrown from the second-story sitting-room window into the garden that adjoins the house on Pine Street, for the officers, on entering the sitting-room mentioned, found a sofa clotted with blood, and pools of blood on the floor in close proximity to it. A cushion on the sofa also contained blood, and it was torn as though some blows aimed at the deceased had missed and struck the cushion. The blood was then traced through the sitting-room to the window of a small room that adjoins it on the east. The sill of this window was covered with blood, and it was evident that it had been opened and the body thrown into the yard. An examination of the ground disclosed a large pool of blood directly under the window mentioned, and the congealed condition of this blood when discovered indicated that the body had lain there some time before the officer entered the house. Twitchell stated that when Mrs. Hill fell or threw herself from the window, he, in company with a servant girl who came home about that time, went into the yard and carried her into the dining-room and laid her on the settee, but did not attempt to explain how the blood came on the sofa and floor of the sitting-room up stairs. Blood was also traced from the sitting-room to the stairway leading down to the first-floor, showing conclusively that after the perpetration of the murder the murderer went down stairs. A poker was afterward found in the yard that contained blood on it, and was undoubtedly used to commit the murder. Twitchell was taken to the Eighth Ward station-house. He had blood on his shirt when taken there. Mrs. Twitchell was retained at the house where the murder was committed, which was held in charge of Sergeant Pennington and a posse of police during the night. Mrs. Twitchell appeared to be very much concerned about her husband, and spoke to the officers more about him than her murdered mother. There does not appear to have been any struggle in the room (a neatly furnished one) where the murder was committed, as every thing was in order, and the theory is, that Mrs. Hill was lying down on the sofa asleep when she was approached and struck on the head with the poker mentioned, and her body then thrown into the yard.

"The animus of the murder has not yet been discovered, and it is not known on what kind of terms Mrs. Hill and her daughter and son-in-law lived together. Twitchell is a strong, healthy-looking man, about 32 years of age."



THE FOOT-RACE ON "FASHION COURSE," LONG ISLAND, November 23, 1868.—[Sketched by Stanley Fox.]

It has since been discovered that a motive existed for the perpetration of the crime by Mr. TWITCHELL. It is true that neither he nor his wife could inherit Mrs. HILL'S property upon her decease. But it appears that shortly after the removal of the family to the house at Tenth and Pine streets, Mrs. HILL directed her son-in-law to negotiate for the purchase of this property. This was done, but the deed of conveyance was fraudulently made out in the name of TWITCHELL'S wife. The fraud was at length discovered, and the old lady determined to institute a legal prosecution for the recovery of the property. It was, probably, in order to thwart this attempt that the murder was committed. How far Mrs. TWITCHELL was implicated does not yet appear.

The coroner's inquest was held on the 24th, and the verdict of the jury was that Mrs. HILL "came to her death by violence at the hands of GEORGE S. TWITCHELL and CAMILLA TWITCHELL, his wife." The evidence offered on the inquest quite clearly proved that garments belonging to TWITCHELL were stained with blood, and that these were not worn by him when he assisted in carrying the murdered woman up stairs.

BISHOP A. N. LITTLEJOHN.

THREE new dioceses have recently been carved out of the State of New York by the Episcopal Convention held in this city last October. One of these is the diocese of Long Island, of which, on the 19th of November, the Rev. ABRAM N. LITTLEJOHN was elected Bishop. He was born in Montgomery County, New York, on the 15th of December, 1824. He graduated at Union College in 1845, and on the 18th of March, 1848, was admitted to the diaconate at Auburn. He officiated at St. Ann's Church, Amsterdam, New York, for one year, and at St. Andrew's Church, Meriden, Connecticut, for ten months, when, on the 10th of April, 1850, he entered upon the rectorship of Christ Church, Springfield, Massachusetts, where he remained about a year. While connected with this church he was ordained to the priesthood. In July, 1851, he entered upon the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, New Haven, Connecticut, where he remained until the spring of 1860, when, on Easter-Sunday, commenced his duties at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, where he has remained up to this time. Dr. LITTLEJOHN was a few weeks since elected Bishop of Western New York, but there is little doubt of his accepting his last election. In 1853 Dr. LITTLEJOHN delivered the first of a course of lectures given in Philadelphia during the fall and winter by various bishops and clergymen. His subject was "The Philosophy of Religion," afterward published. In 1856 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Pennsylvania. In 1858 he was unanimously elected President of Hobart College, Geneva, New York, but declined the offer. For ten years he performed the duty of Lecturer on Pastoral Theology at the Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Connecticut. He has been prominently connected with the missionary work of the Church as a member of the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions. He is also a trustee of St. Stephen's College, and of the General Theological Seminary of New York: a member of the Executive Committee of the Protestant Episcopal Freedman's Commission; a director of the Society for the Increase of the Ministry; and a member of the Executive Committee of the Sunday School Union and Church Book Society. He has been for several years President of the Homes for the Aged and Orphan on the church charity foundation, Brooklyn, and Vice-President of the Kings County Convocation for Church Extension.

A. OAKEY HALL.

A. OAKEY HALL, Esq., whose portrait we publish on this page, and who was recently the District Attorney of this city, will, if he lives, be the Mayor-elect of New York before this sketch meets the eyes of our readers. He is of an old Knickerbocker family, and is now in his forty-third year. For nearly twenty years he has occupied a prominent position at the metropolitan bar. He is not only well known as a lawyer, but also as a politician and a littérateur.

Mr. HALL, having been connected with all the celebrated legal cases in New York city for fifteen years—mainly on the side of the prosecution—has become, through the metropolitan press, well known to the nation at large. JAMES T. BRADY and himself are recognized as the witty duo of the New York Bar. He was a student at the Cambridge Law School during the professorship of Judge STORY. Thence he went to New Orleans, where he passed one or two years in the study of civil law. He was a student in the offices of SLIDELL and BENJAMIN.

As District Attorney in 1866 Mr. HALL received a majority of nearly 40,000, and the result of our Charter election will probably show that he is equally successful as a competitor in a wider field of action. In his late speech at Tammany Hall he declared that he would rather be Mayor of New York city than President.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

A FEW weeks ago Princeton College was rejoicing over the acquisition of Dr. M'COSH as its President. Cornell University has equal reason to be proud of her importation of a Professor of History. The acquisition in a single year of two of England's most distinguished scholars and most useful citizens is a memorable event in the history of American institutions.

GOLDWIN SMITH, who recently arrived in this country to enter upon his official duties as Professor of History in Cornell University, was born in 1823 at Reading, England, where his father was a physician. He received his education at Oxford, where he was graduated in 1845, carrying off some of the most important scholarships and prizes. Like many English gentlemen of education, he was called to the bar, but never practiced. He was Secretary to the two Oxford Commissions, and was a member of the Education Commission of 1859. In 1866 he resigned the Professorship of History at Oxford, which he had held for some time. GOLDWIN SMITH has written largely during the last few years, his Lectures on Modern History and on the Study of History being best known. His latest work was an historical study on the three English statesmen, PYM, CROMWELL, and PITT. He has written besides as a journalist, and has contributed to various literary publications. He is one of the most liberal of English scholars, and all his writings are fraught with the spirit of liberty.

LIFE IN SPAIN.

CERTAINLY the Spaniards are a most peculiar people. The lives of the regular old Spanish families in Madrid (we do not allude to those of high rank) are as singularly unlike as those of any in the world. As a rule Spaniards never stir away from Madrid at any part of the year. They live on separate floors of houses, a floor to a family; society is perfectly unknown among them, according to our meaning of the word, especially among the women, whose only dissipation from year's end to year's end is their constant attendance at the churches. Owing to the astonishing number of saints' days there is scarcely a day in the week when there is not some especial service, some famous preacher to be heard, some especial mass to be attended; and should none of these causes bring them out they are sure of finding the churches open, and thither they go and select some chapel where they offer up their prayers to a favorite saint. Every thing connected with the outward observances of religion is to them an excitement and an occupation. The men, on the contrary, find their amusement in constant smoking. Clubs, up to a late period, were little frequented by Spaniards, but some change is creeping on in this respect. They are all for outward show, both men and women; and as long as they can manage to keep a miserable-looking pair of horses to draw an antiquated sort of carriage along the public drives, they care not what privations they suffer in their domestic orrangements. They are naturally very small enters, and adhere strictly to the fasts enjoined by their religion. The universal siesta, that town to the dwellers in hot climates, closes all the shops at one o'clock till the heat of the day is over. Every one retreats indoors, the streets are all deserted, even the beggars seem to disappear, and the houses are all shut up as if the inhabitants had left them. Then in the evening the whole world seems to come to life again.

NO DECLINE IN HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.

Ten years ago I purchased a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine, and have had it in constant use in my family ever since. We used it during the war to make clothing for our volunteers in the service and for the hospitals, and this work was very heavy, being coarse woolen and cotton fabrics. It is still in good working order, nothing having been broken but a few needles.

You are welcome to use my name in your recommendations.

THE DERBY ATHENÆUM.
A CHANGE of the PLAN OF DISTRIBUTION.
Monthly instead of Semi-Annual Awards to be made.
THE FIRST TO TAKE PLACE SATURDAY, DEC. 5th.

The undersigned respectfully begs to state that the plan of The Derby Athenæum, set forth in its Prospectus, has been changed, as follows:

Instead of a semi-annual distribution of Works or Art, a distribution will be made MONTHLY to its patrons, with regard to amount of sales. The number of tickets sold will be in the same proportion, and in no case exceed the amount stated. There will be but twenty-five hundred tickets sold for the first distribution, at $6 each, the purchaser in all cases receiving the full value of his money in the books purchased, which will be sold at the Publishers' Lowest Prices. It will be observed that the change gives to the patrons of the Athenæum the same privileges as the former plan, but the advantage of more frequent distribution of choice works of Art. The first premium to be awarded will be James M. Hart's and so justly pronounced the best picture by that fine artist.

MEADOW LANDS,
Valued at $2500,

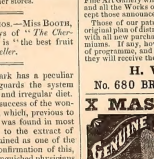
The award will positively be made on the 5th day of December next.

The next premium to be given to the customers of the Derby Athenæum will be

SHATTUCK'S WHITE HILLS IN OCTOBER,
Valued at $6000.

This splendid painting will be awarded on the 31st of December next.



The change of plan has been decided upon at the instance and by the advice of prominent patrons of the Athenæum, among whom are many of the clergy, artists, literati, and members of the religious and secular Press.

The Athenæum will continue the sale of the choicest Works of Chromo-Lithography, Engravings, Prints, Fine Art Gallery will, as heretofore, remain open, free, and all the Works of Art on view will be for sale, except those announced as monthly prizes.

Those of our patrons who have certificates for the original plan of distribution will have an equal chance with all new purchasers in securing the monthly premiums. We shall endeavor to improve the character of programme, and prefer to return their certificates, they will receive the amount paid in cash.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (Improved Oroide).

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, have named it the "COLLINS METAL," and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $20 Watches are equal in fineness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $1 to $8. Any Jewelry of the Collins Metal in every style.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

Goods sent to any part of the United States by express, to be paid for on delivery. Money need not be sent with the order, as bills can be paid when goods are taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. We employ no Agents; orders must therefore be sent directly to us. Customers in the city will receive their goods at once.

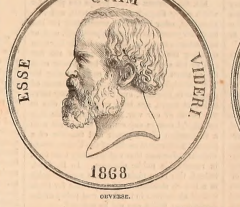
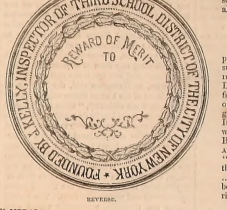
THE "KELLY MEDAL."



THE Public Schools of New York city are acknowledged to be the most excellent in the world; and this acknowledgment receives additional force on account of the attention which our public school system has received from the rival cities of Boston and Philadelphia. The Empire State has in its public schools a larger percentage of its children than most of the New England States, and in this city the percentage is much larger than in the rural districts. Lately the best modes of heating and ventilating school-buildings have occupied the attention of the Board of Education, and the result has been the modification, and, where it has seemed necessary, the reconstruction of these buildings.

The illustrations on this page represent a peculiar and important feature connected with the Commencement exercises of the Public Grammar-School No. 45, which is probably the largest institution of the kind in the world which is devoted exclusively to females. These exercises were attended by a large number of our most influential citizens, and, giving evidence of the most excellent and thorough instruction, they reflected great credit upon the Principal, Miss ANNA A. ROGERS, and her assistant teachers.



The most interesting part of the day's proceedings is that which we have illustrated—the presentation of the "Kelly Medal," which, in the language of the donor, Mr. JAMES KELLY, Inspector of Schools for the Third District, comprising the Ninth and Sixteenth Wards, is to be awarded annually to "such two members of the highest class as shall be designated by at least two-thirds of the pupils of the class, as best entitled to receive them by reason of superior moral excellence, manifested by their amiability of disposition, correctness of deportment, or otherwise."

The presentation of medals for excellence in this particular is peculiar to New York, and worthy of emulation by benevolent, public-spirited citizens in this and other cities; and the novelty of the occasion called together very many friends of education, among whom were two representatives from the Philadelphia Board of Controllers, Messrs. J. H. MACBRIDE and H. W. HALLIWELL, who will doubtless carry with them to our sister city pleasant and profitable remembrances of this exceedingly interesting occasion.

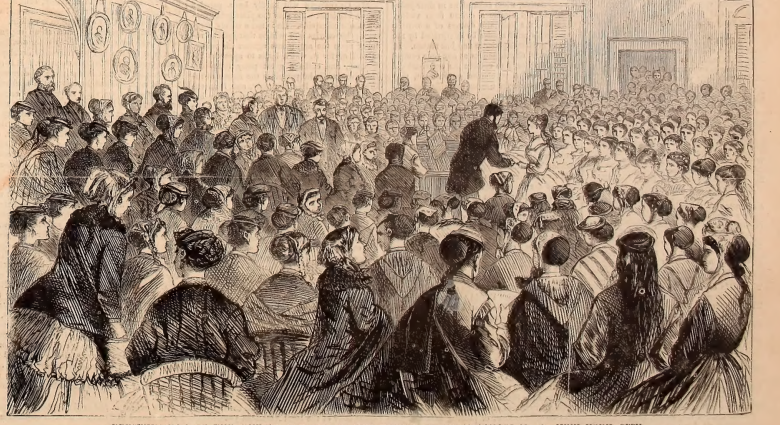
The graduating class consisted of twenty-one young ladies, who were awarded diplomas certifying that they had completed the supplementary course of study prescribed by the Board of Education, were highly praised by the Superintendent for their proficiency, and very appropriately addressed by Rev. DR. HALL.

OBVERSE.

REVERSE.

THE "KELLY MEDAL."

The class having indicated the members engiled by the terms of the award to receive the "Kelly Medal," the latter were presented to Misses EMMA GREGORY and BLANCHE MILLENGEN, and addresses made by Rev. Mr. STILES, Rev. Dr. BELLOWS, JAMES W. GERARD, Esq., H. B. PERKINS, Esq., and others, calculated to impress upon the pupils the importance of cultivating moral excellence, and upon the audience the amount of influence that may be exerted upon the children by incentives such as has thus been offered through the philanthropy and public spirit of Mr. KELLY.



We trust that other friends of education may be induced to follow so praiseworthy an example. The obverse of the Kelly Medal contains a medallion portrait of THOMAS BOESE, Esq., the clerk of the Board of Education, whose diligent exertions in the interests of public schools in this city deserve the gratitude of all our citizens.

THE INDIAN WAR.

GENERAL SHERIDAN has conceived a plan of Indian warfare which will yield substantial results. General SHERMAN'S report to the War Department from St. Louis, on the 2d instant, indorses a report from General SHERIDAN of the first stage of his campaign. As SHERMAN says, "it gives General SHERIDAN a good initiation." It seems that at the state FRIEDMAN met with old acquaintances. "The bands of BLACK KETTLE, LITTLE RAVEN, and SANTANTA do well known to us," says SHERMAN, "and are the same that have been along the Smoky Hill for the past five years, and ..... embrace the very same men who first began this war on the Saline and Solomon rivers.

General SHERIDAN reports from Canadian River, junction of Beaver Creek, Indian Territory, November 29, 1868:

"I have the honor to report, for the information of the Lieutenant-General, the following operations of General CUSTER'S command: On the 1st of November I ordered him to proceed with eleven companies of the Seventh Cavalry in a southerly direction toward the Antelope Hills in search of hostile Indians. On the 26th he struck the trail of a war party of BLACK KETTLE'S band returning from the north, near where the eastern line of the panhandle of Texas crossed the main Canadian. He at once corralled his wagons and followed in pursuit over the bleak waters of the Washita, thence down that stream; and on the morning of the 27th surprised the camp of BLACK KETTLE, and after a desperate fight, in which BLACK KETTLE was assisted by the auxiliaries under LITTLE RAVEN, and the Kiowas, under SANTANTA, we captured the entire camp, killing the chief, BLACK KETTLE and 102 warriors, whose bodies were left on the field, all their stock, ammunition, arms, lodges, robes, and fifty-three women and their children. Our loss was Major ELLIOTT, Captain HAMILTON, and nine enlisted men killed. Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel BAR-

NETT, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel J. W. COMTE, Second Lieutenant Z. MANN, and eleven enlisted men wounded. LITTLE RAVEN'S band of Arapahoes and SANTANA'S band of Kiowas were encamped six miles below BLACK KETTLE'S camp, and, before being fully animate captured were shot. The highest credit is due to for military purposes. The highest credit is due to GENERAL CUSTER and his command. They started in a furious snow-storm, and marched all the while in snow about twelve inches deep. BLACK KETTLE'S and LITTLE RAVEN'S families are among the prisoners. It LITTLE RAVEN'S band that committed the first WAR BLACK KETTLE'S band that committed the first depredations in the Salina and Solomon rivers, in Kansas the present season.

"The Kansas regiment has just come in. They missed the trail and had to struggle in the snow-storm. They killed some buffalo and had some fine fight. men were living on buffalo meat and were in good condition. days. We will soon have them all down there with us. If we can get one or two more good officers for my department. We have no more Indian troubles in my department, and he will be pinched in ability to obtain supplies, and notice will prevent many difficulties. Sheridan will do everything, but we have stout hearts and will do our best. Fifty-three Indians were cut up were brought white woman and a boy ten years old were brought in. murdered by the Indian women when the attack commenced."

Cheyenne village was captured on the morning of November 27, as stated in the above report. General CUSTER on this occasion won fresh laurels. He regret the loss of HAMMERSLY, HACKBERRY, and ELLIOTT; but we rejoice that one of the most hostile of the Indian encampments has been destroyed. SHERIDAN'S plan, as we have previously stated, is the destruction of Indian lodges. This, fully accomplished, will make it impossible for the savages to begin their depredations in the spring. SHERIDAN'S harvest is one which could only be garnered in the winter season, and thus far he has proved himself an efficient reaper.

THE FAIRY'S WEDDING.

It is a fairy's wedding day!
Oh, what a beautiful thing!
Bluebells the news are spreading,
Ring-a-ting, ting, ting, ting!
All the flowers have voices,
Lovely the songs that they sing;
How the bluebell rejoices,
Ting-a-ring, ting, ting, ting!

Daisy likes love-songs pretty;
Columbine, canzonets;
Rose, an old-fashioned ditty;
Lilies prefer duets.
Bells, too busy for singing,
Shake themselves till they ring;
Sweet the chime they are ringing—
Ting-a-ring, ting, ting, ting!

Butterflies come with fiddles;
Bravely they play the bars:
Wasps round their slender middles
Carry cornopeans.
Cork-shafters flutes are using;
Dragon-flies touch their harps,
Difficult music playing,
Laden with flats and sharps.

Little green moss is spreading
Velvety carpets for those
Who to the fairy's wedding
Trip on their dainty toes.
Fragile delicate grasses
Wave about in the air,
Shade the trade as she passes,
Whispering, "Oh, beware!"

Heeding the grand procession,
Oh how they shine and flash!
Each with his scarlet dress on,
Each with his golden sash,
Each with his shield and weapon,
Substretch, spurs, and spears,
Gallantly don't they step on,
The Fairy Volunteers.

Twelve little fairy curates
After the soldiers come:
Poor little legs! I'm sure it's Seldom they've march'd to the drums!
M. B. coats their wear is,
Almost down to their feet—
Little clerical fairies,
Miniature Dons complete.

Gravely the Bishop marches
Just in rear of his troops
(Come from the Court of Arches
Form'd by the croquet hoops!)
Wearing his jaunty apron
Woven of jasmyr leaves,
Robe of jasmine the cape from,
Delicate lily-bud sleeves.

Next come all the relations
Very splendidly drest,
Making sharp observations,
Every one on the rest.
Then, oh! beautiful bevy
Of bridesmaids fair and afraid!
Were I a king, my leeves
Only of you should be made!

Then the gomes softly tripping,
Half ashamed of her glee:
The Bridegroom leaping and skipping,
As bridegrooms should ever be.
Lovely is dawn of morning,
Innocent, bright, and gay;
Fair is she as the morning,
Radiant he as the day.

The little vows are over,
The pretty wee knot is tied:
Oh, happy fairy lover!
Oh, exquisite fairy bride!
While eager bluebells shake fast
Their loudest ring-a-ting, ting,
The guests sit down to breakfast
And eat like any thing!

THE QUESTION OF THE SUFFRAGE.

IF a majority of the voters of New York should amend the State Constitution in such manner as to vest the political power of the State in one family exclusively—say the house of MONARSKY or of WOOD—would it be competent for the Union be unable constitutionally to help themselves? And if thirty other States should do the same thing, would the Union be without constitutional remedy? Is the Government of the United States powerless to prevent the erection of a monarchy in any State? Is it powerless to prevent the total consequent overthrow of harmony among the States by the fundamental principle of their organization? This was a question which naturally occured to the Convention that framed the Government. The most sagacious mind in the Convention foresaw that the peril of the new system would be the centrifugal and not the centripetal tendency; and the whole body saw the folly of leaving the supreme power at the mercy of any lesser authority, and therefore the Convention comprehensively provided in the constitution that "the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government."

This provision, of course, forbids any State from adopting any form of government that it may choose, and restricts it to a particular form. Otherwise, as HAMILTON said, the liberties of the citizens of the United States might be overthrown by State authority, "while the National Government could legally do nothing more than behold its encroachments with indignation and regret." The constitutional provision is peremptory and mandatory upon the United States authority. It is also unlimited. The guarantee is perpetual. Whenever a State, from any cause, has ceased to have a republican form of government, it is the duty of the United States to intervene and restore that form. The United States are, therefore, necessarily vested with the authority of determining what is a republican government. An exact definition of the term is hardly possible. MADISON, in his famous statement, says that a republic is one "in which people meet and exercise the government in person: in a republic they assemble and administer it by their representatives and agents." But he leaves the definition of the word "people" still wanting.

It is, however, very easy to see what is not a republican government. The governments of Turkey and Hungary are not republican. A system which gives the political power exclusively to one person, to one family, or to one class, founded upon arbitrary and wholesale distinctions, is not republican. Practically speaking, a republican form of government is that in which all the adult citizens of sound mind and innocent of crime, and not of a class, are entitled to vote. Moreover, the indefinite clauses of a written constitution must always be interpreted by the light of greater experience and just reason. If, for instance, circumstances at any time compel the United States to enforce the constitutional guarantee of a republican government, they must determine for themselves what the Constitution does not, namely, what is a republican form. MADISON, again recurring to the subject, as Mr. HOWARD M. JENKINS, of Wilmington, in Delaware, quotes in the admirable pamphlet, "Our Democratic Republic," of which we speak briefly below, defines it as "a vigorous and able statement of the subject, declares substantially that a republican government is one that derives all its powers from the great body of the people, and to which it is essential that it be derived from no favored class of society.

If this be true, and it can hardly be denied, it seems to us plain that Congress may enforce the constitutional guarantee by protecting the right of every citizen to the suffrage. If any State by disfranchising any class of innocent adult citizens destroys its republican government, Congress would seem to be authorized to restore it by preventing such disfranchisement. And if experience should show or professed a sentiment upon the subject as to make this destruction a constantly menacing danger, why might not Congress execute the guarantee once and forever by forbidding any State to give political power exclusively to a favored class? Because, say some, the Constitution provides that electors of members of Congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature; and of course the State alone may decide who shall vote for members of the Legislature. This is the favorite method of proving that Congress has nothing to do with the suffrage in the States.

But suppose that the State decides that only persons named SMITH or HAMPTON shall be electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature, or only persons six feet in height, or of a blonde complexion, or of negro blood, has Congress, under the obligation to guarantee a republican form of government, no power whatever to interfere? Suppose that a Legislature so elected sends a Senator to Congress, has the Senate no right to object, upon adequate information of the facts, that the State which sends him is not republican in form? If such action of the State is final, is it not evident that the State alone decides what is a republican government, and that the constitutional provision is nullified by the very action which it was intended to prevent? The doctrine that the States alone are competent under the Constitution to deal with the suffrage is the result of the long dominance in the government of the Southern theories of the Constitution. It is the qualification and control of the suffrage which really determines the question of form in government, and as no subject is now more important we shall next week resume the discussion.

MR. GLADSTONE PRIME MINISTER.

MR. GLADSTONE at last grasps the prize for which every English statesman toils, and MR. DISRAELI, after holding it uncertainly for less than two years, surrenders it promptly, and, as he doubtless supposes, finally. For he has been opposing the inevitable tendency of the age and of his country, and has held power even for so short a time only by compromising his Tory principles. The accustomed movement of progress in England, and the astonishing revolution in Spain, are both undoubtedly due to the result of our war. It is impossible that thoughtful men in every country should see such a vindication of the power and tenacity of a popular government as that of the United States without reflections that will presently take form in remarkable public changes. In England, indeed, this is so plain that it is unpardonable in a British statesman not to provide for those radical alterations in the form and policy of the government which in can not be resisted.

In his able and unflinching canvass MR. DISRAELI has plained himself upon the true Tory ground. "The establishment of the Irish Church," he says, "is but the first step. When that is taken the momentum of reform will be increased, and it can not be stayed. Who does not see," he exclaims, "that the spirit which reforms the Irish Establishment will presently scrutinize the English Establishment? Are all the bulwarks and barriers to be overthrown?" This is precisely old Toryism. The bulwarks and barriers are always about going in the Tory apprehension. To abolish the disemboweling and quartering of traitors was to lay the axe at the foundation of the Constitution, and Lord ST. VINCENT, threescore years ago, washed his hands of would follow the abolition of the slave-trade. MR. DISRAELI is unquestionably right. The reform that now lays its hand upon the Irish Church will not stop there. The real problem of MR. GLADSTONE now is to secure safety with inevitable speed. If he tries to stop, as most Ministers do, he will be swept away as the Tories have been.

MR. GLADSTONE will hardly be a popular Prime Minister. He sees too plainly the reason of the other side. He is not a steady party man. He carries to public politics that judicial refining upon the arguments against his policy, as well as for it, which leads to apparent indecision, and chills a party following. Moreover, while he perceives the reason of reform he sees no less distinctly, and from experience, its practical difficulties. He has many of the defects which we imagine the English people greatly dislike in a leader. Of modern Ministers LORD PALMERSTON was the most agreeable to the English sentiment, which is personified, and which is very powerful. LORD PALMERSTON had no real political philosophy or insight. His strength lay in understanding the weakness of human nature, and using it. He had an air of jaunty and indomitable pluck upon all occasions; he talked loudly of British honor; he appealed skilfully to British prejudices; he was alert in debate, prompt at repartee; he never generalized nor spoke with intellectual earnestness; his only principle was laissez faire—let things alone until you hear the first threatening thunder of trouble, and then give way just enough to silence it. MR. GLADSTONE can not be such a Minister, for he is not such a man.

JOHN BRIGHT will undoubtedly be invited into the Cabinet, and, as a matter of expediency, we presume, rather than from preference, will join the Ministry. But, of course, he will not lose his seat in Parliament, nor his leadership of popular sentiment. MR. BRIGHT'S strength lies in his hearty sympathy with the progressive movement of the national mind. He has the kind of instinctive knowledge of it, and receives the same kind of profound confidence from it, that distinguished MR. LINCOLN in this country at the close of his career. The great body of the loyal American people trusted MR. LINCOLN as his countrymen trust JOHN BRIGHT. But the more ardent wing in this country was impatient of MR. LINCOLN, just as in England it describes MR. BRIGHT—"a middle-class man." But there is no English statesman during the war who so remarkably comprehended this country as JOHN BRIGHT, and his presence in the new Cabinet would be the most emphatic assurance that the best possible understanding would be maintained with the United States. Americans will never forget that when LORD PALMERSTON would gladly have seen war spring out of the Trent affair, when even LORD RUSSELL and MR. GLADSTONE said what they would now unfeignedly regret, JOHN BRIGHT breasted the current of prejudice against us, and declared that he did not believe our Government would justify the seizure. And now as right hand to him he will be welcomed. He would get no more slave-grown cotton from the United States.

With the accession of MR. GLADSTONE and of MR. BRIGHT the friends of America in England come into power. We may justly anticipate even a generous policy in the settlement of difficulties between us; and the moment is most favorable for England to recede from her rash precedent of belligerent recognition by inviting an international conference or proposing an understanding.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

THE "lock up" by speculators in Wall Street of a large amount of currency at the moment when large sums had been drawn out of the West to move our breadstuffs and cotton to the sea-board has had a depressing effect upon business, as it tightened the money market in all portions of the Union. But inasmuch as the country is not heavily stocked with goods, and it enjoys the benefit of free crops, there is more steadiness among business-men, notwithstanding this emergency, than was expected. Instead of its resulting in a panic, as many feared, money has become plenty. To guard against the repetition of this offense it may be necessary for Congress or the State, or both, to declare it to be a misdemeanor hereafter, punishable with fine and imprisonment. As the National Banks are agents of the National Government, and the offense took place in connection with those institutions, we do not see why it is not competent for Congress, as part of its plan of control and management, to take this step. Few offenses have inflicted deeper injury. The occasion of the transfer of funds from the East to the West will be looked upon by a new set of speculators in every ensuing fall to try this experiment of a "lock up," unless all the aids are resorted to which may be derived from penetrating and divorcing interest, and from penal laws. The State, as part of its ordinary jurisdiction over all crimes not strictly against national institutions, could also take cognizance of such an offense.

It is scarcely possible to suppose, however, that the Erie Railroad will again afford the means for any such operation. Its stock and debts are now estimated at over one hundred millions of dollars—an amount so greatly in excess of the capital upon which a dividend can be earned, and so greatly beyond the value of the road, that it can no longer be wielded in this manner to injure the public. Its future can be predicted with little certainty, considering the characters both of the Directorate and of the Judiciary. Only one feature is certain. It must endure severe litigation at an expense equal to its net earnings, if not more.

A new impetus has been recently developed in the progress of Southern recovery. It is the introduction of coin in the place of currency. This is accomplished by selling the cotton crop which floats from their shipments of cotton, and carrying to New Orleans the precious metals. The effort there made to give currency to silver instead of gold has finally been fairly carried up the price of silver to within two per cent. of that of gold, while, at the same time, the difference in New York was but two per cent. or one. Mexican silver has been there as well as here a premium of two per cent. above the premium on gold, due to the fact that they are more valuable than ordinary silver, on account of the purpose of being melted. The ROTHSCHILDS, who have the means of ascertaining with great exactness the value of coins as compared with each other over the world, have for some years past placed a higher relative value upon these than upon other coins nominally equal. The policy now pursued in New Orleans will probably advance the price of our silver coins in Canada. Their collection and transmission to New Orleans would doubtless pay handsomely for the trouble, if managed as part of some established industry. This policy will no doubt, if it receive no check, aid the country in returning to specie payments. It will be of great ing to specie payments. It will be of great benefit to the South, as it will produce economy, which is the first requisite to successful recovery. With the gold-producing States and the South both in a sound condition the remainder of the Union would be forcibly influenced.

We expect to find in the forthcoming report of Secretary MCCULLOCH a recommendation in favor of as speedy a return to specie payments as is possible in order to avoid a crash. He and those who favor this plan will be greatly strengthened by the example now being set in the South. The advantage to be derived from taking the initiative in this step is this, that the portion of the Union which is first in the field will have all the advantage which the present abundance of gold and silver affords in the markets in which they circulate. That abundance is due in great part to the policy of the United States in driving it from circulation and making it available only for the uses of custom-house and for the payment of interest on the public debt. If the South shall obtain a large supply in advance of a more active trade throughout the world than is now experienced, and in advance of such a rise in the value of the precious metals as will result necessarily from their adoption in any subsequent withdrawal from other countries, she will obtain her circulating medium at a cheaper rate than will be possible hereafter. It behooves the South to consider well the situation in this view. If every individual shall so improve his own circumstances as to make the payment of debts easy to him, it will not be difficult to return to specie payments. We hope the South may be inflexible in its present policy, and that the recovery commencing there may include State after State until it shall embrace the whole Union. The bill to legalize gold contracts, if it pass, will help this tendency.

We learn by the Mark Lane Express that the farmers of England find that wheat of a poor quality is the cheapest article to be fed to their animals, and that it is so used. It is not probable that the wheat thus fed grew upon light soils and that it is unfit for bread. This feature is entirely new in the experience of England; and the fact that can be used for such its use for cattle is in part owing to English publications, which state the quantity of wheat produced this season at an amount so vastly beyond the truth as to lead to waste. It is the cessity of its use in that manner to supply the place of other grains, we have often presented as one of the circumstances which aggravate the severity of drought.

The examination we have given to the subject at every stage of the trouble satisfies us that we have in no degree magnified the damage which England must suffer. We have neither advised nor stimulated speculation here, and those who speculate must do it at their own peril. We think, however, our advice to the great farming interest to hold on to their productions until they receive remunerative prices. Every kind of food will be wanted, and it is certain that our crops will be found to be not in excess of the demand. We should at all events see that what we raise is not disposed of so cheaply that it may be wasted upon cattle.

All the indications are, whatever may be the policy with respect to specie payments, that the North and the South, blessed as they are with good crops, will continue in a condition to keep the trade of the country free from any severe shock if we return to specie payments with the caution which debtors require.

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL POSTAL TREATY.

THE new Postal Treaty between the United States and Great Britain goes into operation on the 1st of January, 1869, and deserves very careful consideration. A close study of the text of the treaty reveals palpable injustice toward the American citizen—an injustice which must be ascribed to apathy and ignorance rather than to intentional negligence upon the part of the Americans entrusted to the Treaty. There is no guilt, we presume, in American citizenship, and it is very remarkable that the Government should be willing to inflict a penalty upon it. No reasons can be evidenced, that the Government should rather foster than discourage the freest expression of American thought, and facilitate its cheapest and widest diffusion. The interests of literature are those of peace and advantage are given by our Government to the circulation of English thought and opinion. It is a direct discrimination in favor of the English subject over the American citizen.

By the new treaty the United States Postoffice carries through the country English books parcels weighing 100 pounds, and the British Post-office accounts therefor to the United States Post-office for $16, or 16 cents per pound (Art. VI., 1), while our Post-office charges for a corresponding parcel of American books $96, or 96 cents a pound. Here is a discrimination of 600 per cent. against American books, American authors, and American readers and publishers. That is to say, we residents of the United States can not transmit through our own mails book-parcels weighing more than four pounds without payment of letter postage; but the lucky Briton may send through our mails, from one side of the continent to the other, book-parcels weighing 100 pounds or more. This is a palpable injustice to American readers, which a little careful reflection and collation would have avoided. It is certainly rather hard that 100 pounds of Tory histories may be sent from England through our mails, and our Government receive for the carriage only one cent per ounce, while it refuses to carry the Histories of the United States by BANCROFT and HILDRETH, weighing less than eighteen pounds each, except at letter postage. A more foolish arrangement could not be imagined: for a policy which prefers the literature of a foreign country to the finest native productions can be heartily commended by no wise man.

Again, we residents of the United States, instead exchanging our books and newspapers through the mails, are not allowed to indicate upon the wrappers our names as the senders. But, by the new Postal Treaty, a person who mails a parcel of any kind may write his name upon it—provided only that he be a resident of the British realm. Mr. MOZLEY, for instance, in mailing a copy of his "Dutch Reality" or "Netherlands" from Boston to New York or St. Louis, is not allowed to write even his initials upon the parcel, without subjecting it to letter postage, which is six times the rate of book postage. But the very same United States mail will carry not only books and papers, but packets of any kind, from Boston to Canada or Australia, or any part of the country with the superscription and compliments of Mr. LAIRD, or Mr. ROEBUCK, or Lord WARNCLIFFE, or any other excellent Briton who may happen to be an American correspondent with his autograph. This is a small advantage, indeed; but there should be absolute equality in details, and every advantage is a great offense.

Still further, the British Government by drawback pays the English book-maker for sending books to this country. Our Government, then, admits the same books free of duty and delivers them at the door of any person in the United States at a trifling expense. This is again pure discrimination and favoritism for the British subject; but when we consider our heavy taxation upon every thing we use, upon our sales and our incomes, and the serious and disproportionate taxation which the manufacturers makers are subjected for raw material, certainly the subject becomes more and more surprisingly, and we can see in it a less excusable spirit than shameful and persistent discrimination.

We do not complain of the International Postage treaty in itself. Many of its provisions are good. We only call attention to the subject that American citizens are not allowed the privileges in their own mails which are given to the residents of Great Britain, toward whom we certainly entertain all friendly feelings, and whose clear claim to our own upon the favor of the United States Government we are unable to perceive. Under the present arrangement every American citizen may as well select London or Liverpool as the points of departure for the weighty mail parcels he may wish to send from New York or Brooklyn to Jersey City, Washington to Georgetown. The new Convention supersedes upon the 1st of January, 1869, that of the 15th of May, 1867, and may be terminable at any time on a notice by either office of one year. We hope that early and careful attention will be given by Congress to the plain injustice of the terms of the new treaty. The laws that effect trade should certainly be as generous toward the citizen as toward the foreigner; and Yankee diplomacy will be justly a subject of derision if either the new Treaty or the United States Postal Laws be not revised and equalized.

THE GOOD NEW YEAR.

MR. JOHN STUART MILL'S direct influence as a legislator is probably limited to a single act, but no man has done more for the progress of his country in sound political philosophy. He is one which he called by many, with some severity possibly, a philosophic statesman—if there could be any other. The other kind, who are not philosophic, are more truly described as politicians. EDMUND BURKE, a century ago, was a philosophic statesman. Unfortunately he did not always command his temper, and his taste in oratory was sometimes questionable. But he was generally regarded as a visionary by his opponents, and as a theorist by many of his friends. But could BURKE'S counsels upon the great questions of America, of Ireland, of India, and of the relations of influence, have prevailed in the policy of the nation, the record of England would have been nobler and brighter than it is. A thinker is as valuable in politics as elsewhere; and amidst the loud hum of lesser public men it is impossible not to recall BURKE'S famous figure of the ox in the field.

During the late political contest in England in which Mr. MILL was defeated, his opponents constantly declared that he was an atheist; and an appeal was made to Mr. MILL to contradict the story. Mr. MILL replied that when the charge was made at his previous election, it was refuted by eminent dignitaries of the Church of England, but that he had refused to deny it and should persist in his refusal because he did not acknowledge any right in any body to ask what his theological beliefs might be, as evidence of his political opinions, and because he owed it to future candidates not to encourage a practice which could only lead to attempts to extract from every man material for prejudice against himself. Mr. MILL further said that he had published many books upon grave topics, and it was for those who made the charge to substantiate it from his writings.

In this reply Mr. MILL shows his usual good sense. A candidate's religious belief as such is nobody's business. If he be an unprincipled, dishonest man, the fact can be readily enough ascertained without any reference to him. But to assume his practical dishonesty from his theological views, is simply absurd. The disabilities of Jews and Catholics have been removed in England, and no man can rightfully be judged by any profession of faith, or by no profession. Of course, however, when a man's religious views accompany a notorious personal immorality or commit him to a certain political policy, the question may justly be asked, with the object properly defined him. Then it is no longer a religious, but has become a political question.

Thus, in the State of New York, where it is the known policy of the Roman Church to obtain a separate share of the school fund for the support of its sectarian schools—where the effort has been made—where it was flagrantly broken under a mask last winter, and where it will unquestionably be renewed, it is perfectly proper to ask a candidate who is supposed to belong to that communion if the supposition be true. His theological opinions would be presumptive evidence of his political opinions upon a vital point, and he could not decline to declare himself under the plea that his religious belief was nobody's business. The theological question that is true, but in the political it is untrue. Mr. MILL's letter is not inconsistent with this view.

DAVIS'S TRIAL.

WE have never been sanguine that JEFFERSON DAVIS would be tried, and we suppose nobody imagines that if convicted he would be punished. The whole affair may be a little ashamed at the constantly recurring spectacle of a solemn arguing about his case. If the Government, as nobody doubts, has been acquished all intention of punishment, why has it not long ago quashed the indictment? Mr. DANA made a conclusive argument upon the subject, so far as the Fourteenth Amendment was concerned. He showed that if that was to be regarded as a punishment, which was not its intention, a prolonged perjury, however, left those who had not violated any oath to be dealt with as traitors and hung, while the traitors who were perjurers also would merely be incapacitated from holding office under the Congress. But this was an argument in favor of proceeding with the trial, and why proceed if the result is a foregone conclusion?

Our opinion is that the trial has been upon the ground that is submitted to a jury the question of secession—a question which the nation has settled by the highest human and terrible resort. The fact of being in arms would not be disputed by the counsel of DAVIS, but they would have attempted to justify the action. If that should have been ruled out, they would probably have submitted to judgment; and if DAVIS had been condemned as a traitor he would have been pardoned. We have heard much of the moral effect of such a trial, of the odium it would cast upon treason, of the disgrace that would attach to every man who should make a similar attempt hereafter. But this reasoning is mistaken. No judicial decision could make DAVIS a criminal in the eyes of those who do not already utterly condemn him. No man arrested for what are called political crimes ever becomes odious in the ordinary sense. Besides, what would be the significance of the pardon which was not only certain in case of conviction, but which was doubtless generally approved? If DAVIS were liable to the law punishing treason, no greater offense against the law could be conceived. And if he were pardoned, certainly the law ought to be repealed.

The case now goes up to the Supreme Court of the United States, where, we presume, it will be early called and the indictment quashed. But, since that is the determination, let us hope that it will be done in the absence of the prosecution, and that the further enormous expense of a trial that is virtually decided may at once end.

SHARP PRACTICE.

THE publishers of M'CLINTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, have sent the following circular from one of their agents of the work in Boston:

"BOSTON, November 24, 1868.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

GENTLEMEN,—I am told that the agent of the new edition of SMITH'S Dictionary (HACK & HOUGHTON) is representing to subscribers to M'CLINTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopedia that you have abandoned the further publication of that work, considering it a failure, and is gathering new subscribers to that work on this representation. Please write if this is true. We think it due to you, the agents, and the subscribers, to publish a statement of the facts. The agent represents himself as having control of the New England States, and if his statement is untrue he deserves a notice.

"Yours truly, PITMAN & CO."

The agent mentioned confesses duly deserve a notice, and a very strong one; for his alleged representations are wholly untrue, as, of course, the publishers whom he represents are aware. The editors and publishers of the Cyclopedia of Doctors M'CLINTOCK and STRONG are hard at work, and within a month a volume has been issued. The host of names of theological and general scholars who have expressed the highest commendation of the work, as well as those of the chief religious and critical journals in the country, are evidence both of the excellence of the Cyclopedia and of its most flattering reception. Dr. Mer. FORSTER SHELDON says:

"The multiplication of works according to the Scriptures, the Church, and Theological Science generally, have for its object to bring the results of the advance of them all, thereby saving the student both time and expense. The editors of this Cyclopedia have performed the difficult task in an admirable manner. They have brought down to the present day all important topics, and have presented the materials in a lucid, compact form, and in an attractive style. Not the least of the excellences in a work covering so much ground, and relating to so many languages, is seen in the candor and fairness of the editorial supervision."

Leading Ministers of the various denominations of the Christian Church declare that "for thorough research, comprehensive range, accurate scholarship, and strict fidelity it is vastly superior to any work of its class." M'CLINTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopedia will be completed in about six volumes, and the subscribers need not be troubled by any adverse representations of the agents of a mere Biblical Dictionary.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MR. M'CULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury, has very strong language in his document upon the Loan-Tender acts, and speaks of our currency as "disorganized and demoralized." He recommends that it be declared by law that after January 1, 1870, United States notes shall cease to be legal tender for the payment of private debts, and that one year afterward they shall cease to be tender for any payments whatsoever. He suggests the conversion of these notes into three-per-cent bearing bonds. The internal revenue receipts for the fiscal year have amounted to $246,000,000. The Secretary thinks that they should be diminished and the excises increased. Hiereportshows a decrease in the national debt from November 1, 1867, to November 1, 1868, of $26,619,162. Of this sum $19,000 is in coin bonds, $1,000,000 in currency, and $7,500,000 to the purchase of Alaska. The payments for bounties amounted to $43,000,000. The Secretary defends his interference with the stock and money market, and says that it is necessary while the country have existed if specie payments had been resumed, or if the Government of the Government had been converted into bonds.

A terrible steamboat collision took place on the Ohio River on the night of December 4, resulting in the fearful loss of 300 lives. The steamboats were the Lexington and United States, plying between Cincinnati and Louisville. The collision occurred in a dense fog, owing to false signals having been sounded. Immediately after the collision the Lexington was discovered to be on board the United States caught fire and enveloped in flames. The scene that followed was appalling among the passengers, many of them jumping overboard to escape the flames. A fearful struggle between seeming and elderly persons, many of them young ladies, was the result. Many were drowned.

As was to be expected the Charter election in this city resulted in the election of A. Oakey Hall for Mayor and Richard O'Gorman for Corporation Counsel, the latter over Mr. Graham by about 58,000, a majority of almost double that number. Hall's majority was over 80,000, and O'Gorman's nearly that number.

The importance of General Sheridan's Indian campaign, which we give more detailed account of in the paper, is by no means confined to the results contemplated from a military point of view. His victories are those of peace mainly. Once rid our Southwestern territory of hostile savages, and the only great obstacle to the Pacific Railroad will have been overcome. The London Times has expressed its surprise at commencing with wonder upon the rapid progress of this road. Some fourteen miles of the new road will be inaugurated by its successful completion is furnished by the receipt of news from San Francisco to the Union of $250,000 in specie for China and $70,000 for Japan.

General Grant's Cabinet is complete, his only care could that "troops are still needed in the Southern States," and that it is undesirable to reduce the numbers of our regular army below the present standard. The recent appointments by General Thomas and Sheridan fully justify this conclusion. The former reports that lawless element in Kentucky and Kentucky as insolent and aggressive, and the latter shows that an insufficient provision has been made hitherto by the General Government for the enforcement of law. Sheridan was appointed to the New Orleans election, but it was only by the presence of national troops that the temporary surrender of the franchise by Republicans.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Prime Minister of England, Disraeli, has resigned. He appealed to the people, and has been defeated. Mr. Gladstone has called him to Premier, and it is reported that he has invited Mr. Bright to become a member of the new Cabinet.

The London Observer gives the following as a list of the members of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet:

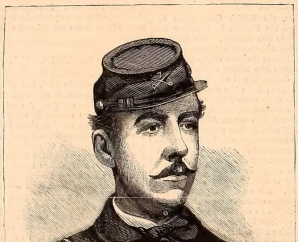
Lord High Chancellor—Sir William Page Wood.
President of the Privy Council—Lord Cranworth.
Lord Privy Seal—Earl Russell.
Chancellor of the Exchequer—Robert Lowe.
First Lord of the Admiralty—Mr. Childers.
Foreign Secretary—Lord Clarendon.
Home Secretary—Henry A. Bruce.
Secretary of War—Mr. Cardwell.
Secretary for India—Duke of Argyle.
Colonial Secretary—Earl Granville.
Secretary for Ireland—Chichester Fortescue.
President of the Poor Law Board—Mr. Goschen.
President of the Board of Trade—John Bright.
Postmaster-General—Dr. Lush.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—Charles P. Villiers.
Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland—Earl Spencer.
Lord Chancellor of Ireland—Mr. Fitzgerald.

The anniversary of the coup-d'etat of 1851 took troubles for Napoleon. Bombs in addition to his Banquo's ghost was to Macbeth. But the man who owned Banquo had his head cut off, and the bombs only shook their ghosts. So long as Napoleon lives he can preserve the peace of Europe, which cannot be bound up with his own fortunes the conservative interests of his dynasty. But the bombs may yet reach Napoleon and his death—what then?

The prospects of the Cuban insurgents are by no means flattering. It is true that they have gained possession almost entirely of the Eastern Department, but they have not been particularly successful in their engagement with the Government forces. They were defeated at Cobre, a few miles from Santiago; and although they afterward took the place, they now have to meet a determined and well-prepared campaign in their attempt against Santiago. Important reinforcements were on this landed upon the island, and the Spanish Government is determined at any cost to suppress the rebellion.

GENERAL CUSTER'S COMMAND MARCHING TO ATTACK THE CHEYENNE VILLAGE.

BURNING OF FORT LAFAYETTE.



ABOUT noon, on the 1st inst., Fort Lafayette took fire from the chimney of a fire-place in which a fire had been kindled by one of the workmen engaged in repairs upon the work. The roof was soon ablaze, and the fire continued through the afternoon and night, fed by the pine shingles and lumber crowded inside of the fort for the use of the workmen. The alarm was immediately given, and, as it was known that the fort inclosed a magazine containing ten tons of powder, the inhabitants of Fort Hamilton were filled with consternation, and fled in panic to a safer neighborhood.

Fortunately the flames did not reach the magazine, which was protected by two doors several feet apart and by a thick wall of brick.

Fort Lafayette was built after the close of our Revolutionary contest with Great Britain, to guard the entrance of New York harbor. It stood on the Long Island side of the bay, about six miles below the city, and almost directly opposite Fort Wadsworth on Staten Island. It was built on a reef about 300 yards from the shore, and at low tide was surrounded by about six feet of water. The structure was quaint in appearance from the outside as well as within. The inner wall was diamond-shaped, and rose five or six feet higher than the wall surrounding it. The top surface of the inner wall sloped toward the centre, and it was upon this strong rampart that the heavy guns were mounted.

The original name of the work was Fort Diamond, but about forty-four years ago it received its present name in honor of General LAFAYETTE, the French Revolutionary hero.

The progress made in the construction of ordnance long ago rendered this fortification almost useless for defensive purposes. It is chiefly noted as "the American Bastile," in which political prisoners were confined during the late war. In its cells were placed men who, like BENJAMIN WOOD, abused the liberty of the press; commercial speculators who were implicated in blockade-running; the lake pirate COLES; MARTIN, the hotel burner, and other lawless men. Cases there were, doubtless, in regard to which a great deal might be said on both sides, but the Government was obliged to act promptly. It was a time when patriotism must be like the virtue of Cæsar's wife, beyond suspicion.

CAPTAIN LOUIS M. HAMILTON.—(PHOT. BY SLEE BROTHERS, POUGHKEEPSIE.)

The loss by the fire at Fort Lafayette is estimated at $100,000, upon which there is no insurance. Of the armament there were destroyed twenty-two 10-inch Rodman guns, with their carriages, together with one dismounted gun; ten 100-pound Parrott guns and carriages, and twelve 32-pounders with wooden carriages. The new lumber destroyed, which was used in repairing the fort, was valued at $1330.

ELECTION RIOTS IN ENGLAND.

OUR engraving on page 813 illustrates the character of the riots which formed a prominent feature in the late election. It was the first election for members of Parliament under the operation of the new Reform Bill.

We in this country can well understand how that which calls itself conservatism most readily allies itself with the elements of disturbance. DISRAELI, in appealing to the "No Popery" sentiment in England, did exactly what HORATIO SEYMOUR did in his address at the New York ACADEMY of Music July 4, 1863. But never has it occurred in the history of this country that a popular election has been accompanied by riotous manifestations so violent and so extensive as those which attended the recent elections in England. Even the isolated instances in the Southern States during the late November election are scarcely noteworthy in the comparison. The riots in England were due to two causes: first, to the fact that a large number of the voters were unaccustomed to the exercise of the suffrage; but, secondly, and mainly, to the religious element which was allowed to enter so prominently into the contest.

Our illustration relates particularly to the disturbances at Blackburn, in the county of Lancaster. Blackburn is a manufacturing town containing 28,000 inhabitants. The mayor and other civic authorities found it impossible to quell the riot without resorting to force; and with the most energetic efforts of the police order was not restored before a great deal of mischief had been accomplished. A large number of Liberal voters in all the manufacturing districts of England were intimidated by these disturbances, and thus kept from the polls.

THE SEVENTH U.S. CAVALRY CHARGING INTO BLACK KETTLE'S VILLAGE AT DAYLIGHT, NOVEMBER 27, 1868.—[SEE PAGE 811.]

THE CONFESSION OF ZILLAH THE WITCH.

CHAPTER I.

I AM a painter's daughter: and although my father was of Zurich, I am, on my mother's side, of English blood. But I have small memory of this mother, for she died when I was a child; yet here in my doleful prison her face hath come to me in a dream often, and I have seen her smile, and heard whispered words of comfort which I will not set down lest they too be called witchcraft.

My father loved only his art. If he cared for me, it was but fitfully, and because my face served him as a model. My hands, too, he loved to paint, they being wondrous small, and shaped slenderly. My hair also was exceedingly beautiful; it reached nearly to my feet in rich waves of brown. I have heard that many women afflicted as I am have mercifully had this gift taken their head—a crown of glorious hair. Yes, I am afflicted in body: I have ever been sickly, and my form is slight and thin—but comely, some say; and my left foot barely touches the ground. Yet my face hath power and beauty—yes, and sweetness too, though I be a witch. And it often served my father in his pictures for many a saint and martyr.

I confess that he also made me sit to him at times for a sibyl, or a sorceress, or a nun condemned to die for broken vows; and once I sat for a Saxon queen undergoing the ordeal of the red-hot plowshares. He changed my hair then to golden; and on my strange sad face, my dark eyes, and ebony brows, he threw the light of the torturing fire.

Ah, God, as it will be to-morrow when I die!

But I dare not think of this, for my heart grows cold with fear, my hands tremble, and my poor pen drops powerless.

These sittings to my father the painter were very sad to me, for he never spoke, save to bid me change my attitude, or bring upon my face the expression he desired. I could do this at will. I had but to think of joy or sorrow, of hate or love, and swift upon my face there flashed the semblance of these passions. As I sat silent, having neither book nor work, I used to dream. I dreamed of the banished queens, the martyrs, and the lonely saints in deserts, whom my father loved to paint. Often it was at his command I dreamed thus.

"Zillah," he would say, "I paint a queen falsely accused, brought before a gaping multitude to die. Think, child, of her agony, her indignation at man's injustice, and her piteous prayers to God."

Then as he spoke the queen's soul came into my soul, and all her anguish rushed upon me; her mingled shame and courage, her faith and fear, the hope of her spirit, and the shrinking of her flesh. And on my face there flushed and paled and quivered these terrors, and my father's pencil seized and fixed them on the canvas.

Ah! for his art's sake he should not have lost his child. For the visions which he bade arise would not cease when he flung down the pencil. No; they grew on me; and upon my face—forced so oft to expressions beyond my youth, and alien to the time—there grew a something unnatural and weird; so at night, when I looked upon myself in my mirror, I felt afraid, and I covered my wild eyes with my hands.

There was a maiden lived near us, whose supple form is to be seen in many a picture of my father's, joined to my sad face. She was noble by birth; but her father, an English exile driven from his own land by wars and treason, died at Zurich so poor that scarce was there money found to chant a mass for him at his burial. Yet his child was gently nurtured, and lacked nothing of this world's joys; for a rich goldsmith and his wife, having no children, took her, and loved her as their own.

She was no friend of mine; but her lover was my father's pupil, and so she was glad to come to his studio, where she could babble love-talk as he worked. She was not beautiful; her eyes were a cold blue, and though her skin was fair, there was no light upon her face. And she loved all my life long, for his father and mine were cousins and brother-painters.

I wish I could tell my story in quicker, sharper words. As I write it seems to me that these cold sentences can not make you understand my misery—cannot bring to your vision the fear of my pain—can not force you to breathe the chill atmosphere that surrounded me. Always to see his indifference, to hear her dislike, to suffer my father's silent carelessness—this was my life for weeks, months, years.

Ah, I could not help my love! It came to me when I was a child, and as a woman I could not fling it away. As well try to pluck the life from my veins as tear out of my heart this woeful love. He did not heed it; no thought of my pain ever ruffled his careless nature; Beatrice had all his thoughts, all his love. Scarcely did his glance ever fall on me, unless I sat that day, and then it rested on my pallid face as it might on a face of stone.

No maiden in Zurich was so solitary as I. Being sickly and silent, I could not make friends, and I felt I must not dare to ask for sympathy, if I fancied myself at times, and pined at sight of my own face, what would these happier damsels say if I confessed to them my wild visions? These grew upon me with more intensity as I became older, and oft at night I heard voices bidding me arise and escape to the wilderness, or to the heights of lonely mountains. They tell me now these were the voices of demons commanding me join the witches' sabbath, and my judges say that doubtless I arose and went. Witnesses also have sworn they saw me in strange shapes fleeing through woods and marshes at night. Alas! I know not if this be true. If so, the power hath left me now. Shut up in this doleful prison, no spell comes to my memory which shall change me to bird, or hare, or wehr-wolf, and so help me to escape the fagot and the flames.

Well, perchance it is best to die and be forgiven. Rather would I choose death than a return to sorcery. Ah me! I did not wish to be a witch. The sin grew upon me as a fever in the blood grows, till the weed grower within me was stronger than I. Yet if I could interpret dreams, and read thoughts, and see as in a vision the form of the absent, I wist not that it was wicked; and I swear I have no remembrance of all the evil things witnessed against me. If in the night I arose, and fled away as a bird or a deer, I knew it not; though I will not deny that ofttimes in the mornings I have found my pillow wet with tears, and my head heavy, and my limbs aching.

ZILLAH IN THE SECRET CHAMBER.

As I have heard happier maidens say theirs did after much dancing. Well, these be honorable men who have tried me, so I will not gainsay them. It may be that much sorrow, and the torture, and the dungeon have taken away my memory; so no shadow of my wanderings in unholy shapes rests upon my brain.

It so happened that my father painted the Saxon queen Ambrose stood and looked on. Now Beatrice had sat for the figure, the rounded arms, the swelling neck; but mine was the woful face that gazed upward in prayer.

"Your queen's form is beautiful," said Ambrose, "but I like not her face."

I spoke not, though a sharp pang ran through me at his cruel words, and clasping my hands I cast them upward wildly, forgetting who was by.

"There is the look I needed," cried my father, in anger; "why not have done that yesterday, girl?"

Then they disputed on the queen's face till my father threw down his pencil, and bade Ambrose finish it himself.

"Right willingly," he answered. "To my mind the face should show the shrinking of the flesh, the fear of the woman, not the faith of the soul."

"Then your queen will burn to death," said my father, "and mine through faith would escape."

"If she had faith like Samson the red-hot iron would scorch, and pass would pierce through the mask of courage on the face," said Ambrose, taking up the brush. "Now, Zillah, think thyself a witch, and yonder pile of wood thou seest in the painting is to burn thee. Fancy thou feelest the fire touch the tender sole of thy foot, then shrink back upon thy chair and shriek. Well done, girl; now will I paint the queen's first step upon the glowing iron bravely."

So I set all that day to Ambrose, and as his hand, unloving eyes looked into my face I felt about my heart a torture like the fiery ordeal of the queen.

CHAPTER II.

I SPEAK of this picture because it wrought out my fate. Being finished, many came to see it, and my father, a curious man, wishing to know what the people said, put up a curtain by the painting, and placed me behind it in ambush.

On the second day of the show, when I, being weary, half slept with my head upon my hands, the sound of a voice roused me, bringing me to my feet as the cry of fire might. All my blood chilled at that voice, and there thrilled through my frame a thousand warnings, whispering of sorrow and death.

"There are more powers than we wot of, lady," answered the knight; "the world is young yet. This girl is wondrous beautiful, both in face and form."

"Oh, the Saxon queen hath Beatrice Damer's shape, my lord. Zillah hath but her face: her form is thin, and somewhat crooked. But what think you of the picture?"

"The queen shrinks too fearfully from the ordeal, lady. Being innocent, and full of faith, she will tread the plowshares unscathed, and her face should be brave and calm, not fearful."

"Ah! as her father painted it at first. But methinks the horror and fear of pain depicted in the queen is more natural," said the lady.

"Is it that face," returned the knight, "the young painter understands not the woman he has painted."

"Nay, sir, as a woman, say I should fear horribly the red-hot iron; and I think the queen's face would have looked as the young Ambrose hath limned it."

"Madam, had you been the queen it would have looked so," said the knight.

The voices moved away: and I heard the rustle of the lady's rich robe, and the stately tread of the noble, as they passed through our poor doorway.

"So I am crooked and a witch," I said to myself, bitterly. "What have I done to Beatrice Damer that she should take away my good name?"

And for the first time I evil-wished her, and longed in my heart that I were indeed a witch.

"Zillah!" cried the voice of Ambrose. Startled I looked up, and saw him at the curtain, holding it aside as he stood. He was pale, and though he smiled his lip trembled.

"I am sorry thou hast heard me," he said. "Thou art not so crooked, Zillah, as the lady's speech. It was empty babble, child; naught else."

"I can see in the mirror what I am," I answered, calmly. "But tell me, Ambrose, do I seem to thee a witch?"

"Dash!" he answered; "I wonder Beta hath uttered such cruel, giddy words."

And for the first time since I had grown a woman, he fixed his eyes on me without that stony look in them that chilled me.

"Poor child!" he said, softly; "no, thou art no witch, Zillah; I swear it."

Then he let the curtain drop; and with a burning glow upon my cheek I rose, and moving it gently, I watched him as he went away.

"No, not a witch!" and yet if, by some witchcraft, I could only make him love me!"

And sitting down again, I pondered in my loneliness on unlawful things—on spells and sorcery, and that weirdness in my blood that made me differ from other maidens.

CHAPTER III.

THE next day my father shut his studio against all comers.

"The painting was sold," he said, "and the English baron who had bought it would not have it shown."

Then I heard this was the noble whose voice had startled me; and he had made my father great offers to come to England and paint the ceilings of a stately castle which he had newly built.

"Thou wilt not go to England, father?" I cried.

"Why not?" he answered, angrily. "It is a rich country, and this count pays like a prince. See what he hath given me for my Saxon queen."

He showed me a great purse of gold. But I turned my eyes from it, shuddering. A voice in my heart told me this was the price of my blood, and I loathed the sight of its glitter.

"Where shall I live in thy absence, father?" I said, timidly hoping the hand of fate would spare me.

"Thou goest with me, Zillah," he answered. "This English noble saith there is room, and to spare, in his goodly castle on the Avon."

I knew it before he spoke; yet now I grew faint, and a shadow like the shadow of death fell upon me.

"Let me stay in Zurich, father," I cried. "Let me stay in Zurich and live."

"Life and health are as sound and safe in England as elsewhere, gentle damsel," said a voice, and turning, I saw the English noble standing courteously in our doorway. He was of tall stature and fair pale face, his nose high and hooked, his head thick with light curls. Strange, I thought him evil-looking, yet the world called him handsome; so let it stand that he was handsome, and, moreover, since then I know me sorceries and death."

His light eyes sparkled at this, and bending down to me, he whispered, and caused in alone: "So the good painter understands not English? That is well. Zillah, I came hither only to seek thee. On thy mother's side we are akin."

"I am only a poor painter's daughter," I said, shrinking from his outstretched hand.

"There is witch's blood in thee, Zillah, and blood is stronger than water, even if it be lukewater," he answered; "and through that blood I claim thee. Thy mother's mother was my grandame's sister. Thou must come to England, girl; there is no escape for thee. Meet me at sunset on the bridge and I will tell thee more."

Then he talked to my father of our journey, and, scarcely glancing again at me, he departed.

I would not go to the bridge, I said; but as the sun went down I felt upon my heart, as it were, cords of fire, and these drew me forth and set me in that man's presence. He took me by the hand and led me to a little knoll by the lake,

"Oh, my lord, I am but listened, if I had but heeded this cry of my good angel!" Looking beyond the curtain, myself unseen, I beheld a man of some forty years, of a grave and steadfast face, and noble presence, yet slightly stooping, and dressed soberly though richly.

"The queen is surely a living woman," he said. "Who is the maiden?"

"The queen wears the face of the painter's daughter, my lord," answered the lady with him.

"It is a strange face," mused the noble. "Do you know the lady?"

"Faith, my lord," she answered, haughtily, "my knowledge lies not among painters or such like, but I have heard Beatrice Damer say she is somewhat of a witch, and moody and silent as a cloistered nun."

"Damer!" repeated the noble; "is she of Zurich?"

"Yes; but her father was a noble, exiled from England."

The knight mused a moment, then said:

"And what doth this demoiselle say of the painter's daughter?"

"Oh, the maidest things! How she falls at times into a trance or sleep; and in this sleep she can reveal secrets, interpret dreams, and foretell the future. But, truly, it is somewhat dangerous to speak of her art. Such powers can only come of sorcery."

where pine-trees grew. Here we sat, and he discoursed long on strange things: on the power to be gained by fasting and watching, on spells, on the secrets hidden in the earth and air, on the enchantments to be wrought by the eye and the hand and the waving arms, and on that mystic force in the voice and the presence of a kingly man which make other men's souls obedient to his.

Never had lips spoken to me as this man's lips; and as I listened to words that seemed the interpretation of my own secret thoughts, I trembled.

"Scarcely have I courage to muse on these unlawful things," I said; "and you, my lord, are brave enough to speak them."

"Not to the world, Zillah," and he smiled mournfully, "but only to thee. Such thoughts run in the blood of some, and I have told thee we are akin."

Then he took from his neck a chain of gold, and hanging to it was a picture in enamel of a lady. At first I thought I looked upon mine own face; then I saw she wore a dress of an ancient fashion, and a crown of pearls was on her head.

"By this I recognized thee, Zillah, when I looked upon the Saxon queen," he said. "This is thy ancestress, whose blood runs in thy veins and mine. She was deemed a sorceress, and being tried—her judges Ignorance and Fear—she perished at the stake. All her kith and kin forsook her little child, who, wandering in penury and want, came at last to be a servant to a Flemish merchant, then thy father's wife. Hearing all this from my mother when a boy, I said it was base to forsake the child, and when I was a man I would find her. Thus, Zillah, I have sought thy mother many years, and I have found thee."

"Not for kindness do you claim kin with me," I answered. "Leave me in peace."

"If I hope to find in thee the gifts thy grand-dame had, what then?" he asked. "Unhappy in love and despised, what peace is there for thee at Zurich?"

I grew white to the lips as he spoke.

"Do not tempt me," I said, with tears.

But as I spoke the sound of music came, wafted to us by the breeze, and I saw Ambrose and Beatrice seated in a little boat, floating down the lake. He toyed with her long hair, and she leaned upon him as he sat; and ever and anon he touched the flute he held, piping forth sweet slow music, with rippling laughter and gentle kisses for its interlude.

I hid behind the trees; but her laughing face and his glowing lips passed so close that my eyes looked into theirs, and saw the love in them, and my heart grew bitter as gall.

Then my kinsman leaned forward and whispered in my ear:

"Zillah, I, and I only, can give thee the secret desire of thine heart. I promise thee that yonder careless woman shall never be the wife of Ambrose, and his love shall return to thee, only consent to come into England and be my witch."

And in an evil moment I consented hastily, and the knight, stooping, took my hand and kissed it.

"I will never leave thee nor forsake thee, Zillah," he said, in his rich, mournful voice; "and I will crown thee with wealth and honor."

"What are these to me," I answered, "when there is no one in the wide world who loves me?"

"Power is love," returned the knight. "We will gain power, and the world will come to our feet."

I did not heed him. I was thinking of Beatrice's careless grace; I was thinking of the passionate heart of Ambrose given to her—the heart that might be mine.

"Oh, sir knight, let not thy promise fail me," I said, wistfully.

"It shall not fail, Zillah." And drawing me toward him, he pressed his lips upon my brow.

CHAPTER IV.

Ambrose bade me farewell sadly.

"Thine is the face I have known and loved the longest, Zillah," he said. "I shall miss thee sorely when thou art gone."

"What! with Beatrice Damer as a consolation?" I asked, bitterly.

"Perhaps she will be a poor comforter," he answered, and he turned away with a weary look.

And so we parted; I with a wild hope in my heart, and he with a fear in his.

It was a weary journey by sea and land before we reached the castle of my kinsman. But I speak not of this, nor of the stately riches of his house; I speak only of a secret chamber in the eastern tower, wherein were crucibles, and censers, and strange fires, and things which I dare not tell of. Here, too, were couches of Persian silk, and embroidered hangings, and carpets of tapestried work, so soft that a footfall was never heard. There was no window, but a costly lamp, ever alight, hung from the ceiling, and sweet perfumes filled the air always.

In this place did my evil kinsman practice his enchantments; and though in all these I was his aid and helper, I speak truth when I say I knew naught of them. For when I entered the secret chamber at dead of night my senses sank into a deep sleep, and I remembered not what I uttered or what I saw.

The baron had said courteously to my father:

"Paint as leisurely as it liketh thee, and sit at thine own table; but as for thy daughter, her mother was of my blood, and I shall treat her as a kinswoman."

"My wife could not be of your kin, my lord; she was but a servant," returned my father, and his face paled strangely.

"I care not what she was," answered the baron. "Say no more."

So he told his household I was a kinswoman, and he gave me jewels and silks, and all things befitting a lady; but I felt these were given me for my witchcraft, and I hid my bitterness in my heart.

So by day I was the Lady Zillah, honored as an innocent maiden; but at night I knew I was a witch. In the blessed sunlight, when freed from that strange sleep, I used no witcheries. Only, knowing I had the power, I have sometimes charmed away the pains of the sick, not thinking I did evil.

As for the baron, he gained great honor through me, and in a year he was a belted earl. Then I spoke to him of his promise, and asked to go back to my own land.

"The painter Ambrose shall come to England," he answered. "I have kept my word with thee. The king, at my request, has granted to Beatrice Damer her father's lands, and he has given to me the wardship of her and them; and she shall not marry the painter."

I was amazed at this news, and sorrowful, fearing Ambrose would be grieved.

"Have patience, Zillah," said my kinsman. "I have told thee thou shalt have the desire of thine heart."

So I waited in gloomy patience. And soon after this the earl went up to court, returning after a while with a great retinue of lords and ladies, and among these his young son, a wan, sickly boy, with a gentle beauty on his face. Have I said my kinsman was a widower?

"It would not suit thee, Zillah, to mingle with this gay company," he said; "so keep thy chamber till they be gone."

Thus I found myself a prisoner; yet when the gay company went out with hawk and hound, I stole down into the garden and walked alone; or I crept on through the trees to the huts of the poor, and healed them of their sickness with herbs and spells; and I sang ditties to them, or told them wild stories that grew upon my brain through loneliness. These were my only companions, for my father painted every day: ceiling and hall, chapel and wall he covered with the work of his pencil; and I was ever alone, feeling the whispers of the household creeping about me evilly.

One day in the dreary pleasaunce I sat in a little bower where roses lay dying, and sang to myself. Hawk and hound had departed, and I thought all the noble company was away with them, so I sang from my heart a wild Swiss lay, with echoes in the music coming down from the mountains and dying softly on the lonely lakes. Sadly, sweetly, the old Swiss words and wild music dropped from my lips, bringing rushing memories and fast-falling tears; and choked by these, I stopped singing. "Ah, do not stop, sweet lady!" said a boyish voice, and straightway there stepped from the laurels a pale child clad in velvet. Guessing him to be the young count, I rose and saluted him.

"Are you a prisoner, lady?" said the boy. "I have watched you these many days from my window, walking in the pleasaunce like a captive, but I never see your face at our board; and though I hear your voice sometimes singing, I hear it oftener weeping."

Now I feared to tell him I was a distant kinswoman, so I said, humbly, "Sir, I am from Zurich; I am the daughter of the painter here. If I am sad, it is with pining for my own land. Memories of the mountains and lakes come to my eyes in tears."

"Poor lady!" said the child, putting his hand on mine; "your voice is like my mother's. Will you sing to me again?"

I sang to him softly, while the boy gazed into my face with large, eager eyes, too earnest, too sorrowful for childhood.

"You will come again?" he cried, clinging to my hand as I rose to leave him. But I avoided the pleasaunce for many days, till the child, being bent on seeing my face, found out my chamber, and came and sat at the door patiently till the yearning of my heart moved me to speak to him. Yet, fearing sorrow would befall him for his love for me, I strove often to make my speech rough to him; but he heeded it not.

"I will wait, Zillah, till thine anger be gone," he would say, in a low, sweet voice.

Then opening my door with a soft hand, I saw him sitting patiently on the rushes, his sweet, gentle face and large, bright eyes turned toward me lovingly.

Ah me! could I help it if my arm stole around him, and our two sad faces touched each other with a gentle kiss, or sometimes mingled tears? Was it witchcraft that my heart yearned over him like a mother, and my hand stroked his golden hair caressingly, and my ears longed for his pretty talk, and my lips fell upon his pale cheeks with such kisses as his mother had given him? No, there was no sorcery in this, and no sorcery in the dear love which the poor, wan child paid me back from the treasures of his gentle heart.

I was glad when the gay company all departed, but, to my sorrow, the earl staid, and he sought me as of old to work spells for him. Grown weary and sick of heart, I said I would not, unless he redeemed his word and brought Ambrose to me.

"Foolish maiden, hast thou not yet forgotten the vain painter?" he said, laughing.

But that night, in the secret chamber, he spoke more kindly.

"Zillah, by thy aid I have discovered great things," he said, "so I will not refuse thy request. If thou canst find the painter, let him come and aid thy father."

"Alas! I know not where he is," I answered. "He hath left Zurich."

"Then let us weave a spell and bring him," he said.

And I, being awake and in my senses that night, saw him draw a circle with strange figures in the centre, on which he placed a tripod, whereon there burned a pale blue flame, and in the midst of the flame there came up the semblance of a hand.

"Quickly, Zillah," whispered my kinsman; "sign this!"

He held a paper toward me, and I, pricking my finger, signed it with the gout of blood that came forth. Then he thrust it into the fire, and the hand clutching it disappeared; upon which a great darkness fell upon me, and in this I felt drawn toward the fire till it scorched me.

"Come back, Zillah!" cried the earl, and as his hand seized me I fainted. Except once, this was the only time that I was awake when in the secret chamber.

When I opened my eyes to sense again, the censer, the fire, and the ring of flame around the tripod were gone, and I saw only the face of my kinsman leaning over me.

"Had you crossed the fire, Zillah, you must have died. But your wish is granted. What did you desire?"

"I wrote, 'Let Ambrose come hither, and let him love me,'" I answered, as my cheeks glowed with sudden shame.

The earl laughed at this. "Not so, my fair witch; this is what was written."

And crossing the circle, to where the fire lay dead, he lifted from it the paper, scorched, yet not burned. And on it I read this: "Let the wife of Ambrose be accursed, let her die as the wicked die, and let the heart of her husband be turned against her." I flung the paper from my hand, and burst into bitter tears.

"Am I come to this," I said, "that like an evil woman I should scatter curses on the innocent? I wish no evil to the wife of Ambrose, let her be whom she may. It was cruel to deceive me thus."

"I thought the spell would suit thy jealous nature," said the earl. "And take heed thou marry him not thyself. It was to hinder this that I wrote it."

My soul was sick for sorrow, when in the morning I awoke and remembered this as a dream.

CHAPTER V.

"Oh, Zillah, have I found thee at last?"

It was the voice of Ambrose, and I shrieked aloud for fear. He looked worn and weary, and he was clad poorly in a pilgrim's garb. He seized my palfrey by the rein, and stooping he kissed my hand.

"Is the Lady Beatrice near by, Ambrose?" I said, in a trembling voice.

"Beatrice has deserted me," he answered, and his face flushed scornfully. "Have you not heard, Zillah, how the English embassador at Paris sent messengers to her, saying his king had restored her father's lands? And not heeding my prayer she departed with the retinue sent for her."

"But you followed her to England, Ambrose."

"And found her a great lady, too proud to give a smile to old friends. Since then I have sought thee and thy father, Zillah, in much painful wandering."

So I brought Ambrose to the earl, and it was settled he should help my father in the great work going on in the castle. Thus I saw him every day, and loved him better than of old, and being freed now from his love for Beatrice, his heart turned to me, and he loved me as dearly as man ever loved woman.

"Zillah," he said once, "I think I have loved thee always, but Beatrice made me fear thee somewhat. She swore she saw thee lay a spell upon an old fish-wife, who beat a little child with a cruel hand. And under this spell the hag belabored her own visage till she shrieked to thee for mercy."

I laughed, and yet I trembled. "'Tis true," I said; "I have some such power. Some I can make sing and dance, laugh or cry; I can not do this with all people. And I know not what the gift may be; but surely, Ambrose, it is not witchcraft?"

But he answered me, with a face paling to the hue of death, "Beware, Zillah, of that power; be not tempted to use it. It is of the Evil One, and it will destroy thee."

So, fearing to lose his love, I dared not tell him of the secret sorceries to which the earl had forced me; but I feigned illness, and refused again and again to go to the magic chamber, till my kinsman grew angry and dealt roughly with me. Then I told Ambrose of his hardness, and we two, being resolved to flee, went to a priest and were married secretly. Yet I still lingered, because of my father, who refused to go with us and leave his work unfinished. And during this delay there was brought to the castle a litter, closely curtained, guarded by armed men, and I saw alight from it Beatrice—the Lady Beatrice Damer now.

She spoke courteously to my father and Ambrose; but as she passed me she drew away her robe, and muttered—

"I like not witch-blood."

That night I wept bitterly at my husband's knee, and besought him to leave this evil castle. Then with kisses and kind words he soothed me, saying he would but wait till the earl's treasurer had paid him for his work, then we would go.

The next day a whisper ran through the household that the earl would wed his ward—the Lady Beatrice; and the poor wan boy—his son—came to me with a white face, and asked if it was true.

I said "yes" with my eyes, not daring to speak. Then the child put his arms about me, and leaned his cheek against mine.

"Zillah," he said, "I have but thee in the world; do not forsake me for yon cold-hearted painter. I love thee a million times better than he can love. Tarry for me, Zillah, till I be a man; then I will make thee a lady, and thou shalt never weep again."

"Come away from the witch, boy!" cried a sharp voice.

It was the Lady Beatrice, who had stolen softly on us as we sat in the embrasured window. And at her bidding the child's small arms fell down from my neck, and with lips quivering, and tearful eyes looking back on me, he went with her, she dragging him by the hand.

That evening, as I sat alone spinning, the earl came upon me suddenly.

"Zillah," he said, sternly, "I will not have my child's heart turned against the lady who is to be his mother.

"She lies, if she says I did it!" I answered, scornfully. Then my courage failed, and I fell on my knees.

"My lord, I have troubled your roof too long; let me depart."

"Put aside such a thought forever, Zillah," he said, in a firm voice. "Thou art my guest—or prisoner, if thou wilt—for life. Come to the secret chamber to-night, and burn me there the waxen effigy of mine enemy—the man who stands next the king."

"I can not do your bidding, my lord," I answered; "for my husband, to whom I owe a holier obedience, has commanded me to cease these arts."

"Thy husband, girl! Who is thy husband?"

"Ambrose, the painter, my lord."

Even here in the close prison I shrink from thought of the earl's fury. He struck me to the ground in a sudden frenzy; but as I crouched, fearing a second blow, I felt his strong arms wind about me, and his lips stifled my cry with kisses.

"Oh, rare witch and fool!" he said; "not to see these many months how thy sorceries have beguiled me into love. Oh, Zillah! Zillah! in the witch-chamber where we wrought our spells, when that mystic sleep bound thee, thine arms have clasped my neck, and thy lips have pressed mine. Surely it is a lie that thou art a wife. Say it is false, my witch, and I forgive thee."

Breaking from him I fell upon my knees and gazed into his cruel face with looks of horror. Was he speaking truth? was I so lost? Had my lips ever touched his—I, who so feared and hated him that I shuddered even if his shadow crossed me? Then there came into my memory thronged shapes of pain and horror unutterable. The fumes of incense and the smoke of enchantments rose up before me, and within their wreathed vapors writhed grim shadows and forms of demons. And with these there grew upon my lips the earl's hot kiss, drawing soul and sense away. Yielding to it as to a hideous spell, I sank down senseless as his arms clasped me.

I awoke in the witch-chamber. I was lying on the silken couch, and before me rose the perfume of incense and the smoke of enchantments. Between the wreathed mists I saw dimly the form of the earl, who came and went like a shadow; but I could neither speak nor move, for the spices that burned close by numbed my sense. Then suddenly he turned; he fixed his eyes on mine, and waved his arms as wizards do. I struggled against the spell; I loathed the power conquering me. But all was vain; and soon my eyes closed. My arms fell upon his neck, and my head drooped upon his shoulder. Then his lips touched my ear, whispering words of love.

"My life, this night I have but half chained thy senses. I would have thee know that thou art mine. Now call this groveling painter, this man who dares to love my witch. It will be rare sport to behold his wonder when he sees thee here."

Obedient to his wicked will, obedient to the lightest touch of his hand or glance of his eye, I called in spirit to my husband. I bade him come through fire and peril, through sleep or watching, through health or sickness; alive or dead I bade him come.

Then upon my fainting heart I heard the echo of his steps through corridor and vaulted hall, through the masked door where tapestry hung, and on to the sliding panel. As his hand touched this my writhing spirit strove in a last struggle to be free; but the voice of the wizard-earl whispered, "Say thou lovest me, witch, and let this man hear thee." And my loathing lips uttered the words he bade me.

"Harold, my love, my love!" And clasping his neck, my bowed head sank on his shoulder.

As one in a dream, Ambrose stood bewildered, his face like a dead man's. Then I saw a jeweled hand—Beatrice's—seize his arm and draw him away. And the great torture I felt did not awake me, till the earl unbound the spell. Then, in my misery and shame, as his mocking eye laughed in my face, I fell weeping and moaning at his feet.

"Poor witch! Go to thy husband now, and see if he will accept thy company. Get to thy chamber and weep there; I hate tears."

I fled from him, weeping as I went; and thus in anguish I sought Ambrose, but he was gone. Then, like one maddened, I rushed forth into the night, and overtook my husband beyond the draw-bridge, walking slowly, with his head bent low and lips quivering. I caught him by the hand, and implored him to hear me.

"I have seen thee, witch!" he answered. And casting me from him went his way.

I would have followed him, but, as I arose from my despair, the earl seized me and held me in his strong clasp. I saw Ambrose pass out of my sight.

And henceforth I was alone and silent; for I would not rack my father's heart with my doleful story.

CHAPTER VI.

The Lady Beatrice was cruel to the child, and I saw his gentle face grow wan, and his step get slow and languid. At last he lay sick nearly unto death, and he would take nothing save from my hand. So they let me come to him, and I tended him gently, hiding my ghastly woe as I could from his sight.

"Thou art fading like a flower, Zillah," he said, putting his wasted arms about me. "When I am a man I will be thy champion, and if any have wronged thee thou shalt have redress."

Alas! there was no redress or mercy for me on earth.

I loved the boy, and often I put my face upon his pillow, and the touch of his soft cheek comforted me for my woes.

"I shall not be with thee long, little one," I said. "The Lady Beatrice weds thy father in a week, and I fear she will drive poor Zillah from thy bedside."

"Then I shall have a cruel step-dame and thou a hard mistress," he answered. And turning his wan face on the pillow I saw tears course down it softly. I wiped them away, kissing him, and we sat hand in hand silent, till the twilight grew into darkness.

They were married at court before the king, with tournaments and pageantry and feasting; and while they reveled there fell upon me and the child a short peace—a little lull in my great sorrow.

In this tranquillity my father died. Oh, thank Heaven he died! And kneeling down beside his cold face in the night I vowed I would quit all unlawful arts, and flee from this wicked prison forever. When morning dawned I went softly to the chamber of the sick child, and found him sleeping. His face was sicklier, sadder than I had ever seen it, and his cheeks were wet, as though he had slept weeping. I dared not look twice on him, lest I should stay for his sake and lose my soul. So I put a little flower in his thin hand as a farewell, and stole away, not waking him.

Thus I fled from my unholy thralldom. And now I can not recount what happened to me, for my memory is full only of dim shapes. I know I wandered hither and thither—not always in my right mind—till my beauty was gone through weather and want, and the lameness that rest and luxury had almost healed grew upon me painfully. I can not say how long I wandered. I see, as in a picture, the summer sun and the winter snow descending on the head of a weird woman who begs for charity, while children run from her and men chase her as a witch.

I was crooked, as I have said, and lame, and poor; and my long hair, which in summer-time I washed in clear streams and decked with flowers, fell down to my feet. So you see I was like a witch.

I remember this summer—this last summer of my life—with undimmed memory. I remember the bright sun shining on me as I came timidly into the harvest-field, and humbly prayed the reapers to let me glean. I remember the frightened faces that looked into my face, and the rough hands that seized me.

"Bring her to my lord!" they cried.

As they dragged me on, bridge and moat, buttress and tower, grew familiar to me; and as we crossed the hall I looked up on the paintings my father's hand had wrought, and I saw myself face to face with that great wizard, and his wife the Lady Beatrice.

Her eyes gleamed with joy and hate as she saw me.

"Ah, Zillah the witch!" she cried; "have thy witchcrafts brought thee to this?"

I clasped my hands and looked into her pitiless face, but my lips would not speak for quivering.

"Lodge her in the dungeon," she said, and turned away.

But I was past grief and fear; and careless as a stone drops into a well, so did I fall upon the straw of that damp dungeon, and forget in sleep my misery and my madness.

A bright light awoke me, and a strong hand lifted me to my feet.

"Zillah, it is I," said the earl's voice. "There is power still shining in those wild eyes of thine. Promise to obey me, and I will free thee from these chains, and hide thee from my lady's eye, and all that gold can give shall be thine."

"I will not listen," I said, calmly, and I covered my ears with my shackled hands. Then he took them in his strong grasp.

"Zillah, I have discovered strange secrets in earth and air, and with thy help I can do yet greater things. These mysteries are no sorceries, they are truths; and through these I can show men how to travel swift as birds. I can build ships of iron—"

But I tore my hands from his grasp, and ran shrieking round my dungeon, drowning his prayers and promises with my cries. Wearied at last with my madness, he flung me from his hand in fury.

"Die, witch, then, if you will!" he said: and he took up his lamp to depart. But at the grate he turned, and as the light shone upon his face I saw it was full of bitterness. "Zillah, poor fool and witch!" he said, "there is something in my soul that is sorry for thee. Awake, thou art only a poor, weak woman; but in sleep thou hast told me some of the wisest secrets that exist on earth. See here, girl!" And he took from his vest a crystal globe, dark-looking, and filled with a lead-like powder. "Through thee I have made this ball for my enemies. Nay, do not touch it; there are a hundred deaths in it. But the ball alone is useless. I need some weapon, some deadly instrument, which shall hurl it among our foes. I ask thee, then, for England's sake, be my witch again."

I shuddered at his words. "Our Lady forbid," I cried, "that I should aid thee in thy sorceries! England has stout arms and arrows for her foes. Take thy witch-ball away; it maddens me!"

He looked at me with exceeding sorrow. "Zillah, thy brain is crazed. And I am verily to blame that in thy witch-sleep I made thee feign love for me. I did it to drive thy husband from thee. I feared as wife and mother thy weird powers would depart, and all my great discoveries would die. Alas! they perish now, perhaps for centuries, perhaps forever!"

I would not answer him. I sat cowering in a corner of the dungeon, my head upon my hands.

"Zillah, do not fear me. In all those hours of mystic sleep I swear I never touched thine hand. It was but to deceive that puling painter—that coward unworthy of thy heart—that I feigned love."

"It was a deed worthy of a wizard," I said, "to trample thus on a woman's happiness and honor!"

"What was one woman's peace, compared to the glorious truths I sought—truths that would make millions happy?"

He spoke as if to himself, but my heart swelled at his cruelty.

"Leave me!" I cried in indignation.

"If I leave thee thou wilt die, Zillah—die as a witch."

"I care not. Better die than be a witch again."

"Zillah! Zillah! the times are not ripe for such as thee or me. And if thou diest thy innocent blood will be on my head."

"On thy head let it be," I answered.

He stood a moment at the door, gazing on me sorrowfully, the dying lamp throwing a pale light across his haggard face.

"Dost thou forgive me, Zillah?" he said.

I thought of my lost life, my crazed wanderings, and my husband's heart turned against me, and my eyes swam in salt tears.

"But there was One who suffered more," I said to myself; so I answered, "Go in peace; I forgive thee."

Then there fell between us a short silence, broken only by the sob which gasped from my dry throat.

"Zillah, thou shalt not die," said the earl. And going to the grated window of my dungeon he flung the huge key he held into the moat.

"The postern-door at the top of these narrow stairs is unlocked; escape, Zillah, for thy life. Alas! and all those great things that I had hoped to do will die now for ages. Hasten, girl, lest I attempt again to seize thee!"

He undid the chains upon my hands, and as these dropped with a heavy clank upon the stones he left me. I listened to his ascending steps, but at the top of the narrow stairs he missed his footing and fell. Then a noise like thunder shook the castle from the topmost turret to the dungeon-floor, a flash of fire blinded me, and I fell senseless. When I awoke I saw moonlight through a rift in the wall, and passing over fallen stones and dust I reached the ruins of the stairs, and beheld the earl lying dead. Stooping over him I undid his vest, and found the ball of crystal which he had made by sorcery was gone. Doubtless this had killed him; and his face was blackened as by fire. Moreover, an unholy smell of sulphur and a hideous smoke filled the ruin.

I sat by the dead man amazed, not seeking to escape; and here the frightened warders found me.

"The witch! the witch!" they cried; "she hath slain my lord the earl. He lieth here dead—slain by sorcery; and the wall is rent, and the castle shaken, by her witchcrafts."

And so, amidst weeping, and cries of terror, and blows, I was carried to another dungeon.

CHAPTER VII.

I will not tell of the long, long months in prison; I will not tell of the torture and the chain. These bloodshot eyes have wept tears of blood, and these parched lips have shrieked in vain for mercy. I confessed willingly to all my sorceries, but these did not content them; so under torture I shrieked a thousand falsehoods. I told of things that could not be; I lied again and again against my soul.

Oh, I satisfied their greedy ears with lies, for which sin I weep now, and therefore I write this confession, wherein alone I speak the truth.

When my trial came the warders swore it was I who had killed the earl—I who had shaken the foundations of the castle, and opened the door of my prison by enchantments.

The Countess Beatrice witnessed against me with calm cruelty; and, though I appealed to her for my life's sake to say if her husband practiced not strange arts, she answered:

"Never, witch, unless bewitched by thee."

And the judge said that, save by sorcery, no such ball as I had spoken of could be made; therefore I was condemned by my own lips.

Then they brought a witness into court, the sight of whom wrung my heart. Men carried him on a pallet-bed, and as I saw his pale face lying on the pillow I wept.

"Thou, too, Gilbert?" I cried.

But the child turned his eyes from me, and would not look my way.

Then he was raised in men's arms, for without their aid he could not sit, and in a sad, low voice he told the judge my witcheries had made him love me, and the bitterest draught from my hand had seemed sweet to him. And many other things he said, having his heart turned against me by my enemy, his step-mother. But while he spoke, he kept his small white face away from my face, nor looked upon me once till the men bore him away; then his eyes turned on me, and his pale cheek flushed with sudden pain.

"Oh, Zillah, is it thou, so changed? Would to God they had not made me speak against thee. Pardon me, Zillah, pardon me!"

"I forgive thee, my poor child," I answered. "Do not grieve when I die."

"Woman," cried the judge, "all the court can see to what a cruel strait and weakness thy sorcery hath brought the young Lord Gilbert. Take the noble boy from her presence."

So the men bore him away, but he was weeping as he went, and I heard him say to the men that he would pray to die first, for he could not bear to live and see Zillah die a cruel death.

Alas, for that tender heart! In forcing him to cruelty they killed him. Yesterday the jailer said to me:

"The young Lord Gilbert is dead. Will thy sorceries never cease, witch? And the crowd cry aloud for thy blood: they gather fagots in the wood to-day."

But I leaned my head upon my hands, and thanked God the child was gone.

Now I hurry on to the end. As they bore the young Gilbert away, and my dry eyes watched him, I thought my worst pang went with him; but it was not so. The voice of a new witness startled me, and, turning, I saw Ambrose, my husband.

"I am a painter," he said; "I came hither by the Countess's command to finish the ceiling of the hall begun by the prisoner's father. Then I heard she was in prison. I have known her as a witch all her life long. There is witch-blood in her; for this I pitied her once, and hoped and prayed she might escape the taint. Yet even then I felt her spell, and, to save myself, I gave my love to a noble lady; but in the end, by witchery, she beguiled my heart, and I became her husband. Then I found her faithless, and left her. I escaped for my life, fearing her sorceries and her lover's power. I have not seen her face since then till this day."

"Ambrose," I said, and rose to my feet, "I was never faithless. Thou hast been deceived by a strange glamour, past my poor wits to explain. But I loved thee ever, and I love thee still. Now, say on. Death is not so cruel as this thy treachery."

I sank down upon my seat—they had given me a seat for my weakness—and I looked sadly on his white face working with strange tremors.

"I defy thee, witch!" he said. "I abhor thy love and thee!"

I looked upon him, but I uttered no word more. Hope and I had parted now, and I had no more to do with love or life; my heart was broken. And when they bade me stand to hear the judge's sentence I smiled, and wondered who the witch was that was condemned to die. I had forgot it was myself.

I was thinking of the lakes and streams of Zurich, and the mountains where I had strayed a child.

To-morrow I die, and before the winds have scattered the ashes of this poor flesh the Countess Beatrice and the painter Ambrose will sit at their wedding-feast. And to the bridegroom I send this history and my pardon. Zillah the witch dies with prayers for him, and at peace with all.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The Wolf at the Door—Fashion.

Clerical Blunders.—"I will give notice," said a reverend doctor, in his pulpit, "of the annual meeting of the Maternal Society. It is to be hoped that every member will be present, and all mothers, married or single, are particularly invited." He meant, of course, "all ladies." The same excellent gentleman was illustrating a sermon on human greed by the story of Esau. "How many there are, my friends," said he, impressively, "even among us, who would exchange their birthright for a pot of message."

A FASHIONABLE EDUCATION.

Dear Madam, I've called for the purpose
 Of placing my daughter at school;
She's only thirteen, I assure you,
 And remarkably easy to rule.
I'd have her learn painting and music,
 Gymnastics and dancing, pray do,
Philosophy, grammar, and logic;
 You'll teach her to read, of course, too.

I wish her to learn every study,
 Mathematics are down in my plan,
But of figures she scarce has an inkling,
 Pray instruct her in those, if you can.
I'd have her taught Spanish and Latin,
 Including the language of France;
Never mind her very bad English,
 Teach her that when you find a good chance.

On the harp she must be a proficient,
 And play the guitar pretty soon,
And sing the last opera music,
 Even though she can't turn a right tune.
You must see that her manners are finished,
 That she moves with a Hebe-like grace;
For, though she is lame and one-sided,
 That's nothing to do with the case.

Now, to you I resign this young jewel,
 And my words I would have you obey:
In six months you return her, dear Madam,
 Shining bright as an unclouded day.
She's no aptness, I grant you, for learning,
 And her memory oft seems to halt;
But, remember, if she's not accomplished,
 It will certainly all be your fault.

A gentleman, who owns a country seat, nearly lost his wife, who fell into a river which flows through his estate. He announced the narrow escape to his friends, expecting their congratulations. One of them—an old bachelor—wrote as follows: "I always told you that river was too shallow."

IRISH INFLUENCE.

A story is told of an auctioneer who was provokingly annoyed, while in the exercise of his profession, by the ludicrous bids of a fellow whose sole object seemed to be to make sport for the buyers rather than himself to buy. At length, enraged beyond endurance, the knight of the ivory-headed hammer, looking around the room for a champion to avenge his wrongs, fixed his eyes upon a biped of huge dimensions, a very monarch in strength, and cried out,

"Marlow, what shall I give you to put that fellow out?"

"I take one fife-dollar bill."

"Done, done, you shall have it."

Assuming the ferocious, knitting his brows, spreading his nostrils like a lion's, and putting on the wolf all over his head and shoulders, old Marlow strode off to the aggressor, and seizing the terrified wretch by the collar, said to him in a whisper that was heard all over the room,

"My good frin, you go out with me, I give you half the money!"

"Done! done!" says the fellow.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouted the audience. The auctioneer had the good sense to join in the laugh, and coolly forked out the V.

A good story is told of a captain who went into a grocery where were a lot of loungers, and no one offered him a seat. Knowing every thing about the grocery, he went behind the counter, and seizing a keg marked powder, threw it upon the fire, exclaiming: "Gentlemen, it's my opinion that we've lived long enough." The way they ran out of the store was a caution to "ground and lofty tumbling." Of course the keg was empty.

The most popular Fall with the Ladies—Falling in love.

"I don't see as any thing is the matter with this plum-pudding," said a fellow at a Thanksgiving dinner. "Well, who said there was?" growled out his neighbor. "Why," said the first, "I concluded there was, you all seem to be running it down!"

"Well, George," asked a friend of a young lawyer, who had been "admitted" about a year, "how do you like your new profession?"

The reply was accompanied by a brief sigh to suit the occasion—"My profession is much better than my practice."

A new way of collecting a bad debt was most effectively tried in the Rue de la Seine, in Paris, before the lodgings of a somewhat dissipated student. A man was observed walking up and down before the house, having upon his back a large placard, with the words: "Monsieur C—— owes me for thirty bottles of vin rouge; I am waiting until he pays for them."

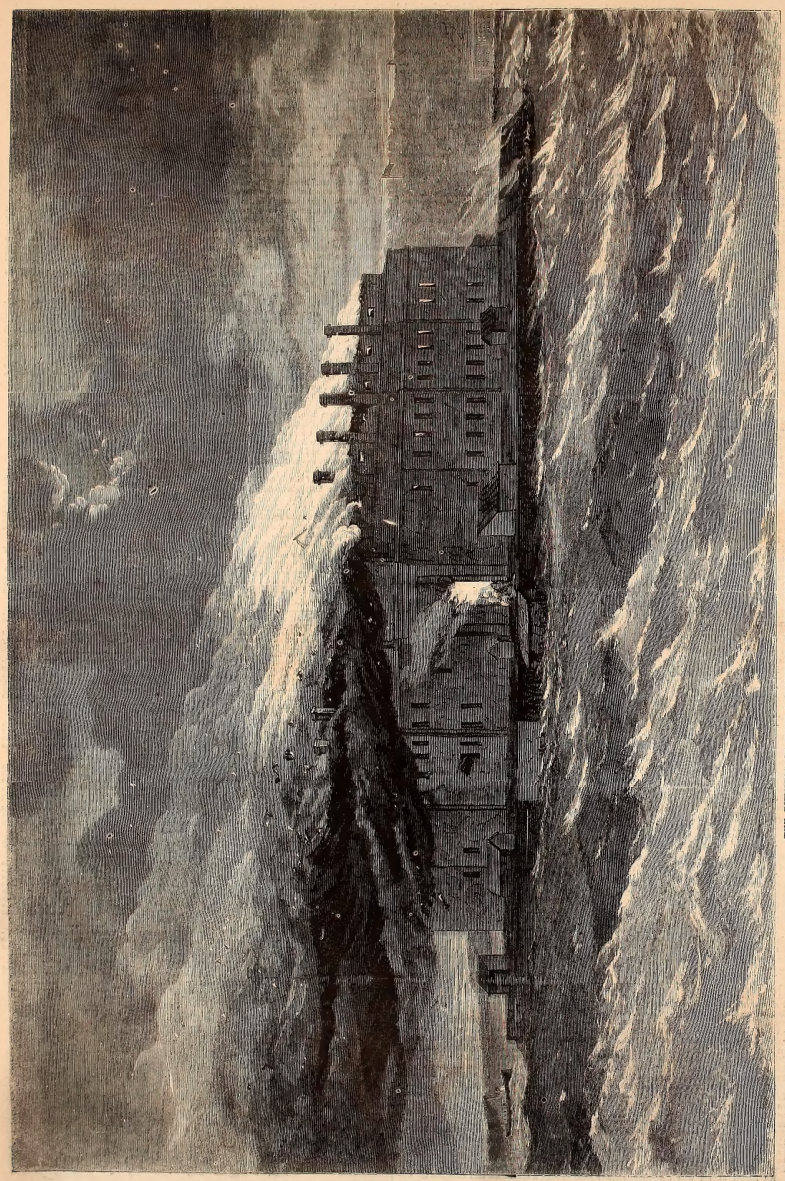
He did not wait very long.

A whimsical comparison being made between a clock and a woman, Charles Fox observed that he thought the simile bad; "for," said he, "a clock serves to point out the hours, and a woman to make us forget them."

A lady went out shopping, promising her little son she would get him a cocoa-nut, and procured one with the husk on it, in which state he had never seen the article. On arriving at home she gave it to the boy, who looked at it curiously, smiled, and laid it down. Presently he said: "Mother, where is my cocoa-nut?" "I just now gave it to you," she replied. Taking it up again, he looked at it curiously for a moment, and exclaimed: "That thing a cocoa-nut! Why, I thought it was a waterfall!"

Is a mantua-maker amenable to law for hooking lady's dresses?

For stopping a man's mouth when he openly tells disagreeable truths there is no gag like gold. Complaint having been made to a certain bishop that a vicar in his diocese was always preaching against pluralities, in spite of repeated admonitions to the contrary, "Tush!" exclaimed the right reverend dignitary, "I will silence him forever in less than a week." And so he did by giving him an additional benefice.



The slumbers of an Irish gentleman being disturbed by the call of another gentleman who had come to administer a horsewhipping he asked him whether he meant to be so unmanly as to flog him while in bed.

"Certainly not," was the visitor's reply.

"Well, then," rejoined the other, quietly rolling himself up very snugly in the bed-clothes, "you may wait as long as you please, but hang me if I'll get up while you're in the house."

"A GOOD BOY." "A BAD MAN." "A DEAR GIRL." "A FINE LAD."

WINTER.

A GIRL'S LOVE-SONG.

IT was an April morning
When my true love went out;
The wind had never a warning,
The sky had never a doubt.
Leaves and blossoms were lustres
On oak and maple and beech;
Hopes were hanging in clusters
A little out of reach.

He wandered—he and no other—
Down by the little white brook;
The stream sang one to another,
"A king is coming; look!"
The brook said, laughing and leaping,
"Peep, and you shall see."
Through the leaves he went peeping,
And there he saw—Me.

Saw me, took me, crowned me,
There, as I stood in my shame;
I knew that he had found me,
Before I knew his name.
He went where I was fated,
Dumb with fear and surprise.
A week and a day I waited,
Before I saw his eyes.

I never a wife or
To all my words he said;
The brook was a pleasant lisper,
It talked to him instead.
Brook, you told my emotion,
Hearing him plight his vow!
Brook, you have not a notion
What I feel for him now.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER VII.

A PRIVATE AUDIENCE.

I HAD but reached my room when Eccles followed me to say my father wished to see me at once.

"Come, come, Digby," said Eccles, good-naturedly, "don't be frightened. Even if he should be angry with you, his passion passes soon over; and, if unreconciled, he is never disposed to bear a grudge long. Go immediately, however, and don't keep him waiting."

I can not tell with what a sense of abasement I entered my lord's dressing-room; for, after all, it was the abject condition of my own mind that weighed me down.

"So, sir," said he, as I closed the door, "this is something I was not prepared for. You might be forty things, but I certainly did not suspect that a son of mine could be a coward."

Had my father ransacked his whole vocabulary for a term of insult he could not have found one to pain me like this.

"I am not a coward, Sir," said I, reddening till I felt my face in a perfect glow.

"What! not a coward, pusillanimity," "are you going to give me a proof of courage by daring to outrage me? It is by sending back my words in my teeth you propose to be brave?"

"I ask pardon, Sir," said I, humbly, "if I have replied rudely; but you called me by a name that made me forget myself. I hope you will forgive me."

"Sit down there, Sir; no, there." And he pointed to a more distant chair. "There are various sorts and shades of cowardice, and I would not have you tarnished with any one of them. The creature whose first thought, and, indeed, only one, in an emergency is his personal safety, and who, till that condition is secured, abstains from all action, is below contempt; but I will not even consider. But next to him—of course with no large interval—comes the fellow who is so afraid of a responsibility that he never thought of it unmans him. How did the fact of my wager and its influence on you at all, Sir? Why should you have had any thought but for the game you were playing, and how it behooved you to play it? How came I and your gentlemen to stand between you and your real object, if it were not that a craven dread of consequences had got the ascendency in your mind? If men were to be beset by these calculations, if every fellow carried about him an armor of sophistry like this, he'd have to be born to wield a sword, and the world would see neither men who storm a breach nor board an enemy. Till a man can so isolate and individualize his faculties on what he has to do that all extraneous conditions cease to affect him, he will never be well served by his own powers, and he who is but half served is only half brave. There are times when the unreasoned worth all the men of logic—remember that. And now go and sleep over it."

He motioned me to withdraw, but I could not bear to go till he had withdrawn the slur he had cast on me in the word coward. He had used it me steadfastly, but not harshly, for a moment or two, and then said:

"You are not to think that it is out of regret for a lost sum of money I have read you this lecture. As to the wager itself, I am as well pleased that it ended as it did. These gentlemen are not rich either of them. I can afford the loss. What I can not afford is to keep a fool at it."

"But will you not say, Sir, that I am no coward?" said I, falteringly.

"I will withdraw the word," said he, slowly, "the very first time I shall see you deal with a difficulty without a thought for what it may cost you. There; good-night; leave me now, unless you have a ride with you in the morning." And he nodded twice, and smiled, and dismissed me.

There was nothing, certainly, very flattering to me in this reception. It cost me dearly while it lasted, and you—I can not explain why—I came away with a feeling of affection for my father, and a desire to stand well in his esteem, such as I had not experienced till that moment. It was his utter indifference up to this that had chilled and repelled me. Any show of interest, any thing that might evidence that he cared what I was, or what I might become, was so much better than this apathy, that I welcomed the change with delight. Accustomed to the tender solicitude of a loving mother, no riggard of her praise, and more given to sympathize than blame, the stern reserve of my father's manner had been a terrible reverse, and over and over had I asked myself why he took me from where I was loved and cherished, to live this life of ceremonious observance and cold deference.

To know that he felt even such interest in me as this was to restore to me self-esteem at once. He would not have his son a coward, he said; and as I felt in my heart that I was not a coward, as I knew I was not, and that there to confront any peril he could propose to me, all that the speech left in my memory was a sense of self-satisfaction.

In each of the letters I had received from my mother she impressed on me how important it was that I should win my father's affection, and now a hope flushed across me that I might do this. It sat down to tell her all that had passed between us; but somehow remembering the incident of the billiard-room I wandered away into a description of the house, its splendors and luxury, and of the kind of society I found that we were living. "You will ask, dearest mamma," I wrote, "how and when I find time to study amidst all these dissipations? and I believe to own that I do very little. Mr. Eccles says he is satisfied with me; but I fear it is more because I obtrude little in the way than that I am making any progress. We are still in the same room of the Athenæum that I began with you; and as to the Greek, we leave it now for holidays, and the Saturdays get skipped. I have become a good shot with the rifle; and George says I have the finest, lightest hand he knows on a horse, and that he'll make me yet a regular steeple-chaser honest. I have's passion for riding, and sometimes get four hours on it. Indeed, papa takes no interest in the stable, and I give all that I can spare to it. I can have a team harnessed for me—which I do—when I am tired with the saddle. They have not quite given up calling me that 'boy of Norcott's'; only when they do so, it is to say how well he rides, and what a taste he shows for driving and shooting.

"Don't be afraid that I am neglecting my music. I play every day, and take singing lessons with a master; they call him the Count Gunstalla; but I believe he is the cook of the opera here, and only teaches me out of compliment to papa. He dines here nearly every day, and plays piquet with papa after dinner.

"There is a very beautiful lady comes here, Mdme. Clermont. She is the wife of the Secretary to the Legation. She is very kind, and has such pleasing ways, and is so gay, and so good-natured, and full of gratifying me in every way, that I delight in her coming; and we ride out together constantly, and I am now teaching her to drive the ponies, and she enjoys it just as I used myself. I don't think papa likes her, for he seldom speaks to her, and never asks her to dine or dinner if there is another lady in the room; and I suspect she feels this, for she is often very cold. I dislike Mrs Clermont; but I'm always saying unjustly things, and is never happy, no matter how merry we are. But papa seems to like him best of all the people I know. Old Count Hotham and I are great friends, though he's always saying, 'You ought to be as sea, youngster.' This sort of life is wearing him down. I can see it. But I can't make out why, because I am very happy and have so much to interest and amuse me. I must make a stand, or Mrs. Clermont says, too, it is not true; that papa is bringing me up exactly as he ought, that I will enter life as a gentleman, and be a credit to my name; and in my existence in learning the habits of the well-bred world. They fight bitterly over this every day; but she says papa is right, and then kisses me, and says, 'Mon cher petit Digby, I'll not have you spoiled to please any vilgar prejudices of a boarding-school miss.' She is a dear whispers, for she would not offend him for any thing. Dear mamma, how you would love her if you knew her! I think you will, for I'm going to school; but I hope not, for how I shall live like a school-boy after all this happiness I don't know and Mdme. Clermont says papa will never permit it; but she has no influence over papa, and how could she prevent it? Captain Hotham is always saying, 'If Norcott's father would send that boy to Harrow, or Rugby, or some of them places, he'll graduate in the Marshalsea—that's a prison—before he's twenty.' I am glad when a day passes without my being brought up for the subject of a discussion, which papa always ends with, 'After all, I was neither an Etonian nor Rugbeian, and I guess I can hold my own with most men; and if that boy doesn't better his breeding, perhaps he may do so too.'

"Mdme. Clermont understanding papa, especially when he says any thing in a certain tone of voice, and whenever he uses this the conversation turns away to something else.

"I forgot to say, in my last, that your letters always come regularly. They arrive with papa's, and he sends them up to me at once by his valet, Mons. Durand, who is always so nicely dressed, and has a handsomer watch-chain than papa.

"Mdme. Clermont said yesterday, 'I'm so sorry not to know your dear mamma, Digby; but, if I dared, I'd send her so many caresses, de ma part.' I said nothing at the time, but I send them now, and am your own loving son,

"DIGBY NORCOTT."

This letter was much longer than it appears here. It filled several sides of note-paper, and occupied me till daybreak. Indeed, I heard the bell ringing for the workmen as I closed it, and shortly after a gentle tap came to my door, and George Spencer, our head groom, entered.

"I am up at the stables, Master Digby," said he, "and I thought I'd step up and tell you not to ride to spars this morning. Sir Roger wants to see you on Mary Blount, and you know she's a hot un, Sir, and don't want the steel. Indeed if she feels the boot, she's as much as a man can do to sit."

"You're a good fellow, George, to think of this," said I. "Do you know where we're going?"

"That's what I was going to tell you, Sir. We're going to the Castle de Caubre, and there's two of our men gone on with hurdles to set them up in the cross alleys of the wood, and we're to come on with the mawsters, you see."

"Then why don't you give me Father Tom or Hungerford?"

"The master wouldn't have either. He said, 'A child of five years old could ride the Irish horse;' and as for Hungerford, he calls him a circus boy."

"But who knows if Blossom will take a fence?"

"I'll warrant she'll go high enough; how shall I come about her? She is another matter. Only don't you go a pullin' at her, or ride her in the snaffle, and as light as you can. Face her straight at what you've got to go over, and let her choose her own pace."

"I declare I don't see how this is a fair trial of my riding, George," said I.

"Well, it is, and it isn't," said he, scratching his head. "You might have a very tidy hand and a nice seat, and be able to ride the mare; but then, Sir, you see, if you have the heavy judgment to manage her coolly, and not rouse her temper at first, if you can bring her to a fence, and make her take off at a proper distance, and fly it, never changing her stride nor balk, why, then, he'll say you can ride."

"And if she rushes, or comes with her chest to a bank, or—as I think she will—she refuses the fence, crosses it, and back, what then?"

"Then I think the mornin's sport will be pretty nigh over," growled he; as though I had suggested something unnecessarily offensive to him.

"What time do we go, George?"

"Sir Roger said seven, Sir, but that will be eight or nine. He'll not be for drive over to the wood, and the horses are to meet him there."

"All right. I'll take a short sleep, and be ready to time."

As he left the room I tore open my letter to add a few words. I thought I'd say something that, if unanswered by him, might be a comfort to my dear mother to read over and dwell on; but for the life of me I did not know how to do it without seeming boastful or awakening her to the dread of some impending calamity. Were I to say, 'I'm off for a ride with papa, it meant nothing; and were I to say, 'I'm going to ride to-day,' I can manage a very hot horse, it might keep her in an agony of suspense till I wrote again.

So I merely added, "I intend to write to you very soon again, and hope I may do so within the week." These few commonplace words had a great meaning for me, however little they might convey to her I wrote them to; and as I read them over I stored them with details supplied by anxious memory, and was full of courage and catastrophe that they made a perfect story. After this I lay down, and slept heavily.

CHAPTER VIII.

A DARK-ROOM PICTURE.

MY next letter to my mother was very short, and ran thus:

"DEAREST MAMMA,—Don't be shocked at my bad writing, for I had a fall on Tuesday last, and hurt my arm a little; nothing broken, but bruised and sore, so that I lie on my bed and read novels. Madame never leaves me, but sits here to put ice on my shoulder and play chess with papa. She is very kind to me for me, and I don't know when I had such a jolly life. It was a rather big hurdle, and the mare took it sideways, and caught her hind leg—at least they say so—but we came down together, and she rolled over me. Papa cried out well done, for I did not lose my saddle, and he has given me a gold watch and a seal with the Norcott crest. Every one is kind; and Captain Hotham comes up after dinner and tells me all the talk of the table, and we smoke and have our coffee very nicely.

"Papa comes every night before supper and is very good to me. He says that Blossom is now my own, and must teach her to come coolly or to her fences. I can't write more, for my pain comes back when I stir my arm. You shall hear at once—and I will not write myself.

"Oh, dearest mamma, when papa is kind there is no one like him—so gentle, so thoughtful, so soft in manner, and so dignified all the while. I wish you could see him as he stood here. A thousand loves from your own boy, DIGBY."

Madame Clermont wrote by the same post. I did not see her letter; but when mamma's answer came I knew it must have been a serious version of my accident, and told how, besides a dislocated shoulder, I had got a broken collar-bone and two ribs fractured. With all this, however, there was no danger to life; for the doctor said every thing had gone luckily, and no internal parts were wounded.

Poor mamma had added a postscript that puzzled Madame greatly, and she came and showed it to me, and asked what I thought she could do about it. It was an entreaty that she might be permitted to come and see me. There was a touching humility in the request that almost choked me with emotion as I read it. "I could come and go, unknown and unnoticed," wrote she. "None of Sir Roger's household have ever seen me, and my visit might pass for the devotion of some old follower of the family, and I will promise not to appear at—" She urged her plea in the most beseeching terms, and said that she would submit to any conditions if her prayer was only complied with.

"I really do not know what to do here," said Madame to me. "Without your father's consent I suppose she can not be done; and who is to ask him for permission?"

"Shall I?"

"No, no, no," cried she, rapidly. "Such a step on your part would be ruin; a certain refusal, and ruin to yourself."

"Would Mr. Eccles do it?"

"He has no influence whatever."

"Has Captain Hotham?"

"Less, if possible, than he."

"Mr. Clermont, then?"

"Ah, yes, he might, and with a better chance of success; but—" she stopped, and, as I awaited patiently, she did not finish her sentence.

"But what?" asked I, at last.

Gentle hates doing an harsh thing," said she; and I remarked that her expression changed, and her face assumed a hard, stern look as she spoke: "All theory is nothing without the to one in your favor. He says you'll always get these odds, if you only wait."

"But you don't believe that?" cried I, eagerly.

"Sometimes—very seldom; that is, I do not whenever I can help it. There was a long pause now, in which neither of us spoke. At last she said, "I can't aid your mother in this project. She must give it up. There is no saying how your father would receive it."

"And how will you tell her that?" faltered I out.

"I can't tell. I'll try and show her the mischief it might bring upon you; and that now, standing high, as you do, in your father's favor, she would be perfectly right to withhold it as the cause of a change toward you. This consideration will have more weight with her than any that could touch herself personally."

"But it shall not," cried I, passionately. "Nothing in my fortune shall stand between my mother and her love for me."

She bent down and looked at me with an intensity in her stare that I can not describe; it was as if it seemed searching for some side to fix me, and read me in my inmost heart.

"From which of your parents, Digby," said she, slowly, "do you derive this energy?"

"I do not know; papa always says I am very like him."

"And do you believe that papa is capable of great self-sacrifice? I mean, would he let his affections lead him against his interests?"

"I don't know!" But the talk was over and over; the head is as often wrong as right—the heart only ever about once in five times." She fell on my neck and kissed me a hundred times, with a sort of rapturous delight. "Your heart will be always right, dear boy," said she; once more she bent down and kissed me, and then hurried away.

This scene must have worked more powerfully on my nerves than I knew at the moment, while it was passing: at all events, it brought back a fever, and before night I was in wild delirium. Of the awful hours that followed I know little, all their alternations, I knew nothing. My first consciousness was to know myself, as very weak and propped up with pillows, sitting in a room in which an old nurse-tender sat and mingled her heavy snorings with the ticking of the clock on the chimney. Outside, I could hear the tramp of a debilitated brain, I used to fancy that I had passed away into another form of existence, in which no objects of sounds had form, and though I thought they were not altogether unknown to me, the attempt at recognition would have been a labor as full of pain as thought, rather than make it fall back again into apathy.

For the moment of perfect consciousness—when I could easily recall how all that I heard, and to member it afterward—was one evening when a doctor but officiator sat came in through the open window, and the rich fragrance of the night filled the room. Captain Hotham and the doctor were seated on the balcony smoking and chatting.

"You're sure the tobacco won't be bad for him?" asked Hotham.

"Nothing will be bad or good now," was the answer. "Effusion has set in."

"Which means—it's all over—eh?"

"About one in a thousand, perhaps, rub through. My own experience records no instance of recovery."

"And you certainly did not take such a gloomy view of his case at first. You told me that there were no visible danger!"

"Neither was there; the ribs had suffered no displacement, and as for a broken clavicle, I've known a thousand of them. This was rare after it. This boy was doing famously. I don't know that I ever saw a case going on better, when some of these fevers—I'm sorry to say whom—sent off for his mother to come and see him. Of course, without Norcott's knowledge. It was a rash thing to do, and not well done either; for when the woman arrived there was no preparation made, either with the boy or herself, for their meeting; and the result was that when she crossed the threshold and saw him she fainted away. The youngster tried to get to her and fainted too: a great hubbub and noise followed, and Norcott himself appeared. The scene that ensued must have been, from what I heard, terrific. He either ordered the woman out of the house or he dragged her away—it's not easy to say which—but it is quite clear that he went absolutely mad with passion: some say that he told them to pack off the boy along with her, but of course this was sheer impossibility; the boy was insensible, and has been so ever since."

"I was at Namur that day, but they told me when I came back that Cleremont's wife had behaved so well; that she had the courage to face Norcott; and though I don't believe she did much by her bravery, she drove him off the field to his own room; and when his wife did leave the house for the railroad it was in one of Norcott's carriages, and Madame herself accompanied her."

"Is she his wife? that's the question."

"There's not a doubt of it. Blenkworth of the Greys was at the wedding."

"If I were to be examined before a commission of lunacy to-morrow," said the doctor, solemnly, "I'd call that man insane."

"And you'd shut him up?"

"I'd shut him up!"

"Then I'm precious glad you are not called on to give an opinion, for you'd shut up the best house in this quarter of Europe."

"And what security have you any moment that he won't make a clean sweep of it, and turn you all into the streets?"

"Yes, that's on the cards any day."

"He must have got through almost every thing he had; besides, I never heard his property called six thousand a year, and I'll swear twelve wouldn't pay his way here."

"What does he care! His father and he agreed to cut off the entail; and seeing the sort of marriage he made, he'll not fret much at leaving the boy a beggar."

"But he likes him: if there's any thing in the world he cares for, it's that boy!"

The other must have made some gesture of doubt or dissent, for the doctor quickly added, "No, no, I'm right about that. It was only yesterday morning he said to me, with a shake in the voice there's no mistaking, 'If you can come and tell me, doctor, that he's out of danger, I'll give you a thousand pounds.'"

"Egad, I think I'd have done it, even though I might have made a blunder."

"Ye're no a doctor, Sir, that's plain;" and in the emotion of the moment he spoke the words with a strong Scotch accent.

There was a silence of some minutes, and Hotham said, "That little Frenchwoman and I have no love lost between us; but I'm glad she cut up so well."

"They're strange natures, there's no denying it. They'll do less from duty and more from impulse than any people in the world, and they're never thoroughly proud of themselves except when they're all wrong."

"That's a neat character for Frenchwomen," said Hotham, laughing.

"I think Norcott will be looking out for his whist by this time," said the other; and they both arose, and passing noiselessly through the room, moved away.

I had enough left me to think over, and I did think over it till I fell asleep.

THE AMERICAN VELOCIPEDE.

SOME months have passed since we heard of the advent in Paris of a strange something on which it was possible for an active Frenchman, furnishing his own motive power, to traverse ten miles of the streets of Paris during a single hour. It was a bicircle, a veloce. It was a two-wheeled contrivance, and something decidedly new.

There seemed to be no very definite information with reference to the machine. It was like Paris—fast; and, unlike the generality of French contrivances, seemed likely to be useful.

The fever which raged so high in France seems to have broken out in America. The veloce was inspected by ingenious Americans, and a number of professional inventors are now laboring to bring it to American completeness. A few persons in New York have the velocipede for sale, and are doing quite as driving a business as the riders of their wares.

The machines now offered for sale are four-wheeled, three-wheeled, and two-wheeled. The first two may be used tolerably well during a first trial, but the two-wheeled affair needs acquaintance before one may ride it successfully. Then it is incomparably the best, for its movement is graceful and easy. The power required for driving it is but little, when the machine is properly made. Of the various velocipedes yet produced the American seems to be the best, for many reasons. It does not, like the French machine, contract the chest; it is simpler, lighter, and withal stronger and more durable. The constructor took great pains to obviate the decided objection to the French machine—that of retarding rather than assisting the development of the chest—and constructed his patterns under the advice of one of the best surgeons in New York, who, with others, now recommends the velocipede as an excellent means for healthful pleasure. The Scientific American says: "The reach, or frame, is made of hydraulic tubing. PICKERING's is made by gauge, just as sewing-machines, Waltham watches, and Springfield muskets are made, so that when any part wears out or is broken it may be replaced at an hour's notice. Its bearings are of composition or gun metal, and the reach or frame is tubular, giving both lightness and strength. The hub of the hind wheel is bushed with metal, and the axle constitutes its own oil-box. It differs from the French veloce in the arrangement of the tiller, which is brought well back and is sufficiently high to allow of a perfectly upright position in riding. The stirrups or crank pedals are three-sided, with circular flanges at each end; and, as they are fitted to turn on the crank pins, the pressure of the foot will always bring one of the three sides into proper position. They are so shaped as to allow of the use of the fore part of the foot, bringing the ankle-joint in play, relieving the knee, and rendering propulsion much easier than when the shank of the foot alone is used, as in propelling the French vehicle. The connecting apparatus differs from that of the French bicycle in that the saddle bar serves only as a seat and a brake, and is not attached to the rear wheel. By a simple pressure forward against the tiller, and a backward pressure against the tail of the saddle, the saddle-spring is compressed and the brake attached to it brought firmly down upon the wheel."

A number of persons in this city and its vicinity are already making use of the velocipede as a means of traversing the distance from their homes to and from their places of business. One gentleman takes his ride of nearly ten miles daily, and saves time as well as enjoying the ride. The Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER has secured two of the American machines, and other gentlemen, well known in the literary and artistic world, are possessed of their magic circles.

Schools for the instruction of velocipede-riding are being opened. Youngsters ride down Fifth Avenue with their school-books strapped in front of their velocipedes, and expert riders cause crowds of spectators to visit the public squares, which afford excellent tracks for the light wheels to move swiftly over.

The best speed thus far attained is a mile in a few seconds less than four minutes. In Paris the Americans carried off the prizes, as well for slow as fast riding. The slow riding is much the most difficult, as it is far easier for the rider to keep his equilibrium in a rapid ride than while moving slowly—just as in the case of a boy driving his hoop, the faster it goes the more direct is its line. To ride a velocipede well is much less difficult than to learn to skate, and the danger of a fall is not imminent. The present scale of prices demanded by dealers is about the same, ranging from sixty to one hundred dollars.

"A horse costs more, and will eat, kick, and die; and you can not stable him under your bed," remarked an expert rider to a friend.

The weight of a medium-sized velocipede is about sixty pounds, and the size of driving wheel most in favor from 30 to 36 inches in diameter. The springs of the vehicle are so arranged as to make it ride easily over a tolerably rough pavement. A fair country road is as good a track as one could desire; but hills of more than one foot ascent in twenty can not be climbed without dismounting and leading the machine.

The winter season is not favorable to veloce-riding, but with opening of spring we may expect to see the two-wheeled affairs gliding gracefully about the streets and whizzing swiftly through the smooth roads of the Park.

STEADINESS OF PURPOSE.

STEADINESS of purpose is capable of helping us in the smallest, as well as in the greatest, events and acts of life. It is not with the moralist as with the economist—"Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves"—but, "Take care upon what ruling principle you frame your conduct, and the details of your daily lives will fall easily, and rightly, and naturally under it." Let the purpose of your lives be steady, and your acts will be steady; even your thoughts and wishes will not be fluttering after the unattainable and the impossible. If you lose some pleasant dreams, you will also lose the more bitter awakenings. Only please to accept in friendly mood our parting admonition, and, when you seek for steadiness of purpose, "see that you get it!"

FRESH ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

Now that the renewed activity of Mount Vesuvius has been followed by an eruption, as was threatened, the circumstance indicates a condition of the great volcano differing wholly from any thing which has been observed for the past eighteen centuries.

It has happened during the last two hundred years that the mountain has been in eruption twice during the course of a few months, but the occurrence of three eruptions in the course of a year is altogether unprecedented. Tracing the history of the mountain from the period of the great outbreak of 79 A.D., one recognizes, amidst a considerable amount of irregularity, a gradual increase in the rapidity with which the eruptions of the volcano have followed each other. It is generally known that at the commencement of the Christian era Vesuvius had been so long quiescent that it had come to be ranked among the number of extinguished craters.

Singularly enough Mount Etna seemed also to be gradually expiring at this time, insomuch that Seneca described it as "nearly extinct;" and at a later period Ælian stated that Etna was gradually sinking, and had already become invisible at a distance across the seas from which in old times seamen had clearly seen it.

During all this time the island of Pithecusa—the modern Ischia so dear to our traveling citizens—was the scene of the most violent and frequent convulsions. Several Greek colonies which attempted to settle on this island were driven away by terrible eruptions. Large tracts of the island also exhaled poisonous vapors resembling those which are emitted by volcanic craters after eruption.

In the year 63 A.D. the occurrence of an earthquake in the neighborhood clearly indicated that this volcano was about to become, as it had been in long ages past, the vent of subterranean fires. For sixteen years earthquakes were experienced from time to time. They grew gradually more violent until at length, in the year 79, they culminated in a tremendous outburst from the great crater of Vesuvius. The rocks and cinders, lava, sand, and scoriæ which had obstructed the exit of the confined matter from this source for so many centuries were propelled in a tremendous succession of explosions high into the air, and falling thence on every side of Vesuvius spread desolation over an enormous extent of country. The younger Pliny, describing the appearance of the mountain during this great eruption, says: "I can not give a clearer notion of the figure of the great cloud which came from Vesuvius than by comparing it to that of a pine-tree, for it shot up to a great height in the figure of a trunk and spread over on every side above into a sort of branches."

No one need be reminded that it was while endeavoring to ascertain the meaning and nature of this remarkable phenomenon that the elder Pliny lost his life. Stabiæ, the town to which he went with this object, was among those which were completely overwhelmed by the downfall of ashes and scoria during the progress of the eruption, which lasted several days. The towns of Pompeii and Herculaneum were much more rapidly overwhelmed, though Sir Charles Lyell, the distinguished geologist, has been able to prove that there is no foundation for the opinion currently accepted that the inhabitants of these towns were all destroyed. On the contrary, he considers that "there were very few of the inhabitants who did not escape."

No lava was ejected during this first great outburst. It was not, in fact, until the year 1036 that Vesuvius was observed to pour forth lava streams. After the eruption of that year Vesuvius was thirteen years at rest; then followed an interval of ninety years, and after that a long rest of 168 years. During these intervals of inactivity Ischia was disturbed by earthquakes and eruptions.

Between the years 1306 and 1631 there was only one slight eruption of Vesuvius, which occurred in the year 1500. During this period Mount Etna was in a state of unusual activity, a circumstance which Lyell considers to indicate that "the great Sicilian volcano may sometimes serve as a channel of discharge to elastic fluids and lava that would otherwise rise to the vents in Campania." During the same interval a new mountain was thrown up in the Phlegrœan Fields. The base of this mountain was nearly half a mile in diameter.

At the end of this long period of rest it seemed as if Vesuvius were gradually assuming the condition of an extinct volcano. The interior of the crater—which was about a thousand yards deep and more than a mile and a half in diameter—was overgrown with brush-wood, and at the bottom there was an extensive plain, within which cattle grazed. In December, 1631, all these woods and pastures were blown away in a tremendous explosion. This outburst differed in many important respects, however, from the great eruption of 79. In the latter the chief mischief was occasioned by the showers of dust, ashes, and scoriæ, which buried whole towns to a depth of many yards. But in the eruption of 1631 streams of lava poured forth from the crater. The town of Resina, which was built over the ruins of Herculaneum, was in its turn entirely consumed by one of these streams. An enormous volume of steam was also poured forth from Vesuvius, and this vapor, being condensed, fell in destructive showers of rain, which swept from the summit of the mountain the enormous heaps of ashes and volcanic dust which had been collected there. The aqueous lava which was thus poured down on the surrounding districts was almost as destructive as the burning lava.

After the eruption of 1631 an interval of thirty-five years elapsed during which the mountain was at rest. But since 1666 Vesuvius has never been at rest for ten years together; occasionally there have been two eruptions within a few months. One circumstance must be noticed in connection with the striking evidence thus afforded of some change in the arrangement of the passages through which the subterranean fires find an outlet. Whereas of old there had been disturbances in various parts of the Bay of Naples—as, for instance, an eruption of Solfatara in the twelfth century, one of Ischia in the fourteenth, and one of Monte Nuovo in the sixteenth—there has been no volcanic activity in any part of the Neapolitan district, except in Vesuvius alone, during the past three centuries.

Nor has the increase in the number of the eruptions been in any way attended by a decrease in their intensity. On the contrary, the eruptions of 1779, 1793, and 1822 have been as violent, perhaps, as any which the mountain has given vent to during the whole period which has elapsed since the eruption of 79. The eruption which took place last winter was also a remarkably violent and persistent outburst. Enormous masses of red-hot stone and rock were hurled forth for days together, and at night the intensity of the fire which was raging within the bowels of the disturbed mountain was indicated by the resplendent whiteness of the vast canopy of vapor which overhung Vesuvius.

Since that time Vesuvius can hardly be said to have rested. Last June the mountain was again in active eruption. Gradually the violence of the disturbance increased until the beginning of July, but the mountain did not cease to project stones and cinders until the end of August. At the time some observers traced an apparent connection between the occurrence of an earthquake at Gibraltar with the movements of the disturbed mountain. Since then other earthquakes have occurred in the south of Europe, a circumstance which may be considered confirmatory of this new theory. It will be noticed that these disturbances have taken place while the mountain has been comparatively at rest. Now that the volcano is again in action a cessation of earthquakes in the Mediterranean volcanic districts may be looked for.

In this connection it may not be inappropriate to mention the remarkable circumstance that the earthquake which shook the British Isles on the 13th of August, 1816, seems to have been associated with the eruption of Vesuvius which occurred within a few days of the same date; and also the fact of the subsidence of Hawaii and the extraordinary phenomena occurring there in a like manner coinciding with the present outbreak of Vesuvius.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE opening of A. T. Stewart's new addition to his mammoth establishment on Broadway, corner of Tenth Street, drew together an immense crowd. Early in the morning the building was surrounded by carriages, each one of which had brought a bevy of curious sight-seers, and throughout the entire day thousands of visitors promenaded the spacious floors of this magnificent store. No mercantile establishment in the world can probably compete with this one. It is about 200 by 300 feet, and eight stories high, including the basement. The rotunda, which is surmounted by a glass dome, is 100 feet in height; and from each of the galleries there is a fine view of the interior of the establishment—the busy clerks (there are six hundred in the retail department), gayly dressed ladies intent on purchases, and rich dress goods of every hue and fabric, forming an attractive picture. Almost every thing in the dry-goods line, from a yard of ribbon to the most costly carpet, can be found at Stewart's.

There is a curious story afloat of a rich bachelor of Providence who lately died, leaving his property wholly to a Spiritualistic doctress. It appears that, when other doctors failed to cure him of some lingering disease, the woman in question was applied to and apparently benefited the patient. He grew generous and his fees profuse. One day he sent her a check for $40,000, and again one for $15,000. His health, however, began to fail in a short time, but not his respect for the doctress, to whom he willed his estate, estimated at $430,000. The heirs at law contested the will on the ground of insanity and undue influence.

Heavy snow-storms have seriously interfered with the Mont Cenis Railway. There is a lack of sufficient locomotive power, and communications between France and Italy are in an uncertain state. It is said that a better supply of engines must be had before trains will again run regularly.

The new Central Market, corner of Broadway and Forty-eighth Street, was opened to the public a short time ago, and affords housekeepers in the vicinity a far better opportunity than they have hitherto enjoyed of having a variety of eatables from which to select. The market is light and roomy, and the prices as reasonable as can be found elsewhere. But every thing to eat is every where and at all times wonderfully expensive.

New postal regulations between the United States and Great Britain will take effect on the first of next January. The postage on a single international letter, weighing half an ounce or less, will be twelve cents. A fine of five cents will be levied on each insufficiently prepaid letter received by one country from the other. Newspapers not exceeding four ounces in weight will be charged two cents. For book packets and patterns, when not exceeding an ounce in weight, the postage is two cents. When exceeding one ounce, and not exceeding two ounces in weight, it is four cents; and for packets exceeding four ounces in weight, an additional rate of six cents for every four ounces or fraction of four ounces is charged.

The Ohio State Lunatic Asylum, which was recently burned at Columbus, was doubtless—according to a statement of the assistant physician—set on fire by one of the patients. It is believed that one of the patients lighted a paper at the gas and threw it into the clothing-room. It is said, however, that if prompt measures had been taken by the Fire Department of the city, the building might have been saved.

A citizen of Philadelphia, who has been confined in an insane asylum for three years, made his escape a short time ago by sawing off the iron bars of his cell. He has since been declared by a jury to be, and always to have been, a sane man. The law regarding admissions to insane asylums should be inquired into and made more stringent.

It is announced that a new prima donna, Signora Lanzri, who has been brilliantly successful in opera at Milan and Florence, will appear in an oratorio at Christmas. She is said to have a pure soprano voice, and to sing with unusual taste and effect.

A physician of Boston reports the death of three children from convulsions produced by eating the skins of raisins. He remarks that there is no stomach, unless it be that of the ostrich, that can master the skin of the raisin.

The following purports to be told by a husband of his loving little wife and excellent housekeeper. But more likely it is the fabrication of some cross old bachelor who never had a "loving little wife" by his side. However, this is the story: One day the wife moved her low rocking-chair close to her husband's side. He was reading. She placed her dear little hand lovingly on his arm, and moved it along softly toward his coat-collar. He felt nice all over. He certainly expected a kiss. Dear, sweet, loving creature!—an angel! She moved her hand up and down his coat-sleeve. "Husband," said she. "What, my dear?" "I was just thinking—" "Was you, my love?" "I was just thinking how nicely this suit of clothes you have on would work into a rag-carpet." The husband felt cross all day, the disappointment was so very great.

A French writer has propounded an entirely new theory of sound. He assures us that the velocity of sound varies according to the following rates: Praises attain a speed of 1500 metres (a metre is about 3 feet 3 inches) per second; flattery is still more rapid, 1806 per second; good advice only 15 metres, and bad advice 1250 metres per second; merited reproaches, 20 metres; slander, which is fleeter than the wind, is 2000 per second; falsehood traveling with the same speed, 2000; while truth and appeals to charity only attain 2 metres each per second.

Children need smiles as flowers need sunbeams. If they meet them at home, they will be happy and contented there; if not, they will be likely to seek elsewhere for them. And who can blame them?

An invention is ascribed to the Russians by which enormous pieces of marble may be detached from the whole mass in the quarries. Crevices are made in the marble during the summer and filled with water. As winter approaches the water congeals and causes the crevice to become wider and wider; finally a huge piece of marble is detached.

VELOCIPEDE RACE IN PARIS—SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

THE AMERICAN VELOCIPEDE.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 811.]

KU-KLUXISM.

WHEN Senator SUMNER made his celebrated argument in Congress over ten years ago, insisting upon the "barbarism of slavery," his oration was denounced as declamatory and extravagant. But scarcely had the voice of the orator ceased to echo in the chamber where it was uttered before the full evidence of his bitter truth was furnished by the cowardly assault of a South Carolina Congressman upon his person. The rebellion which soon followed convinced the North that even the Senator from Massachusetts had not adequately appreciated the barbarism which he denounced, for suddenly elements were evolved from the peculiar civilization of the slaveholding States which threatened and actually attempted the disruption and ruin of the country. The war itself, and considered apart from its original cause, afforded in its successive stages accumulative evidence of the barbarism generated by a system of legalized injustice. The scalping of our dead soldiers upon the battle-field of Pea Ridge by the savage allies of the Confederacy; the inhuman butchery of national negro soldiers at Fort Pillow; the denial of the common courtesies of war to our captured negro soldiers by an attempt to make the axioms of slavery as potent on the battle-field as on the plantation; and the barbarities inflicted upon our brave youth at Belle Isle, Andersonville, Salisbury, and Millen—all these enormities illustrated the depravity possible even to a Christian community which adopts and persistently cherishes a monstrous wrong.

All this we should willingly leave to the historian but for the unfortunate development of the same barbarism since the close of the war. The confession of defeat does not prove the annihilation of wrong. The very first attempt made by the Southern Legislatures, assembled under President JOHNSON'S provisional governments, was to revive a system of partial slavery by a continuance of the old slave code. That attempt was baffled by the passage of the Civil Rights Bill. Disappointed here, the Southern Legislatures attempted, through the defeat of the Fourteenth Amendment, to retain for the whites of the South the disproportionate representation which slavery had given them, while denying suffrage to the colored race. Here again they were thwarted by the establishment over them of a military government.

Then it was that the Ku-Klux organization sprang into being. The object of this secret society was the accomplishment by intimidation and murder of that which open war first and unjust legislation afterward had failed to secure. The logic of the new order was that of the old "Regulators" under the slave system; it was the argument of the New Orleans riot. It has been only too successful in its operations; its members, in ceremental disguise, wearing sepulchral masks and courting the aid of darkness, have murdered without stint, and where they have not murdered they have used intimidation. They have been aided by the proscription of Union men, and by the denial of labor to negroes who refused to vote the Democratic ticket. The result of these violent means of exercising political power are plainly evident in the late election returns of the Southern States. But, for all that, the Ku-Klux organization has failed.

Our illustration is engraved from a photograph, representing two members of the Ku-Klux order captured in a recent riot at Huntsville, Alabama. Judge THURLOW and another person were killed in this riot. It is represented that in that vicinity there are over 400 members of this secret society.

GRANT is the certain defeat of political violence in the South. But the evil can only be completely eradicated by the co-operation of Southern citizens, and by efforts on their part to advance educational interests, and to diffuse Christianity and humanizing influences, throughout the territory so long blasted by the curse of slavery.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS. — MESSRS. PRANG & CO., of Boston, have lately published a new chromo, from a landscape by Mr. A. BIERSTADT. It is a striking California scene, with rocks, pines, and cascades, under a strong effect of sunlight.—Advan.

ALMOST every day we hear many persons complaining of headache, loss of appetite, and that they are not up to any thing, etc., for days and the days that we have felt so ourselves, and in fact have gone to bed and imagined ourselves sick, but for the life of us could not tell what was the matter. One day, while thus complaining, a friend said to us, "Why don't you try PLANTATION BITTERS? They are really a good thing, and will make you feel like a new man. Upon his recommendation we purchased a bottle, and took them according to directions. They seemed to go right to the spot, and gave us immediate relief. SOZODONT.
An Eminent Chemist says:
489 BROADWAY, N. Y., July 6, 1865.
I have made a careful analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs. HALL & RUCKEL, and the object of my analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.
An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed by me, and either corrosive or injurious ingredients likely to have a deleterious action on the teeth or gums not being found, an objectionable character was found in its composition. JEROME THOMAS, M.D., Late Professor of Chemistry, &c.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (Improved Oroide).

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been Imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we respectfully caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, have named it the "COLLINS METAL," and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch, all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $18 Watches are equal in neatness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $100. Those for $20 are of very superior finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $300. Chains of every style, from $2 to $8. Also, Jewelry of the Collins Metal in every style.

NOVELTY JOB PRINTING HOUSE.

Read this Advertisement every Week.

BURNSWICK, ME., Oct. 8, 1868.

MR. WOODS:—Dear Sir,—I must say that I am much pleased with your Novelty Quarto Press. It is just the thing for saving thing for me, besides a Demi Lever Press, on which has been doing all my printing for a period of forty-nine years. Taking into consideration the cost and easy running, with a job can be done upon the Novelty Press—together with the small outlay for the press—and the trifling expense of keeping it, with its simple apparatus, it order—with the fact, also, that a boy or girl of 15 in weight, after half a day's practice upon it, can give from 300 to 500 impressions per hour, makes this press a very desirable article in any printing office, large or small, and an economical article, I think, even by the side of the Rotary Printing Machines. Your obedient,

JOSEPH GRIFFIN, Bookseller and Printer.

CHRISTMAS SONG.

FROM belfry, towers, and tapering spires
The drifted dark bright cherubs clear,
And bend to hear the chanting choirs
Greet the great day of all the year.

And all the mellow Christmas bells
Clash their wild tunes upon the air,
And, gathering in melodious swells,
Wake the white echoes every where.

Around the fane the incense wreathes,
The organ rolls, the anthem rings;
Through the dim aisles all Heaven breathes
To lift the soul from mortal things.

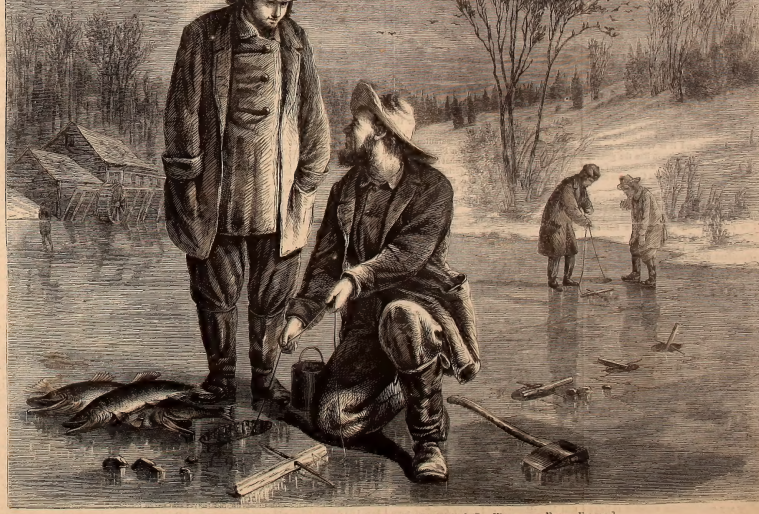
To lift the soul, the sense upbuoy,
And meet the level of the morn,
When, breaking all the gloom to joy,
The Saviour of the world was born.

STEAMBOAT DISASTER ON THE OHIO RIVER.

EVEN in a year which has furnished so full a record of disasters by land and water it is difficult to find a story more painful than that of the recent collision of the two steamboats United States and America, on the Ohio River.

The accident took place on the night of December 4, a little after eleven o'clock. The United States, a splendid three-decker, was descending the river to Louisville. Just opposite Rayl's Landing, one mile above Warsaw, Kentucky, she collided with the America, which was ascending the river. The United States was sunk, but not before she was enveloped in flames, which were instantly communicated to the other steamer. Both vessels were destroyed in less than five minutes. The fire was caused by the collision, which forced a number of barrels of petroleum that were on the guards of the United States into the furnace; at least this is the statement made by Mr. ANDREW HARRIGAN, second clerk on that vessel. The cargo on both steamers was of a very inflammable material—consisting of brooms, whisky, cotton, bacon, etc. To this circumstance the speedy destruction of both vessels is to be attributed. The catastrophe was sudden, and there was an immense loss of life, mainly, however, on the United States, which lost 35 out of 65 passengers.

Captain R. M. WADE, who makes this statement, says that it was a dark but not a foggy night. "The America," he reports, "went into the States on the larboard, abreast of the baggage-room, and only cut through the guards and a few of the top timbers of the hull. The flames appeared to come instantaneously with the crash on both boats—shooting up above the top of the hurricane-roof of the States, where I was standing. The wind was blowing hard up stream. The States backed into the Indiana shore, where her head swung quartering out into the stream, going down in a few seconds. The America blew two whistles, which was answered by the States by one whistle, or it was all I could hear, owing to the high wind. The States blew again, but we could not hear the America's reply. After the collision the boats appear to have been separated for a brief interval, but, according to the second clerk's statement, came together again, and a number of passengers were saved by jumping on board the America. This clerk says there were 75 passengers on board the United States, and that of this number 35 were ladies. "There were," he says, "two bridal parties on the boat, and some of the passengers thought they would have a little fun in serenading them, which they did, and some twenty minutes after the serenade the collision occurred; and I think if it was not for the serenade the bridal parties would have been lost; but as they were in their state-rooms awake, they were apprised of the danger in which they were, and got off the United States on to the America; and as their state-rooms were on the same side as the America they were saved. The scene in the cabin at the time was indescribable. Several ladies stood throwing their children overboard and crying for assistance. Upon the guards a number of ladies stood, wringing their hands and crying for help, but they would not leave the place they were in, and perished in the flames. Previous to the disaster we were enjoying ourselves in the cabin dancing, and the passengers had just entered their state-rooms."



The panic occasioned on board both vessels was beyond description. There was no time to dress, and some of the ladies in their attempts to escape the raging flames lost even their night-clothes. OLE BULL, the celebrated violinist, was one of the passengers on the America. He escaped by wading to the shore with his violin. Many other passengers on this vessel owe their escape to the efforts of the clerk, C. W. TAYLOR, who burst open the doors of their state-rooms and dragged them out of their beds. In some cases ladies who were attempting to escape by means of floating shutters were ruthlessly hurled from their refuge by men.

The people of Warsaw deserve most grateful mention for their efforts to alleviate the sufferings and to supply the temporary wants of the distressed victims of this disaster.

THE LETTER-CARRIERS' NEW COSTUME.

THE New York City Post-office employs 308 mail-carriers. On the 25th instant these officers are to be clad in uniform—a cadet-gray coat and pants, with black trimming, and a marine cap with a badge bearing the mail-carrier's number.

The average number of letters distributed by a single mail-carrier is from 233 to 250 per day, including papers and parcels. In the month of September last there were distributed in this way over the city 1,212,766 letters, 537,109 drop-letters; 212,352 papers; and from the mail-boxes the carriers collected 2,877,646 letters. There are eight distributions per day in the lower part of the city, and nine in the upper part. In the course of a year a single letter-carrier is intrusted with the delivery of upward of 90,000 letters and papers. It is an occupation which demands from these officers the promptest attention and the most scrupulous care, besides industrious tramping in all sorts of weather. The advantages arising from their new livery are numerous, and so obvious that it is unnecessary to particularize.

WINTER SPORTS—FISHING FOR PICKEREL THROUGH THE ICE.—[DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1868.

THE LAST OF THE PRESIDENT.

THE President's Message was so emphatically ill said upon the table that it is now probably forgotten except as an insult, not so much to Congress as to common honesty and common-sense. In obedience to the requirements of the Constitution, the President recommended certain measures which he considered necessary to the public welfare. The first of them was a proposition that the people of the country should proceed to say that they did not mean what they had just declared at the election and after the fullest discussion; and the second was, that the Government should cheat its creditors. The comedy of the first suggestion for the public welfare is sobered by the unmitigated knavery of the second.

Looking at this Message, with its sullen spirit and its base proposals, the country can imagine what the national situation would have now been had HORATIO SEYMOUR been elected. The absurdities and criminalities of the Message would have been the declared policy of the Government. The reconstruction acts would have been doomed, and the late rebel States would consequently have been plunged into anarchy. The honor of the United States would have been irrevocably tarnished, and the nation that emerged victorious from a struggle of arms would have resolved to hopeless demoralization. The system of popular government would have been brought into a disgrace from which it is not possible to see when it could have recovered; and, bankrupt in good sense and common honesty, the country would have been the scorn of history.

If we had not seen a great party surrendering itself last summer to the control of baffled enemies, not only of the Union but of the principle of the Government, and proclaiming that wholesale swindling was the true financial policy for a great nation, it would be incredible that a President could send to Congress such a message as this in the blank stupidity of proposing that, after more than three years' acquaintance with the situation, after the most intelligent and deliberate popular conclusive verdict against "My Policy," the country should adopt it as the sole solution of every difficulty, is explicable only upon the theory of mingled ignorance and dull, dogged obstinacy, which is more than suspected in the President. But the brisk bravery of the recommendation to break the faith of the Government as a total way out of the moral maze in the Chief Magistrate, which should, it seems to us, rather vigorously remind the country that common conscience is really of some practical value in public affairs.

The Senate arrested the reading of the Message. The House listened to it, and immediately laid it upon the table, whence it will never be taken. There were several Republican Senators, including Mr. MORTON and Mr. WILSON, who were in favor of reading the whole, upon the ground that the Constitution requires the President to communicate to Congress the state of the country, and to submit suggestions for promoting the public welfare. But surely this does not compel Congress to hear only what the President may choose to say in any manner. Congress is the guardian of its own dignity, and spontaneously of that of the nation. It must decide for itself when the limits of decency are passed; and it is very easy to imagine, especially with a person like the present incumbent of the Presidency, a message of recommendations so expressed that Congress could not properly tolerate it.

If, for instance, when Mr. JOHNSON delivered his drunken speech at his inauguration as Vice-President, the Senate had interrupted and refused to listen, no one would have felt aggrieved, even if the Constitution expressly provided that a speech should be made by the Vice-President upon that occasion. Poor old GEORGE CLINTON, who was said to have sent down a royal message to Parliament begging, "My Lords, Gentlemen, and Woodcocks," Parliament was hardly obliged to listen. Suppose that the President, instead of sending a message in writing by his secretary, had come in person to deliver it orally, and, being in the same condition as when he made the speech to which we have referred, had refused to put on any clothes upon the occasion, would Congress be constitutionally bound to permit the outrage upon common decency?

Now, in the actual case, common honesty was as much outraged as decency would have been in the other. The United States are pledged to pay a certain interest upon certain bonds, and the President says that he thinks the bondholders have been sufficiently paid already, and proposes that the payment of the interest shall be stopped. If he had recommended that the navy of the United States should seize all the foreign ships it could find, pay for them at its own valuation, then scuttle and burn them, would the Congress of the United States be bound by any consideration whatever to listen to all the details of the proposition? Clearly it is within Congressional discretion in either branch to determine when the public dignity and welfare demand the refusal to hear more of any communication whatever. As a rule, undoubtedly it will generally hear; but it is a grave consideration whether the overture from the Executive of a conspiracy to swindle the national creditor does not justify an emphatic departure from the rule.

Whatever further offenses the President may commit, it is a pleasant reflection that the opportunities of vexing the public patience are rapidly ending. Had he been removed from office when he was impeached he would have retired with a measure of public dignity as a martyr, and have enjoyed a kind of active hold upon a vague sympathy. But he will now leave his office not only to the satisfaction of all loyal citizens, but with the merited contempt of all honest men.

THE QUESTION OF THE SUFFRAGE.

IN considering, last week, the subject of the suffrage, we suggested that it was very difficult to see why, under the constitutional clause requiring the United States to guarantee to every State a republican form of government, and the decision of the Supreme Court that Congress has the binding power to examine the State constitutions, Congress could not legislate upon suffrage. If it can not, it is difficult to see how the guarantee can be executed, for if a State should vest all political power in a family or an oligarchy, and Congress can not touch the suffrage, a republican form of government would be overthrown in the State, and the constitutional guarantee for its defense would be wholly inoperative and nugatory. Indeed, it is upon that theory that the control of this vital question in a republic resides solely in the States, is the growth of the long supremacy of Southern interests and political dogmas in the government. The point is generally conceded as of course, and without reflection. But when the authority for such a view is demanded, it is usually given by quoting the constitutional provision that electors of Members of Congress "shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." And there is no other express constitutional allusion to the subject. It is then, of course, assumed, under the general provision that the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited are reserved to the States respectively or to the people, that the question remains indisputably with the States.

But if the States should demand qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature which are not republican, what, again, becomes of the guarantee of a republican form to every State? If the State creates a small privileged class of electors of the Legislature, so that the Senators and Representatives who come to Congress are not chosen by the people in any proper and intelligible sense, has the country no remedy, and is the guarantee a mere figure? "Usurpation is dangerous," says Judge STORY, "usurpation might raise its standard, and trample upon the liberties of the people." Must the country submit? We can it, at least, hardly do nothing more than behold the encroachments of usurpation with indignation and regret? In other words, is Congress bound to see the republic die while a republican form of government is overthrown in a State? Is it not to answer the question to ask it? Is not the conclusion inevitable that Congress must determine in certain form of government in a State, it must have power first to determine what that form is, and whether it exists? Has it not, therefore, the authority to interfere if it finds that such a form does not exist? Without this power and authority the constitutional provision is a mere mockery of form.

SENATOR TRUMBULL, in supporting the theory that Congress can do nothing upon the subject of the suffrage, expressed with more remarkable theory that a republican government does not depend upon the number of people who participate in the primary election of representatives. But what then does depend? If the Senator meant a mere play upon the word republic, and included old Venice or Paraguay in the term, there would be no argument, because in that view the Paper money States are a republic. It is a use of the words republic and republican which destroys their meaning. But in any received and intelligible sense the word republic means a system of government by the people through their representatives, and by people is understood no class of the people taken upon arbitrary grounds, but the great body of adult citizens. If this is not a republic, what is? MR. TRUMBULL seems to assume that the State governments recognized when the Constitution was formed, must be considered republican, although they did not allow slaves to vote. But does MR. TRUMBULL seriously assert that the government of South Carolina, for instance, before the war was a republican government? And if so, is that the kind of government which Congress is required to guarantee to every State? Or does he mean that Massachusetts and South Carolina were equally republican? And if he does, has not the word ceased to have any meaning whatever in his mind?

Because it may be difficult to define with perfect precision what a republican form of government is, it surely does not follow that there is none. Nor because the significance of the word increases with further reflection ought possible ever to enable the government to insist upon being bound by a more ignorant interpretation. The guarantee of a republican form is permanently imperative upon the United States. It is the duty of Congress, therefore, whenever the question arises, to answer it by its convictions at that time. With the conviction of the country before it, undoubtedly the constitutional clause of this guarantee, and the clause apportioning representatives and direct taxes are inconsistent, because the latter recognizes a large class of persons not free, and slavery is not compatible with a republic. But that is no longer a question. There are no slaves; there are only free citizens in the country. And are not women free citizens? asks MR. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly; and did the Senator ever see any substantial argument against their claim to political power? Then he would undoubtedly ask in return whether, if Congress may declare government by a single man or family in any State not to be republican, it may not also declare government by a sex not to be republican? It seems, certainly, that it may do the last if it may do the first; and does MR. TRUMBULL deny that it may do the first? If he does deny it, it is possible to show how Congress can execute the mandate of the Constitution? If it means any thing, what does it mean? Does it mean that the United States may interfere upon the requisition of the Governor of a State if a citizen tries to make himself King, but may not interfere if a majority of the electors make him King? But, in the former case, has the State less a republican form than in the latter? If the United States must guarantee a republican form, must they not decide when it is necessary to exert the authority so imposed?

There is still something to be said of the manner in which this authority may best be exercised, as we have already the point whether, conceding the right and the authority of Congress, the result contemplated may be more wisely attained by a constitutional amendment.

THE NEW MINISTRY AND THE OLD CLAIMS.

THE immediate interest of the United States in the new British Ministry is the consideration of the manner in which it is likely to regard the Alabama claims, and its disposition toward a settlement of them. The Ministry is supposed to be united upon the general question of the election, the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but it is evidently composed of very heterogeneous materials so far as the United States are concerned. If MR. BRIGHT becomes a member of the Cabinet, of which there now really seems to be some doubt, the staunchest and most intelligent friend of American rights in English statesmen will be an influential member of the Government. But he will find himself associated with other gentlemen, such as the Marquis OF HARTINGTON, who have very decidedly not friends of the United States during the war. With LORD CLARENDON as Foreign Secretary, there will be no appreciable, no serious change in the general tone of the foreign policy of England. LORD STANLEY is too intelligent a man to suffer his hereditary Toryism to become stupid or malignant. He must be acknowledged that the general conviction of his high character and ability has done very much to rescue that unfortunate party from the ruin inevitably declining under his predecessor.

Upon the preliminary point which is understood to be so urgently pressed by MR. SEWARD, that Great Britain first confess that she did wrong in recognizing the rebel States as belligerents, we do not believe the new Cabinet will be more disposed to do this than the old. It will not deny the responsibility for losses which the Government conceded to be its duty to prevent when it forsook the departure of the Alabama. But it will probably insist that every nation must decide for itself under what circumstances it will recognize the belligerency of combatants. Should the United States decline to accept a settlement of the Alabama claims until the question of international custom or law is settled, there must be a treaty or a war. If we insist that the recognition was an act of open hostility, and that we will regard it in no other light, England must, of course, apologize or fight. But if England declares that such a demand upon our part necessarily renders the peaceful adjustment of questions of international law impossible, it will be rather difficult to find an answer.

As for a reference, it is only possible to refer the question of damages. Great Britain will hardly allow Prussia substantially to decide whether she has correctly interpreted the law of nations. Would the United States do it? The British Government and people unquestionably see as distinctly as we the ruinous and disastrous consequences of the principle they have laid down. They will, therefore, undoubtedly pay the damage which it has inflicted upon us, and then, surely, we may safely leave the matter as it stands. Indeed, it has sometimes seemed as if MR. SEWARD had persistently in his demand because he knew that England would not accede to it, and that so a constant irritation would be maintained against her. We do not attribute a puerile and base a policy to the Secretary of State, but it has been suspected, and even suggested. The barbarous statesmanship of the Middle Ages might have been guilty of a wish to foster causes of international hostility; but the man who should do it to-day between England and the United States, and call claim to be a statesman, would be laughed to scorn. The duty of statesmanship to-day is not to cherish provincial and national jealousies: it is to make universal peace possible upon the most satisfactory principles.

MR. SEWARD is supposed not to be very friendly toward England, and he knows what we all know, that there is a sentiment feeling in this country that would gladly hail a difficulty or a war. It is a conviction that the account can be settled only by a blow, and there is in some otherwise sensible minds a kind of aching desire to give John Bull a shaking. But whether it would be wise and noble to take a national policy from such feelings is not a question. The war should at least have put us right in our own eyes. England knows, and we know that England knows, that we are no longer to be treated as a child, or an adventurer, but as an equal. Being sure of that upon both sides, war is wholly unnecessary.

LAND HO!

MR. CALEB CUSHING is supposed to have left the country upon some one of Secretary SEWARD's peripatetic missions of buying lands. The area of the United States is so small and its parts so harmonious, that the Secretary seems to be of opinion that we want a few hundreds of thousands of fresh inhabitants; and if they are Esquimaux, Spaniards, African slaves, people bred under the worst monarchy and mikado in every way to our enlightened system and spirit, so much the better. It is also suggested that MR. CUSHING is to act as associate Minister with MR. REVERDY JOHNSON. But we imagine a Cabinet Department would not undertake to mend that matter at present; and it is so curiously like MR. SEWARD to think that the Spanish surrender and the trouble in Cuba offer a proper opportunity for buying that island at a bargain, that the presumption is in favor of MR. CUSHING's employment in some such service.

But is this the fortunate moment for a great increase of our territory and population in any direction? Certainly the present population is not crowding upon our resources. And there is, with equal certainty, not that patriotic unity of feeling which is desirable in a great country. It is, in fact, the very worst moment that could be selected for the policy of territorial expansion with which MR. SEWARD is so fascinated. What we most need now is to consolidate the population, to make it properly homogeneous, and to develop to the utmost our scarcely known resources. What we need least is an immense addition of foreign traditions and ignorance to the ignorance and disaffection already existing.

In fact, MR. SEWARD's policy is that of a thrifty squatter. His feeling probably is, that if we do not obtain the West India Islands some other Power will, and then we shall have a foreigner, possibly an enemy, seated at our very doors. But the West Islands have been in European possession, and have they been very dangerous or even threatening to us? And if they should ever become so, if England or France became the lord of Cuba, would England or France be strengthened by the colony? In case of war between either of those countries and the United States, would the necessity of protecting the faithful island be a striking advantage? MR. SEWARD's foreign policy is that of a merchant who should think himself turning about in his regular and prosperous business to speculations of dazzling promise in fancy stocks. Experience and good sense plead against the tempting display.

What do we want of Cuba? What do we want of Alaska? Have we not immigrants enough now in what may be called the natural order of events? Are the West not filled as was the East, from China as well as from Europe, that we should multiply them suddenly and recklessly? Is it not the feeling of the late rebel States sufficiently bitter and alienated that we should reinforce it with the discontent of a class of Spanish slaveholders? Is not the ignorance with which we must contend, genius enough already that we should deepen it with that of West Indian slaves? Is it not better that we should direct our minds to the necessity of becoming a great nation as well as a big nation? Indeed, the policy which MR. SEWARD favors is a legacy from the dark days of the old rule in this country when expansion was a necessity of slavery. But it is not a necessity of liberty. Instead of an advantage it is now a distinct peril. There was never one good reason given for the Alaska purchase. If that of Cuba is seriously attempted there will still less be any plausible argument for it.

TRADE AND FINANCE.

THE lessons taught by recent vicissitudes must convince the people of the United States that, although a return to specie payments will be attended with present inconvenience and loss, it is wholly unsafe to continue under the present system. The operations of a few managers of the Erie Railroad, in locking up moneys obtained from an unauthorized and secret issue and sale of stock, interfered with the reasonable prospects of all business men throughout that portion of the Union which relied upon paper-money. The wickedness of this proceeding was the greater as it was planned to take effect at a time of deep interest to all, when a large share of capital was used to move our vast agricultural productions from where they are produced to where they are consumed—an object in which every substantial citizen is deeply interested, and which none will frustrate but those who are governed by an extreme selfishness at war with the public good. This action has brought down the price of wheat below what will remunerate our farming interest, and affected the business of the country injuriously. It amounts to a conspiracy against the public welfare, which, we repeat, should be made impossible by penal statutes and united disapprobation.

It is scarcely possible that a scheme of injury so vast can be carried into effect when we reach the solid ground of specie. The purchase and distribution of specie sufficient for the wants of the country will be a costly operation. We shall need probably three hundred millions more than we have. As every dollar of coined money is the result of labor, it will require an equivalent amount of labor to command this sum over and above what is required for support. The country must decide between a system which strikes off money with the printing-press—a thousand-dollar bill as easily as a one—and sets all calculations of value at defiance, and that true system which obtains it from what the world has accumulated, or from its original source, as in either event it will furnish a true test of the value of the labor which it has cost, and for which it is successively exchanged.

Our industry now is subject to the control of speculators, and is commanded by those countries which possess a sound currency, because we have deviated from the true policy. No device will extricate us except that of basing our transactions wholly upon the precious metals. All other expedients are temporary and delusive. We shall grow in wealth, solidity, and integrity in the proportion in which we infuse the precious metals into our monetary affairs. The supremacy foretold for us can never be achieved under a paper system. Under the opposite system our great country, so full of all the material upon which industry can successfully be employed, will know no superiors in supplying easily all the wants of man.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his recent report to Congress, had the opportunity to enlighten the country as to its true duty at this juncture; but there is one great error into which he has fallen. His ideas of the Legal-Tender policy are wholly erroneous. It was resorted to because of the universal prevalence of a paper system. The error being incapable of correction in war, was adopted and continued during hostilities, and such has been and ever will be the experience of those nations which in time of peace expel the precious metals by the general circulation of paper. If he had contented himself with stating the difficulty in this form, and urged that, having served its purpose with as much efficiency as could be expected from a measure into which we were driven from antecedent errors, no complaint would have been made; but he goes out of his way to show that Mr. WEBSTER had declared its illegality, not distinguishing between the circumstances to which Mr. WEBSTER applied his doctrines and those upon which the Congress acted in establishing the law. Mr. WEBSTER was right in declaring that the policy could not be adopted in peace. Mr. M'CULLOCH is wrong in supposing that the policy is illegal, when under the pressure of war all other means of raising money fail. All other objects are subordinate in war to the great one of saving the country from destruction. With its downfall the rights of property and the obligation of debts might be entirely changed or wholly extinguished. It is the true interest of creditors who are exposed to such a contingency to accept the money which the Government is forced to circulate. Modern nations, under the exigency of war, have made this a precedent which this Government may legally adopt as a "necessary and proper" means in that emergency.

We perhaps owe to Mr. M'CULLOCH that the cases now before the Supreme Court of the United States were held for advisement and re-argument at the present term, and regret the more, as he is about to lay down his office, that he does not exercise the prudent circumspection and foresight with respect to his successor, which induced him to urge a delay in the decision of the Court until his financial arrangements were placed beyond the influence of an adverse decision. The intimate relations which ought to exist between co-ordinate branches of the Government might give to his expressed opinions against this Act of Congress an influence over the Court of an injurious character. A decision against its validity would plunge the country into sudden disorder. It was this belief which induced us to publish in our Monthly for December a carefully-prepared article in support of the law. We were fearful that the influence of the Administration might coincide with that of others too powerful to be despised in depriving the country of the sole debt-paying medium—legal tenders—in advance of the circulation of gold and silver. From the brief which we have received from Mr. EVARTS, who, we are gratified to find, argued the case for the Government, we have no fears of the result. The argument upon it was clear, comprehensive, and able, leaving no room for an adverse decision. The country will thus escape another peril due to its paper system, and have the opportunity to substitute by degrees a better, as the former may be from time to time displaced in the necessary process of recovery. The Attorney-General deserves the thanks of the country for his great services in this matter. He unites the qualities of a lawyer and statesman in a degree seldom surpassed.

There will be some uneasiness about the prosecution of business until the Legal-Tender Act shall be sustained by the highest tribunal. Some scarcity of money is complained of, due in part to apprehension from this source. But a healthy business is being done in all branches, care being taken not to carry heavy stocks. It will be the policy of all to prepare for the gradual change which a favorable decision will allow—a change which must take place if it is intended by our law-makers that our manifold industries shall be placed on the solid footing which is essential to true commercial greatness.

The ports on the Baltic and St. Lawrence being now closed with ice, the attention of Great Britain must be turned to us as the source of her needed supplies of food. Egypt and a few ports on the Black Sea will still be in the market as competitors, and San Francisco has still a part of her surplus grain on hand; but the main reliance of England, Spain, and those portions of Europe which suffered from the disastrous drought, must be upon the United States. The quantity of grain imported into England falls short of her importations of 1867; and no fears need be entertained that there will not be a steady and large demand for the whole surplus of our agricultural productions.

THE REPUBLIC IN SPAIN.

THAT the revolution in Spain would proceed to its end as peacefully as it began, although most sincerely to be hoped, and although there was even some show of promise, was hardly to be expected. It must surprise no one, therefore, that difficulties have occurred, and that there have been fights and bloodshed. All those who, for any reason, were dissatisfied with the old system would naturally acquiesce in its overthrow, but their willingness to see the old destroyed would be in the degree of their hope for their own favorite system to replace it. When reconstruction begins, differences appear. But as the appeal in Spain was to be made to the people—that is, to the male adults—those who make trouble before the appeal is taken are, à priori, in the wrong. Their action presumptively shows that they expect to be beaten by a peaceful verdict, and that they therefore resort to force. Consequently, when we read that the Republicans have broken up meetings of their opponents, and have finally appeared in arms, the conclusion, until more is known, is that they anticipated defeat and declined to abide by the popular decision.

But the à priori view is very often a false view. Those who recall the vote which made LOUIS NAPOLEON emperor may very wisely doubt whether it was a real expression of the popular will; and before judging the Spanish Republicans, still more before condemning them, we must know a great deal more of the secret intrigues of parties in Spain. The Spanish people are ignorant and superstitious beyond most Europeans. The situation of the country favors the ecclesiastical domination under which the country has always suffered. The priesthood as a class are, of course, monarchists. As a rule also, a political priesthood is unscrupulous. Moreover, the leaders of the revolution are not beyond the suspicion of personal ambition; and no one of them has risen to an evident mastery of the country and of the situation. That the intrigues to secure a vote for the monarchy may have been so flagrant and so patent that the Republicans became aware that the appeal was not to be a fair one, is very possible; and they may, therefore, have preferred to take the chances of force rather than to surrender all hope of a change of the political system.

To us, at this distance and with our necessarily imperfect knowledge, there seems to be no hope of a speedy settlement of troubles of this kind when once begun. The absence of any settled government is of course an advantage to an insurrection; for it becomes the interest of the adherents of the old system to increase and perpetuate disorder, that it may be regarded as the consequence of the overthrow of the old government. Again, if the provisional government hopes to represent the monarchical principle as opposed to the republican, it can not count upon the sympathy of the real monarchists, who prefer the old régime; and without any charm of tradition or authority of legitimacy it can hardly appeal to popular ignorance with the force of an enthusiastic republican party demanding and offering popular rights and equality. As yet the news is so confused that the movement can not be well comprehended. But, as we remarked when the revolution began, the republican element will probably be found to have an unsuspected vigor and extent in the country; and PRIM will probably learn that he should have declared for a republic if he wished to govern Spain.

BOGUS BRONZES.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

PERHAPS you will allow me to say to your readers that nine out of ten of the so-called bronzes put up at street auctions about holiday time are not bronze at all, but simply "Berlin iron" castings, bronzed or colored to represent a better material. The chief value of a bronze ornament, or statue, lies in the degree of skill displayed by the designer; next to that the workmanship in carrying out the design; and, lastly, the material. Cast iron may be bronzed to look as well for a time, and a long time, as true bronze, but it is extremely brittle and delicate; and if accidentally overset the principal parts are broken past remedy, of course utterly destroying the value of the article. This is not so with true bronze, which has not only twenty per cent. more strength than cast iron, but bears sudden jar better than it.

The only way for an inexperienced person to tell real bronze from a piece of cast iron is to scratch or cut some of the inside portions with a knife; if the abrasion is white it is iron, if it is yellowish brown it is true bronze. The actual value of iron castings is five cents a pound; of bronze, seven to eight times as much. When I add that auctioneers bid off these castings at the price of true bronzes, it will be seen that some reflection and care must be taken to avoid deception.

EGBERT P. WATSON.

WINTER SCENE.

MOIST-GRAY the hills, through quiet haze,
Along the horizon bend;
Brown faded leaves and withering grass
Toward that faint distance tend.
The voiceless fields with mists are white,
In winter silence sleeping;
Low twilight, by dim clouds led on,
O'er sky and heath is creeping.

Long plashes catch the lessening gleam
In clay-stamped hollows 'biding;
The hope of spring-tide life and joy
In banks and tufts is hiding.
Short winter's day the rolling clouds
With damp and dark are wreathing;
Yet whispers of the coming spring
In westward winds are breathing.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE third session of the Fortieth Congress opened at noon on the 7th of December.

In the Senate, the announcement of Senator Edmunds's re-election by the Vermont Legislature was announced with the Governor's certificate.—A communication was offered from the Governor of Georgia. This Mr. Sherman moved to lay on the table, presenting the credentials of the Hon. Joshua Hill as Senator from Georgia. He maintained that Mr. Hill was elected before the expulsion of colored members from the Legislature of that State, and that he could take the oath. The whole subject was temporarily laid on the table.—Mr. Sumner offered a resolution tendering to Spain the best wishes of the American people, also a bill providing for the resumption of specie payments after July, 1869.—Other bills and resolutions were offered affecting naturalization and suffrage.

In the House, several bills and resolutions were offered. Mr. Wood called for the instructions of the Government to Minister Johnson on the Alabama question, and for the correspondence.—Mr. Kelly offered a constitutional amendment affecting suffrage, and Mr. Broomall offered still another.

December 8:

In the House, Mr. Garfield reported a bill providing for the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the War Department. The bill was passed, yeas 116, nays 33.

December 9:

In the Senate the President's Message was received. It was so offensive that Mr. Conness, of California, moved to dispense with the further reading, after the portion which scolded Congress for its appropriations for the enforcement of "unnecessary and unconstitutional laws." A debate was thus occasioned, and finally Mr. Conness withdrew his motion, which was renewed by Mr. Cameron. After some discussion an adjournment was concluded upon.

In the House a bill was passed providing for an election to be held in Virginia on the fourth Thursday in May, 1869, at which the citizens of the State should vote upon the adoption of the Constitution agreed upon by the State Constitutional Convention. The President's Message was received, ordered to be laid upon the table, and printed.

December 10:

In the Senate, the House bill transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The conclusion of the President's Message, interrupted the day before, was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.—A resolution was adopted providing for a recess of both Houses from December 21 to January 5.

The President's Message was transmitted to Congress on the 9th of December. Comments upon it will be found in another column.

The Secretary of War, Mr. Schofield, estimates the strength of the army on September 30 at 48,081 men, which, he thinks, will be reduced by January 1 to about 43,000. The Indian war has rendered necessary an additional cavalry force. The disbursements of the Pay Department last year have been nearly $61,000,000; the disbursements for Reconstruction amount to a little over two millions.

A. G. Taylor, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is opposed to the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and recommends that the war policy be ended, and a separate department of Indian affairs be created.

The Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, reports the total number of vessels in use in the navy, including store-ships, tugs, etc., as 206, carrying 1743 guns. Thirty-five of the vessels in use are cruising vessels, with 365 guns, and ten are practice vessels in the Naval Academy. The naval force is classified thus: 52 iron-clads, 129 guns; 95 screw steamers, 938 guns; 28 paddle-wheel steamers, 199 guns; and 31 sailing vessels, with 477 guns.

While there is but one revolutionary soldier now living and drawing a pension, there are upon the rolls 888 widows of revolutionary soldiers!

General George W. Cole was on the 7th of December acquitted by the jury trying him for the murder of L. H. Hiscock. The jury found the prisoner sane the moment before and the moment after the murder, but were in doubt as to his sanity at the precise moment when the act was committed.

Deacon Andrews, who has been on trial at Plymouth, Massachusetts, for the murder of Cornelius Holmes, was found guilty on December 9 of manslaughter. In accordance with the laws of the State Deacon Andrews was allowed to present his own statement before the jury. The prisoner was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment.

The number of lives lost by the disaster on the Ohio River, which we illustrate on another page, is believed to be about sixty-five.

Quarter-master-General Meigs has published the sixteenth number of the Roll of Honor. The number of graves of Union soldiers now recorded in printed form is 150,000, the occupants of which, to the number of 55,000, are as yet unknown. It is conjectured that the full number of graves will reach over 300,000. The whole number of Union soldiers who have died in the war of the rebellion is estimated as 355,000.

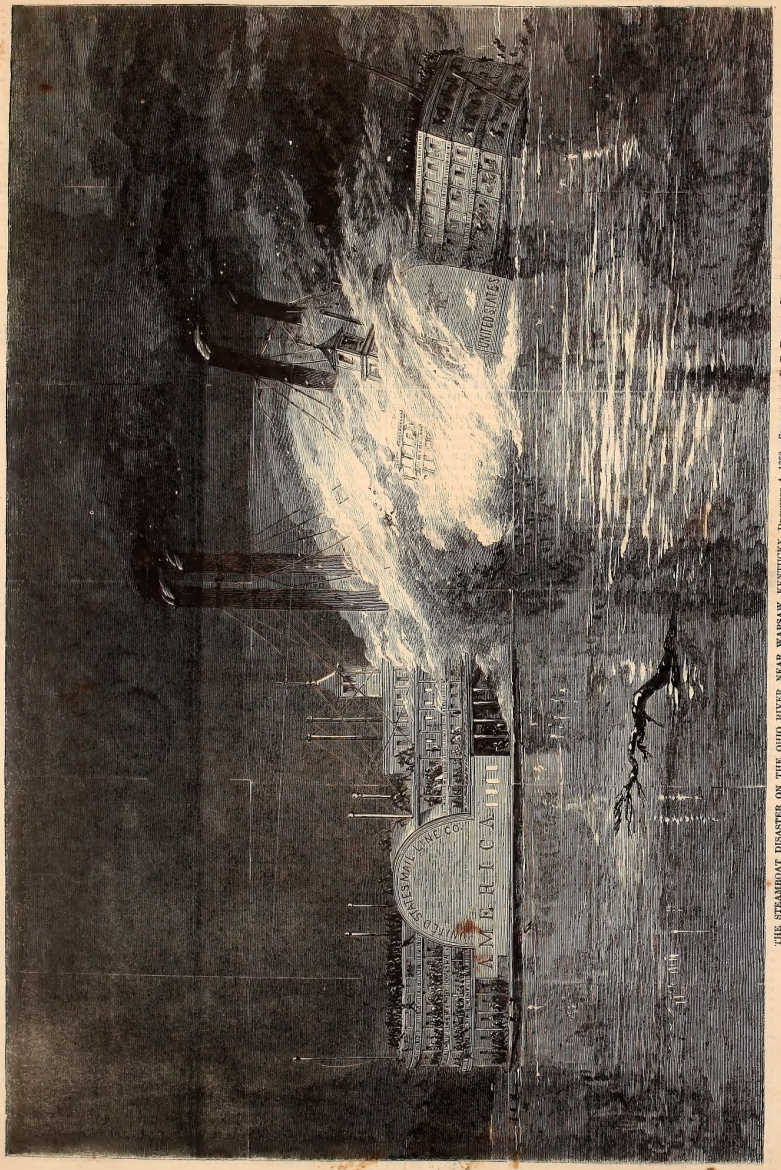
FOREIGN NEWS.

Is the long period which has been allowed to elapse before the assembling of the Spanish Cortes a means taken by General Prim to secure his elevation to Dictatorship? This is the question which is now being asked throughout Europe. There is now in Spain a revolution within a revolution. Insurrection has broken out at Cadiz, and a desperate conflict has been waged with heavy losses on both sides. Great political excitement prevails at Xeres, Malaga, and Tarragona. General Prim has started for the southern provinces to restore tranquillity. By the time the Cortes meet may not his acceptance of the Dictatorship of Spain be made to seem indispensable?

An important Clerical Conference was held at Berlin, Prussia, October 15, under the presidency of Dr. Hoffman. At this Conference not a voice was raised for rationalism, which the writer believes to be dying out in Prussia. Some impatience was rather expressed at the tolerance of the authosities; but it was evident that wherever proof could be obtained, any attempt to teach what was contrary to the confessions of the Reformation would be put down by the ecclesiastical authorities. The meeting also exhibited the working of that craving for ecclesiastical unity which is displaying itself in Great Britain, the Colonies, and the United States. The question was discussed: Can an historical symbol be found in which the Lutheran and Reformed Churches can agree? Herr Schulze, a consistorial counselor from Posen, maintained with great ability that the Augsburg Confession of A.D. 1530 was the best œcumenical symbol of the United Evangelical Church of Germany, especially with the addition of its tenth article, which admits the sacramental doctrine of the Calvinists. The Conference seemed pretty unanimous in approving of the confessional basis, and the writer's impression was, that, sooner or later, it will be accepted by the German Churches as the basis of their unity.

The Conference suggested that a united demonstration might be made by the Prussian Church on the 8th of December, 1869, in reply to the papal allocution lately addressed to Protestants. This demonstration might even be on a wider scale. A simultaneous testimony by the whole of the really Protestant churches of the world in favor of the essential truths of the Gospel, published to the world, and arresting attention simultaneously with the great gathering at Rome, would not only be a great means of attesting the real unity of Protestantism, in spite of all that is usually asserted to the contrary by the advocates of Popery, but might become a real means of grace, a remarkable and blessed way of spreading the knowledge of the Gospel in regions of darkness and the shadow of death.

The reference to Roman unity leads us to remark that facts are constantly occurring to show that even within the Roman community two manner of people, or principles, are ever contending—the spirit of liberalism and the spirit of submission. Those who are animated by the desire to advance in the free paths of intellectual, industrial, and political progress, disdain the fetters which Roman influence is perpetually forging for them; and, on the other hand, those who deem spiritual submission the first duty of man are terrified at the spirit of liberalism which is so eager to burst all ecclesiastical fetters. Hungary furnishes an illustration. A Hungarian bishop has published a pastoral, in which he lays it down that the ecclesiastical law remains in full force, in spite of the new marriage law; that a civil marriage is invalid in the eyes of the Church; that the concordat is still in force; that the relation of the Church to the schools is still unaltered; that "the situation" of the Emperor is dreadful. Another bishop has been fined five thousand florins for refusing to deliver up the records of the ecclesiastical marriage court. At Torplitz a marriage took place, the bridegroom being a Protestant and the bride a Catholic. The priest refused to marry without the customary promises as to the bringing up of the children, which were refused. The civil marriage was thereupon celebrated by the governor of the district, in full uniform. An enormous crowd was assembled, and at the close tumultuous cheering was given for the Emperor for freeing them from the ecclesiastical yoke.



In Florence a singular method has been taken for propagating sentiments favorable to liberty and Protestantism. A play founded on the domestic life of Milton has been produced. The sentiments on a free press, the ends and aims of all good government, on the real worth and dignity of letters, on domestic purity, on filial love, were carefully reproduced from Milton's writings, and whole passages from "Paradise Lost" were dextrously inwoven into the play. The poet hurls his denunciations against the superstition and tyranny of the Church and Court of Rome; and is free in his censures of kings, past, present, and future. It is interesting that this has been done under the eyes and the approval of King Victor Emanuel, the lineal descendant of that Duke of Savoy to whom Milton, as Latin Secretary of Cromwell, addressed the indignant remonstrance against the slaughter of the Vaudois, commemorated in the immortal sonnet, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints."

There were five boats into which the passengers and crew were placed; two of these were picked up; one, containing 33 persons, was capsized and lost; no information had been at last advices received from the other two. The passengers numbered 83. Fifty-two persons are known to be saved.

THE STEAMBOAT DISASTER ON THE OHIO RIVER, NEAR WARSAW, KENTUCKY, DECEMBER 4, 1868.—SKETCHED BY E. P. FRAZER.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE TRUE STORY OF DON JUAN.

WHEN the orange and citron groves of the Alcazar were in their ripest glory, and the gilded palace of the Moors yet wore the freshness that had made it splendid in the days of its first masters, there lived a certain Sevillian hidalgo whose entrance to the Plaza de Toros was the signal for a hum and a whisper among the multitude that told that bloody arena; whose rare presence at vespers in the dusky aisles of the great cathedral boded ill to some fair worshiper within the solemn fanes: a man from the touch of whose infidel fingers the priest withdrew his holy-water brush as from contact with the foul fiend himself; a man behind whose steps followed ever the smothered anathema of the pious and the weak.

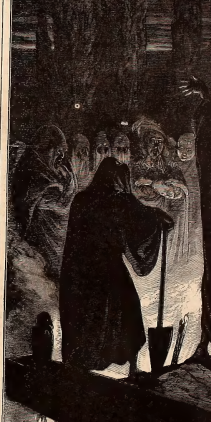
This man was Juan Tenorio, one of the twenty-four, the best hated and the most feared among the inhabitants of Seville. Handsome, proud, brave—with a decorous brand of courage—false, and cruel, he was all these, and known to be all these, for he came of a race in which these qualities had been hereditary since the Mohammedan was driven out of Spain.

Don Juan's wealth was even greater than his rank. He was master of many a sparse mile of vineyard between Seville and Jerez, and owner of a delicious Oriental villa on the banks of the Guadalquivir, built in the true Moorish style, with airy barbaric colonnades, and pierced pavements of colored marble through which a hundred jets of limpid water rose to cool the sultry southern atmosphere, and a quadrangle where a fountain played all day and night amidst a wealth of exotic blossoms, beneath the shade of a wide silken awning. Here, in the idle summer noontide, the noble Sevillian loved to bask, and here, beneath the tender light of the southern moon, were held revels of which all good citizens spoke with a shudder. Dancing-girls and matadors had told strange stories of banquets given in those marble-paved chambers—banquets at which Lucifer himself might have taken the chair; of dances performed in that Moorish quadrangle which might have delighted the Prince of Darkness and his most courtcery of deeds scarcely less terrible than those by which Pedro the Cruel had given the Alcazar a hideous renown. Don Juan Tenorio had elevated vice into a kind of poetry, and refined sin into a science. From his very boyhood his name had been a terror to husbands and fathers and brothers; but of late the good people of Seville had crossed themselves as they spoke of him, as when they pronounced the name of the fiend. His latest crime had surpassed his former villainies, for on this last occasion he had added murder to seduction.

Among those weak enough or bold enough to countenance this man, in spite of his infamous repute, was the Commander Gonzalo de Ulloa, with whose young and beautiful daughter Don Juan Tenorio professed himself eager to form a matrimonial alliance. The Commander was influenced by the rank and wealth of the suitor; the terms of the contract were arranged, and the contracted parties were allowed to meet in the most ceremonious manner on certain rare occasions—the promised bride attended by her duenna, and supported by her proud old father.

Whether Juan entered upon this engagement in good faith at first was only known to himself. Certain it is, that, after a very short courtship, the idea of matrimonial bondage in the future, and the wearisome attendance of father and duenna in the present, became alike obnoxious to him. The habit of evil-doing had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength. He was practiced in the corruption of duennas, versed in all delusive arts for the conquest of a weak inexperienced girl, and the end in this case came but too soon. One morning the gossips of Seville were startled by the tidings of Don Gonzalo's elopement with Don Juan; and before nightfall a great terror came upon the city with the knowledge that the Commander Don Gonzalo de Ulloa had been found stabbed through the heart on a lonely road twenty miles from the gates.

He had discovered his daughter's disappearance within one hour of the wretched girl's flight; had extorted some half-confession from the unwilling duenna, and had followed the fugitives, attended by one servant, who saw his master overtake a traveling-carriage, in which were a lady and gentleman both masked. The Commander had dragged the gentleman from the carriage, and a sharp encounter had followed on the spot, with fatal result to Don Gonzalo, the lady shrieking piteously all the while. The gentleman had not once removed his mask, and had sprung into the carriage directly after his opponent's dying to the postilions to drive like a thousand devils.



The servant was an inexperienced rustic, who had been but a few weeks in the service of the Commander, and he was unable to identify the masked traveler, but had a kind of idea that it was no other than Don Juan Tenorio, who had ingeniously sworn at him for a base-born dog more than once upon the occasion of his visits to Don Gonzalo.

The Commander's family were furious against the libertine, scarcely knowing whether to hate him most as the seducer of their kinswoman or as the murderer of their kinsman. Shame was new to their house, and was so much the more bitter to bear. They urged their wrongs in the ears of legal authority, and demanded that the seducer and assassin should be brought before the tribunal of justice; but as the duenna had contrived to disappear from Seville during the confusion that followed her employer's death, there was no direct evidence against Don Juan Tenorio. And besides this difficulty there was another in the fact that Don Juan was not to be found. It was reported that he and his frail companion had embarked at Cadiz on a vessel bound for the East. Don Gonzalo's remains were brought to Seville and interred with much solemnity in the church of the Franciscan monastery, where the house of Ulloa possessed a mortuary chapel, and of which order the only son of the late Commander was a superior; and after affording gossip and excitement for all Seville, the monstrous scandal gradually died away, and, if not forgotten, at least ceased to be a common subject of conversation.

But there was one gloomy mind from which no time could efface the memory of Don Juan's iniquities, there was one chief member of the holy brotherhood of St. Francis from whose thoughts the fatal image of the murderer and seducer was only banished during the supreme service of the day, and scarcely banished then.

Father Onofrio of the Holy Sepulchre, whose name in the world had been Paez de Ulloa, cherished the memory of his father's death and his sister's disgrace as other men cherish the image of a lost love, or wasted wealth, or longdelayed happiness. By day and by night his prayers arose to heaven, imploring justice from Him who claims the divine right to avenge all earthly wrongs.

"Thou hast said 'Vengeance is mine,'" cried the monk. "Surely Thou wilt not suffer this libertine to go unpunished; and if Thou needest an earthly instrument, behold, Thy servant is ready."

Months grew into years, and it seemed as if the brother's pleading were unheard at the supreme tribunal. A marble effigy of the murdered Commander was executed for the mortuary chapel in the church of the Franciscans, a noble image of the dead, "in his habit as he lived," erect and sword in hand, as if standing guardian over the vault below, awfully lifelike in the obscurity of that solemn shrine.

Three years had passed since Donna Octavia's flight, and in all that time the Commander's villa on the banks of the Guadalquivir had been deserted by its master. Suddenly as he had disappeared Don Juan Tenorio came back to his native city; and again his very name was a terror in all virtuous households.

He reappeared with a bold and dauntless front, expressed himself profoundly grieved to hear of Don Gonzalo's death and his daughter's elopement, declared that he had quarreled with and parted from the damsel on the very day before her flight, having reason to suspect her of a low intrigue with one of the members of the circus, and had left Seville quietly and alone immediately after this quarrel, since which departure he had been traveling in the Holy Land.

The story was rendered somewhat plausible by the fact that a celebrated matador had disappeared from Seville about the time of Donna Octavia's flight; the Sevillians were not the less convinced of Juan Tenorio's guilt, and regarded him with a gloomy interest as he walked among them at half-light and festival, shunned yet admired, splendid and lonely.

Unhappily the very fact of his evil reputation rendered him an object of interest in the eyes of foolish women; and from the hour of his return he grew bolder and more successful in crime. The rumor of his return and his new iniquities penetrated to the sombre retreat of the Franciscan monks, and Father Onofrio declared that the hour had come in which the offended majesty of Heaven must be vindicated by an earthly champion. This blasphemous libertine, whose career was devastating as the progress of some dragon of fabulous story—this hardened sinner, whose rank enabled him to defy the law, and whose infidelity mocked the dangers of divine wrath—had come back to the scene of his guilty deeds, and had come to expiate them.

"The hour has arrived," said the superior, in solemn conference with the holy brotherhood. "When the rewardies of venal man shrinks from the duty of chastising the high-born sinner—when the outraged law is powerless, it is time that the Church should assert its authority. Juan Tenorio is an incarnate vice, and it is the office of the Church to vanquish sin. Juan Tenorio must die."

The superior spoke with a tone of conviction that seemed inspiration. His pale care-worn face brightened with an awful radiance; so might look the avenging angel, as he proclaims the doom of a sinner.

"There should be no scandal," faltered one of the brotherhood. "The—fiend—must be done secretly."

"The Church can keep her secrets and can answer for her acts to God," replied Father Onofrio, calmly. "For the safety of Seville, for the glory of Heaven, it is expedient that this man should perish."

"And the means by which he shall die?" nervously interrogated Brother Ildefonzo.

"Leave the means to Heaven—and to me," replied the superior. "I want to put the question of the righteousness of this deed to the vote. Let those of the brotherhood who are opposed to this act of justice hold up their hands."

There was a solemn silence of some minutes, during which Father Onofrio waited with calm inflexible countenance. No hand was uplifted, no voice pleaded for the abandoned libertine, Juan Tenorio.

"Enough," said the superior; "it is decided. Dextimus."

The suppers and dances at the Moorish villa had been longer than ever since Don Juan's return from his wanderings—unholy festivals, to which men and women stole between dusk and midnight in a stealthy, secret manner. But to have partaken of one of those banquets was to be a lost creature in the sight of all good men, and women, and over the gates of that barbaric paradise might have been written, "Who enters here leaves honor and good name behind." The distant flash of many lamps, the lifted sound of gay dance-music or snatches of song floating Sevilleward on the still night-air, were all that respectable people knew, or sought to know, of Don Juan Tenorio's festivities. But twice and the morning sun beheld the close of revelries more disgraceful than the fair old land shone upon since Commedus and his venal favorites dragged the god of day with their drunken chorus of jubilee.

It was at the close of one of these infamous orgies that Juan Tenorio strolled alone on the broad terrace-walk, from which he looked across groves of orange and citron, myrtle and arbutus, to the fair winding river glorified by the morning sun. The festival just concluded seemed and disappointed the giver of the feast. That dread hour had come in which the cup of pleasure begins to pall upon the lips of the libertine, and in which for the first time he asks himself the fatal question, "And is this happiness?" Is this all? Is it to be always the same: lovely eyes with the same fond flattering looks, soft round arms wreathed in the same caresses; music and song as old as life itself; wines that have lost their power to warm the blood; dances whose voluptuous enchantments have ceased to charm; the mere dull mechanism of profligacy, the dreary emptiness of vice? "Is this all that life has left for me?" cries the libertine, dreadly. "Oh for some intrigue which shall thrill every sense with the old fire; something mysterious, awful, perilous; something which shall outsoar the mists of earthly bliss, and carry my jaded soul into the domain of the supernatural! I am weary of women. Is there no fair fallen angel among the ranks of the damned who will take pity on a soul at least as her own?"

"A packet for his highness Don Juan Tenorio."

The address was so sudden as to seem like an answer to that blasphemous invocation; but it came only from a messenger who had approached the musing hidalgo with stealthy foot. He handed Don Juan a small packet, carefully sealed with a blank seal, bowed, and disappeared before there was time to interrogate him.

The packet contained a letter and a miniature. Don Juan first examined the miniature. It was exquisitely painted, and it represented a lovelier face than any that Juan Tenorio had ever seen in out of his dreams. Dark eyes of marvelous bewitchment, parted lips of ripest crimson, and a smile that was of almost diabolical beauty.

The letter was brief.

"One who has long cherished your image, and watched your career, would fain see you alone. If you are bold enough to venture an interview with a stranger, and in a place not often devoted to such meetings as you attend, come, two hours after midnight, to the Franciscan church, where you will be waited for in the chapel to the left of the high altar."

This was all. The writer made no allusion to the portrait; but could Don Juan doubt that those delicate feminine characters were hers upon whose image he gazed with new hope and passion?

"A rendezvous two hours after midnight in a church!" exclaimed the hidalgo. "This savors of the diabolic. Yes, fair fallen angel, I will come, though the foul fiend himself should make a third at our meeting. The church of the Franciscan monastery? It is surely there that Don Gonzalo was buried; yes, I remember."

This association was scarcely an agreeable one even to Don Juan, who held all things lighter than his own pleasure; but it in no wise deterred him from attending the rendezvous. He looked at the miniature twenty times during the day, wondering how it was he had never beheld the lovely original.

There were no revels that night at the villa, and at one o'clock Don Juan left the house alone and on foot. It was a somewhat memorable departure: for he had ordained never again to cross that familiar threshold.

The monastery of the Franciscans was situated in a dreary spot upon the outskirts of the city. Beyond lay the open country, wild and solitary. All was dark and silent, even in the streets through which the deserted streets and squares reigned an unspeakable solitude. Intrigue affects darkness, and the unknown seemed to have chosen a moonless midnight for her assignation.

As the hidalgo approached the lofty walls of the monastery he began to wonder how he should gain admittance to the church at this dead hour of night. Did the pious Franciscans leave their doors open for the faithful and penitent all night long? The customs of the pious were not familiar to Don Juan Tenorio, and he could not answer this question.

"My fallen angel has made all things smooth for me, no doubt," he reflected, with an insolent smile; "but a church is a strange place for a post-midnight rendezvous; and if nothing but a church will suit my unknown mistress, I should have been better pleased had she chosen any other fane than that which hallows the ashes of the Commander."

He was close under the walls by this time. The western door of the church stood before him. It was ajar, and he saw a faint light burning within. He pushed the door open gently, and entered the sacred building with stealthy steps. There was no such feeling as fear in his mind. He was not even awe-stricken by that solemn, time-hallowed solitude. He felt only a chill, unpleasant sense of repugnance to the place, and a vague sentiment of vexation against the folly of the fair one who had selected such a spot and such an hour.

"She must be of a rank to render extreme caution necessary," he thought, "or she would scarcely bring me to such a place."

He walked slowly along the southern aisle, looking to the right and the left. Solitary tapers burned dimly before the images of Virgin and saints. No living creature was to be seen within the solemn precincts. The cautious footsteps of Don Juan Tenorio sounded loud upon the broad stone flags, beneath which reposed the ashes of many a patient brother whose feet had paced them living.

The chapel to the left of the high altar was in deepest shadow. Don Juan's footsteps quickened as he drew near that appointed spot. His heart beat loud and fast with the old eagerness for triumph and conquest. He entered the chapel and stood face to face with—Don Gonzalo de Ulloa.

It was only the Commander's statue, the noble marble effigy of that murdered gentleman, which confronted Don Juan, sword in hand, with—but that was a trick of light and shadow—a vengeful frown upon its lifeless brow.

"St. Jago! if this be meant for a jest, the senorita shall pay dearly for it," muttered Don Juan, when he recovered his breath.

He turned his back on the statue and the mortuary chapel, and looked along the shadowy aisles in search of the person who had summoned him.

At an insignificant door in the opposite aisle he saw a slight black-robed figure beckoning to him with uplifted hand. He crossed the church, and followed this figure through the open door into the grounds of the monastery. Here he would fain have arrested the black-robed stranger; but the unknown kept in advance of him, and pointed onward with commanding gesture.

They crossed a cypress grove and entered a small inclosure surrounded by high walls. It was the ground which had been used as a burial-place for the brotherhood since the vaults below the church had been filled.

Here Juan Tenorio saw a group of monks encircling an open grave. The scene was illumined by torches stuck in the newly-dug earth, that made a bank upon one side of the grave; and the picture had something of the diabolic in the fitful glare of torch-light.

"If this be a jest," cried Don Juan, "it is a sorry one, and the Franciscans shall answer to the king for such an insult to one of the noblest among his servants."

He grasped the loose garment of his unknown guide, who turned toward him with uplifted hood, and showed him the boyish countenance of a young novice.

"It is no jest," said one of the hooded monks, in a voice that was strangely familiar to the libertine; "you have been summoned hither, Don Juan Tenorio, to expiate your many crimes."

"Before what tribunal?"

"The tribunal of the Church. When a sinner of your rank outrages Heaven and man, and defies the laws of his country, it is time that a superior power should take upon itself the punishment of his iniquities. It is better that one man should perish than that the souls of many should be destroyed. You have been the incarnate scourge of your native city; you have sinned with an impunity that is a lasting witness against the cowardice of your fellow-citizens; but you shall do evil no more. Prepare yourself for death, guilty brother; your grave is ready."

Don Juan drew his sword; but a strong hand snatched the weapon from his grasp and flung it to the bottom of that dismal yawning grave. Other hands seized him at the same instant, and bound his arms to his sides with rope. Bound thus, amidst that circle of solemn, black-robed figures, the sinner knew that he was doomed.

"You are allowed half an hour to prepare for death," said the calm voice of the superior. "Kneel, brother, and pray that your guilty soul may be finally purified in the flames of purgatory."

"I believe as much in purgatory as I believe in heaven or hell," answered Don Juan, "and have no breath to waste in prayer. I conclude this performance is some priestly practical joke, or a stratagem for the extortion of money. If it be the latter, you had better name the price of my liberty at once. I am prepared to be liberal, and I deserve to pay dearly for my credulity in coming here at the behest of a lady who exists—"

"Only in a picture of Joseph's Temptation, by Leonardo da Vinci, from which one of our brotherhood, skilled in miniature-painting, copied the head of Potiphar's wife. We knew the style of beauty calculated to attract Don Juan Tenorio," said the superior. "Once more, wretched man, I tell you this is no jest, but solemn earnest; no trick to extort money, but a tribunal to execute summary justice on a villain. And in order that you may believe this the more easily, know that I, who within these sacred walls am called Father Onofrio of the Holy Sepulchre, bore, in the world from which I have withdrawn myself, the name of Paez de Ulloa, only son of the man you murdered, and brother of the woman you seduced.—Now let the Dies Iræ be sung, and the sinner prepare for death."

The solemn hymn was chanted, the funeral service was performed. Juan Tenorio stood by, motionless as the statue of the Commander in the mortuary chapel. White as that marble effigy was the face of the condemned, but the haughty lip curved in a defiant sneer, as if in scorn of death itself.

The coffin was brought forward to the brink of the grave, and the victim was lifted in the arms of four stalwart monks and laid living in that last habitation of mortality.

"We would not inflict unnecessary torture even on such a criminal," said Father Onofrio; "a draught has been prepared which will shorten the pangs of death. Brother Ignatius, let the cup be offered to the lips of the condemned."

A monk advanced with a metal goblet in his hand, knelt by the side of the coffin, and offered the vessel to the lips of Don Juan. He drained it in silence. This being done, the lid of the coffin was adjusted and nailed down by two other monks, and then the funeral service proceeded.

The first faint streak of day glimmered in the east as the last shovelful of earth was thrown into the grave; and in that faint morning light the procession of monks moved with slow and solemn step from the burial-ground. A bird began its gay carol as they crossed the monastic garden, beneath the dark cypress avenue, and the bell for matins sounded from the gray church-tower.

The disappearance of Juan Tenorio was the subject of much wonderment to the Sevillians; but their wonder was speedily changed into horror upon the arising of a strange rumor as to the manner of his death.

It seemed that Don Juan had gone at midnight to the church of the Franciscans, and had there insulted the statue of the Commander, Don Gonzalo. And lo, horror of horrors! the statue had been endowed with life and motion, and had invited the insulter to mortal combat; which ghastly challenge being accepted, the effigy had led the way to a waste place beyond the convent garden, and suddenly a great chasm in the earth had opened, and Juan Tenorio was devoured alive.

This story was vouched for by the monks of the Franciscan monastery, certain members of that holy brotherhood having witnessed the awful doom of the profligate. And on such indisputable evidence the story of Don Juan passed into the records of Seville, a never-to-be-forgotten legend of human guilt and supernatural retribution.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER IX.

MADAME CLEREMONT.

FROM that day forth I received no tidings of my mother. Whether my own letters reached her or not I could not tell; and though I entreated Madame Cleremont, who was now my confidant in every thing, to aid me in learning where my mother was, she declared that the task was beyond her; and at last, as time went over, my anxieties became blunted and my affections dulled. The life I was leading grew to have such a hold upon me, and was so full of its own varied interests, that—with shame I say it—I actually forgot the very existence of her to whom I owed any trace of good, or honest, or truthful, that was in me.

The house in which I was living was a finishing school for every sort of dissipation, and all who frequented it were people who only lived for pleasure. Play of the highest kind went on unceasingly, and large sums were bandied about from hand to hand as carelessly as if all were men of fortune and indifferent to heavy losses.

A splendid mode of living, sumptuous dinners, a great retinue, and perfect liberty to the guests, drew around us that class who, knowing well that they have no other occupation than self-indulgence, throw an air of languid elegance over vice, which your vulgar sinner, who has only intervals of wickedness, knows nothing of; and this, be it said passingly, is, of all sections of society, the most seductive and dangerous to the young: for there are no outrages to taste among these people, they violate no decencies, they shock no principles. If they smash the tables of the law it is in kid gloves, and with a delicious odor of Ess bouquet about them. The Cleremonts lived at the Villa. Cleremont managed the household, and gave the orders for every thing. Madame received the company and did the honors; my father lounging about like an unoccupied guest, and actually amused, as it seemed, by his own unimportance. Hotham had gone to sea; but Eccles remained, in name, as my tutor; but we rarely met, save at meal-times, and his manner to me was almost slavish in subserviency, and with a habit of flattery that, even young as I was, revolted me.

"Isn't that your charge, Eccles?" I once heard an old gentleman ask him; and he replied, "Yes, my lord; but Madame Cleremont has succeeded me. It is she is finishing him."

And they both laughed heartily at the joke. There was, however, this much of truth in the speech, that I lived almost entirely in her society. We sang together; she called me Cherubino, and taught me all the pages' songs in Mozart or Rossini; and we rode out together, or read or walked in company. Nor was her influence over me such as might effeminate me. On the contrary, it was ever her aim to give me manly tastes and ambitions. She laid great stress on my being a perfect swordsman and a pistol-shot, over and over telling me that a conscious skill in arms gives a man immense coolness in every question of difference with other men; and she would add, "Don't fall into that John Bull blunder of believing that dueling is gone out because they dislike the practice in England. The world is happily larger than the British Islands."

Little sneers like this at England, sarcasms on English prudery, English reserve, or English distrustfulness, were constantly dropping from her, and I grew up to believe that, while genuine sentiment and unselfish devotion lived on one side of the Channel, a decorous hypocrisy had its home on the other.

Now she would contrast the women of Balzac's novels with the colder nonentities of English fiction; and now she would dwell on traits of fascination in the sex which our writers either did not know of or were afraid to touch on. "It is entirely the fault of your Englishwomen," she would say, "that the men invariably fall victims to foreign seductions. Circe always sings with a bronchitis in the North;" and though I but dimly saw what she pointed at then, I lived to perceive her meaning more fully.

As for my father, I saw little of him, but in that little he was always kind and good-natured with me. He would quiz me about my lessons, as though I were the tutor, and Eccles the pupil; and ask me how he got on with his Aristophanes or his Homer? He talked to me freely about the people who came to the house, and treated me almost as an equal. All this time he behaved to Madame with a reserve that was perfectly chilling, so that it was the rarest thing in the world for the three of us to be together.

"I don't think you like papa," said I once to her, in an effusion of confidence. "I am sure you don't like him!"

"And why do you think so?" asked she, with the faintest imaginable flush on her pale cheek.

While I was puzzling myself what to answer, she said:

"Come now, Cherubino, what you really meant to say was, I don't think papa likes you!"

Though I never could have made so rude a speech, its truth and force struck me so palpably that I could not answer.

"Well," cried she, with a little laugh, "he is very fond of Monsieur Cleremont, and that ought always to be enough for Madame Cleremont. Do you know, Cherubino, it's the rarest thing in life for a husband and wife to be liked by the same people. There is in conjugal life some beautiful little ingredient of discord that sets the two partners to the compact at opposite poles, and gives them separate followings. I mustn't distract you with the theory, I only want you to see why liking my husband is sufficient reason for not caring for me."

Now, as I liked her exceedingly, and felt something very near to hatred for Monsieur Cleremont, I accepted all she said as incontestible truth. Still I grieved over the fact that papa was not of my own mind, and did not see her and all her fascinations as I did.

There is something indescribably touching in the gentle sadness of certain buoyant bright natures. Like the low notes in a treble voice, there is that that seems to vibrate in our hearts at a most susceptible moment, and with the force of an unforeseen contrast; and it was thus that, in her graver times, she won over me an ascendency, and inspired an interest which, had I been other than a mere boy, had certainly been love.

Perhaps I should not have been even conscious, as I was, of this sentiment, if it were not for the indignation I felt at Cleremont's treatment of her. Over and over again my temper was pushed to its last limit by his brutality and coarseness. His tone was a perpetual sneer, and his wife seldom spoke before him without his directing toward her a sarcasm or an impertinence. This was especially remarkable if she uttered any sentiment at all elevated, when his banter would be ushered in with a burst of derisive laughter.

Nothing could be more perfect than the way she bore these trials. There was no assumed martyrdom; no covert appeal for sympathy; no air of suffering asking for protection. No! whether it came as ridicule or rebuke, she accepted it gently and good-humoredly; trying, when she could, to turn it off with a laugh, or when too grave for that, bearing it with quiet forbearance.

I often wondered why my father did not check these persecutions, for they were such, and very cruel ones too; but he scarcely seemed to notice them, or if he did it would be by a smile, far more like enjoyment of Cleremont's coarse wit than reprehending or reproving it.

"I wonder how that woman stands it," I once overheard Hotham say to Eccles; and the other replied:

"I don't think she does stand it. I mistake her much if she is as forgiving as she looks."

Why do I recall these things? why do I dwell on incidents and passages which had no actual bearing on my own destiny? Only because they serve to show the terrible school in which I was brought up; the mingled dissipation, splendor, indolence, and passion in which my boyhood was passed. Surrounded by men of reckless habits, and women but a mere shade better, life presented itself to me as one series of costly pleasures, dashed only with such disappointments as loss at play inflicted, or some project of intrigue baffled or averted.

"If that boy of Norcott's isn't a scamp he must be a most unteachable young rascal," said an old colonel once to Eccles on the croquet-ground.

"He has had great opportunities," said Eccles, as he sent off his ball, "and, so far as I see, neglected none of them."

"You were his tutor, I think," said the other with a laugh.

"Yes, till Madame Cleremont took my place."

"I'll not say it was the worst thing could have happened him. I wish it had been a woman had spoiled me. Eh, Eccles, possibly you may have some such misgivings yourself?"

"I was never corrupted," said the other, with a sententious gravity whose hypocrisy was palpable.

I meditated many and many a time over these few words, and they suggested to me the first attempt I ever made to know something about myself and my own nature.

Those stories of Balzac's, those wonderful pictures of passionate life, acquired an immense hold upon me, from the very character of my own existence. That terrific game of temper against temper, mind against mind, and heart against heart, of which I read in these novels, I was daily witnessing in what went on around me, and I amused myself by giving the names of the characters in these fictions to the various persons of our society.

"It is a very naughty little world we live in at this house, Digby," said Madame to me one day; "but you'd be surprised to find what a very vulgar thing is the life of people in general, and that if you want the sensational or even the pictorial in existence, you'll have to pay for it in some compromise of principle."

"I know mamma wouldn't like to live here," said I, half sullenly.

"Oh, mamma!" cried she, with a laugh, and then suddenly checking herself: "No, Digby, you are quite right. Mamma would be shocked at our doings; not that they are so very wicked in themselves as that, to one of her quiet ways, they would seem so."

"Mamma is very good. I never knew any one like her," stammered I out.

"That's quite true, my dear boy. She is all that you say, but one may be too good, just as he may be too generous or too confiding; and it is well to remember that there are a number of excellent things one would like to be if they could afford them; but the truth is, Digby, the most costly of all things are virtues."

"Oh, do not say that!" cried I, eagerly.

"Yes, dear, I must say it. Monsieur Cleremont and I have always been very poor, and we never permitted ourselves these luxuries, any more than we kept a great house and a fine equipage, and so we economize in our morals, as in our means, doing what rich folk might call little shabbinesses; but on the whole managing to live, and not unhappily either."

"And papa?"

"Papa has a fine estate, wants for nothing, and can give himself every good quality he has a fancy for."

"By this theory, then, it is only rich people are good?"

"Not exactly. I would rather state it thus—the rich are as good as they like to be; the poor are as good as they're able."

"What do you say then to Mr. Eccles—he's not rich, and I'm sure he's good?"

"Poor Mr. Eccles!" said she, with a merry laughter, in which a something scornful mingled, and she hurried away.

CHAPTER X.

PLANNING PLEASURE.

IT was my father's pleasure to celebrate my fifteenth birthday with great splendor. The whole house was to be thrown open; and not only the house, but the conservatory and the grounds were to be illuminated. The festivities were to comprise a grand dinner and a reception afterward, which was to become a ball, as if by an impromptu.

As the society of the Villa habitually was made up of a certain number of intimates, relieved from time to time by such strangers as were presented, and as my father never dined out, or went into the fashionable world of the place, it was somewhat of a bold step at once to invite a number of persons with whom he had no more than bowing acquaintance, and to ask to his table ministers, envoys, court officials, and grand chamberlains for the first time. It was said, I know not how truthfully, that Cleremont did his utmost to dissuade him from the project at first, by disparaging the people for whom he was putting himself to such cost, and finding this line of no avail, by openly saying that what between the refusals of some, the excuses of others, and the actual absence of many whose presence he was led to expect, my father was storing up for himself an amount of disappointment and outrage that would drive him half desperate. It was not, of course, very easy to convey this to my father. It could only be done by a dropping word or a half-expressed doubt. And when the time came to make out the lists and issue the invitations, no real step had been taken to turn him from his plan.

The same rumor which ascribed to Cleremont the repute of attempting to dissuade my father from his project attributed to Madame Cleremont a most eager and warm advocacy of the intended fête. From the marked coldness and reserve, however, which subsisted between my father and her, it was too difficult to imagine in what way her influence could be exercised.

And for my own part, though I heard the list of the company canvassed every day at luncheon, and discussed at dinner, I don't remember an occasion where Madame ever uttered a word of remark, or even a suggestion in the matter. Hotham, who had come back on a short leave, was full of the scheme. With all a sailor's love of movement and bustle, he mixed himself up with every detail of it. He wrote to Paris and London for all the delicacies of the "comestible" shops. He established "estafettes" on every side to bring in fresh flowers and fruit; with his own hands he rigged out tents and marquees for the regimental bands, which were to be stationed in different parts of the grounds; and all the devices of Bengal-lights and fire-works he took into his especial charge.

Indeed, Nixon told me that his functions did not stop here, but that he had charged himself with the care of Madame Cleremont's toilet, for whom he had ordered the most splendid ball-dress Paris could produce. "Naturally, Master Digby, it is Sir Roger pays," added he; "and perhaps one of these days he'll be surprised to find that diamond loops and diamond bouquets should figure in a milliner's bill. But as she is to receive the company, of course it's all right."

"And why does Mr. Cleremont seem to dislike it all so much?" asked I.

"Chiefly, I believe, because she likes it." And then, as though he had said more than he intended, he added, "Oh, it's easy to see he likes to keep this house as much his own as he can. He doesn't want Sir Roger to have other people about him. He's almost the master here now; but if your father begins to mix with the world, and have strangers here, Cleremont's reign would soon be over."

Though there was much in this speech to suggest thought and speculation, nothing in it struck me so forcibly as the impertinence of calling Mr. Cleremont, Cleremont, and it was all I could do to suppress the rebuke that was on my lips.

"If your father comes through for a thousand pounds, Sir," continued he, "I'll say he's lucky. If Sir Roger would leave it to one person to give the orders—I don't mean myself—though by right it is my business; instead of that, there's the captain sending for this, and Cleremont for the other, and you'll see there will be enough for three entertainments when it's all over. Could you just say a word to him, Sir?"

"Not for the world, Nixon. Papa is very kind to me, and good-natured, but I'll not risk any liberty with him; and what's more, I'd be right sorry to call Mr. Cleremont, Cleremont before him, as you have done twice within the last five minutes."

"Lord bless you, Master Digby! I've known him these fifteen years. I knew him when he came out, just a boy like, to Lord Colthorpe's embassy. He and I is like pals."

"You have known me also as a boy, Nixon," said I, haughtily; "and yet, I promise you, I'll not permit you to speak of me as Norcott when I am a man."

"No fear of that, Sir, you may depend on't," said he, with humility; but there was a malicious twinkle in his eye, and a firm compression of the lip, as he withdrew, that did not leave my mind the whole day after. Indeed, I recognized that his face had assumed the self-same look of insolent familiarity it wore when he spoke of Cleremont.

The evening of that day was passed filling up the cards of invitation—a process which amused me greatly, affording, as it did, a sort of current critique on the persons whose names came up for notice, and certainly, if I were to judge of their eligibility only by what I heard of their characters, I might well feel amazed why they were singled out for attentions. They were marquises and counts, however, chevaliers of various orders, grand cordons and "hautes charges," so that their trespasses or their shortcomings had all been enacted in the world of good society, and with each other as accomplices or victims. There were a number of contingencies, too, attached to almost every name. There must be high play for the Russian envoy, flirting for the French minister's wife, iced drinks for the Americans, and scandal and Ostend oysters for every body. There was scarcely a good word for any one, and yet the most eager anxiety was expressed that they would all come. Immense precautions had been taken to fix a day when there was nothing going on at court or in the court circle. It was difficult to believe that pleasure could be planned with such heart-burning and bitterness. There was scarcely a detail that did not come associated with something that reflected on the morals or the manners of the dear friends we were entreating to honor us; and for the life of me I did not know why such pains were taken to secure the presence of people for whom none had a good wish nor a single kindly thought.

My father took very little part in the discussion; he sat there with a sort of proud indifference, as though the matter had little interest for him, and if a doubt were expressed as to the likelihood of this or that person's acceptance, he would superciliously break in with, "He'll come, Sir; I'll answer for that. I have never yet played to empty benches."

This vain and haughty speech dwelt in my mind for many a day, and showed me how my father deemed that it was not his splendid style of living, his exquisite dinners, and his choice wines that drew guests around him, but his own especial qualities as host and entertainer.

"But that it involves the bore of an audience, I'd ask the King; I could give him some Château d'Yquem very unlike his own, and such as, I'll venture to say, he never tasted," said he, affectedly.

"So you are going to bring out the purple seal?" cried Cleremont.

"I might for royalty, Sir; but not for such people as I read of in that list there."

"Why, here are two dukes with their duchesses, marquises and counts by the score, half a dozen ministers plenipotentiary, and a perfect cloud of chamberlains and court swells."

"They'd cut a great figure, I've no doubt, Hotham, on the quarter-deck of the Thunder Bomb, where you eke out the defects of a bad band with a salute from your big guns, and give your guests the national anthem when they want Champagne. Oh dear, there's no snob like a sailor!"

"Well, if they're not good enough for you, why the devil do you ask them?" cried Hotham, sturdily.

"Sir, if I were to put such a question to myself I might shut up my house to-morrow!" And with this very uncourteous speech he arose and left the room.

We continued, however, to fill in the cards of invitation and address the envelopes, but with little inclination to converse, and none whatever to refer to what had passed.

"There," cried Cleremont, as he checked off the list. "That makes very close on seven hundred. I take it I may order supper for six hundred." Then turning half fiercely to me, he added, "Do you know, youngster, that all this tomfoolery is got up for you? It is by way of celebrating your birthday we're going to turn the house out of the windows!"

"I suppose my father has that right, Sir."

"Of course he has, just as he would have the right to make a ruin of the place to-morrow if he liked it; but I don't fancy his friends would be the better pleased with him for his amiable eccentricity; your father pushes our regard for him very far sometimes."

"I'll tell him to be more cautious, Sir, in future," said I, moving toward the door.

"Do so," said he. "Good-night."

I had scarcely taken my bedroom candle when I felt a hand on my shoulder: I turned and saw Madame Cleremont standing very pale and in great agitation at my side. "Oh, Digby," said she, "don't make that man your enemy whatever you do; he is more than a match for you, poor child!" She was about to say more when we heard voices in the corridor, and she hurried away and left me.

A COUNTRY PASTOR IN NORWAY.

It has been the good fortune of the writer of the following sketch to see a good deal of the Norwegian clergy in their country homes; and as their parishes, their mode of life, their habits and tastes differ so essentially from those of our country clergy, it has occurred to him that a brief account of the same might not be without interest.

Extending over so many degrees of latitude, with such a large sea-board, and abounding with such enormous tracts of forest-land, and mountains and valleys, it will readily be seen that the life of a pastor in many of these differs materially from that in others. Thus, a description of a pastor's life in a mountainous district would by no means hold good for a parish on the western coast, where he has constantly to contend against the fierce storms of the Atlantic, while visiting some of his island flock; whereas, in the former he has, at least in winter-time, almost daily to face the snow and the ice, undertake long journeys in the piercing cold, sometimes in a sledge, but most generally on snow ski (skates). The ski are long, narrow pieces of seasoned wood, furnished with a loop in the middle of each, into which the löber, or runner, inserts his foot. By means of a pole in his hands, wherewith to guide his course, a clever runner can travel easily eight or nine miles an hour on level ground; while the velocity with which he can descend an almost perpendicular mountain-side, and the skill with which he avoids the rocks and trees in his way, against which, if he were to stumble, death would probably be the result, are wonderful to behold. It seems strange to speak of a congregation skating in this manner to church; but such is often, nay, generally, the case in winter-time, when the snow lies at an incredible depth; and, stranger still, what is also of frequent occurrence, to think of the pastor, too, skating to the house of God. I witnessed a sight one Sunday, a few years ago, which has made an ineffaceable impression on my mind. Let me try to sketch it. It was a clear bright Sunday; the thermometer degrees below zero, I fear to say how many; but so still and calm that the excessive cold was not only endurable, but positively enjoyable. I was staying with a pastor in a mountain parish, and the church was but a little distance from the parsonage-house.

"You will see a strange sight, I think, today," said my host, as we were preparing to set out to church, which was close by. There was another district church, about thirty miles off, on the other side the mountain, I should state, where duty was only held in the summer months, and that only monthly. And indeed it was a strange sight. Far off in the distance, I could discern a number of objects moving swiftly down a mountain-slope—there were about thirty or forty, as far as I could make out, in all. What they were, I could not at first conceive, but presently they again came into view, and I could see that they were men, women, and children, of all ages and sizes. It was christening Sunday, and several of the women were carrying their infants on their backs in an ingeniously contrived kind of basket, without apparently suffering any inconvenience.

In the far north, indeed, my host informed me, the Lapps, who are very skillful "runners," and punctilious in the discharge of their religious duties, bury their children in the snow outside the church, while they, the parents, attend the service. Do not start, reader! The reason is, that their cries might disturb the congregation; and it is far warmer for them underneath the snow, wrapped up in a pelts, or skin, than in the church. A trusty dog is stationed near them, to keep off the wolves, should any be prowling about in the neighborhood.

Let me now introduce the reader to a parish in Valders, in the southern part of the country. I conceal the name; but those who are as intimately acquainted with that part of Norway as I am myself may perchance recognize it from my description. Should they do so, I feel confident that its worthy pastor will not feel annoyed with me for bringing his habitat so prominently forward. It is a large parish to manage, measuring as it does twenty-five miles from one extremity to the other. It consists of a narrow valley, along the bottom of which runs the beautiful Begna River, while its sides are bounded by lofty mountains on either side. Toward its northern part the valley widens out, and the mountain-sides are not of such imposing height or steepness as in the southern part. Hereabouts live the greater number of the parishioners; and here, too, far up in the forest-tracts which cover the mountain-tops, the bear would find a safe and secure retreat were any hunter less daring and less skillful than a Valders jäger to seek him in his lair.

The parsonage-house consists, as is usually the case in Norway, of four or five detached wooden houses, each of which has its respective use. There are five churches in this parish, three of which are situated in the main valley, while the two others lie at a considerable distance off in remote mountain defiles. The two most northerly churches are not more than four miles apart; but between are lofty and rugged heights, the like of which are scarcely to be found in any other part of the land. To the other two main churches, it is respectively fifteen and twenty miles from the parsonage. Though the present pastor keeps what is termed a capellan, or curate, it is impossible that divine service can be performed in all the above churches; indeed, —— church, famous for a bear-story connected with it, only sees its pastor four or five times a year. House-to-house visitation in such a widely extended parish is, of course, an impossibility, rendered, in this case, still more impossible from the large number of souls—about seven thousand—it contains. But though this be the case, what with so many churches on his hands, and such a large parish to see after, the poor pastor and his capellan are very hard worked.

There are, I believe, fourteen fixed schools in the parish; while in the forest and mountain districts, in lonely farm-houses, in out-of-the-way parts, the education of the children is attended to by traveling teachers. The supervision of these forms one of the most arduous duties a pastor has to fulfill, especially as in Norway education is compulsory, and parents are severely punished if their children do not frequent the schools when they have arrived at the age of nine, unless, of course, bad health, insanity, or other natural causes render it an impossibility. In the fixed school, besides reading, writing, and religious instruction, the history and geography of Norway, and arithmetic, are taught. Each spring the pastor has to inspect every school in his parish, and to satisfy himself, after a strict examination of the scholars, that the teachers have fulfilled their duties duly.

During the winter months his time is occupied by preparing candidates for confirmation; for confirmation is, or rather till recently was, compulsory in every member of the Norwegian Church. The candidates are obliged to attend twice a week, for three or four hours at a time, to receive instruction, either at the parsonage-house or at some other convenient place. The education of the poorer classes is free; while that of the better classes costs but a trifling sum, as the schoolmasters' salaries, etc., are defrayed by an "education-tax."

When the pastor went to preach in the two distant churches of his parish he always left home on the Saturday afternoon, seldom returning till the following Tuesday or Wednesday, so as to give himself time for visiting any sick parishioners. In addition to his spiritual duties, a Norwegian pastor must also be something of a doctor, for medical men in country districts are few and far between. My host never went any where without his medicine-chest; while his wife's time was not a little occupied in administering to the wants of the sick nearer home.

Whatever time the pastor may have over after having discharged the above-described duties, he usually devotes to the management of his farm, which he generally prefers to retain in his own hands instead of letting it. My friend's farm happened to be rather a small one in comparison to the size of his parish.

And now as regards the diversions and amusements of a country pastor's life. Naturally, in a fjeld or mountain parish, far away from any town, and shut out from intercourse with educated people, these must needs be few and simple in their nature. Still, in the summer months, there are visits to make and receive; acquaintances from Christiania dropping in, in order to enjoy some of the fine shooting and fishing with which Valders abounds. Winter is the trying time. Not only do the wildness of the scene and the monotony of the snow-covered earth have a depressing effect upon the frame, but social intercourse becomes rarer, visits more seldom, and every one thinks of keeping the cold out, rather than of pleasure-making; and yet the winter evenings are by no means devoid of pleasure. In a country parsonage-house the time is occupied partly in reading aloud, in studying, in music, etc., and last, but not least, in enjoying supper, that happy meal; after which, maybe, a rubber of whist and a pipe, and then to bed beneath a quilt of eider-down.

Need I say that post-day is always considered a red-letter day in a country parsonage-house?

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

We may expect the height of the skating season about the time of Christmas and New-Year's. To be sure heavy snow-storms may again interfere, and pleasure-loving New York be obliged to solace itself with the merry jingling of sleigh-bells; yet every body who knows by experience the fascinations of skating longs for the snapping cold days in which the Old Year usually steps shiveringly out and the bright New Year comes dancing in.

The Central Park Commissioners can not make ice, but they have given Jack Frost every opportunity to exercise his skill to the uttermost. And when he has done his best they will do their best to keep the ponds in good skating condition—a matter of no little care and expense. Winter houses for refreshment and rest have been erected near the Park ponds, as in former seasons; and with every cold snap there will be a rush Park-ward. A novelty for New Yorkers this season is the Empire Skating Rink, on Third Avenue and Sixty-third Street; and it will doubtless be a very good substitute for some of the private ponds in the upper part of the city, which have been fashionably patronized in seasons past, but are now overrun with brick and mortar. This new rink is 170 feet wide and 350 feet long. The inclosed shallow lake of water is 126 feet in width and 290 in length. Between six and seven hundred gas jets illuminate the interior; there is a gallery for a band of music, and comfortable seats for spectators; moreover, there are plenty of refreshment rooms. This skating rink is said to be the largest and most perfect building of the kind in the country. A similar one is now being constructed in Philadelphia; also, an immense rink will be finished in Brooklyn about Christmas. It is 124 feet by 200, and will have an ice surface of something like 90 by 170 feet. There is, moreover, a new rink in Jersey City. With these additional accommodations for skating the youthful lovers of this exhilarating amusement will probably enjoy more this season than ever before.

The design of the New England Christian Temperance Convention, which was recently held in Boston, was to create a deeper interest in the temperance question among the people and in the churches, and to show how the moral and religious circles of New England in general, and Massachusetts in particular, looked upon the subject in point of law. All but one member of the Convention—which was composed of about three hundred gentlemen, mostly ministers—was in full sympathy with the total abstinence and prohibitory liquor law party.

According to the report of the special Commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to examine the Union Pacific Railroad, they are of opinion that, taken as a whole, it has been well constructed, and the general route exceedingly well selected.

The whole number of dead letters received at the Dead-Letter Office during the year which ended June 30 was 4,162,144; 1,736,867 of these were found to be either not susceptible of being returned or of no importance, and were destroyed; about 333,000 more were destroyed after an effort to return them. The remainder were classified and returned to the owners as far as practicable. The whole number sent from the office was 2,258,199, of which about 84 per cent. were delivered to owners; 18,340 letters contained $95,169 52, in sums of $1 and upward, of which 16,061 letters, containing $86,638 66, were delivered to owners; 14,082 contained $3436 68 in sums of less than $1, of which 12,518, containing $3120 70, were delivered to owners; 17,750 contained drafts, deeds, and other papers of value, representing the value of $3,609,271 80; of these 16,809 were restored to the owners; 13,064 contained books, jewelry, and other articles of property, of the estimated value of $8500; of these 11,489 were forwarded for delivery, and 9911 were delivered to their owners; 125,221 contained articles of small value, of which 114,666 were delivered to owners; 58,387 letters received at the office were misdirected, and 1598 had no direction whatever. The amount of money taken from all dead-letters undelivered since last report, and deposited in the United States Treasury, was $27,967 71. The amount realized from sales of waste paper, and deposited, was $1280 42.

A school has been founded in Charleston, South Carolina, under the name of the "Shaw Free School," for the education of colored youth. The money, which was contributed by the colored troops of South Carolina to erect a monument to the memory of Colonel Robert G. Shaw, who was killed in the assault at Fort Wagner, has been, after deliberation, appropriated to this object. The building is occupied by a flourishing school of nearly five hundred pupils, with eight or nine teachers.

An unprecedented case has been brought up in an English court. A petition was presented to dissolve an injunction granted two years ago under peculiar circumstances. A ward of the court, fifteen years of age, entitled to property yielding an annual income of about £130, married his governess, aged twenty-five years, and after a private hearing of the case the court granted an injunction to prevent them living together until the youth could gain his own livelihood, and ordered him to be apprenticed to a farmer. The parties were married upon misrepresentation as to their ages, but the Divorce Court had since held that the marriage was valid. The court expressed the opinion that it could not be for the interest of a boy of seventeen, without the means of subsistence, to live with his wife, and held it to be the duty of the court to protect its ward. The question was held for further consideration.

Perhaps no more remarkable verdict was ever rendered in a criminal cause than in the case of General George W. Cole, recently tried for the murder of Mr. L. H. Hiscock. The jury found the prisoner to be perfectly sane a moment before the murder and also a moment after, but were in doubt about his condition at the moment of firing his pistol. Under these circumstances the Judge directed them to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, and they accordingly brought in a verdict of acquittal. There is an old proverb, Ira furor brevis est; this was doubtless one of the maxims in the legal code upon which the jury based their decision.

One of the boldest operations known to surgery was recently performed by Dr. Carnochan, of this city, by which a tumor weighing sixty-four pounds was removed from the abdomen of a young woman. The subject of this skillful operation is now in the enjoyment of health and comfort.

A new method of preserving wood has lately been patented, and its application will evidently form a new era in wood manufacture; for, in addition to the preservative qualities engendered, it insures the wood against cracking, shrinking, warping, or chipping, and renders it far less liable to break than in the original state. The wood is permeated by the vapors produced from coal-tar, subjected to increasing degrees of heat, which drives out all moisture, condenses the wood, and protects it completely against atmospheric moisture. It is believed that this process will be very useful when applied to wood exposed to the action of water or earth.

Every body thinks, or wants to think, that he lives in the biggest place.

"You must confess," remarked a New York to a Chicago merchant, as they were discussing the merits of their respective cities, "that New York is the metropolis of the country." "Yes," replied the man of the West; "New York is a right smart place for business. New York is the Chicago of the East." Another Westerner gave it as his opinion "that New York was too far from Indianapolis ever to be much of a place." Which reminds us of the remark made by a rough farmer who lived at the foot of a high mountain in Maine, miles away from any neighbors. A young man from New York roaming about on a fishing tramp stumbled upon the farmer's lonely house. They entered into conversation, and learning that his guest was from New York, the worthy man exclaimed, in unfeigned surprise: "Well, now, how can you stand it to live so far away from folks?"

There was a time when women and children were scarce in San Francisco. They were then appreciated. According to the Westminster Review, a woman once took her infant to a theatre in San Francisco, and just as the orchestra began to play the child began to cry. A man in the pit cried out, "Stop those fiddles and let the baby cry. I haven't heard such a sound for ten years!" The audience applauded this sentiment; the orchestra stopped, and the baby continued its performance amidst unbounded enthusiasm.

THE HOLY FAMILY.—[FROM A PAINTING BY RIBERA SPAGNOLETTO.]

THE INDIAN CAMPAIGN—PRISONERS CAPTURED BY GENERAL CUSTER.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 836.]

INDIAN PRISONERS TAKEN BY CUSTER.

ON engraving on page 825 illustrates a peculiar feature of SHERIDAN'S plan of Indian warfare. His object is to break up the nomadic habits and to destroy the irregular settlements of the hostile Indians. He finds them as at Black Kettle's village out of their proper place; he pounces upon them, shows his power by a physical conquest, breaks up their villages and lodges; but after that comes the most important and most difficult portion of his work: he has to bag the whole parcel of vampished savages and bear them off—the warriors, the aged, and the young—to their proper reservation. And there the Indian must remain, understanding that if again found wandering he must suffer the severest penalties of martial law.

The action of Congress in transferring the entire management of Indian affairs to the War Department will very materially facilitate General SHERIDAN'S operations. The Department of the Interior has made a sad bungle of this Indian matter; its immense patronage has introduced corruption and almost criminal negligence and thus Indian agencies as well as the Indians themselves have become demoralized. The new arrangement will make it possible to reduce the Indians to their proper position in relation to the Government; it will make economy possible for the first time in many years; and it will bring peace to our borders through the stern lessons of war—the only lessons which savages can appreciate.

Our illustration shows the method adopted in transferring Indian prisoners to their reservations. The children and women and papooses are tied to ponies, as represented in the cut, while the hardy young Indians perform the tedious journey through the snow on foot.

WRAITH-HAUNTED.

"YES, Helen?"

The speaker, a tall, elegant woman, in whose every lineament beauty yet lingered as if loth to accept from Time the sad decree years were to quit, looked up interrogatively at her niece, a blooming matron, busy writing invitations for a juvenile party.

"I did not speak, aunt."

"Did you not? Nor you, Mr. Birley?"

Mr. Birley, addressed in his evening paper, looked up somewhat vaguely.

"Eh, what?"

"Did you call me?"

"What, I? Certainly not.

"Strange!" murmured Mrs. Carson, involuntarily glancing at the ormolu time-piece ere her eyes bent down once more on her interrupted sewing. The fingers pointed to ten minutes before nine.

Click, click, went her needle steadily through the seam; Mrs. Birley's pen made a faint sound as it traced the pink paper; and Mr. Birley studied the "share-list" and "markets" with more than ordinary assiduity. A spaniel coiled up on the hearth dozed in a dog's paradise, in the glow of a ruddy fire, which lit up every corner of the cosy room, and was reflected cheerfully by glass, gilding, and polished furniture.

Presently Mrs. Carson's head was raised again.

"Will I said she, glancing alternately from niece to nephew.

"What?" questioned both in a breath.

"One of you spoke this time—I heard my name distinctly."

"Indeed, Aunt Marianne, I have not uttered a syllable; I have never lifted my eyes from my desk since you addressed me last."

"Nor I from my newspaper, Mrs. Carson," continued the gentleman. "Dash it, something sounded melodiously—possibly you mistook his utterance for mine. Not very complimentary if you did, I must say."

"Indeed I did not," returned she, with more emphasis than the occasion seemed to warrant. "I certainly heard myself called by my Christian name."

"Nonsense, aunt, I am sure no one spoke. You must be dreaming."

Again Mrs. Carson's eyes sought the time piece on the mantle-shelf: the index had advanced five minutes.

"Maybe so; old people do dream sometimes," replied she, quietly, resuming her work with a sigh as if to change the subject.

With a light laugh Mrs. Birley sought his foot paragraph.

Had either husband or wife cared to listen there might have been heard a beating and keeping time with the sharp click of the needle and the steady tick of the time-piece. But there was no such listener, and she, seemingly occupied with her needle-work, sat with lips apart and head bent in rapt expectancy.

The bell struck five warning. With the first stroke of nine her work dropped; she grasped the arms of her chair and rose. Her face was bloodless and her brown eyes were wild and wandering. For some moments she stood thus, then with a groan sank nerveless in her seat.

Her companions, alarmed, were by her side in an instant.

"My dear aunt, what is the matter?"

"Are you ill, Mrs. Carson?" and Mr. Birley as he spoke made a movement toward the bell.

She did not, recovering, arrested his hand.

"Are you sure neither of you spoke to me?"

"Quite sure," was the simultaneous reply.

"Do you think any of the children called me?"

"Why, Aunt Marianne, what are you thinking of?—the children have been in bed two hours."

"Did neither of you hear any thing?"

"I heard nothing."

"Nor I, save the scratching of my own pen and the rustle of James's paper."

Mrs. Carson looked from one to the other as if incredulity struggled with a foregone conclusion; then in answer to their inquiries, said, seriously, "I distinctly heard my own name, Marianne," ended thrice, with an interval of five minutes between each call, although I saw nothing!"

"Now nothing! Why, what did you expect to see?" asked Helen, much perplexed.

"Ghosts!" answered Mrs. Birley between his teeth as he resumed his seat and study.

"What I expected to see is not easy to say; but I heard a voice I have not heard for thirty-five years. It is a solemn warning."

"Of what, aunt?"

"Of death!" was the low and measured response.

Mr. Birley laughed outright; his wife fidgeted, nervously.

"James," said the old lady, "I know you think me a superstitious old fool, and my laughing aunt; and she drew her chair to the fire, and with a gesture and grimace meant to call her spouse to order, still.

"Well, aunt, we are listening."

"Well, Helen, I suppose you know, if James does not, that when your grandfather died on his business in the many years his own travelling; and as there were no railroads, few stagecoaches, and those only main roads, he used to travel with a horse and gig. On one of his journeys he met at a road-side inn a Mr. Lavery, from Bristol, likewise travelling on his own account, although in a different line.

"The two had met before on the road, but on that occasion he found Mr. Lavery ill in bed, ailing, but crippled by rheumatism. The women of those days were of a different type from the present generation, and your grandmother was not only an excellent nurse, but possessed a valuable specific for rheumatism; so, being a man of impulse, she insisted on his own accounce his return—for a letter would have been longer on the road than himself—my father brought Mr. Lavery home, and by blankets, to his own house, and placed him under my mother's care. For months the patient remained an invalid guest, tended by my mother, his wife being sent for after a while.

"Out of these services rendered and accepted grew a very certain friendship, one of which was Mrs. Lavery's declared inability to dispense with the society of one or other of the Misses Benton. In consequence, Mrs. Lavery visits generally extending over many months.

"I was about two-and-twenty when my last visit to Bristol was made, and I have no say so now without vanity—I was known as the beautiful Miss Denton; perhaps one reason why Mrs. Lavery was asked to have me with her. Fond of dress and company herself, she was glad to have an attractive companion, and introduced me into many her social circle which my mother had thought well for her daughters.

"I had been in Bristol nearly nine months, when the first of those strange occurrences which have marked my life stamped its indelible impress on my soul and memory.

"Mr. Lavery, a widower, Mrs. Lavery and myself had been to a card-party, which, as was customary in those days, broke up early—by o'clock. Mr. Lavery had been music as well as cards, and I having then a very fine voice—

"Then? You had a fine voice when I knew you first, twelve years ago," interrupted Mr. Birley.

"Well, James, perhaps so; but I had a good voice then, and naturally was pressed to exercise it. One of the guests, Mr. Carson, whom I saw that night for the first time, appeared to admire it more than any one else; he seemed literally entranced by my singing, and whispered as much to me as he handed me to my sedan chair when we left.

"Neither admiration nor adulation was new to me, yet at the one compliment from the young Scotchman I flushed with a strange pleasure such as no flattery had ever called up before. The words lingered in my ear, and my fancy had carried home; even his peculiar intonation had an unvoiced fascination for me: and, indeed, there was something romantic in the idle dwelling upon those incidents of the evening in which the handsome Mr. Carson had the most prominent part. Mrs. Lavery's chair and Mr. Lavery's remarks somewhat at random, and went to bed with this stranger's parting words floating through my mind as a refrain.

"I mention this, my dears, merely to show that there was no possible link of connection between my thoughts and this which followed.

"The bed assigned to me was an old-fashioned four-post, with heavy moreen curtains and full valances, the curtains reaching within two feet of which ran upon iron rods. Mrs. Lavery, in her husband's absence, always slept with me.

"I had been asleep some time when I suddenly awakened with a start, hearing myself called. I sat up in the bed apprehensive. The curtains at the foot were slowly undrawn, the rings jingling as they slipped over the iron rods, and there in the aperture, distinctly visible in the frosty moonlight, stood the form of my mother in her night-robes. She was thin and ghastly white; but a smile of ineffable sweetness parted her wan lips, from which issued slowly the words, 'Marianne, Marianne, Marianne!' Raising her hand as if in benediction, she melted away, as it were, into the moonbeams.

"Terror for the moment held me fast. When I recovered my self-possession I roused my bedfellow. She had seen nothing, heard nothing, and was therefore skeptical. In vain she strove, like you, to persuade me I had been dreaming; the still open curtains refuted that, for she recollected closing them with her own hand as she got into bed. She then suggested that the maid had played me a trick; but we found the door locked, with the key inside, as we had left it.

"'It is, Mrs. Lavery!' I moaned, in an agony of apprehension, 'something is wrong at home—my mother is either ill or in trouble, perhaps dying, and wants me. Oh that I had never left her!'

"Now do, my dear child, go to sleep; you have had the nightmare, that is all. It is not much more than a week since you heard from home; and you know,' said Mrs. Lavery, trying to soothe my distress.

"Oh, that was ten days ago!' I argued. 'It is a foreign letter that I expect we written. What may not have happened since then! I must go home at once.'

"There was no response from my friend: sleep had overpowered her sympathy. Neither my terror nor distress had fully roused her.

"For me sleep was gone—sleep that night. I sat up shivering in bed until the piercing cold compelled me to lie down. I watched the sun's early curtains of the retreating moonbeams as they marked on the wall the passage of the silent hours; but although my mother's pale face and anguished voice, in memory, the actual presence came no more.

"Night shadows linger long in December, and I was afraid to rise until daylight, but the first streak of dawn found me attic collecting my scattered possessions; and by nine Mrs. Lavery and I had almost completed my packing, for I had determined to go home, and knew that the 'Royal Mail' coach would start that very day for Manchester, and if I missed it I must wait three days for another.

"Mrs. Lavery's astonishment is not describable; the episode of the night had left no impression on her sleep-bound faculties. She tried reliance, persuasion, even ridicule—now to abandon my journey, the offspring of a dream.'

"Foolish woman, the superstitious Scotch peasant called her, received a letter for Miss Denton, and a shilling to pay!' in a voice which penetrated to the breakfast-table, and my trembling fingers refused to unclasp my purse or break the seal, which, however, was not black.

"Well I remember the tenor of that letter. It told that during my father's absence from home some rollicking fellow, with that in his head which was not wine, had knocked loudly at our door in the middle of the night, when all were asleep, and then run off. My mother, always a light sleeper, had come down under the impression that her grandfather had returned unexpectedly, and in her hurry to reach the door before he, in his drunken impatience, should knock a second time, caught her foot in the coverlet, and fell heavily against a carved oak coffer. She was found in the morning with her left collar-bone broken. The fracture was reduced, but she never fairly rallied, and I was summoned home, for my mother was alarming.

"We were yet discussing these sad tidings when Mr. Carson was announced. He called, he said, not to intrude after our health, but to offer his services in conveying either message or package to my friends in Manchester, whither he was then going, and would not settle. Heleen; it was a common practice at that time to burden travelers with friendly letters and parcels, to insure delivery at the journey's end because quite a tax.)

"You have come quite opportunely, Mr. Carson,' said Mrs. Lavery, briskly: 'you will relieve me from a sore dilemma. Miss Denton's mother having met with a severe injury, our young friend is summoned home hastily. She has never traveled alone in her life, and I was debating how I could trust her so far without a protector. Now I can make the change? I know I can rely upon your care.'

"I saw a flush of pleasure light up his clear eye and heightened color as he answered earnestly, 'If Miss Denton will graciously accept my humble services I shall only be too proud of the trust.'

"In my eagerness to depart I had lost sight of the dangers and discomforts of the long journey of two hundred miles; but the picture drawn by Mrs. Lavery to deter me from quitting Bristol, as she then thought, needlessly, had made me apprehensive something fearful. I care was no disguising my satisfaction when a protector offered himself so unexpectedly; and if I thanked him quietly I felt my heart so sufficiently.

"Mr. Carson's place had been booked the day before—outside. He hastened to the coach-office to secure an inside one for me, and to transfer his own. A fruitless errand; every inside place was already secured. There only remained the hope that some outside passenger would surrender his inside seat in favor of a lady.

"A vain hope. The 'insides' were all long-distance passengers, a man resented any infringement on the right of 'number one,' expressing their personal opinions more freely than courteously.

"Mr. Carson,' I whispered, 'do not let there be any altercation on my account (he was waving warm). 'I should dread being penned up with those coarse men for two days; I would much rather sit outside with you.'

"An incautious speech, but the grateful look which answered it sent my blood tingling with very shame to my finger-ends. He answered, soberly, 'I do prefer the outside in all seasons; but, then, I am hardy. You are not fitted to brave the inclemency of a midwinter frost. Only the urgency of life and death should tempt you to make the experiment.'

"'It is the urgency of life and death,' I answered. 'But I am not afraid of a little cold; my pelisse is warm, and my fur tippet protects my chest.'

"I bade my weeping friend 'good-by.' With out another word Mr. Carson assisted me to mount the movable ladder to a seat at the back, which held two, and fronted the guard's solitary post. And then a messenger, dispatched by Mrs. Lavery, came up laden with a rug and shawl.

"With much care Mr. Carson tucked the rug beneath my feet, and adjusted the shawl around my knees. I felt at once that I was in good hands, though, in my ignorance, I considered the precaution unnecessary.

"The leaders' heads were released, the coachman cracked his long whip, the guard blew his horn, a final 'adieu' was said, and I had started on the most momentous journey of my life.

"Right joyfully that my emotions were not less deep because they did no more than well up into my eyes, my new protector entered into a conversation with the guard to divert his attention, and left me to my meditations. Sombre enough they were. I could not quit my kind friend without regret; but what weighed heaviest on my heart was the presentiment that my mother was dead, and that I had seen her passing spirit. She seemed so powerful and present to my thoughts as one by one the mile-stones were left behind on the turnpike-road, and, notwithstanding my wrapping-up, I began to feel it bitterly.

"I need not worry you with the details of that long and miserable journey, only rendered endurable by the unremitting attention I was the object, for such in truth he was. Not only the scenery, but the weather and temperature varied with the districts through which we rode. The third night, black frost we passed to a region where snow lay thick on the distant hills, like a shroud on a dead giant, and the coach-lamps here and there by the road-side, or on the trees which tossed their skeleton arms in the breeze and played at snow-ball with us as the coach swept past. From falling snow we made an advance under a canopy of weeping clouds—first a drizzle, then a pattering, pelting rain, which ceased not without intermission—rain which would have penetrated a plank.

"No wonder, then, that notwithstanding the plaid which Mr. Carson had stripped from himself to fold round me during the chill of the first evening (since then a substitute, when he left, a horse-rug obtained from an hostler at a fabulous price)—no wonder, I say, that several hours before we reached our destination I was drenched to the skin and utterly worn out both in body and mind.

"When the steaming horses drew the miry coach up before the Bridgewater Arms I had lain for some time in a state of insensibility on Mr. Carson's shoulder, utterly unconscious of his supporting arm, or of the anathemas vented by the sympathizing guard on the sinful 'insides,' whose selfish love of comfort could not be done.

"Uncle Bancroft was fortunately in waiting, for I had to be lifted from the coach-top, and, being unable to stand, I must be carried and benumbed to render further assistance. Brandy was poured down my throat, and I was put to bed, where, after a while, I was found I was conveyed, not to my father's house, but to my uncle's, Mr. Carson never leaving me until I was safe under the roof of my friends and showed some signs of returning amination.

"My shoes, stockings, and upper garments, sodden and saturated, had to be cut from my swollen limbs; but of this I knew nothing, for a fever had supervened during the coach-journey.

"Every attention were given to my first inquiries for my mother, as I was too weak to bear the truth; but when I approached convalescence I told my story thing. She was dead when I commenced my journey—had died on the 23d of December, close upon midnight, the hour I saw her in my dream.

"Helen, there could be no question that my mother's purified spirit had kept my solemn tryst. The impression made was theneforth ineffaceable.

"The coincidence was certainly remarkable,' said Mr. Birley; 'still, I incline to think the whole a dream.

"Then see something very awful about it, even if it was a dream, you must own that, James,' put in his wife.

"It was a dream; but my next revelation took place in broad daylight—that could be no dream,' said Mrs. Carson, sadly. "I have called my journey 'momentous,' and I still influenced my life. My friend, in his care for me, had sacrificed himself. Hardy as he was, inflammation laid her hand upon my chest, and, bind down, and only let him rise with a spot marked like a target for the shaft of death. Gratitude and pity rose to heart and when I first saw his altered face. That journey had indeed traced two souls into one. Whatever impressions could I have received, he made my sufferings and his self-sacrifice had confirmed. What I had found him during our long and miserable ride I found him still more; but there was no doubt whither we were drifting. Every moment he could spare from business was spent with me; and it was principally on my account that he induced his uncle in Glasgow, a muslin manufacturer, to engage a traveler and give him a permanent agency in Manchester, opening a warehouse for the sale of their goods.

"Shortly after that I became his wife, with the full approbation of friends, and with every prospect of happiness. He had furnished for me, simply but well, a house in Hanover Street, then a thorough Scotch colony, and my father's house being in Cannon Street, I was not more than a quarter of a mile from home. As was then the custom, we were married on Sunday, it being likewise my birthday, the 21st of December, and at once took possession of our new abode.

"The twenty-third was signalled by one of the fiercest conflagrations Manchester had known for years. A cotton-mill at Ancoats had taken fire while the hands were being dismissed. Some were in the upper stories at the time; the only low staircase was crowded, and many lives were in danger. Attracted by the glare, Mr. Carson was quickly on the spot, forgetful of all but the duty before him, and to his heroic efforts three girls at least owed their lives. They came to thank him a week later. Alas! where was he? His hair was singed, and so was his coat, from which the tails were dangling loose; he had become wetted through and through with perspiration and water from the engine, but he waited until all danger to others was over, and when he reached home his clothes were apparently dry. He kissed me, apologized for keeping me waiting tea, and sat down to describe the incidents of the fire. Of his own exploits he said little; but on the plea of fatigue excused his sitting down to tea in the plight he then was. After the meal he had retired, which I attributed to his recent exertions and the heat of our own fire. It was only on going to rouse him that I discovered his absence had been wetted, and I was too inexperienced to calculate the consequences.

"The following day I had promised to spend with my father and sisters. William was to join me on closing the warehouse. Being a bride I was of course an object of special attention, made more of by my relations than at any other period of my life. I found there a perfect levee of aunts and cousins discussing the bride's cake and future prospects with equal freedom. In the midst of our lively chat time fled fast. There came a sharp rat-tat-tat at the street door.

"Why, that is William's knock; what brings him from the warehouse so early?' I exclaimed I, running to anticipate the servant in opening the door. Without another word than 'Marianne, strangely spoken, he passed me by, never stopping to kiss me, as was his wont.

"I confess he had spoiled me. I pouted, petulant tears welled to my eyes, and I lingered with the fastening of the door before I turned round.

"'Marianne!'

"He was calling me from behind. I dropped the latch and followed him, as I thought, into the room I had just quitted.

"'Where is William?' I asked, looking round but not seeing him.

"'He has not come in here.'

"'Marianne!'

"The voice seemed to come from the room on the opposite side the hall. I ran thither, anticipating the loving embrace he was too reserved to give before strangers.

"He was not there.

"'William, dear, where are you? Don't hide from me!'

"There was no answer. I ran into the back-parlors, up stairs, down stairs, calling his name. He was nowhere to be seen.

"By this time the house was in commotion. Sisters and cousins alike had heard the knock, but no one had seen my husband or heard his voice.

"As they looked from me to one another for an explanation of that which is inexplicable, I having protested that Mr. Carson had entered and spoken to me in the hall, a sudden light flashed over and appalled me. I remembered seeing the bolt passed through its keeper! With a startling shriek I rushed bareheaded from the house, tore across Cannon Street, along Sugar Lane, and up Shude Hill like a mad-woman, nor paused till my grasp was on the handle of my own door.

"That was mine. A bad omen. I found my beloved husband extended on our bed, a doctor by his side vainly trying to bleed him—the blood would not flow.

"Inflammation—the result, no doubt, of his overnight's wetting and fatigue—had seized him suddenly.

"On his way home he had called on his doctor, who never left him again in life.

"Before night fell on the earth, the night of Death had fallen on my idolized husband, and my soul was in eclipse.

"Maid, wife, widow in a week, a widow all unconscious of her widowhood. A dumb, dreamy statuesque automaton. I lived and moved, but that was all.

"I was taken home. When the funeral was over, the house in Hanover Street was given up. I was incapable of managing it.

"In this state I remained until my boy was born. Then the ice at my heart thawed, and tears came to my relief. The babe lived and I lived for him.

"How I idolized that boy! I watched him night and day with more than a mother's care. He grew up a fine strong youth, the image of his dead father, whose name he bore. His father's uncle would have taken the entire charge of him, but I would not part from Willie; so we were summoned to Glasgow together, and there lived until the death of old Mr. Carson, when Willie was sixteen. The old gentleman left considerable property behind him, much of which was bequeathed to my son.

"Having no ties in Scotland, I came back to the old home, from which two of my sisters had gone away to homes of their own.

"Between myself and his grandfather Willie stood a fair chance of being spoiled. He grew a tall athletic man, not over-fond of business or study, but much given to all manly sports and pastimes; in which he was encouraged by his grandfather. As for me, I saw no harm in his pursuits, and never dreamed of danger.

"Willie had a friend close by with whom he often put on the gloves, or practiced fencing and single-stick.

"One day, toward the close of the year—my sorrows have always come in the midst of others' rejoicing—I sat reading by the fire; my father was playing his favorite game of backgammon with my sister Sarah; you, then a child of three years, sat nursing a kitten at your mother's feet; she had brought you to spend Christmas with us.

"'My father, I must tell you, had then given up business, and our garret was filled with old lumber from the warehouse, several open baskets of 'wisket containing waste 'cops,' 'spindles,' and other refuse among the rest.

"Our quiet was broken, and the rattling dice deserted by a loud clash and clatter up stairs.

"'Some one has left that garret-window open again, and the cats are making fine havoc with those cops, I know by how they rattle!'

"'Go up stairs, Sally, and shut the window,' said my father, pausing in his game.

"Sarah went. All was still.

"'The window is fast enough, and I saw no cats,' said she, as she sat down again to the table.

"Again the clash and clatter, as of metal, clear and distinct.

"'Hush, do you go up. Take my stick, and rout the intruders out; I'd swear the cats are there.'

"Your mother went, and came back with the same report—nothing there; all silent.

"Again the self-same clash and clatter, louder than before. I, haunted by old memories, felt my heart sink.

"'Here, Marianne, lass, lend me thy arm; thou and I will go up and see what all this din's about; but don't thou look so scared.'

"We mounted the first flight, he leaning on my arm. All at once he stood still, and cursed.

"'Mother, mother, mother!' came floating like a breath down the stairway; and while we paused to listen—for my ear had heard it also—the figure of Willie brushed past us, with one hand pressed upon his heart.

"I trembled and grew faint. I had seen the balustrades through the form.

"My father chuckled outright. 'Ah, the young dog is! It was Willie playing tricks upon us, after all.'

"I said nothing until I reached the parlor. As I rightly conjectured, no Willie was there.

"'Father,' said I, clasping my hands in anguish, 'that was not Willie. It was his wraith. I have seen his double-branched all my life.'

"My father looked dazed. My sisters, perhaps with a good motive, rallied me on my fears; his superstition, much as you have done; but ere their laughter had well subsided, there was an imperious knock at the street door.

"We were summoned to our neighbor, Mr. Neale's; an accident had befallen my son.

"He lay on a couch pale and bleeding, wounded in the chest, the room in disorder, foils upon the floor. He had barely strength left to press my hand and say: 'Mother, I did not mean it; I could not help it—the button came off his foil. Mother, forgive—' and I was childless.

"I was present at the close of the inquest, for there was another long blank in my memory; and during my mental oblivion your grandfather died, broken down by the double sorrow.

"You see, I have good reasons for saying I am wraith-haunted, and for knowing that the voice I heard to-night is a call from the spirit-world to me."

Mr. Birley and his wife both looked perplexed and startled.

"I do remember something about a ghost in grandfather's garret when I was a very little girl, but how he it I was never told of the 'warnings' you think you have had?"

"They were hushed up lest my grief should be reawakened. And now let us talk of Willie's lute. The issues of life and death are in higher hands than ours."

The morning broke—clear, sparkling, exhilarating. Mrs. Carson made her appearance in her ordinary health, a little paler, it might be, but that was all.

Mrs. Birley had hesitated whether to issue her invitations, but finally resolved not to disappoint her children, and so they were sent.

The nursery-doors were thrown open, and all hands, big and little, summoned to the task of decoration with evergreens and holly.

In the midst of it all a carrier brought a large box inscribed, "Aunt Carson's Gift." The old lady had made her purchases the day before. There was a general rush to wrench open the lid, and make a raid on the contents. Books, dolls, work-boxes, a desk, toys, sugar and nosegays were there, each labeled with the fortunate recipient's name. Blushed and elated, the youngsters pushed hither and thither displaying their prizes. Frocks and pinafores filled to repletion dropped their contents, until the little ones might be tracked by straggling Sheims and Noahs, cups and saucers, whistles and drum-sticks.

The box had been removed, the litter cleared away, the stray waifs collected, when Mrs. Carson descended the stairs after her customary nap.

A wee round toy, the color of the stair-carpet, had been overlooked. She stepped upon it, and fell from top to bottom, striking her head against the balustrades.

There was a rush through the house to where she lay stunned on the oil-cloth. Reverently and sadly she was carried into the nearest room—the one occupied overnight. A messenger was sent on horseback for a surgeon and for Mr. Birley.

Shocked beyond measure, the latter gentleman hastened home in time to hear the fiat pronounced:

"An injured spine—concussion of the brain—no hope whatever."

A physician summoned hastily confirmed the surgeon's decision.

The weeping children were huddled from the room.

"How long may she linger?" was Mr. Birley's question.

"She may go off any moment, the shock to her system is so great; she may last two or three hours."

"Do you think she is conscious?"

"I am afraid not."

Mrs. Birley, sobbing, whispered her husband:

"James, do you think aunt did hear any thing supernatural last night?"

Two days before he would have said, "Ah, bah!" now he answered, "God only knows! It is most mysterious."

"If she did, she will not die until nine o'clock."

"Ah me!" murmured the dying woman; "at nine."

She was evidently conscious, and something more she said, but the words were inaudible. Husband and wife watched the clock as intensely as Mrs. Carson had watched the night before.

Ten minutes to nine! The retreating pulse quickened under the doctor's touch. The lips moved.

"William!" was faintly audible to the bent ear.

Five minutes to nine! The "change" was perceptible.

"Yes, William!"

There was another pause—a burr—the clock's note of warning. There was a rattle in the throat of the dying woman.

"Coming, William!" was gasped out audibly. NINE!

A last leap of the pulse—a last flicker of the eyelids—the "call" was obeyed.

Mrs. Carson, wraith-haunted, spirit-summoned, was of the dead!

THE GAME-STALL, FULTON MARKET.

THE sales at this stall are entirely of game and poultry, and amount to half a million of dollars per annum. It is the most enterprising and most perfect establishment of the kind in this country. In variety it is inexhaustible, including venison, duck, partridge, quail, woodcock, snipe, hare, and in fact every thing which is sought after by the most fastidious connoisseurs. It has long become the resort of our most aristocratic citizens. We give an illustration on page 829, representing the appearance which the stall presents at the season immediately preceding Christmas.

The poultry for sale here comes chiefly from Bucks County, Pennsylvania; later in the season the turkeys are sent frozen from Vermont. The receipts by shipment from all parts of the country average on an average to about four tons per day. But before Thanksgiving and Christmas it is increased to about six tons. The proportion of wild fowl are the largest dealers in this country, and they occasionally make shipments to Europe.

Squigglus is a little forgetful sometimes. He counted his brood the other night, but could only make fourteen. "How is this?" he asked his wife. "I thought there were fifteen of them at the last census." "So there were," answered the wife; "but little Sarguny was drowned since then."

"Robert!" said Squigglus, meditatively; "why, it seems to me I heard of that at the time."

A transcendental preacher took for his text, "Feed my lambs." A plain farmer very quaintly remarked to him, on coming out of the church: "A very good text, Sir; but you should take care not to put the hay so high in the rack that the lambs can't reach it!"

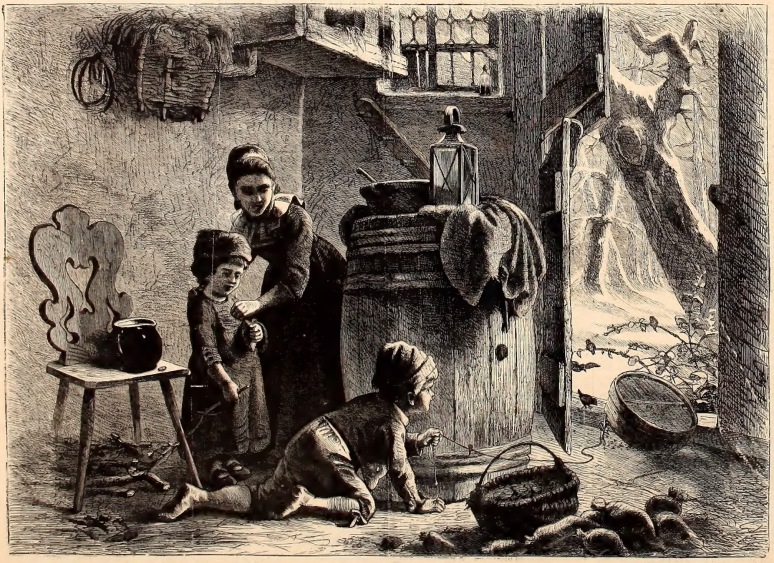
"A cucumber, my beloved Georgiana," replied the matron, with a bland smile of approbation at her darling's commendable curiosity.



"Cucumber! Gracious goodness, my dear mamma, how very extraordinary! I always imagined, until this moment, that they grew in slices!"

HEARTH AND HOME.

EDITED BY

DONALD G. MITCHELL

AND

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

On the 26th of December will be issued the first Number of a new Rural and Family Paper, with the above title.

It will be published weekly, on sixteen large handsome Pages, printed with new Type, on clear, white Book-Paper, abundantly illustrated by the best artists.

It will be largely devoted to AGRICULTURE.

It will not go to the farmer with any airs of superior knowledge, as though he were his own special calf; every man knows that: but it will aim to aid the farmer in his peculiar difficulties, and to help him where he needs help. To this end a large number of scientific men and men of practical experience will tell in its columns the best work that they know about Soils, Tillage, Drainage, Irrigation, Special Crops, Manures, Stock-Breeding, Poultry-Raising, the Arrangements of Fields and Buildings, all New Implements, Seeds, and Plants of Value.

It will carefully report to him all public discussions of home and shrewd matters pertaining to the calling, and no pains will be spared to induce the best farmers and planters all over the country to state in its pages the methods by which they reached the best results. What its writers have to say will smell of the soil, and not of the dictionary, and their object will be to protect the farmer from humbug, to aim out of wrong ways into right ways, and to make the least work produce the most profit.

THE FRUIT-GROWER

will find in this journal all new fruits of value figured and described, with practical directions for treatment of established sorts, subject to the observations and criticisms of professional and amateur cultivators. This paper will not be a party lia the wars of the pomologists, but will present the present facts as to speak well of an inferior fruit, or badly of a good fruit.

THE FLORIST

will find due space in this journal to flower-culture, whether in summer or winter. The conservatory of the rich and the window of the day-laborer will both be subjects of consideration and of such suggestions as experienced flower-growers or lovers of amateurs can supply. This department of the journal will be under the supervision of a practical gardener and accomplished botanist.

ORNAMENTAL GARDENING,

whether relating to parterres of flowers or to the layout of an estate, will be subjects of careful attention, and every number of the journal will have some one or more illustrations of designs to inform taste in this direction.

RURAL ARCHITECTURE

will be represented by a design each week, and in the course of the year we shall hope to give tasteful examples of every class of Farm-House, Villa, and rustic arbor to a village church.

PLANS OF COUNTRY HOMES

which will stand for their attractiveness will be given from time to time, as also of cemeteries, parks, villages—with a special study each month of the best method, whether of planting or road-making—as shall make them worthy of study.

TO THE FAMILY CIRCLE

it will bring all that can interest the household: plain hints for healthy living and domestic economy, from the fishing of a napkin and the cooking of a good dinner to the education of children. It will make record of all that relates to new industries, progress in science, agreeable curiosities in Natural life, new books and favorite authors will have due notice, with choice items of domestic and foreign news. It will also bring to the Hearth the entertainment of admirable Stories by and best, the choice of good stories, and the melody of sweet songs. In these features it will be strong, original, and pure.

Mrs. Stowe,

Grace Greenwood,

Mrs. Mary E. Dodge

will contribute to every number, and many of the best writers of the country will constantly enrich the departments.

A NEW STORY,

BY

Mr. J. T. TROWBRIDGE,

ENTITLED

"IN THE ICE,"

written expressly for HEARTH AND HOME, will begin with the first Number. Any other novel followed by an original novel from the powerful pen of

Mrs. REBECCA HARDING DAVIS,

AUTHOR OF "LIFE IN THE IRON MILLS."

THE BOYS AND GIRLS

will not be forgotten, but will find their own page always lighted with such fun in pictures and such fun in stories as will make them love the paper, and look for the coming of HEARTH AND HOME. There will be riddles, and puzzles, and merry games, that shall suit women and cheerful men, who love the little people, while there shall be right lessons interwoven. And all the fun will be so tempered with good teaching that we shall hope to make them wiser and better while we make them merrier.

TO ALL WHO LIVE IN THE COUNTRY

we shall hope to bring entertainment, sound teaching, and valuable information.

Finally, we are aware that it is easy, and not unnatural to promise more than can be performed: we rely, however, upon the actual merit of our paper to secure good will to have said; and to that end we shall confidently ask the attention of every reading person, for no one can be disappointed.

NASBY'S PAPER,

THE TOLEDO BLADE.

GREAT ENLARGEMENT!
GREAT IMPROVEMENT!!

The proprietors of the TOLEDO BLADE, encouraged by the unparalleled success which has attended their efforts to establish a announce that they have just enlarged the BLADE to a MAMMOTH SHEET, by Ledger Paper, containing fifty-six broad columns, and will spare no effort to further their readers the best and cheapest paper in the world.

First-Class National Newspaper,

The Nasby Letters.

The rich, racy, rollicking humor of the Letters of "REV. PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P.P., late a Postmaster"—their quaint irony, keen sarcasm, and cutting satire—their merciless exposure of the hollowness of political demagogues or ALL PARTIES—and, withal, their profound philosophy and unanswerable arguments, have rendered them the most popular political literature ever published, to the like of any other country. These Letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

Among the new attractions already engaged for 1869 is an original story, by the brilliant and popular authoress, Miss OLIVE LOGAN, entitled

"NO WEDDING RING."

This is a story of thrilling interest and high moral tone, entrancing to the reader's attention on the first chapter and holding it unabated to the end.

We shall also shortly commence the publication of

A NEW STORY BY NASBY,

ENTITLED

THE WHITE SLAVE'S STORY!

Competent critics pronounce this one of the best stories that has ever appeared in the periodical press of the country.

We intend to continue during the year the publication of other choice stories from the pens of first writers, and will also have regular contributions on topics of general interest from writers of national reputation.

In short, it is our constant aim to make the

TOLEDO BLADE

A Perfect Family Newspaper.

49 BROADWAY, N. Y., July 6, 1866.

I have made a chemical analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs. HALL & RUSSEL, the object of the analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.

An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed for acids and other corrosive or injurious substances likely to have a detrimental action on the teeth or gums, but nothing of an objectionable character was found in its composition. THE COLLINS METAL WATCH
$20 $30 NASSAU ST.

From the New-Yorker:

THE COLLINS METAL WATCHES.

The best possible proof that a watch is more an article of necessity than of ornament, and administers constantly to the wearer's need rather than to his vanity, is the fact that no person ever wore one and then parted with it without feeling as if he had lost a faithful friend, and intelligent companion. No business man should be without a good time-keeper upon his person, as he can rely without being dependent upon others or upon public clocks, which, as "what's o'clock" at many (from pride and lack of means) refrain from purchasing a watch, lest their neighbors observe their poverty.

As an evidence of this, some twenty years ago, C. S. COLLINS, of the now celebrated firm of C. E. COLLINS & CO., and 39 Nassau Street, New York, opposite the Post-Office, after several years of critical experimenting, discovered, or rather invented, the most beautiful metallic substance known as Oroide, so nearly like gold in appearance and resistance to atmospherical influences as to be distinguished from it by the skeweddest eye or chemical test; and this remarkable and highly esteemed compound forms the beautiful casing of what are now famous throughout the United States and Canada as the Collins Oroide Watches.

MR. COLLINS has had an experience of about twenty years as a manufacturer, and with such success have his Oroide Watches proved that the Collins Company have sold over one hundred and fifty thousand (150,000) of these admirable time-keepers within the last two years. That they are also favorably to compare with the best competitive watches in the world, in respect to keeping time faithfully and continually, is significantly demonstrated by the fact that these Oroide Watches are very generally used by railroad men, engineers, officials on the principal railroads throughout the United States. When time-keepers are thus regarded as reliable preservers, little more need be said to establish their reputation for perfect time and fidelity of movements.

The Oroide Watches are in fact a triumph of art and a marvel of cheapness, when we consider that the important fact that perfect and lasting efficiency in movements, together with beautiful workmanship attained and established in a watch which for all necessary purposes, for length of use, for enduring accuracy of movements, and for appearances' sake, is to every intent and purpose a gold watch, is now within the reach of our readers in this city to call at the office of MESSRS. C. E. COLLINS & CO., 39 and 39 Nassau Street, opposite the Post-Office, and inspect these beautiful and perfectly reliable time-keepers, which are now being sold more rapidly than ever before, and which have proved themselves, and to-day are, the most reliable time-keepers in the world.

The Oroide, having been recently greatly improved, has been named after Mr. COLLINS's own name: THE COLLINS METAL. Watches made on the principle of the Collins Metal are sold throughout the country, represented as the COLLINS ONYONE, but these are base imitations of the genuine article, and should be carefully avoided. Information may be obtained by a person or sending to the office of C. E. COLLINS & CO.

☞ "DR. CHILTON'S TOILET SOAPS" are the Ladies' Watches. Those for Gentlemen are Medium and Large size.
